"Here they quietly waited till the boy pulled the hunter's coat and pointed to the cliff. "The vines hanging from the limbs of the great tree were shaking, and a low murmur at many monkey voices announced the coming of the troop. A round head peeped forth from the leaves, a hairy face, that was directly withdrawn, and its place supplied by another, older apparently, and having a look on its wrinkled visage of preternatural wisdom. This wrinkled face was followed by a grisly body, and soon an immense old fellow was clinging to the lianas and swinging himself downward. He was followed by a score or more of others, tumbling promiscuously one over each other, clutching at the vines and at one another's tails."

"At last they disappeared below the plantain-tops, and I could hear the old chief marshalling them at the foot of the cliff. "Hark!" whispered the little negro by my side, "he old man counting him macaque."

"It really seemed as though he gave the word; as, at the last grunt, there was a scampering, and the monkeys scattered themselves through the grove. Not so with the ancient; he duly felt the weight of responsibility, and did not join the rest in their sport or search for food, but ascended the ladder of vines, and perched himself in the fork of a limb overlooking the whole field."

"During this time I was most assuredly excited. By darting forward, when that chain of monkeys was suspended in mid-air, I could have got two good shots into them before they dispersed. But at least two motives restrained me: first, I wished to observe their actions; second, I shrank from killing creatures so human like. The temptation was so strong, however, that I could only withhold myself by great effort, and was trembling with excitement."

"Meanwhile, the grove was alive with monkeys, tearing down bunches of bananas and plantains, scaling the mamme trees and twisting off the fruit. In a little while one of them reached the tree beneath which we sat; a young male, about half grown, rejoicing in his strength. He saw us, and stopped. He let himself down by his tail, and commenced a series of evolutions that would have shamed an acrobat. I could not shoot, and would not sully the enjoyment by what, I could not help thinking, would be murder in the first degree."

The little man in the tree swung himself into space and disappeared. In a few minutes he came skipping gleefully along, followed by a monkey of mature years, about whose neck was dangling an infant a few months old. To her, he pointed us out. When she saw herself in such proximity to a dreaded man, an enemy of her race, "she turned about with such violence as to jerk loose the infant that clung about her neck, who fell to the ground. Maternal solicitude, even, could not arrest her flight, as she fled chattering to the vine-ladder, and hurriedly ascended it, followed by her wondering son.

"A bark from the patriarch summoned the rest of the gang so quickly, that they slid over those lianas and out of sight behind the cliff, in less time than I can write it in. Not one remained, save that infant monkey on the ground, which was just recovering its scattered senses as little Jim darted forward to secure it. Quickly as Jim rushed out, the monkey was yet more agile, and gathered himself up and leaped into a clump of razor-grass. Into this the little negro dashed, regardless of the cuts of the cruel blades.

"The razor-grass is a terrible pest in these woods, climbing into trees and overhanging trails; every leaf of it which touches you clings to you and cuts like a jagged-edged razor. Spite of his burning desire to capture a monkey, Jim was obliged to stop and disentangle himself, and before I had gained the scene, the monkey was in the lianas. Slowly and feebly it ascended, but I could not shake it down, and to shoot it was out of the question.

"As it reached the tree, its mother sprang to seize it, and glided with it into the forest, and I awoke to the fact that I had missed my opportunity, and had been spared the pain of slaying a monkey."

Lonesomeness.—A mother, busy with her household cares, was obliged to go into an upper room and leave two little ones alone for some time. So she gave them books and toys to amuse them, which answered very well for a time. But by-and-by the house seemed to grow so still and lonesome they began to feel afraid. So the eldest went to the foot of the staircase, and calling with a timid voice, said, "Mamma, are you there?" "Yes, darling," said the mother, cheerily. "All right!" said the little one, more to herself than to her mother. So she went back to her play for a time. After a while the question was repeated, with the same answer and the same result. Oh, how often in our loneliness and sadness here in the world we forget that God is still overhead! But if we only send up our prayers to him, we shall not fail to get a comforting and quieting answer. "What time I am afraid I will trust in thee." You need not fear in the darkest night or the wildest storm, for God is still overhead. "As one whom his mother comforteth," so the Lord will comfort those sorrowing ones who flee to his bosom for rest.—Presbyterian.

SAFE AT HOME.

Original.

TO THE MEMORY OF C. ALLEN HAMBLEN.

Our brother's gentle spirit's gone,
Gone, from the wintry vale of time,
Gone, where disease can never invade;
He dwells in Heaven's eternal clime.

Like as the sunbeam, pure and bright,
Gladness and joy to earth imparts;
So he, while here, by deeds of love,
Dropt bright sunshine into many hearts.

His Godly life was like the rose,
Whose fragrance fills the morning air;
The sweet perfume of his pure life,
Where'er he's been, still lingers there.

No stately monument we rear,
To mark where we his loved form lay;
His own he reared by noble deeds,
'Tis one that never will decay.

Oh thou! to whom Jehovah gave
This lovely, tender plant to rear,
Weep not; in fields of fadeless green
He blooms; and the flower to thee so dear.

THE NEW YEAR, 1880.

BY RAY PALMER.

Gone art thou, in thy turn, thou fleeting year!
E'en as thou'st spent wave dies upon the shore!
I backward glance and drop a silent tear.

As for a friend whose feet shall come no more—
Till Time of earth's last day shall sound the knell,
I hid thee, vanished year, farewell—farewell!

But farewell said, and memory charged to keep
In her still depths the annals of the past,
Which—howe'er again for a time may sleep—
Unlost, shall all again be read at last;
Once more to duty's call my ear I lend,
And onward where she leads, my steps I bend.

Year newly born! I hail thee at the goal
Whence thou dost come thy swiftly numbered days;
Whence left thy months and seasons as they roll,
And days the summer solstice's scorching blaze;
Which left behind, thou too by slow decline
Shalt waste and die—the fate of others, thine!

But ah! Thou hast thy secrets—unrevealed!
Thou bear'st a scroll wherein the pen of heaven
Hath written mysteries to be unsealed;
Unroll and read, young Year! To thee 'tis given!
What fates or fortunes—say—shall each befall
In thy swift course?—that record hides them all!

No! Heaven permits thee not, before thy hour,
Of hidden things to speak in mortal ear,
Eternal love hath kept in its own power
The things that kindle hope or waken fear;
'Tis God's great lesson, that man live to-day,
And learn to watch and wait—to trust and pray!

Yet this I know that, in thy measured round,
Whatever hath been yet shall be to men;
The changes of earth shall oft with songs resound,
And oft with groans shall echoes waken again;
All lights and shades on mortal faces rest,
And pang and pleasure mingle in each breast.

Sweet as the first notes of the early bird,
That tremble on the tranquil morning air,
Childhood's soft merry voices shall be heard
In many a happy home—safe sheltered there;
While many a mother bows her throbbing head
And weeps heart-broken o'er her loved one dead.

Thy course full many a noble deed shall show,
Wrought by heroic love that self forgot;
And hidden streams of mercy through thee flow,
That reach and cheer the lowliest in his lot;
Yet many a shameful crime shall stain thy page,
And murder grim with brutal passions rage.

Peace, here, shall bring her welcome banner wide,
And wealth and taste and art shall life adorn;
Yet, here, shall count his life's sands that have died
On bloody fields, or maimed, or still forlorn!
And rich abundance shall her garners fill,
The while devouring famine wastes at will.

To-day shall sails of prosperous commerce sweep
O'er friendly waves, where distant mariners invite;
The next, wrecked argosies enrich the deep,
Engulfed by billows tossing in their might.

Success, that yesterday his treasures kept,
To-morrow finds a waste by ruin swept!

Such good and ill, such fortunes all untold,
Such ecstasies of joy or dark despair,
O youthful Year! thy bosom doth unfold;
Unsealed as yet, they sleep unheeded there;
But, day to day, the tale by thee begun,
'Till time to tell till thy last sands are run.

I greet thee not with clouded anxious brow,
Nor pass thy portals with a bodiful dread;
But calm in hope—since hope thou dost allow—
That thou shalt pour rich blessings on my head;
Or, e'en should ills o'ertake, and shadows fall,
That thou divine shall send me good in all!

O kindly Heaven! that from our mortal sight
Vels in thick clouds what future days shall bring Nor robes the present of its golden light,
Nor checks the music which the heart would sing;
Courage, O mortal! Bid thy soul be strong;
Nor deem eternal Wisdom chooseth wrong!

What saith to thee the brightly dawning year?
'Tis wisely man! thou livest not to dream;
Life's toils await thee—its rewards are near;

Think not the seeming ills the ills they seem!
For God and duty, make each moment tell,
Till thou this year—or earth—shalt bid farewell!"

Brief Spiritual Observations.

Extracted from the Writings of Isaac Pennington
No. 4.

"True Spiritual Worship. * * * The worshipper in the times of the gospel, under the New Testament, is 'he that is born of God'; he that is drawn out of the dark spirit of this world, and formed anew in the light of God's spirit. He that is a Jew inward, but that hath the unenreimission of his heart cut off by the power of God; this is the worshipper whom 'the Father seeks to worship Him. This is the sort of worshippers God chooses when he cast off the Jews. God did not choose any one nation, or many nations instead of that one which He cast off; but He sent his apostles and ministers among all nations to gather a spiritual seed instead of a natural."

"The only place of worship in the New Testament, is where the spiritual worshippers meet together. The place is spiritual. As the worship is spiritual, so is the place where it is to be offered. It hath a spiritual consideration; not outward as under the law. It is to be offered in the spirit; that is the place where doth my soul offer his private worship to God? Hath it relation to any outward place? or is it in the building which God hath reared up in my heart by his Spirit? And I can offer his public worship in no other place, but in a building of the same nature in a house built of mortals of the same stones * * * In the holy city, in the living temple, which is built by God, of the stone which all other builders refuse, is the place of the worship of the living God, where the true Jews meet to offer up their spirits, souls, and bodies, a living sacrifice to the Father of life and where they meet with such a glorious presence and power of the Father, as none but the true Jews were ever acquainted with."

"Concerning Prayer. Prayer is the breath of the living child to the Father of life, in that Spirit which quickened it, which giveth it the right sense of its wants, and suitable cries proportionable to its state, in the proper season thereof. So that mark: prayer is holly out of the will of the creature, wholly out of the time of the creature, wholly out of the power of the creature; in the Spirit of the Father, who is the fountain of life, and the fourth breathings of life to his child at his pleasure."

"The gospel church is the spiritual house of Jacob, who walk in the light of the Lord, Isaiah ii. 5, who go up to the mountain of the Lord, (to that which is revealed to be the mountain of God in the last days, even spiritual Mount Zion, Heb. xii. 22.) to the house of the fount of Jacob, where he teacheth his spiritual people, the inward Jews, of his ways, and they learn to walk in his paths: for out of his Zion shall go forth the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, (in the days of the gospel) and the word of the Lord from this Jerusalem. For Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of all the children that are born of God's spirit, Gal. iv. 26, John i. 6. And she being the mother of them all, nourisheth them all with the word of life, which goeth forth from her."

"The true gospel ministers are those whom Christ sends forth, in the spirit and power of his Father, to gather and build up his church, Christ had all power in heaven and earth given Him, even to this very end, to gather, defend, and build up his church: and He bid his apostles wait for the same power; and sends forth his ministers in the same power, which they may be able ministers of the gospel, which is not in words but power, even the power of God unto salvation. The new covenant stands not in the letter, but in the spirit and power; and they that are ministers of it, must receive life, spirit, and power from Christ, (the Head) and minister in that Spirit, life and power to the members, or they cannot nourish and build them up; yea, they must preach and minister to the world in it, if they are not able to gather out of the world into it. * * *

"The gospel state, the gospel church, the gospel building, begins in the power, and is carried out in the power, and finished or perfected in the power; and the whole ministry of the gospel is to partake of this power, and minister in it, or they can do nothing in this work."

Sanctification and Justification. "That which is holy is righteous; there is nothing righteous in the eyes of the pure God but that which is holy. The Head was really holy and righteous, and they that are in Him partake of his holiness and righteousness, and are really holy and righteous in Him; and faith, which purifies the heart, and through which sanctification is, must needs be in order of nature before the justification which is by it; for God justifieth no unbelievers, but believers only. Yea, the wicked must forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and turn unto the Lord; which cannot possibly be without some degree of sanctification, before the Lord will have mercy, and pardon the soul its sins. For God justifieth no man as ungodly; but calleth upon men to repent, and turn from their ungodliness, and He will have mercy upon them, justify and save them. Now men are not ungodly in turning from their ungodliness, unt changed; and so their state is in some measure changed before justified. * * * There is no man justified by the Lord till he is changed, translated unto Him [Christ] in whom God justifieth, out of the place of condemnation into the place of justification. For all men are changed by the Spirit and power of the Lord, they are but darkness, and in the darkness, where no justification is. It is the believing, the obedient, the children of light, that are justified by the Lord. * * * God sent Christ to renew, to redeem, to change, to make holy and righteous, to make people such as the Father might be pleased with, accept and justify; and as Christ maketh them so, the Father receiveth and accepteth them as such. But God doth distinguish and call things as they are. He doth not call an ungodly man a holy man, a justified man; but when He hath changed him, new created him in Christ Jesus, taken him out of his old stock and planted him into the new, then He accounteth and calleth him so, and not before. * * *

Holiness, though it may be distinguished, yet it cannot be divided from righteousness; nor can a man possibly be righteous in God's sight, unless he be also holy in some measure."

"Now the things of the kingdom are all at the disposal of the King thereof. To Him all power is given, in Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge; He hath life in himself, and He hath life to dispose of, and dispense to his people. He gives the true knowledge, which is life eternal; He gives repentance, and remission of sins. He teacheth to believe in the Father, and He giveth faith also. He is the Shepherd of the sheep, who by his voice quickeneth, and maketh alive, and lea-leth, and preserveth, and nourisheth up to life eternal. Therefore, whoever will understand aright, must receive understanding from Him; whoever will repent aright, must receive repentance from Him; whoever will believe aright, must receive faith from Him; whoever will hear and see aright, must receive an ear and an eye from Him; and whoever will come unto Him, and receive Him, must witness the new heart forming or forming in him, wherewith and whereby He is received. Men greatly mistake and err about the gospel knowledge and religion, by beginning therein without the gospel spirit and power."

"Oh! away with empty notions, and come to the ministration of the Spirit, where the knowledge is living, the faith is victorious, the love is pure and undefiled, the worship truly spiritual, even flowing from, and comprehended in, the life and virtue of the Spirit. Oh! that all that truly breathe after the Lord, might be gathered here, be found here, and dwell here. Amen."

The Independent Catholic Church.

This remarkable movement, initiated by Bishop MacNamara over two years since in our city, is growing in interest daily, and assuming proportions which its most sanguine supporters did not anticipate in so short a time. Large crowds of Irish Roman Catholics are drawn to the services held in the University and Clarendon halls, at which many of the hearers are first taught to think intelligently over the errors of their church. The plan adopted by the bishop and his co-laborers in the cause is first to break the faith of their hearers in the dogmas and traditions of Rome, showing that the church is simply an Italian organization which has for its work the enslaving, body and soul, of the Irish, as well as of others, under its baleful sway. These people grasp the fact for the first time that the system, under the false guise of religion, crushes and swallows up the energies of the people. In proportion as this is realized by the attentive and willing hearers, they begin to grasp at the truths laid before them, and lose all faith in infallibility, Mariology, the immaculate conception, and everything else which is essentially Romish and P'pal. Then selections from the Old and New Testaments are read, and the divine truths therein contained explained in a simple manner, fitted to the understanding of those who hear them for the first time. Nothing is put before the people which is not plainly evident in the Holy Scriptures.

It must not be forgotten that the great majority of those who attend these meetings have had no chance given them to learn the great truths of the redemption offered up on Calvary. Their system of religion holds its great power, not by instructing the masses, but by holding them in a state of ignorance. They are taught that faith in the dogmas of the church, and that alone, is essential to salvation. An atonement was made, but the atonement is invalid and of no avail, should the simplest ordinances of the church be broken, or should the sinner attempt to pray to his God in any other form than that prescribed by Rome. It has been a difficult task, and one which has so far failed in its object, to attract the impulsive Irish Catholics to any place or to any speaker, when the Romish Church was the subject of discussion. This was owing to the fact that the church saw its great strength lay in the complete isolation of its people, in a religious way, from the Protestant portion of the community. It was not only allowable, but most desirable, that money should be made off the latter, but otherwise no communication should be allowed; and particularly was it ordained that all Catholics entering a Protestant place of worship committed a deadly sin. Thus no wholesome good has been possible, until Bishop MacNamara, one of themselves, a man against whose moral character nothing could be said, realizing the errors and wickedness of the false religion which he had preached for so long a time, determined to retrace his steps and do what he could to bring his people out of the house of bondage.

The crucified Saviour is held up before the people as the only means of salvation, and gladly accepted. It may be said that the common people hear Him gladly, and, as in old, the fruits of his preaching are more evident daily and weekly. Hundreds of Irish Roman Catholics have renounced Rome and her doctrines. In response to a demand whether it was not their will to abandon their old belief, seven hundred on one Sunday held up their hands and responded aye, and during the last four weeks upward of two thousand have done the same. During the past week a priest called on the bishop, and after a detailed and critical examination into the work, its history and its aims, renounced on his knees the errors of Rome, and has entered into the new work, and gives evidence that he is a changed man. Another priest, a doctor of divinity, and much respected in Boston, has given himself to the work there. Letters are received not only from all parts of the United States, but also from foreign countries, from priest and laymen, who have heard of the work, and seek fuller information as to its progress.

A great movement has been inaugurated successfully in Boston, to which city Bishop MacNamara paid a visit on the occasion of the attacks made by Archbishop Williams and Father Scully on the common schools of Massachusetts. It was feared that great opposition would be met with, but such was not the case, for the Irish filled the churches and endorsed what the bishop said. They declared, openly, that they were American Irish, and that their children must be educated in American and not Roman schools, and that in the future they would never again be ridden over by bishops or priests. The facts laid before these people opened their eyes, and the errors of Rome were for the first time shown up in a way that they could appreciate. The People's Church (Methodist), Grace Church (Methodist) and the Chambers Street Church (Presbyterian), were filled with crowds who were addressed by Bishop MacNamara and Father O'Connor, and many publicly came forward and renounced their church. Some of the most intelligent of the Roman Catholics in Boston attended the meetings and endorsed the movement, and preparations are complete to have a mass-meeting in the Music Hall of that city; as also a series of lectures on the errors of the Romish Church.

The outward opposition is dying away here, and bullies are no longer sent to the meetings to annoy the preachers and disturb the congregations, but the Church of Rome still continues to work against the movement, quietly, and in an underhand way. Her vigilance never sleeps, and she is constantly devising plots against the Protestant liberties of our country and carrying them on to a successful issue. The voice of the people has, however, been heard more than once lately, when the church, forgetting her prudence, threw off her cloak and fulminated her anathemas against the public schools and those who frequented them; and consequently the raid is discontinued for a time. So with the MacNamara movement, the public opposition has dwindled away, the converts being attacked secretly and in their homes, as this alone is considered safe, a public demonstration being feared as inevitable were the preachers to meet with any harm.

The name of this religious movement was originally the Irish Catholic Church, but this was found to interfere in a manner with many Roman Catholics other than Irish, and the name was changed to the Independent Catholic Church. The services are essentially and strictly Protestant, of the simplest type and devoid of all the glitter and gold which are all that the Romish Church can show, if we except a few dry bones, the remains of reputed, but very doubtful, saints. Certain names, beloved by those who have been Roman Catholics, are retained, such as father, priest, and bishop, to show that although these priests have left Rome, they have not deserted their flocks, but are bringing them also. These ministers of the pure gospel object to being styled ex-priests, saying as they do, that they have only left behind what was base, and retained all worth retaining in the priesthood. The movement is now no longer an experiment, but a fixed certainty; it is the Lord's work and pleasing in his eyes. Only those who have watched closely the heavy struggle through which Father MacNamara has passed, can appreciate the vast amount of work he has accomplished in little more than a year. But he had a backer more powerful even than the powerful Church of Rome, and when all other friends failed him, the Lord God of his people stood by him, a very present help in time of need. No appeal has ever been made to the American people; the poor Irish, out of the little left them by their church, have supported this movement unassisted. It is now the intention of the bishop and his brothers in the Lord to secure a piece of ground and erect thereon a temporary building as the first church of the Independent Catholics.

This movement, especially among the Irish, is the natural uprising of a people who have for centuries desired a closer communion with their Lord and Saviour, but who, to suit the grasping policy of the Romish Church, have been obliged to accept a stone when they demanded bread. The Irish are essentially a religious people, and have impoverished themselves to build up the church which kept them in ignorance. But the hour and the man have come, and the enslaved people are freeing themselves at last from the arms of the octopus which has drained their life's blood and that of their nation. One most favorable symptom of the great change is the coming out of the women, who have been the victims of the confessional and the right hand of the church.—The Methodist, N. Y.

Southern Refugees.

For "The Friend."

A letter from a Friend at Baxter Springs, Kansas, dated 1st mo. 10th, says:

"Information reached here last Friday, that there were a number of the 'Exodus' people from Texas at Chetopa, in a suffering condition. I hitched up my team next morning and took them 900 lbs. of corn meal—it was a hard trip—the mud many places nearly hub deep and very sticky. We got there just at night, inquired for the Methodist minister, who I had learned was doing all he could to relieve them; he was glad to learn that I had something for them, as it was the first to come in from the country. He went with me to see some of them next day, we spent until noon visiting and did not get to see all either. They are crowded into buildings that are not fit in most instances for stock; in one building we found seven families, they had to pay $1.50 per month for each room; in one room there were three families, they had the last of their provision on cooking; yet it was consoling to see their faith that their Heavenly Father would provide; also some that had nothing to eat. In another room we found a woman that had just been confined, and her husband had died a short time before; an old woman who was with her, said she had not enough clothing for a change, but little else than corn bread to eat, and was thankful to get that. In another house we found five persons down sick—one with the hiccoughs and lung fever—it looked like it was almost impossible for them to get well. But I have not time to enumerate all of the sad situations I found them in. They say that there are many on the way; some have lost their teams and are waiting for those who have got through to send them help, but it is impossible for them to do so; also there are hundreds who will come as soon as they get money enough. It seems to me it would cause the heart to be sad of any one to hear them recite the wrongs they have received, and those who are left behind are receiving, at the hands of the Southern people.

The subject will be laid before our next

Monthly Meeting, and I think a committee will be appointed to look after the matter. We learn there are a great many at Osawatomie and Parsons, who are in a worse condition than those at Chetopa. We have brought of here eighteen, and there are three more of the same family left at Chetopa, one of them was taken sick, and the other two staid to take care of him, who will come soon. We think it best to get them out in the country, as they can become self-sustaining much sooner than in town."

The Colored Refugees.

Since the first of the Eleventh month, have sent to our friend Eliz. L. Comstock for the relief of the colored refugees in Kansas, 44 barrels, 10 boxes, and 32 bales of cloth and iron ware, one box bibles, three box soap—in all 96 packages. A great many of these articles have been sent to me in small parcels, from individuals or from sewing societies in this city and vicinity, and have been made up into boxes and bales. About seven barrels have been received from different parts of New England, (North Ferrisbur, Salem, Lynn, New Bedford, Falmouth, Wren, &c.,) and the remainder from towns, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware. Wherever the packages contain marks or names by which the donors can be known, written acknowledgments have been sent; but a very large proportion of the articles received, have not been so marked, that it has been impossible to know from whose sources they came. This will explain to some who have advised me of shipments, but who have had no acknowledgment of their receipt here.

I would suggest to any who may see articles in the future, that to secure acknowledgment the name of the shipper should be distinctly marked on each package.

The Pennsylvania Railroad and the Chicago and Alton Railroad Co., have very generously carried the goods over their respective roads, free of charge. In addition to the above there have been contributions in money to the amount of $493. All of which has been forwarded to E. L. C. The freight paid on goods received here, cost of re-packing, drayage, &c., having been paid without using any of the funds intended for the relief of the refugees.

From letters received from different persons, it is learned that the emigrants are still pouring into Kansas in a very destitute condition, and that the necessity for relief is not diminished. E. L. Comstock writes, under date of 1st mo. 18th: "We are in distress for want of money to buy food, fuel and medicine and to provide shelter. Help us speedily or great suffering, starvation, freezing and death will prevail to a terrible extent. Refugees continue to come in crowds. We need folks to fill with straw: more than 1000 are without a bed of any kind."

This last call has been answered in part by shipment to-day of material for about 20 beds. To the very urgent demand for money to buy food and fuel, there should be a prompt and generous response. Money (which is best in bank drafts) may be sent direct to E. L. Comstock, Topeka, Kansas, or to the undersigned.

For "The Friend."

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

10th mo. 27th, 1866. Crossed the river and sailed to see James Watt, talked with him in relation to the Indians and gave advice in regard to their business—pressing upon him the necessity of their being more industrious in clearing up and farming their land, putting good buildings, and that which is of much more importance, to love and endeavor to live life of obedience to their Divine Master. Then speaking freely to him I encouraged him to speak so to me, which he did, giving views in regard to religion, objecting to some of the practices of some of the white people, which no doubt has been a cause of stumbling to some of the Indians. Called to Jos. Snow—had a pleasant visit with him. On Ray coming to see me, had a satisfactory interview with him.

28th.—First day. Sat meeting with the Society and Benj. Pierce, an Indian,—a comfortable meeting. In the afternoon had the company of a number of Indians (10). Parted with them with friendly feelings. Trust we are all agree thankful. As the time of parting drew near, the friendly feelings grew stronger, and a good degree peaceful and quiet in mind looking towards leaving for home.

30th. Got up early to go to Randolph, to catch the train on the railroad for home. I was desirous not to leave anything undone; breakfast about 3 A. M., and went down to the river, the rains had raised it so much I thought it dangerous to drive our horses rough and returned to Tennessee; although something of a disappointment, I think I felt a desire the Great Head of the Church might control my movements. I did not know but that there might be something more to do for the Indians up the river. While waiting for the boat to be put in order, I had conversation with one of the daily, encouraging the individual to faithful-ness in little things. Two of the women wished to go to Randolph to buy some things for their family, I thought I felt (at) liberty to go with them and Abner, to take the cars, and I feel in a degree thankful for liberty and ease of mind to return home. I esteem it a great favor to feel so, and was favored to get me safely. May I remember these blessings with gratitude to the Great Head of the Church, and be more humble and faithful." After his return home, he appears to have been engaged in visiting, with M. C., the meetings composing his own Quarterly Meeting.

12th mo. 26th. "I have been much favored meetings to have my mind composed, and rust at seasons experienced some qualification to worship; less troubled with drowsiness.

1867. 1st mo. 31. I have of late at seasons passed through some close trials; was favored enjoy our week-day meeting to-day—may be an improvement in best things.

14th. Was much favored yesterday in meeting to have my mind drawn inward, and rust was favored with some ability to serve my Divine Master, who is forever worthy; may all serve Him from the least to the greatest. Attended the funeral of Nathan Kite; as satisfied that I was there; another warning of the uncertainty of time.

25th. Attended a meeting of the sub-committee on Indian affairs on account of an offer a man and his wife to go to Tennessee; returned comforted with a hope I had been in my proper place, although I felt at times much weakness.

28th. L. E. and I visited two members—they reported clear of using spirituous liquors as a drink; spoke to them of the danger of neglecting our religious meetings. May our humble labors be blessed to the careless and indifferent, that they may be favored to feel more the importance of attending to their religious duties.

21 mo. 5th. Attended the Monthly Meeting, and I think was in unmerited mercy favored to have my mind gathered to Him who can strengthen and stay us. There were three passings, and a number who were not members came to be present. I suffered much with fear lest allowing such liberty might be opening a door that might be hard to close, and a departure from the discipline and the practices of the Society. I thought if we were favored and the meeting closed comfortably, the praise is all due to the Great Head.

6th. Was favored as I lay awake this morning, to feel very comfortable, and I trust, my weakness and shortcomings, and a degree of faith. Oh! that I was entirely given up to serve my Creator.

In company with E. S. and T. S., attended Uchelan Monthly Meeting; felt satisfied in having been there, after which we went on towards Robeson; the roads not being good, staid all night at Springfield, went to Robeson Monthly Meeting in the morning; it was small and in a weak condition. Oh that the members were enough concerned for their spiritual welfare as individuals and for their little meeting. After meeting left for home; the afternoon was wet and foggy; night came on us and it seemed difficult to reach the place where we had intended going, and put up at the Eagle tavern, where we were quietly and kindly entertained; got home next day; perhaps all were satisfied that we had been at the two Monthly Meetings.

21st. Attended our week-day meeting at Marshalton, to me a precious and memorable meeting; my mind, I trust, being gathered to Him who can minister true comfort and qualify for worship, and who is worthy to be praised.

31 mo. 2d. I think I have not for years enjoyed meeting more than for the last few weeks, which I esteem an unmerited favor. Oh! may these opportunities be improved, and may there be fruits to the Great Head of the Church.

28th. Oh! the necessity of keeping on the watch, trying to keep near to the Great Head of the Church, and as humble as a little child.

4th mo. 24th. T. S. and I went to see a member, was kindly treated by him and his wife, spoke to them on the subject of attending our religious meetings; met with another member who neglected our meetings, to whom I also spoke of the importance of attending our religious meetings.

4th mo. 1867. Attended the Meeting for Sufferings and the Yearly Meeting for Ministers and Elders, both of which I think were favored meetings, particularly so the latter.

15th. The general Yearly Meeting commenced; it was thought, through unmerited mercy (to be) wonderfully favored through its different sittings, and ought to be remembered with feelings of gratitude by all the rightly concerned members of our religious Society.

5th mo. 4th. Although I have of latter time felt great weakness, at seasons almost amounting to discouragement, at other times have been much favored and helped to my encouragement; may there be an increase of dedication to the Master's service.

19th.—First-day. Was much favored in meeting to feel for myself and others who meet with us,—in the evening was truly comforted and encouraged.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 31, 1880.

The words of encouragement which occasionally reach the conductors of "The Friend" are felt to be strengthening and cheering—and so are those contributions to its columns which evidently flow from a fresh feeling of religious concern in the minds of the writers. These are valued, not merely for the assistance they render in filling its columns, but much more for the evidence they furnish that Friends who are widely scattered as to their outward habitations, are dwelling under the government of the same Spirit, are walking in the same pathway, and are brought under exercise for the promotion of the same glorious cause of truth and righteousness in the earth.

A valued Friend in Indiana writes to us: "I often feel a regret that I am not more capable of contributing to the interest of [The Friend], as I highly value it, and think it is filling an important and useful place in our tribulated Society. I do believe it has been a great stay to many of our tried members. I wish it could have a far greater circulation in Indiana. * * I hope the cause of Primitive Quakerism (as we may call it) will still survive all; though the struggle in places seems hard and the prospect gloomy."

Another correspondent speaks of the grave apprehensions caused by "the signs of the times, with the actions of some meetings," and expresses the sincere hope that "modified Quakerism will never find a nesting place in our borders." He thinks "the danger lies in being tempted to believe that the religion of the cross is too hard and exacting; and hence, tired of stemming a continual current—tired of the battle that is with burning and fuel of fire, such are in danger of taking up with a false rest—a rest short of that prepared for the people of God. The novel doctrines of the day are just calculated to catch such. How appropriate now-a-days is the ancient language 'Watch ye, stand fast in the faith, &c.'" And he adds the desire, "May our petitions be fervent to the God of all power, grace and comfort, that He will cause the setting-in wave of degeneracy to be turned back; cause his banner to be displayed, his outstretched arm to be magnified, and the might of his spirit so manifested, that the people (innovators) shall hear and be afraid," &c.

Another valued Friend after stating that he had been reading the "editorial relating to the Home and Foreign Mission project, with great satisfaction," and referring to that scheme as an evidence that "the Society has shrined from her ancient anchorage," closes with some comforting expressions, which we hope may prove comforting to others than ourselves: "It feels to me as I write, as if there were words of encouragement still to be proclaimed for the help of all those who are concerned to stand upon the one foundation and to build thereon. The Lord will yet give strength unto his people—He will bless his people with peace."

In a recent visit to a section of country which one hundred years ago was settled by Friends; but where now few or no members of our branch of the Christian Church reside; some serious thoughts were awakened as the mind mused on the changes which the lapse of time brings to pass.

Doubtless in former times there were many valuable Friends residing among its hills and cultivating the soil, which, though not very fertile, yielded them the necessaries of life, while it did not expose them to the temptations incident to a rapid increase of worldly riches. They had their trials both outward and inward. They encountered losses, privations, sickness and death; even as their successors in the present generation. Like these, they were Divinely visited by the Day-spring from on high, endured the refining operations of the Grace of God which bringeth salvation, and were often filled with earnest concern for the spiritual welfare of their brethren, and with desires to promote the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom among men. Those of them who patiently endured the Saviour's baptism with the Holy Ghost and with fire, and continued to trust in Him and to be in subjection to his government, received the end of their faith, even the salvation of their souls, having finished their allotted portion of service for their Master. The sentiment so beautifully expressed by Samuel Petherig was brought to remembrance: "Upon all the glory of the earth, and all its enjoyments, upon every visible thing, one inscription is written, as the immutable law and determination of Him whose name is the Most High; 'They shall perish.' Equally fixed is the subsequent truth, the joy and the song of many generations, 'But thou remainest.'"

On those now living who obey the heavenly call, rest the barthens which our forefathers bore. We must experience the same extending of Heavenly help, must in like manner bow in submission to its leadings, must pass through those refining dispensations which the Lord sees meet to cleanse us from the pollutions of flesh and spirit, and must travail in exercise not only for ourselves, but for the help of others and of the church at large. The Church on earth is necessarily in a militant state, fighting against self and sin and error. Yet how consoling it is to remember that the Lord sitteth King in Zion, his dominion is an everlasting dominion, and of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end. May all our readers have their faith in his goodness and power renewedly strengthened, be animated with a quickened desire to do his will in all things, and be confirmed in the feeling that He will carry on his own work in the accord according to his own glorious plans—plans which are far beyond our comprehension.

We have received from Porter & Coates a copy of the "Reminiscences of Levi Coffin," who was born in North Carolina, but resided for many years in Indiana and Ohio. He early imbibed a strong feeling of the wrongfulness of slavery, and of sympathy with those in bondage. Many of those, who had escaped from their masters, he was instrumental in concealing and in assisting to find a safe place of refuge. The pages of the book are mainly filled with incidents connected with these events; and will furnish valuable materials to the student who endeavors to form a just conception of the system of slavery as it existed in this country.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—There was a decided increase in the business of the Philadelphia Post-office last year over the transactions of 1878. The receipts from the sale of stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards, were $1,102,879.66. The matter delivered by the carriers consisted of 89,096,350 letters, 10,826,631 cards, 10,950,060 papers, and 3,191,255 circulars, and their collections were 32,323,295 letters, 8,107,222 cards, and 6,225,146 papers. The registry department handled letters and packages to the number of 432,546. In the money department the total amount of domestic orders issued, reached $801,005.84, while the payment summed up $2,392,176.61. The international orders aggregated $1,000,000, and the payments $511,145.64. The remittances from Postmasters reached $1,474,651.71.

The receipts of the Commissioner of City Property last year amounted to $208,791.48, of which $51,457.50 was from markets, $44,533 from wharves and landing, $10,172 from city property rentals, and $102,605.98 from sale of city property.

The total exports to foreign ports from Philadelphia, during 1879, were valued at $50,085,838. One seventh of these were carried in American vessels, and one half went to Great Britain. They were chiefly made up of 229,000,057 bread-stuffs, $6,777,296 provisions, and $7,320,000 petroleum. There were 62,635 tons of coal exported.

During last year 8246 male and 4337 female immigrants arrived at this port.

During 1879, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals received 395 complaints, 974 warrants, 1200 horses and mules, and were turned out of harness, and 88 animals were killed.

A report being circulated in Augusta, Maine, that the Fusionists were preparing to attack and capture the State House, the Republican authorities called out the militia, and three companies now garrison the State House.

Governor Blackburn, of Kentucky, has recently pardoned eighty-seven convicts in the penitentiary at Frankfort. The reason given for this clemency, is the unhealthy condition of the prison and its inmates.

The German citizens of Petersburg, Va., have made a liberal contribution for the relief of the famine stricken in Upper Silesia, Germany.

Large sums of money are being forwarded for the relief of the sufferers in Ireland—where the distress seems to be increasing. The famine is the result of wet weather, which caused the loss of the potato crop, and prevented the people from drying peat for fuel.

The heaviest snow storm of the present season in Wisconsin prevailed on the 21st and 22d of the month. In the northern section of the State the snow is from two to three feet deep. In the vicinity of Philadelphia the snow is quite common very early in the southern exposures, early spring flowers have been found.

The crop report of the Board of Agriculture of Illinois shows that the wheat acreage of that State is 2,658,826 acres, or 25 per cent. more than last year.

It is estimated that there are about 60,000 Mennonites in America. They have 500 meeting-houses, one-eighth of that number being in Canada. They are nearly all farmers.

The following nominations of the President were confirmed by the Senate on the 29th inst., to be Ministers Plenipotentiary to Great Britain—James M. Smith; to Great Britain; John W. Foster, to Russia; Lucius Fairchild, to Spain, and Phillip H. Morgan to Mexico.

The mortality in Philadelphia for the week ending on the 24th, was 274, being 11 more than the previous week, and 30 less than for corresponding week last year. 1879, 104; 1878, 84; 1877, 104; 1876, 104; 1875, registered, 102; comon, 104; 43's, 107; 4's, 107, 104.

Trade in most departments has been less active during the past week, and prices of several of the leading articles were somewhat unsettled and lower.

Wool, outcomes, per lb., of middlings are reported at 13 a 13 1/2 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7 cts. in barrels, and refined 6 cts. for export, and 8 1/2 cts. per gallon for home use. Flour is dull and quiet, for $9.50 for 48 lbs. of Minnesota extra at $9.50 a $9.75; Penna. do. do., $9.50 a $9.75; west do. do., at $9.75 a $9.75; patent and other high grade at $7.50 a $8.25. Rye flour, 5 a 5.25 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is dull—red, $1.35 a $1.85; and $1.39 a $1.40. Rye, 88 a 90 cts. Corn, mixed; yellow, 37 a 38 cts.; white, 39 cts. Oats, 47 a 48 1/2 cts. Flour were in fair demand and prices were steady; 2842 head sold at the different yards at 33 a 34 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were in demand and a shade higher; 6 head sold at the different yards at 43 a 61 cts. per head, and lambs at 75 cts.

Hogs were dull and a fraction lower; 6000 sold the different yards at 6 a 7 cts. per lb.

Cows were in fair demand; 190 head sold at $5 $50 per head.

FOREIGN.—On the morning of the 21st, an explosion occurred in the Lyceum Gallery, near New Cadet, 77, of whom 70 were killed.

In London, the Attorney-General of the Post-office has applied for an injunction to restrain the Telephone Companies from discharging the functions for which they were called into existence. The argument on behalf of the post-office is, that telephones are telegrams within the meaning of the act by which the latter conventions were committed to the charge of the Post-Office Department, and after spending millions on telegraph they now find their monopoly interfered with by what they claim to be public utilities.

The London correspondent of the Manchester Guardian says, that the Royal Academy has resolved to admit women to membership, subject to certain disabilities including the deprivation of the right to vote at elections and attendance at the annual banquet.

In a recent speech at Birmingham, John Bright expressed the opinion that Parliament should appoint a Commission to go to Dublin to assist the tenants in purchasing lands where the landlord was willing to sell—that it advance three-fourths of the purchase-money, principal and interest to be repaid in thirty-five years. Such a measure he believed would meet the wants and satisfy the desires of the Irish people.

The Standard's Constantinople dispatch asserts that terrible distress prevails in Adrianople. A number persons have been found dead from hunger.

The intelligence has been published at Lisbon, that the exploring expedition under Henry M. Stanley established the first Belgian trading station in Congo near Yallaha, which place is claimed by both England and Portugal.

A disastrous fire occurred in Tokio, Japan, on the 26th of last month, which destroyed 13,000 houses, a rendered 50,000 people homeless. The loss of life thought to be about 100. The pecuniary loss is not great as might be supposed, owing to the cheap construction of most of the houses.

The Experience of a Friend who was Drafted.

[The following interesting narrative, asated by the sufferer, is taken from the My-Star, a small paper published in Iowa—giving only the name of the friend, who is still living, and is well known to many of our readers.—Ed.]

In the year 1864 I was drafted, according to the laws of the land, and one day while pleasantly enjoying the company of some intimate friends at my house, also surrounded by my own dear family, a stranger abruptly entered inquiring if I lived here. I replied, "Yes, he, without further ceremony, drew from his pocket an order from the Provost Marshal of that district, and read nearly as follows: "You are legally drafted into the militia of the United States for the term of one year, and you are required to present yourself at my office at Alliance—day of —, in order to be mustered into service. Refusing to comply with this, you will be treated as a deserter, and subject to be punished to the utmost extent of the law; given up to the military authorities." J. F. Oliver, Provost Marshal."

I repaired at an early date, or previous to the time specified, and had an opportunity to see the officers assembled there, the reasons why I could not comply with the order; that I was conscientious against taking the life of my fellow men, or in any way taking part in the war spirit, believing it to be direct opposition to the command of our Lord, "Thou shalt not kill," and therefore I did not expect to report myself at the time specified. I returned to my home; but in a few days, an officer or deputy called at my home, and commanded me to get ready in a few minutes, as he desired to return by train to the Columbian station, in order to go to Alliance immediately.

Thus in a few minutes I had to part with my family, not knowing how long I should be detained from home, or whether I should ever be permitted to see them again. On nearing the station he asked me what he should do with me while he drove out nearly a mile to the farm in Wm. Nicholas. I told him I should let him to any trouble; that wherever he sent me, there he would find me. He soon returned, and in a short time we were pushing our way to Alliance. After arriving and being conducted to the marshal's office, they took our papers, complexion, &c., so that we could be easily identified, or picked up if we ran away. They then wanted us to dress in soldiers' clothes; this we could not do, therefore they took my friend into another room.

Notwithstanding my dismal forebodings of the future, I could not avoid smiling when my friend came out and told me that when he was being dressed he said to the officer, "This is the first time I have been dressed since my mother dressed me, having had uninterrupted good health." Then came my turn, and I discovered the officer found it a heavy job, for he often sighed deeply, and I was handled as carefully as if I had just recovered from a spell of sickness. He was about adding haversack, canteen, &c. I told him I did not expect to use them, so he let me go without. Through their persuasion I so far consented as to take pen in hand, and was just in the act of signing my name to what proved to be the muster roll, thinking that notwithstanding these clothes were forced on us against our will, it would thus do to sign my name to certify I had received them. While reflecting William came, (he having been in another part of town and felt an impression to come immediately to the office,) and accosted me thus, "What is thee doing?"

I replied, "I have just been considering whether I should sign my name to this."

He answered, "I would do no such thing."

I requested an hour to consider it. Having privilege to walk about town, we retired to a wood near by; endeavoring in silent retirement to draw near unto the Lord, that we might be kept from doing wrong by attending to that which He might instruct us to do, or leave undone.

We soon returned, and as I entered the office strength seemed given me to stand firm. The language ran through my mind: let them do their worst. I told them I could not sign it. They still urged, by persuasion and threats, but without avail. Some of the officers spoke in an undertone to each other, in an adjoining room, saying, "We will send them to the rendezvous at Columbus, then they will make them squirm."

We were assigned to the care of a young man to guard us over night, who took us to a large warehouse where many of his comrades with himself, were making merry over what seemed to them our calamity. When they ceased their loud talking I fell asleep and slept sweetly, but awoke up in the night, at first somewhat troubled with my situation. I was nevertheless favored with a precious covering of Divine regard, and refreshed in having brought to my remembrance, as though spoken to me, "Be of good cheer, Paul, thou shalt testify of me at Jerusalem, thou shalt also bear witness of me at Rome;" (The names of Alliance and Columbus standing for Jerusalem and Rome.) I soon fell asleep, and when I awoke the sun was breaking forth in the east, and in a few minutes we were hurried out to take the earliest train to Columbus; the young man taking the precaution to buckle on a belt in which he thrust a horse-pistol. I told him he need not carry this on our account, as we would not run away or put him to trouble. Still he sat close by us in the car, and in changing cars seemed to urge us to get quickly on the train leading to Columbus. On nearing this place, being seated in the smoking car—as it would not do for such persons as us to occupy or sit in a first class car among the finely dressed and travelling public—I was favored with such a tide of the water of life flowing into my soul that there was not room to receive it; and it flowed back to our ever present and glorious Shepherd in a song of praise; and as the whistle blew and the cars came to a stand, words ceased to flow, and I was ushered into a tranquil, quiet, trusting adoration of Him to whom alone praise is due.

When nearing the barracks the sight of the guards with their bayonets glistening in the morning sunlight produced no fear, the fear of man being taken away. Being handed over to the officer in charge, we were soon inside, the massive doors shutting out the world of beauty, but in fond memory I was back again mingling with dear friends and loved ones at home.

After our names were taken we were assigned to certain quarters. I soon found that we were in the hands of unprincipled men, with a board fence 12 feet high encircling perhaps eight acres, with sentinels but a few rods apart inside and outside walking their beats. Inside this fence were many large two-story buildings, all fronting a tall flag-staff in the center.

Soon after rising in the morning we were called into line by the tap of the drum, and were expected to answer to our names, and march in with ten or twelve hundred men to breakfast, this we did not feel free to do, nor to join in the ranks to drill, so we were reported by the officer of our barracks up to the Major General. When we came before him we found a man tremulous with rage. After he had spent himself in railing out against us, my friend was about to reply, when he forbade him, saying: "Not a word out of your mouth! Your stubbornness may even be the means of causing a mutiny among my men, but you are not to have your way;" and closing with "Now go back to your quarters, and when you are commanded to drill, drill! You will have to do it, even if we have to place two bayonets before and two behind you, or if we have to run them into you." Then we returned to our quarters, and that afternoon all were desired to come out and range themselves in front of the barracks; this we could not do, feeling that it was contrary to the commands and precepts of our Saviour, and especially we feared to do despite to the spirit of grace made manifest in the heart.

In the afternoon we were nearly alone, while almost agonizing I was made willing, or drawn to bow in great prostration of soul, to put up my cries and tears to Israel's unslumbering Shepherd, craving with much earnest entreaty, that He, who preserved Daniel in the lions' den, and the three Hebrew children in the midst of the burning fiery furnace, would arise for our deliverance; for I felt as though I would rather lay down my life than dishonor his name. I then experienced a calm in the midst of seeming danger. That evening we were conducted to the guard-house as a punishment, and as the officer handed us over to the corporal of the guard-house he said, "These are Quakers, whose principles do not allow them to attend roll call, or to drill, but not sent on account of any misdemeanor." This prison was a foul place near the stabling, a place to be dreaded. Here we were confined with about fifteen persons—some of whom were the most depraved I think I ever saw.

Our guard said to us: "Men, I do pity you, as it is such a filthy place, and such hard bars, but I do your company, but I do like to see men live up to their principles." I said, "Perhaps thou hast felt condemnation for wrong-doing; or a glow of satisfaction when thou doest well." He replied he had. "Well, now," said I, "live up to this, and thou mayest be brought into as tight a place as we are." He said, "I want to do so." And giving us a cordial shake of the hand bid us farewell.

Our new abode consisted of a building some 30 by 60 feet, with an open partition, so that the guards sitting or lying in the other end of the building, could prevent the escape of any of its inmates. There was a paldoek on the door with iron gratings to the windows, and lamps were kept burning all night. Notwithstanding these circumstances, I trust I shall remember until my dying day, the happy night my friend and I passed, with nothing but a blanket between us and the plank floor. Soon after being thus incarcerated, a tall man with sword dangling by his side, and epaulets on his shoulders, calling us by name, commanded us to come out there. The large door was unlocked and we led out, where were gathered a few soldiers, and an under officer who was disposed to terrify us to drill, ordered us to stand erect with the heels close together.

My friend rehearsed the scripture, "Thou shalt not kill." "Now whether it is right to obey God rather than man, judge ye." I also replied to them, that "If you force us along we will have to go, but as I do not expect to kill any one, I do not wish to learn the trade." Then we were conducted back to prison. We were soon visited by some of our friends, who took us before an officer to get us to accept positions as nurses, urging "that although we were conscientious against fighting, it was acting the part of the Samaritan to nurse or heal."

I believe words were given me to reply, that "This is only a part and parcel of the dreadful Demon War."

We were repeatedly visited by a cousin of the Secretary of War, Stanton. He being a wise and humane man, took us before a notary public, and had me give my views as to my conscientious scruples against war, signing his name as a witness, then allowed me to write, which I did, stating that I would endeavor to bear whatever sufferings were permitted to befall me, until Providence made way for my deliverance. This instrument of writing was sent to Washington, and probably occasioned my discharge.

About this time W. N. was taken to camp Chase, he needing the aid of a physician; this deprived me of his company.

The corporal finding the Quakers were to be trusted, said to us one day, he would like us to help him remove some wood and pile it up in another place. I had noticed a large amount of filth and offal there. I told him I would help him if he would allow me to clean up this, so as to make it more healthy in our prison; which he did. I was also allowed to go to the post office, near by, without being guarded.

Soon a demand came from the war department for more men in Shenandoah Valley, as it was in a defenceless condition, and I was told my name was taken to go. One day as I was pacing the room with my mind much turned to the Lord, all at once I seemed to see a helpless infant lying on the floor. My heart seemed drawn out in sympathy for the child lest it should be crushed under the feet of the guards. Just then some hand seemed to snatch it up. This assured me beyond a doubt, that I was under the care of Providence, therefore I need fear no evil. I wrote to my wife, that "The day of my deliverance draweth nigh." On inquiry the officer said my name was not taken, and I beheld many hundreds provided with all the implements of war, drilled and marched out at the large gates, and sent away to Virginia. Poor fellow, my heart yearned for them; as it seemed doubtful whether they would ever see their families again, and more than all, if they were launched into a never-ending eternity, could I hope their end would be peace!

In a few days an order came from the Secretary of War, ordering the officer to release me from the prison, and from being confined at Todd barracks. Thus was I relieved from the hands of unprincipled men, and restored to the bosom of my family, with a reward of peace. All praise to Him that enabled me to endure the cross and despise the shame, to his glory.

Selected for "The Friend."

A Christian does not need to be reminded that He, without whom not a sparrow falleth to the ground, hath numbered the very hairs of his head. We have not so learned Christ from the history of his earthly life—we have not so seen the Father manifested in his Son, as to dare to do Him the crowning dishonor of doubting for a moment his full and tender sympathy for each one of his redeemed people, or of refusing to believe that He who made the worlds, watches over a little child. If there is no limitation of infinite power, neither is there any of infinite love. God can, God will, God does care for us.

Dr. B. W. Richardson, in reply to some strictures, in the London Telegraph, on his opinion regarding the use of alcohol, says: "In the dispensary of the apothecary and in the laboratory of the chemist, alcohol is a good agent when it is used with scientific discretion by skilled men; beyond this I hold it to be a mischievous chemical, which destroys its tens of thousands a year, diffuses misery and vice in all directions, engenders a constitutional condition of body altogether unnatural, and does no mortal service in return for all the evils it originates, sustains, and transmits from one generation to another."

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, New Jersey.

In 1810, John Hunt says: "At our Quarterly Meeting, though there were divers other eminent ministers there, yet the public service to Sarah Cresson, a young woman; and she peared famously and worthily. It hath been my prospect for years past, that as the benefactors of other societies generally, do not low of women's preaching, so, in best wisdom, it hath been ordered that the testimony of Truth should be raised into dominion among the women in our Society; and even you girls have been, and continue to be, raised and qualified to preach the gospel in the demonstration of the Spirit, and with life's power. So that I have been ready to say what can be more striking and convicting than that 'tis the work of Divine power and goodness."

Again, in 1814, J. H. writes: "At our Quarterly Meeting at Haddonfield, it was wonderful to see and think of the vast increase of population, the meeting being very large. What great improvement has been made in the outward conveniences of travelling—the roads seem almost filled with carriages for miles together—and with our willingness people flock to these meetings. But the thought occurred to me, whether George Fox and many others of our first worthies who labored so greatly to propagate this principle of Truth which we profess would now own us if here; whether or not after all the great labor bestowed upon us, and the vast outward increase of comforts and improvements, they could sit down easy with us, and own us; and whether or not we were building upon the same foundation as they did, even the Rock of Ages, against which the gates of hell never did and never will prevail."

In the 6th month, 1815, he says: "I was at several meetings with my dear, worthy cousin, Nathan Hunt, from Carolina. He attended our Quarterly Meeting at Evesham and had very extraordinary, close, searching service, both in the select and general meetings, to his own peace and to the great satisfaction of Friends, as appeared by their endorsement on his certificate. Richard Jordan and John Shoemaker, from Pennsylvania, had also much service. It was a highly favorable opening, owing time. Nathan Hunt and Richard Jordan, were brought up with little if a more school-learning than so as to be capable of reading the Scriptures, and writing a letter. Yet the tongue of the learned is given the and they are not only great orators, but very sublime language, but are powerful ministers of the gospel."

Again at the Quarterly Meeting in the 6th month, 1815: "Richard Jordan was raised great eminence in his famous gift, and several young ministers appeared lively, hopeful and growing; also in the discipline a lively zeal appeared. Oh! how we are favored at the large meetings with the evident workings of Truth, although so much weakness and many failings abound among us."

1817. "At our Quarterly Meeting in the 9th month, Richard Jordan, Nathan Yarn and others, had lively service, particularly in relation to the answers to the queries. With a mercy that we are thus favored with a living ministry."

J. H. also gave the following brief notice

Sarah Wilkins, Rebekah Roberts and Ann Quicksall:

"9th mo. 28th, 1812. An invitation was given to the funeral of Sarah Wilkins, a choice, innocent, sweet-spirited, acceptable minister, who has travelled a good deal, visiting families and meetings, and been a faithful valiant laborer in the Lord's vineyard.

"11th mo. 15th, 1815. Heard of the death of Rebekah Roberts, in the 96th year of her age. She was an approved and acceptable minister, and has left a good savor. We visited her a few weeks ago, when she conversed on religious subjects sensibly. Her husband died about twenty years ago. Oh! woe a little time sweeps off one generation after another."

"12th of 9th mo. 1824.—First-day. We went to the burial of Ann Quicksall, who died a fever with a few days' illness. She was a very hopeful young minister, of unblemished character. Hinchman Haines and myself had something to say to the people at the house, after which we attended meeting, and the day ended to my satisfaction."

This is the last entry in John Hunt's diary. He departed this life on the 25th of 9th month, 1824, in the 85th year of his age, and was buried in Friends' grave-yard at Moorestown, being a member of Chester Monthly Meeting, New Jersey, and a minister 52 years.

Then followed the separation in 1827, with its attendant trials and evils, by which Hadsonfield Quarterly Meeting was much reduced in numbers. One of the evils resulting from this was a disposition freely to criticise the ministry, still existing in some degree among us, and which has a tendency to prevent the word from having free course, and is extremely prejudicial to the religious growth of those who indulge it. Such are in danger of becoming like the heath in the desert, and not see when good cometh.

Notwithstanding the trials and weaknesses abounding, we can acknowledge with thankfulness, that evidence is afforded from time to time, that there is vitality among us. We are still favored with a living ministry, and our meetings are frequently crowned with the presence of the Head of the Church, who is waiting to be gracious unto us as a people, and will confer gifts on sons and daughters for the work of the ministry, and the edifying of the body, if they are willing to receive them; but there must be a willingness in the day of the Lord's power; and if those who have been favored with a birth-right and education in our Society, are unfaithful to their trust, I believe it will be the case, as has often been testified, that others will be called in as from the highways and hedges, to uphold our Christian doctrines and testimonies, who from living experience of what the Lord has done for their souls, can indeed speak well of his excellent name.

Examined as we are, in this part of the heritage, from the trials to which Friends are subjected in many places from the introduction of principles and practices subversive of our ancient doctrines and usages, while thankful for that exemption, there is danger of relapsing into the other extreme of lukewarmness and indifference; of resting satisfied with a profession without knowing the arising of Divine life in the soul. It must be acknowledged that there is need of a revival of true religion among us. Too many, it is to be feared, are satisfied with a profession without knowing the arising of Divine life in the soul.

William Evans, writing in 1855, says:—"There is no way by which the strength of the Church can be restored, but by the members coming back to the first principle of individually waiting upon the Lord, and seeking to receive from Him the spirit of prayer, that He would return to us and show us our real condition; what He would have us to come out of, and the high and holy way He would have us to walk in. His mercies are the same from generation to generation, and when we are rightly humbled and brought back, He will condense again to our low estate, and lift us up and put songs of praise into our mouths; and the children will be enabled to join in thanksgiving and praise to his great and adorable name."

Cress Cultivation on Gulf of Mexico.—During one of my rambles about Biloxi, I stumbled upon a curious little plantation, the lesser of which was entirely absorbed in the occupation of raising water-cresses. In Scheffer's garden, which was about half an acre in extent, I found fifteen little springs flowing out of a substratum of chalk. The water was very warm and clear, while the springs varied in character. There was a chalk-spring, a sulphur-spring, and an iron-spring, all within a few feet of each other. The main spring flowed out of the ground near the head, or highest part of the garden, while ditches of about two feet in width, with boarded sides to prevent their caving in, carried the water of the various springs to where it was needed.

The depth of water in these ditches was not over eighteen inches. Their preparation is very simple, and to the depth of an inch or two being placed at the bottom, and the roots, cuttings, &c., of the cresses dropped into them. This prolific plant begins at once to multiply, sending up thousands of hair-like shoots, with green leaves floating upon the surface of the running water. Scheffer informed me that he marketed his stock three times a week, cutting above water the matured plants, and putting them into bundles, or bunches, of about six inches in diameter, and then packing them with the tops downward in barrels and baskets. These bunches of cresses sell for fifteen cents apiece on the ground where they are grown. New Orleans consumes most of the stock; but invalids in various places are fast becoming customers, as the virtues of this plant are better understood. It is of great benefit in all diseases of the liver, in pulmonary complaints, and in dyspepsia with its thousand ills.

The ditches in this little half-acre garden, if placed in a continuous line, would reach six hundred feet, and the crop increases so fast that one hundred bunches a week can be cut throughout the year. The hot suns of summer injure the tender cresses; hence butterbeans are planted along the ditches to shade them. The bean soon covers the high trellis which is built for it to run upon, and forms an airy screen for the tender plants. During the autumn and winter months the light frame-work is removed, and sunlight freely admitted.—N. W. Bishop.

Depart from the highways, and transplant thyself in some enclosed ground; for it is hard for a tree that stands by the wayside to keep her fruit till it is ripe.—Chrysostom.

1867. 5th mo. 24th, E. W. left home to again visit the Indians on the Allegheny reservation. On his way visited the meeting at Elkland and some friends there, and arrived at Friends' Boarding School at Tunnessassa on the evening of the 28th; spent several days in visiting the Indians, and on the 2nd of 6th mo. makes the following memoranda:

"First-day attended meeting at the school, the children sat in a sober and becoming manner, and their conduct seemed to give encouragement to hope that a blessing may attend the labors of Friends for the Indians. Left here to return home on the 3d.

7th mo. 3rd. Attended our Monthly Meeting. Was much favored (in being preserved) from wandering thoughts or drowsiness in meeting, which I esteem a favor. That blessing has mercifully been granted me for the last three weeks—may I prove.

26th. Attended our week-day meeting yesterday; I have seldom sat one in which I experienced so much favor to feel inward retirement, and I trust a qualification to worship in spirit. Meetings have for some time been comforting and refreshing; I desire they may in unmerited mercy continue to be so, and I be a more grateful receiver of the blessing.

8th mo. 4th. Our meeting (First-day) was held in silence; to me a memorable one, may I remember it with a feeling of the sweet savor; it has been refreshing and encouraging. Oh for more humility and dedication.

15th. Much rain has fallen in the night and a large freshet in the streams so as to make crossing some of them dangerous, and in places could not be crossed. Some Friends were late in getting to the (Quarterly) Meeting (which was rather unusually small, but a very comfortable one. I think the presence of the Great Head was felt to be with us, who can minister to all our wants. Samuel Cope laid a concern before the meeting which had rested on his mind for some time to visit Ohio Yearly Meeting and most of the meetings composing it, which was united with."

The following address to the Indians, supposed to have been written about the year 1871, was found among the papers of our friend, without date or signature. It appears to be an earnest expression of the concern he continued to feel for his red brethren after returning to his home in Chester Co., Pa.

"Marshalton.

To Owen Blacksnake, Wm. Redeye, Peter Sundown, Isaac Halthown and the other councillors on the Allegheny reservation:

Brothers.—While I feel unwillingly to meddle with your business, I continue to feel deeply interested for the welfare of the Indians residing on the Allegheny reservation, with a desire that you, and your children after you, may be able to hold in peaceable possession the land that has been left you by your forefathers, which was to them a comfortable home, and where their bodies are laid in graves. I have long felt a desire among you to become a good, honest and industrious people, making a good use of, and enjoying all the blessings which a kind and merciful God has given you, and for which you ought to love and thank Him, and teach your children to love and serve Him; not only teach them by words, but by good example, which they may remember and be much benefited by, long after your spirits have gone to another world. What a pleasant thing it is to think of the spirits of good people whom we have known and loved, and who are now removed by death, and who, we have a comfortable hope, have gone to their good home in Heaven, where they will be forever happy, and be with the great and good Spirit, and his Son, our Saviour Jesus Christ, to praise and thank Him through a never-ending eternity.

In regard to a settlement of your troubles with the white people living on your reservation and the railroad companies, I think you had better pay early attention to it. It is altogether likely there will be a bill passed by Congress at its next session, that will settle the business between you and them. If there should be a bill passed and receive the signature of the President, there is no probability of your ever getting it altered; if you do not get a bill prepared that would settle the business properly and do justice to your people, you may suffer a great loss. There is no doubt the railroad companies and the whites living on your lands will attend to their interests. Now I think it is the interest of every one to do what is honest and right in the sight of our Creator. You have certainly made a great mistake in leasing so much of your land. Our Society have always advised against it, and we have in no way helped to bring this great trouble upon you.

I have been acquainted with your people for the last thirty years, and acquainted with their business, and have never known a time when you so much needed the advice and help of those who are truly your friends, as at the present time.

Brothers: If you continue to pursue the same course if you have been doing, in twenty years from this time some children will have to look out for another home. I want you to think of your children and be honest toward them, for I think they have a just claim to that reservation when their parents are taken away by death, and I think you ought to keep it for a home for them and their children after them. You now see the effect of leasing your land, it is almost as bad as selling it, because you cannot get the white people to whom you have given leases, removed.

ONE LITTLE ACT.

Selected.

I saw a man, with tottering steps,
Come down a gravelled walk one day;
The honored frost of many years
Upon his scattered thin locks lay.
With trembling hand he strove to raise
The latch that held the little gate,
When rosy lips looked up and smiled,—
A silver child-voice said, "Please wait."

A little girl opened wide the gate,
And held it till he passed quite through,
Then closed it, raising his face
Her modest eyes of winsome blue.
"May Heaven bless you, little one,"
The old man said with tear-wet eyes;
"Such deeds of kindness to the old
Will be rewarded in the skies."

'Twas such a little thing to do—
A moment's time it took—no more;
And then the shining, graceful feet
Had vanished through the school-room door.
And yet I'm sure the angels smiled,
And penned it down in words of gold;
'Tis such a blessed thing to see
The young so thoughtful for the old.

IMMANUEL'S LAND.

Selected.

This hymn was suggested by the last words of Samuel Rutherford, which were, "Glory, glory dwelleth in Immanuel's land." Rutherford was a Scotch divine, who was silenced for his nonconformity, and thrown into the dungeons of St. Andrew's, Edinburgh, for preaching the Gospel. Here he died, A. D., 1661. Though the author of the hymn is unknown, it is very old.

The sands of time are sinking,
The dawn of heaven breaks,
The summer morn I've sighed for,
The fair, sweet morn awakes!
Dark, dark hath been the midnight,
But dawning is at hand,
And glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's Land!

Oh, well it is for ever!
Oh, well for evermore!
My rest hung in no forest
Of all this death-doomed shore.
Yea, let the vain world vanish,
As from the ship the strand,
While glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's Land!

There the red rose of Sharon,
Unfolds its heartsome bloom,
And fills the air of heaven
With ravishing perfume.
Oh, to behold it blossom,
While by its fragrance fanned,
Where glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's Land!

The King there in his beauty,
"Without a veil is seen;
"I were a well-scented journey, Though seven deaths lay between!"
The Lamb, with his fair army,
Doth on Mount Zion stand;
And glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's Land!

O Christ! he is the fountain,
The deep, sweet well of love,
The streams on earth I've tasted,
More deep I'll drink above.
There, to an ocean's fulness,
His mercy doth expand;
And glory, glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's Land!

Deep waters crossed life's pathway,
The hedge of thorns was sharp;
Now, these lie all behind me—
Oh, for a well-tuned harp!
Oh, to join Hallelujah
With you triumphant band,
Who sing, where glory dwelleth,
In Immanuel's Land!

I've wrestled on toward heaven,
'Gainst storm, and wind, and tide;
Now, like a weary traveller
That leathen on his guide,
Amid the shades of evening,
While sinks life's lingering sand,
I hail the glory dawning
From Immanuel's Land!

With mercy and with judgment,
My web of time he wove;
And aye the dew of sorrow
Were husted with his love.
I'll bless the hand that guided,
I'll bless the heart that planned,
When throned where glory dwelleth
In Immanuel's Land.

The bride eyes not her garments,
But her dear bridegroom's face;
I will not gaze at glory,
But at my King of grace!
Not at the crown he giveth,
But on his pierced hand;
The Lamb is all the glory
Of Immanuel's Land!

TRUST.

Selected.

Even as Thou wilt, my Father,
Wisdom and Love art Thou,
And though the cloud and darkness
Are round about me now,
I know that in Thy mercy
Light yet is sown for me—
It will break on me, my Father,
When it seemeth good to Thee.

Life's pathway oft is weary,
With the burden of its care,
And the sorrow and the suffering,
Which all in turn must share.
But give to me Thy patience,
Thy strength to do or be,
And rest, sweet rest, my Father,
When it seemeth good to Thee.

And though Thou takest from me
The friends I hold most dear,
And for the smile of gladness
Leavest the sigh and tear;
I know Thou hast my treasures
Garnered in a heap for me;
I shall meet them there, my Father,
When it seemeth good to Thee.

The secrets of Thy wisdom
Which Thou hidest from my sight,
I am content to leave them
Until Thou sendest light.
I can trust for that I see not
By that which will I see:
Thou wilt show me more, my Father,
When it seemeth good to Thee.

But for a faith more steadfast,
For a purer love, I pray,
For a joyful hope to cheer me,
As I tread my pilgrim way.
Of the peace Thou only givest—
Give even now to me.
And perfect peace, my Father,
When it seemeth good to Thee.

The Chip that Could Talk.

John Williams, a missionary to the South Sea Islands, was engaged one day hewing timber for a chapel, surrounded by many wondering natives. It was when thus employed that the incident occurred of which he thus tells in his "Missionary Enterprise!"

"As I had come to work one morning without my square, I took up a chip and with a piece of charcoal wrote upon it a request that Mrs. Williams would send me that article. I called a chief and said to him:

"Friend, take this; go to our house and give it to Mrs. Williams.

"He was a singular looking man, remarkably quick in his movements, and had been a great warrior; but in one of his battles he had lost an eye. Giving me an inexpressible look with the other, he said:

"Take that! she will call me a fool and scold me, if I carry a chip to her!"

"No," I replied, "she will not; take it and go immediately; I am in haste."

"He took it from me and asked, 'What must I say?' I replied, 'You have nothing to say; the chip will say all I wish.' With a look of astonishment and contempt he held up the piece of wood and said:

"How can this speak? Has it a mouth? I desired him to take it immediately and not spend so much time talking about it.

"On arriving at the house he gave the chip to Mrs. Williams, who read it, threw it away, and went to the tool-chest whether the chief, resolving to see the end of this mysterious business, followed her closely. On receiving the square from her he said, 'Stay, daughter, how do you know that this is what Mr. Williams wants?'"

"Why," she replied, "did you not bring me chips just now?"

"Yes," said the astonished warrior; "but did not hear it say anything."

"If you did not, I did," was the reply; "or it told me what he wanted. And all you have to do is to return with it as quickly as possible."

"With this the chief leaped out of the house, catching up the mysterious piece of wood, ran through the settlement with the chip one hand and the square in the other, holding them up as high as his arms would reach, and shouting as he went. 'See the wisdom of these English people! They can make chips like they can make chips!'"

"On giving me the square he wished to know how it was possible thus to converse with people at a distance. I gave him all the explanation I could; but it was to him such a mystery that he actually tied a string to the chip, hung it round his neck and wore it for some time. For several days after we frequently saw him surrounded by a crowd, who were listening with intense interest while he told them of the wonders which this chip had performed."

Rarotonga is now a Christian land. It has churches and Christian schools, and is governed wisely and well, by "Isaia," a native chief. He never forgets, in his laws and plans for the good of the people, that "righteousness exalteth a nation."—Observer.

The Outward and the Inward.

The outward law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ; of whom Moses said, "Him shall ye hear in all things." The old law was outwardly written on tables of stone, to be read by the outward eye; but the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, is inwardly revealed, and spiritually written on the tables of the heart; to be seen and read of all men who walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit; and as many as are led by the Spirit of God they are the sons of God. These worship God in the temples of their own hearts; for they "are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and walk in them; and I will be their God and they shall be my people." And again, "Behold the tabernacle of God is with men." The outward tabernacle was for the outward Jew; but he is no longer a Jew which is one outwardly; but he is a Jew which is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the Spirit, and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men, but of God."

The outward law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by which the better hope, we draw nigh unto God; as seeing Him who is invisible. And now as we follow the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus, and are thus set free from the law of sin and death, we are no longer under the old outward law, but under grace; and are come into the new covenant, wherein the law is written on the heart; and as we are obedient to the teachings of it, we no longer have need for every man to teach his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying know the Lord, for all shall know him from the least to the greatest. And it is then, and only then that we shall find him to be merciful to our unrighteousness, and to remember our sins and iniquities no more. And it is then, as we follow the light of his gospel teachings in the Spirit, and in the newness of life, that we have fellowship one with another, and it is then, and only then, that we shall witness the blood of Jesus Christ to cleanse us from all sin. And being thus cleansed, we have the unction from the Holy One,—the heavenly anointing abiding in us,—which teaches us all things needful pertaining to salvation, and "is truth and no lie," because it comes from the infallible fountain of light, life, and purity; and free from all the mixed and uncertain teachings of fallible men. "But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us." And when it (the way of the gospel ministry) comes to us in the excellency of the power, even though through an earthly vessel, those amongst us who are inwardly gifted with the spirit of holiness and discernment, have a right to receive it as infallible, because it bears witness to their spirits that it is from the Lord. And, on the other hand, if it has not the savor of life unto life, they have a right to reject it; seeing and feeling that it springs from no higher a fountain than fallible man.

May it not be said of some among us, that we deplore ritualism in the churches, and yet blindly cling to figurative and ceremonial rites. We lament our lack of spiritual life and power, and yet seem content to seek the living among the sepulchres of the dead. Our glorified Lord is not there, but is risen, and we must rise with him in newness of life. We denounce separations, but are unconsciously pursuing the paths that lead to them. We deprecate the outward idolatry of the heathen, and yet worship self, a more fatal idol within. We find the light of our lamps growing dim, and vainly call on our fellow-mortals for help; saying, "give us of your oil;" but fail to go to Him who has to sell, and buy for ourselves. We would fain have the heavenly oil to light us into the kingdom, without the sacrifice of self, and all our beloved idols. "Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth," thus "all idols ye shall utterly abolish." I fear we are far too much like the Athenians that Paul found, who were wholly given to idolatry; though their worship was, perhaps, more on visible and tangible things. Their altar was ascribed "to the unknown God." Are we not, too many of us, worshipping we know not what? Do we, individually and experimentally know and worship for ourselves, in spirit and in truth, Him whom to know is life eternal? Are we not, too much like the men of Athens, seeking to hear or to tell some new thing? Instead of asking for the old paths, that good way of self-denial that leads to Zion, the city of the saints' solemnities? Paul saw that the men of Athens were in all things too superstitious. If we are unwilling to admit this, for ourselves, can we not see that many of us are too superficial in our worship? too outward—too formal—too ceremonial—too much for gratifying the carnal ear with outward intellectual eloquence, or musical sounds? without much reverential and deep indwelling in the silence of all flesh, with an ear to hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches. While we have an ear open to the world, we cannot hear the voice of God. There is there not too much of a tendency to the weak and beggarly elements of the shadowy dispensation? Worshipping in the outer court which was to be trodden down of the Gentiles. Have we not now, under this inward and spiritual dispensation, privilege to enter in to the holiest, by the blood of Jesus, by the new and living way which Christ has consecrated for us? And have we not an High Priest in our religious assemblies that should be able to offer all things to his church? And is he not able and willing, as we look in faith and wait upon Him, to minister to our several needs, the food that is most suitable for us; either immediately or instrumentally, as He, in his wisdom may appoint? And do we not have to do our part in gathering the heavenly manna day by day, as we journey on through the wilderness of this world? Can we not now, under this gospel dispensation, offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God through Jesus Christ our Lord, without the intervention of an outward priesthood, or an appointed man-made ministry? If so, let us say inwardly, as David did, "My soul, wait thou only upon God; for my expectation is from him."

For "The Friend."

Praying with the Sick.

[A letter received from a valued Friend, whose residence is far removed from our city, refers to some discussion on this subject which appeared in our columns a few months ago. The writer is one who has for many years been in the station of a minister, and has travelled through several States in the service of the Gospel. In illustration of his views, he gives some details of his own experience and observation, which are interesting and may be useful to those whose minds have been unsettled as to the limitations to be observed in such services.—Ed.]

Some thirty-five years since I went to see a young woman (a member of Friends' Society) who was far gone with pulmonary consumption. On entering the house I found her in great agony of mind under a sense of Divine displeasure with her. In her extremity she got the impression that if some one would pray for her vocally she would get relief. Therefore she appealed to those present, to myself in particular, to engage in that service, which I did not feel at liberty to do, but endeavored to get into the silence. A quiet solemnity soon prevailed over the company present, including the sufferer herself, which continued for some time, after which she looked upon me pleasantly and said, "I will tell thee something that will be of use to thee. It was a delusion," (which I understood to be the impression above described.) "I had prayed that I might die, to get rid of suffering. I distrusted his (the Lord's) providence, and it was a great sin." She said more: "The whole has been a lesson of uselessness to me. The Lord had taken the work into his own hands. He was refining his own child, and making her meet for his kingdom, and He had all the praise."

Some years since while engaged in a religious visit to some families, I called upon a sick man, (not a member among us,) and felt drawn to vocal supplication. While thus engaged, access to the mercy seat was withdrawn, and I felt distressed on his behalf. The circumstance often recurred to my mind with something of an enquiry why it was so. I remembered the Scripture, "There is a sin unto death; I do not say that he shall pray for it."

A few years since I was again engaged in the work of visiting families. On one occasion after a comfortable opportunity in a Friend's family, the mother invited me to go into another part of the house to see her married daughter, who laid very low. On entering the room I perceived she was too sick to converse, or to hear much said. I soon felt constrained to supplicate vocally, and in a few words was enabled to present the petition, for which I felt a peaceful reward. About six months after I met with the mother again, who informed me that her daughter lived about six weeks after the time of my visit. She also said the offering of the petition seemed to be instrumental in enabling the daughter to lay hold on the hope set before her. She received the assurance of peace, which remained with her unto the end.

During a somewhat lengthened period in the service in the ministry, I have been at the bed side of the sick and those who were near their end; have at times been humbled and instructed in silent waiting before the Lord. Then again, have been engaged in the appointed vocal service. On all and every occasion, the single eye and faithful obedience to the will of the Lord is essential to the servant's own safety and usefulness.

The Honey Bee and the Mathematicians.

Extract from a Paper, On Bees and Bee-keeping, read by Herbert R. Peck, at a meeting of the Watford Natural History Society, England.

It will be interesting here, I think, to remind you of the wonderful testimony to the accuracy of mathematical science which has been borne by the work of the honey bee. The base of each cell consists of three lozenge-shaped plates of wax. Many years ago, at the beginning of this century, Maraldi, the original inventor of a glass hive, being struck with the fact that their lozenge-shaped plates always had the same angles, took the trouble to measure them, and found that in each lozenge the large angles measured  $109^{\circ} 28'$ , and the smaller  $70^{\circ} 32'$ , the two together making  $180^{\circ}$ , the equivalent of two right angles. Some time afterwards Reaumur, thinking that this uniformity of angle must have some connection with the economy of space which is so striking a feature in the construction of the honeycomb, hit upon a very ingenious plan to ascertain whether his surmises were correct. Without mentioning his reasons for the question, he asked Keenig, the mathematician, to make the following calculation:—"Given a hexagonal vessel terminated by three lozenge-shaped plates, what are the angles which would give the greatest amount of space with the least amount of material?" Keenig made this calculation, and found that the large angles ought to be  $109^{\circ} 26'$ , and the smaller  $70^{\circ} 34'$ , together  $180^{\circ}$ , being a difference of only two minutes less in the larger angles, and two minutes more in the smaller, than Maraldi had found his original measurement of the plates to be. Reaumur thought that the bee had come quite near enough in the solution of the mathematical problem, and mathematicians generally were delighted with the result of the investigation.

Maclaurin, however, a well-known Scotch mathematician, was not easily satisfied. The two results very nearly tallied with each other, but not quite, and he felt that in a mathematical question precision was a necessity. He tried the whole question himself, and found that Maraldi's measurements of the lozenge-shaped plates were quite correct,  $109^{\circ} 28'$  for large angles, and  $70^{\circ} 32'$  for smaller angles. He then set to work upon the problem which Reaumur had given to Keenig, and found to his great delight that Keenig must have been wrong, as the true theoretical angles were  $109^{\circ} 28'$  and  $70^{\circ} 32'$ , precisely corresponding with the actual measurements of the bee cell. Another question now arose—how could this good man have gone wrong? how could so excellent a mathematician as Keenig have made so great a mistake? Bad workers generally complain of their tools without reason, but here was a case in which a good workman had to complain of his tools with reason. On investigation it was found that no blame attached to Keenig himself, but that there was an error in the book of logarithms which he had used. So a mistake in a mathematical work was corrected by a little honey bee working out its cell; and as captains of ships would have gone on calculating their longitudes by these same faulty tables of logarithms if the mistake had not been discovered, the bee may be said to have saved the life of many a gallant ship, and perhaps the life of many a gallant seaman.

For "The Friend."

The following article on Zeal, I transcribe here from the Watchman newspaper, it having formerly appeared in the British Evangelist. Desiring that its perusal may be blessed to the Christian reader.

San Leandro, Cal., Jan. 11th, 1880.

A Worker's Dream.

I sat down in an armed chair wearied with my work, my toil had been severe and protracted. Many were seeking the salvation of their souls, and many had found what they sought. The church wore an aspect of thrift and prosperity, and joy, and hope, and courage, were the prevailing sentiments on every hand. As for myself I was joyous in my work; my brethren were united; my sermons and exhortations were evidently telling on my hearers; my church was crowded with listeners. The whole community was more or less moved with the prevailing excitement, and as the work went on I had been led into exhausting labors for its promotion.

Fired with my work, I soon lost myself into a sort of half forgetful state, though I seemed fully aware of my place and my surroundings. Suddenly a stranger entered the room without any preliminary "tap" or come in. I saw in his face benignity and weight of character. But though he was passably well attired, he carried about his person measures, chemical agents, and implements, which gave him a very strange appearance. The stranger came towards me and extending his hand said, "How is your Zeal?" I supposed when he began the question, the query was to be for my health, but was pleased to hear his final word; for I was quite well pleased with my zeal—and doubted not the stranger would smile when he should know its proportions.

Instantly conceived of it as a physical quantity; and putting my hand into my bosom brought it forth, and presented it to him for inspection. He took it, and placing it in his scales, weighed it carefully. I heard him say "One hundred pounds." I could scarcely suppress an audible note of satisfaction. But I caught his earnest look as he noted down the weight, and I saw at once that he had drawn no final conclusion; but was intent on pushing his investigations.

He broke the mass to atoms—put it in crucible, and put the crucible in the fire. When the mass was thoroughly fused, he took it out and set it down to cool. It congealed in cooling, and when turned out on the hearth exhibited a series of layers, or strata, which at the touch of the hammer fell apart, and were severally tested and weighed; the strange making minute notes as the process went on. When he had finished, he presented the not to me, and gave me a look mingled with sorrow and compassion, as without a word except "May God save you," he left the room.

I opened the note and read as follows: Analysis of the Zeal of Junius, a candidate for a Crown of Glory.

Weight in mass 100 lbs.

Of this on analysis there proves to be
Bigotry	10 parts
Personal ambition	23 "
Love of praise	19 "
Pride of denomination	15 "
Pride of talent	14 "
Love of authority	12 "
Love to God	4 "
Love to man	3 "

I had become troubled at the peculiar manner of the stranger, and especially at his parting look and words; but when I looked at the figures, my heart sank as lead within me. I made a mental effort to dispute the correctness of the record, but I was suddenly startled into a more honest mood, by an audible sign—almost a groan from the stranger, (who happened in the hall), and by a sudden darkness falling upon me by which the record became at once obscured, and nearly illegible. I suddenly cried out "Lord save me," and knelt down at my chair, with the paper in my hands and my eyes fixed upon it. At once it became a mirror, and I saw my heart reflected in it. The record was true; I saw it, I felt it, I confessed it, I deplored it, and I besought God to save me from myself with many tears and at length with a loud and irrepressible cry of anguish, I awoke. I had prayed thirty years gone by to be saved from hell, but my cry now to be saved from myself was immeasurably more fervent and distressful.

Nor did I rest or pause till the refining fire came down and went through my heart, searching, probing, melting, burning, filling all the chambers with light, and hallowing up my whole heart to God. That light and that love are in my heart to-day; and when the trials and tears of my pilgrimage shall be an end, I expect to kneel in Heaven at the feet of the divine Alchemist and bless him for the revelation of that day that showed me where I stood, and turned my feet into a better path.

That day was the crisis of my history; and if there shall prove to have been in later years some depths and earnestness in my convictions, and some searching and saving pungency in my words, I doubt not eternally will show their connection with the visit of this Searcher of hearts, at whose coming I was weighed in the balance and found wanting.

The longer a man continues a mere hearer of the gospel, the less likelihood there is that he will be saved by it.—D. Thomas.

Faithfulness in the day of Small Things.

Isaac Pennington, in the subjoined selection on one of his letters, showeth how fidelity in the day of small things prepares the way to the Lord towards us; how "light grows on the obedient;" or how he that is faithful in the little is made ruler over more. Similar remarks to those of I. P.'s on language, could no less apply to substituting a constant costume for those foolish fashions and varieties of dress, which so prevail even with many professors of the religion of a Saviour and Lawgiver who taught non-conformity and humility respecting the world with its customs, vanities and follies. It is worthy of note and remembrance, that taking up the cross and bearing a faithful testimony in both spheres herein alluded to, cost our worthy predecessors untold reproach and suffering, all we, for shame, prove delinquent, and ignominiously forsake them?

I. Pennington writes—"The Lord so guide us, manifest himself to thee, help thee, and aid thee by his Holy Spirit and power, as thou may come undeniably to experience, and to be testified by him about these things. And need not so much to know, as to be obedient and subjected to the Lord, both in thy heart and in thy conversation also, in the last thing at He makes manifest. If the Lord would own thee but this one thing, that, to use thee' and 'thou' to a particular person, is improper language, and Scripture language; and that, to say 'you' is improper, and arose from the pride, and nourisheth pride, and so is of the Lord, and not of the Father; and thou shouldst worship thy spirit to Him in this one thing, thou thinkest what a work it would make thee, and how strongly the spirit of darkness would fight against thy subjection unto the Lord. The Lord lead thee as He seeth good, and give thee faithfully to follow; for, if the Lord should lead in any thing, and not on follow in that thing, his Spirit would grieve and vexed thereby, and thy heart danger of being hardened by the deceitfulness of sin."

Religious Items, &amp;c.

Observance of the First-day of the week.—An article in one of our exchanges on this subject mourns over the increasing disregard of the first-day, as a day of religious retirement and rest, and its conversion into a time for business and pleasure. The writer gives a sad picture of the extent to which this has gone in the towns of England, and says, "The nation is rapidly becoming leavened with the spirit which would secularize our day of rest, and render it on a level with the Sundays of France and Spain." He opposes the opinion of those who argue "that the unregenerate may just as well be thus employed as in any other way," on the ground that whatever they do is sin. On this pernicious principle, a man may give himself up to the vilest crimes that are debased humanity."

On our own side of the Atlantic, there are many sad evidences of the rapid growth of the same tendency to regard this day as one of amusement and pleasure-seeking, rather than as one of rest and of public worship.

Apostolical Succession.—The Editor of The Episcopal Recorder quotes the opinion of the learned Archbishop Whately, "that the continuity of the historical succession [of bishops from the days of the Apostles] was hopelessly lost during the dark ages and amid the gross corruptions and irregularities of the Church." The Editor states as his own belief that the office of a Bishop is not ordained by inspiration, and says, in regard to their own denomination, "We think a final step is yet to be taken in order effectually and forever to annihilate the doctrine of Apostolical Succession, and that is, to elect bishops only for a term of years, and then let them return to the position from which they were taken."

The Parisian Committee of the French Mission Interieure recently gave seven conferences at Cherbourg. The population of the place, it is suggestively stated, "has a marked taste for controversy, and got its fill of it." The rooms were crowded, and the audience frequently expressed their satisfaction by applause. As a result, a considerable number of persons manifested a desire to attach themselves to Protestantism.

Harve and Elbeuf are added to the towns in France in which popular evangelistic services have been opened. At Elbeuf the house was more than filled, and many persons listened to the services from the streets, in the face of an intense cold.

The total number of both written and printed copies of the Bible extant at the beginning of the present century did not exceed 3,000,000; but since that time 116,000,000 have been printed by the British and American societies alone.

The rabbi of the Jewish Synagogue at Strasburg has become a convert to Christianity.

The conductor of a Japanese First-day school paper writes that the Japanese teachers desire true stories, rather than the fiction which is usually offered to such schools.

Natural History, Science, &amp;c.

Preserving Fluid.—Wickersheimer, of the University of Berlin, has invented a fluid for the preparation of animal and vegetable tissues, which surpasses anything before known in its power of preserving the color, form and elasticity of specimens treated with it. The fluid was either injected into the veins of the body to be preserved, or the entire object immersed in it. After having been taken out of the fluid and dried, the elasticity of the tissue and flexibility of the joints are secured.

A number of skeletons were shown, in which all the complicated movements could be executed. Some of the skeletons exhibited beautifully the combined movements of the chest, larynx and other parts engaged in the mechanism of breathing. Several skeletons of snakes, which had been treated with the fluid more than a year previously, permitted of undulatory and spiral movements. Lungs thus prepared may, even after years, be inflated by means of bellows. Such old lungs were seen to swell to ten times their size in the collapsed state, the lobes become distinct, the brown color gradually changed into red, and the whole organ appeared as if taken from a fresh body. Sections of delicate tissues, as the bird format, which have been removed by an operation, will appear after months as if in a fresh state, and may thus be preserved for future study.

All sorts of vegetable organisms may also be preserved in this fluid. A colony of exquisite fresh-water algae, which had been in the fluid for a year, appeared to be growing in the water.

The Prussian government had purchased this valuable discovery, and the Minister of Instruction had published it in his official organ for the benefit of the scientific world. The formula for the preparation of the fluid is as follows: In 3000 grammes of boiling water dissolve alum, 100 grammes; common salt, 25 grammes; saltpetre, 12 grammes; potash (all carbonicium), 60 grammes; arsenious acid, 10 grammes. After cooling and filtering, add to every ten litres of the solution four litres of glycerine and one litre of methylic alcohol.—Public Ledger.

At Fernandina, Fla., the experiment of making paper from palmetto fibers is to be undertaken with the aid of appropriate machinery. The fiber is said to be an excellent material for this purpose.

Among quite a number of valuable ways in which different portions of the sunflower are utilized in Lithuania, is the making from the seed-receptacles a species of blotting paper, and from the inner part of the stalk a fine writing paper.

Bees in India.—John Wilson, who long resided as a missionary in India, thus relates the danger to which to which he was exposed from an attack of bees. "As Mr. Henderson and I were engaged with a few friends and some of the pupils in making researches into the natural history and antiquities of the island of Salsete, we were attacked by an immense cloud of wild bees. Mr. Henderson who was the first to be stung, soon sank on one of the jungle-roads in the hopeless attempt to guard himself from injury; and he had lain for about forty minutes in a state of almost insensibility before he was found by our friends and any relief could be extended to him. It was on my joining him from behind, when he first gave the alarm, that I came in contact with the thousands of infuriated insects. I sprang into a bush for shelter, but there I got no adequate covering from their onset. In my attempt to free myself from agony and entanglement I slid over a precipice, tearing both my clothes and body among the thorns in the rapid descent of about forty feet. From the number of bees which still encompassed me and multiplied upon me, and my inability to move from them, I had a pretty strong impression upon my mind, that unless God himself especially interposed in my behalf, all my wanderings and journeyings must then have terminated, though by the humblest agency. That interposition I experienced. I had kept hold of a pillow with which I had gone to Mr. Henderson, and tearing it open on the bushes when I was unable to rise, I found within it, most unexpectedly, about a couple of square yards of blanket. In the circumstances, it was like a sheet sent down from heaven to cover my head; and partially protected by it, I lay till the bees left me. When from the poison of the numerous stings I had received, violent vomiting and other agitation came on, and my pulse failed and my heart faint, a native, a Hakoor, one of the original sons of the forest, who had come up, pulled me into the shade and made a noise, which was heard by our friends. The illustration used by the Psalmist, 'They compassed me about like bees,' has now an intensity and appropriateness of meaning which I never before realized."—Life of John Wilson.

Telegraph.—The word telegraph, which is derived from two Greek words, tele, at a distance, and grapho, to write, was brought into use about 1793 or 1794, when the French Directory established machines of this kind for communicating intelligence between Paris and all the principal towns in France.—Nature.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 7, 1880.

In the Christian Advocate we find collected a statement of the opinions of several recent writers, who unite in fearing the approach of a season of wide-spread immorality, growing out of the spread of materialistic ideas, and the consequent subversion of moral and religious principle.

Goldwin Smith, in an article on "The Prospects of a Moral Interregnum," drawing his conclusions from English Literature and events, says: "A collapse of religious belief, of the most complete and tremendous kind, is apparently now at hand."

In France, Revellaud published recently in Le Signal, a religious weekly which he edits, the following statement, "We are on the eve of a moral and spiritual crisis; the symptoms are every where. We may call it an irreligious crisis. Some are affrighted as though entering on the latter times predicted by the Scriptures, when the Son of Man will find no faith on the earth." Revellaud was formerly the editor of a political paper, a man of intelligence and intellectual power, who has traversed much of his country, preaching to the people as a minister of the Gospel; and his testimony, as to the drift of thought, action and sentiment among the French people, is entitled to respect. His impression is founded on the general decline of religious faith, and the prevalence of materialistic philosophy.

Le Temoignage, the organ of the French Lutherans, bears similar testimony: "The most elementary truths, and the most necessary to human society are in our day denied and blasphemed. A world without God rushes up to the assault of all we love, and all we worship; a generation is rising which believes in naught else but the gross enjoyment of sensual appetites."

At the recent Basle Conference, the speakers gave a very gloomy account of the state of religion in Germany. The imperial system with its military success seems, in a moral point of view, to have opened the flood-gates of corruption. In four years the consumption of alcoholic drinks was more than trebled; theatres were multiplied till every town had its stage for immoral plays. Professor Von Schulte stated, that "there is an entire lack of religious home culture in Germany."

This exhibit, making due allowance for a possible overstatement of facts, and for unduly gloomy forebodings, is one that may well awaken serious reflection in the minds of all those who love the Lord, and seek for the good of their fellow-men. Those who are parents will feel that the increased dangers and temptations to evil, which such a condition of things must cause to operate on their children and descendants, furnish a strong reason for earnest pleading with Him who has all power, that He will arrest the progress of the overwhelming scourge. The true patriot and the lover of mankind,—fully convinced that it is righteousness alone which exalteth a nation, and that sin is not only a reproach, but a deadly enemy to the prosperity of any people,—will unite in the same petition.

The people of the United States have suffered much from the demoralization of large masses of our citizens by the late civil war; and our experience of the evil effects of military operations among ourselves, render it easy to imagine the sad corruption which must flow to the European populations from the very large proportion of their men who are subjected to military service, and thus removed from the softening and restraining influences of the domestic circle. War and its concomitants, including military preparations, are among the most effective of agencies, even in times of peace, in spreading the kingdom of Satan.

But while we may mourn at the many evidences that we are yet far from that state, in which it can be said, "The kingdoms of this world have become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ," let us not lose faith in either the goodness or the power of the Almighty. His plans and purposes are inscrutable to us, except as He may please to disclose to us some glimpses of them; yet his kingdom, the Psalmist assures us, is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion endureth throughout all generations. Let us be willing to suffer in spirit for our own sins, and for the sins of others, so that, being actuated by a measure of that love which led our blessed Redeemer to lay down his life for those who were enemies by reason of their wicked works, we may be enabled to perform every labor that He requires of us and be as instruments in the Lord's hands in accomplishing those things which He designs to effect through us.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The average temperature for the First month, as reported from the U. S. Signal Service office, has been 41.7 degrees, which is 1.4 degrees higher than any corresponding month in the last six years, and nearly 9 degrees above the average for the same period. The highest temperature was 63 degrees on the 29th, and the lowest on the 14th, 19 degrees. Average barometer 30.19 inches. Total rainfall for the month 0.51 inches, of which snow fell during the month. There were 12 days on which rain or snow fell.

The thermometer at the Signal Office on top of Mount Washington, registered at noon on the 1st inst. 19 degrees above zero, and nine hours later had fallen to 27 degrees below zero. This is stated to be the coldest change known to have occurred on the mountain in that space of time.

A violent wind storm raged at Albany, N. Y., on the 1st inst. A number of buildings were marofled.

The Public Secretary of State in Maine, has given up the State property in his possession to the Republican Secretary, and most of the Fusion members have taken their seats in the Republican Legislature, and trouble seems near its end.

Commissioner Hayt, of the Indian Bureau, has been removed from office. It is said he withdrew from office at the close of the fiscal year which it ought to have had.

In the year 1879, Ohio built 219 miles of new railroad, being more than was built during the year in any other State east of the Mississippi river. The report of the Commissioner of Patents shows, that during 1879, there were presented 20,059 applications for patents, and 12,725 patents were issued. The total receipts of the office for the year were $703,931, and the total expenditures $729,658.

It is stated that the public debt of the world at the close of the Napoleonic wars amounted to $7,655,000,000. In 1875, after the close of the civil war in the United States, they amounted to $22,889,000,000. The author adds $1,100,000,000 for the Russo-Turkish war, making the present total nearly $24,000,000,000, and more of all this has been disbursed in the destruction of human life and happiness.

The Philadelphia Bible Society distributed during the past year 7518 copies of the Scriptures. The colporteurs employed by the Society visited 21,351 families living in the poorer sections of the city, many of whom were blind and without a Bible. About twenty colored families from Texas, arrived in New York on the 21st inst., on their way to Liberia. They are said to be in a very destitute condition.

The mortality in this city during the past week numbered 310, of this number 62 died of consumption, and 21 of inflammation of the lungs.

Markets, &c.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 105; do. 57s, referred, 103; coupon, 104; 4 1/2's, 107; 4's, 1307, 104.

Cotton was firmly held at all prices.—Sales of middlings are reported at 13 a 13 1/2 cts. per lb. for spot and New Orleans at 17 1/2 cts. in barrels, and standard New Orleans at 17 1/2 cts. in barrels, and standard white 7 1/2 cts. for export, and 8 1/2 a 8 3/4 cts. per gallon home use.

Flour.—The market is quiet but rather firm. $1 of 1500 barrels, including Minnesota extra firm, $6.50 a $7; Penna. do. do. $6.25 a $7; Ohio and western do. do. at $7 a $7.50. Eye flour is stead $4.75 a $5.

Grain.—Wheat is less active and 2c. lower. Sale 9000 bushels, including rejected at $1.37; red at $1.45, amber at $1.44 a $1.45. Eye is quiet. Pennsylvania 11000 bushels, in fair demand and less firm. 8 of 12,000 bushels, including mixed and yellow, at 58 cts. and white at 60 cts. Oats are firm. Sale 5000 bushels, within the range of 47 a 49 cts. for mixed and choice white.

Hay and straw market for week ending 1st mo. 3, 1880, as follows: Hay, 4200 loads of extra, 45. Average price during the week; Prime Timothy, 95 cts. a $1 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 a 95 cts. per 100 pound straw, $1.05 a $1.20 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were rather dull this week and prices were a shade lower. 324 head arrived and sold at the market yard at 31 a 6 cts. per lb. as to condition.

Sheep were in demand at former rates: 7000 h sold at the different yards at from 4 1/2 a 6 1/2 cts. per lb. and lambs at 5 a 7 cts. per lb.

Hogs were dull; 1500 head sold at a 2 to 5 cts. per lb. as to quality.

Cows were dull; 1800 head sold at $29 a $70 per head.

FOREIGN.—The Australian colonies have contributed $21,000 towards relieving the distress in Ireland.

Reports from Italy continue to represent the distress in some sections of that country as terrible. In seven counties, numbering 92,882 persons, 51,340 have been attacked with cholera, and 30,626 have died.

Heavy rains in Sicily and Calabria have caused rivers to overflow, doing great damage to property.

The Paris correspondent of the Times states that exports of Switzerland to the United States in 1879 show an increase in value of 15,000,000 francs over those of 1878. The chief items being cotton goods, watches, and embroidery.

A dispatch from Geneva says, "For the fourth time during the present century the Lake of Zurich is freezing over."

In 1879, there were 2,475 Europeans and Americans in the Japanese Empire. Of these 1,067 were English, 479 Americans, 500 Germans, 105 Hollanders, 95 Portuguese, and the remainder was divided among other nationalities, principally French and Italians.

DIED, on the evening of the 22d of First mo. 1880, at the residence of her husband, Wm. W. Dilks, 1 Richmond, Ind., ANNE S. DILKS, daughter of Chas. H. Shoemaker, in the 40th year of her age. Early the course of her illness, this dear Friend gave evidence that her mind had been severely prepared for the great change which she was about to undergo. Her faith in the mercy of God in Christ Jesus her Redeemer, to hold of the hope set before her, and to experience her transgressions forgiven; and being favored with hope that a phase of rest was prepared for her, she contemplated the solemn close with calmness and resignation. Her last words were, "I have no more to endure—of extreme suffering, and her testimony to the faith which clothed her spirit were impressive and instructive.

English Rule in India.

The material and some of the moral advantages accruing to India from the rule of European masters have been lately set forth in certain lectures, delivered at Edinburgh by Dr. W. W. Hunter, Director-General of Statistics to the Government of India. The titles of his office have required him for the last ten years to visit each winter the twelve provinces of India, and superintend a survey of their population and resources.

He pictures the vast difference between the moral aspect of the country at the present time, and in the last century. Thousands of square miles of jungle have been changed into arable and fruitful lands; fever-smitten tramps are now covered with healthy and well-drained cities, mountain walls penetrated by roads and railways, and rivers that desolated the country with floods, confined to proper limits, spanned by bridges, and tapped by canals. The numerous native States, once disturbed by constant jealousy and merciless wars, are seen trading quietly with each other through the use of all these appliances of civilization, and all over the country, hospitals, schools, and courts of justice are founded.

A most important point gained is the protection of India against invasions. Though hitherto along the whole length of its boundaries by mountains and seas, there were at its north-eastern and north-western corners two points of gateways which connected the country with the rest of Asia. Through these passages came successive tides of invasion. At a period in the last century no less than six such incursions on a great scale occurred within twenty-three years. Hordes of barbarians, numbering from 20,000 to 100,000, swept over the country, slaughtering on the slightest provocation, and ending with a general massacre at the capital. Eight thousand men, women, and children were backed to pieces in the forenoon in the streets of Delhi. The five Afghan invasions are said to have presented one of the most appalling records of bloodshed and cruelty in human history. Then the invasions of the mountain tribes occurred annually. The Himalayas constituted an unbroken line of fortresses for these predatory hordes.

The inhabitants of the plains were helpless against them. Indeed, for 1,500 miles along the foot of the mountains, there was a wide belt of territory which no one dared to cultivate. This great mountain-wall was therefore no security to the Indian people. Neither was the sea, for it was infested with pirates, who burned the villages and massacred or carried off into slavery the inhabitants. But the rule of England has brought the security. The sea is as safe as the waters that border our own country, and the hill-tricks have been repressed and compelled to work for a livelihood. Among the native States which settled down to peaceful industry, one may be mentioned, the Principality of Cooh-Behar, which has ever faithfully kept its first and only treaty, dated 1773. The lands at the foot of the mountains have been largely reclaimed, the natives cultivating rice and the English the tea-plant on the slopes. An annual value of £16,000,000 in food has thus been added to the productions of the country, or more than the whole cost of the Indian army and of the defence of the Indian empire.

The task of reclaiming lands has, however, been a serious one, and has demanded sturdy English perseverance. In the now populous district of Gualpura more money was spent for a long series of years by the Government in rewards for killing wild beasts than the whole sum realized from the land revenue. In the matter of the depopulation of the country, a wonderful change has been brought about. It is estimated that in the last century 150,000 persons perished annually from this cause. There was a manifest decay of populated districts, and as the people abandoned their hamlets to the growing jungle, and drew closer to certain centres, the wild beasts followed hungrily in their rear. Tigers, leopards, and wolves slew thousands of men, and tens of thousands of cattle, notwithstanding enormous rewards offered for their repression, and wild elephants committed terrible depredations, no less than fifty-six villages in two parishes having been ruined by them within a short period. But British energy has at last mostly overcome these sources of depopulation, and the modern Englishman complains that he can hardly get a shot at a tiger. The snake, however, remains even today a great pest, it having been clearly ascertained that 11,000 in a late year died from snake-bite.

The fearful scourge of famine has also been brought under control. A famine in 1790 is said to have entailed the loss of 10,000,000 lives. Even as late as 1837 famine was regarded as practically beyond the help of man. Now a vast organization of preventive and remedial agencies are used to counteract the threatened calamity in times of dearth. There are roads, canals, railways, systems of irrigation, and the organization of State charity in India, together with greatly advanced liberality of contribution from England itself. In the summer of 1770 only £9,000 of aid was distributed, while in the Bengal scarcity of 1874 the Government expended nearly £4,000,000, and during the next five years devoted over £14,000,000 to feeding the people. Famine as a source of depopulation in India may be said to have been thoroughly conquered by the energy and wisdom of British rule.

In the country, it is to be noted that British rule has built up large mercantile towns, which have greatly changed the character of the industrial force of the country. Industries were once narrowly confined to special castes and to the village loom. Commerce has induced a great expansion. The opening of coal mines has employed tens of thousands of miners, and then caused the erection of steam factories. Twenty-six years ago there was not a single steam-power loom in India; now a million and a quarter spindles are employed in cotton manufacture alone. This expansion of industries has induced a greater variety of product from the soil, besides securing to the people money with which they can purchase from neighboring districts in time of dearth.

Altogether the surplus products of the country have increased from almost nothing in the last century to an export value of £63,000,000 in 1878. The outlet for the fruits of the soil has given a fixed value to land, which is the possibility of permanent civilization. It must be remembered that the establishment of the mercantile cities from which so much economic prosperity has grown, is the special mark of British energy. The Portuguese, Dutch, and French had successively failed in like enterprises; but after different attempts in unfortunate localities, the English have built up Bombay and Calcutta, each rapidly approaching a million of inhabitants. The latter city was only saved from destruction by a system of river engineering, which is one of the greatest triumphs of man over nature.

Closely connected with the growth of land values was the necessity for the general establishment of courts, and the formulation of new laws. In the latter there has been marked and healthy progress. The first great land law of 1793, defined the rights of proprietors against the State; the second, of 1859, the rights of cultivators as against the proprietors. With the formulation of rights has grown up their defence against lawlessness by police force. This force has now become generally sufficient to suppress the enormous evil of bandit raids, which formerly infested the interior. Once there were organized bodies of 50,000 men, each engaged in plundering. Later, the bands have been smaller, but lawlessness was the normal condition of the country before the advent of the British. Now we have the authority of Dr. Hunter for asserting that there is only about one third the crime in Bengal that there is in England. While for one million persons in England and Wales there are always eight hundred and seventy criminals in jail, there are for the same number of the population in Bengal, where the police system is specially efficient, not three hundred in jail.—Christian Advocate.

For "The Friend."

Light of Christ—Conscience.

The following extracts from Robert Barclay's "Apology," are offered more especially for the perusal of the younger members of our Society; with a desire that, by an attentive reading thereof, they may be enabled the better to comprehend the difference there is between "Light" and conscience.

The prominence given to the doctrine of "Spiritual Light," is a marked feature of the Society of Friends. This doctrine was one of those which George Fox believed he was first to proclaim; and which he, with others of the founders of this Society, felt it incumbent upon them to uphold conspicuously before the world.

It was this "Light," of which the Prophet Isaiah spoke where he says: "I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, that thou mayest be my salvation unto the end of the earth." Isaiah xlix. 6. "And the Gentiles shall come to thy light, and kings to the brightness of thy rising." Isa. lx. 3. This prophecy was fulfilled by the coming of Christ, of whom John declared: "In Him was life, and the life was the light of men." John i. 4; and that He "was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." John i. 9; the Redeemer of the world himself testifying: "I am the light of the world; he that followeth me shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life." John viii. 12.

"Man, as he is a rational creature, hath which he can discern things that are rational; for this is a property natural and essential to him, by which he can know and learn many arts and sciences, beyond what any other animal can do by the mere animal principle. * * *

We look upon reason as fit to order and rule man in things natural. For as God gave two great lights to rule the outward world, the sun and moon, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night; so hath He given man the light of his Son, a spiritual divine light, to rule him in things spiritual, and the light of reason to rule him in things natural. And even as the moon borroweth her light from the sun, so ought men, if they would be rightly and comfortably ordered in natural things, to have their reason enlightened by this divine and pure light. * *

We do further rightly distinguish this (light) from man's natural conscience; for conscience being that in man which ariseth from the natural faculties of man's soul, may be defiled and corrupted. It is said expressly in the Scripture, Titus i. 15, "That even their mind and conscience is defiled;" but this light can never be corrupted nor defiled; neither any; for it is said expressly, that it maketh all things manifest that are reprovable, (Ephesians v. 13,) and so is a faithful witness for God against every unrighteousness in man.

Conscience is that knowledge which ariseth in man's heart from what agreeth, contradicth, or is contrary to what agreeth believed by him, whereby he becomes conscious to himself that he transgresseth by doing that which he is persuaded he ought not to do. So that the mind being once blinded or defiled with a wrong belief, there ariseth a conscience from that belief; which troubles him when he goes against it. * * * Conscience followeth the judgment, doth not inform it; but this light, as it is received, removes the blindness of the judgment, opens the understanding, and rectifies both the judgment and conscience. We confess that conscience is an excellent thing, where it is rightly informed and enlightened; wherefore some of us have fitly compared it to the lantern, and the light of Christ to a candle; a lantern is useful, when a clear candle burns and shines in it; but otherwise of no use. To the light of Christ then, in the conscience, and not to man's natural conscience, it is that we continually commend men; this, not that, is it which we preach up, and direct people to, as to a most certain guide unto life eternal.

"This light, said, &c., appears to be no power or natural faculty of man's mind; because a man that is in health can, when he pleases, stir up, move, and exercise the faculties of his soul; he is absolute master of them; and except there be some natural cause or impediment in the way, he can use them at his pleasure; but this light and seed of God in man he cannot move and stir up when he pleaseth; but it moves, blows, and strives with man, as the Lord seeth meet. For though there be a possibility of salvation to every man during the day of his visitation, yet can any man, at any time when he pleaseth, or hath some sense of his misery, stir up that light and grace, so as to procure to himself tenderness of heart; but he must wait for it; which comes upon all at certain times and seasons, wherein it works powerfully upon the soul, mightily tenders it, and breaks it; and when it strikes, he comes to know salvation by it. Even as the lake of Bethesda did not cure all those that washed in it, but such only as washed first after the angels had moved upon the waters; so God moves in love to mankind, in this seed in his heart, at some singular times, setting his sins in order before him, and seriously inviting him to repentance, offering to him remission of sins, and salvation, which if a man accepts of, he may be saved.

"Now there is no man alive, and I am confident there shall be none to whom this paper shall come, who, if they will deal faithfully and honestly with their own hearts, will not be forced to acknowledge that they have been sensible of this in some measure, less or more; which is a thing that man cannot bring upon himself, with all his pains and industry. This, then, oh man and woman! is the day of God's gracious visitation to thy soul, which if thou resist not, thou shalt be happy forever. This is the day of the Lord, which, as Christ saith, is like the lightning, which shineth from the east unto the west; and the wind or spirit, which blows upon the heart, and no man knows whither it goes, nor whence it comes."

We all want to have beautiful endings to our life. We want to leave sweet memories behind, in the hearts of those who know and love us. We can only make sure of this by living always so that any day would make a tender and beautiful "last day;" that any hand-grasp would be a fitting farewell; that any hour's intercourse with friend or neighbor would leave a fragrant memory. For after any heart-throb God may write "Finit."

A Newly Discovered Inscription of Cyrus the Great.
BY GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A.

The inscription comes either from Baby itself, or from a place in its vicinity, a place so near that some antiquarians are inclined to regard it as a suburb, or even as included within the outer walls.

The inscription is stamped in the usual way upon a clay cylinder,—a cylinder of the shape, commonly employed both by Nabonid and Nabonidus, but larger (I think) than any other such cylinder of the kind, being 2 inches long, with a diameter of three and a fourth inches at the ends, and four and a eighth inches in the middle. Unfortunately a large piece is broken out of one side, which by several lines at the beginning are entirely, and some towards the close consist only half a dozen characters at the extreme right-hand side of the cylinder. There is a deep crack towards the middle extending obliquely across the central part of the inscription, and enlarging at one place into a cavity of some size. The writing is longitudinal, or from end to end of the cylinder, though I did not count, I think there are not more than forty to fifty characters in a line. The lines are of twenty unusual length, extending often to twenty words or more. A number of lines which can be exactly counted were originally forty-five, and thus the document contained, it is probable, originally about a thousand words. Of these, I think about two-thirds remain; and twenty-five out of original forty-five lines, occupying the central part, and containing the main gist of the inscription, are nearly perfect.

I now proceed to give an account of contents of the matter of the inscription, first stating that it is a part of the question whether I have rightly called it, in my note, "a newly discovered inscription of Cyrus the Great,"—since it was evidently composed and stamped upon the clay by the priest of Merodach in his reign, rather than by Cyrus himself. The opening passage is lost; and some half-dozen lines only scattered words can be recovered, from which it is difficult to extract any sense. They are thought, however, to speak of Babylonia being ruled by the king, Nabonidus, as appears afterwards, which although he took measures for the military security of the country and strengthened the other fortified cities, neglected the temples and tampered with the ceremonial and worship. The rites of Merodach were apparently superseded by the cultus of other deities; the king wickedly despoiled the shrines of their treasures (?), and otherwise showed a contempt for religion. At the proceedings "the Lord of the Gods" (presumably Merodach) was deeply grieved, and all the gods inhabiting the temples of Babylonia deserted their shrines. In the festivals and processions which were held at Kalanna, apparently the central part of Babylonia, Merodach and his kindred gods were no longer seen; they had removed to other possessions which had retained places for them. The people of Samir and Akkad—the usual designation for the population of Babylonia proper—who had been left by the gods in their evil fate, prayed to Merodach to return (to his old haunts) so that all their city might enjoy his favor, and he might select king who according to his wishes would govern the people whom Merodach committed to his charge. So he (Merodach) proclaimed a name of Cyrus, king of the city of Ansan, be king over the whole country, and to all people he declared his title. The country of Dintir and all its forces, which he caused to bow before his feet, as well as the whole nation of the Black-Heads, which he brought into his hands, he made to rest under a covenant and engagement (?). Merodach, the great God, the feeder of his people and the protector of his own work, directed his heart and hand, and caused him to worship joyfully. To his own city of Babylon he summoned him to march, and he caused him to take the road to Dintir (one of the popular names of Babylon) like a friend and guide he supplied him with formation. His far-extending army was like the waters of the river—its number could not be told—its arms and chariots were beyond all knowledge. Without fighting or opposition he brought them near Kalanna, so as to surround his city of Babylon, and bring it into straits. Nabonidus the king, who did not worship him, he delivered into the hands of Cyrus. Then the people of Dintir, all of them, and many of the Sumir and Akkad, nobles and high-priests, came over and submitted, and kissed his feet; they rejoiced in his sovereignty and changed their allegiance. He is God in whose service the dead are raised to life, and who helps all that are in difficulty and danger, thoroughly befriended him and lauded forth his proclamation (as follows):

I am Cyrus, the supreme king, the great king, the powerful king, king of Dintir, king of Sumir and Akkad, king of the four races; I am Cambyses, the great king, king of the city of Ansan; grandson of Cyrus, the great king, king of the city of Ansan; great-grandson of Teispes, the great king, king of the city of Ansan. The ancient royal family, in which Bel and Nebo had sustained the rule in the goodness of their hearts, faded away when I entered victoriously into Dintir. With joy and gladness in the royal palace I established the seat of sovereignty. Merodach, the great lord, the ancient guardian of the sons of Dintir and * * My wide-spreading army was peacefully established throughout Dintir and the many districts of Sumir and Akkad. Their good order was not disturbed. The high places of Babylon and all its fortresses I maintained in good preservation. The sons of Dintir had neglected to repair their dilapidations. Their fissures gaped; their walls bulged out. To the work of repairing the shrine of Merodach the great lord I addressed myself. To me—Cyrus the king—and to Cambyses, my son, the offspring of my heart, and to my faithful army (the god) auspiciously granted his favor, so that I succeeded in restoring the shrine to its former perfect state * * Many of the kings dwelling in high places, who belonged to the various races inhabiting the country between the Upper Sea (or Mediterranean) and the Lower Sea (or Persian Gulf), together with the kings of Syria and the unknown regions (?) beyond, brought to me their full tribute at Kalanna, and kissed my feet. They came from * * as far as the cities of Asshur and Ishtar, from Agathi, Isuauk, the cities of Zamban, Mil-Turru, and Duran, as far as the skirts of Guitir, and the fortresses along the banks of the Tigris, where they had been settled from ancient times. The gods who dwell among them to their places I restored, and I assigned them a perfect habitation. All their people I assembled, and I increased their property, and the gods of Sumir and Akkad, which Nabonidus had introduced at the festival (or procession?) of the Lord of the gods at Kalanna, by the command of Merodach the great lord, I assigned them an honorable seat in their sanctuaries, as was enjoyed by all the other gods in their own cities. And daily I prayed to Bel and Nebo that they would lengthen my days and would increase my good fortune, and would repeat to Merodach my lord that 'Thy worshiper, Cyrus the king, and his son Cambyses' * * "

There are ten more lines of inscription, which probably contain prayers; but the writing is too much mutilated to admit of any connected sense being extracted from it. For the last six lines, indeed, a few characters at the end of the lines alone remain.—S. S. Times.

For "The Friend" Preparation for Service.

[In the letter which accompanied the valuable article that follows, the writer refers to a remark of Jacob Green, from Ireland, that some of his Methodist Friends had never learned how to be still, and adds: "I am apprehensive that many in membership with Friends have not learned the needful lesson, and consequently are not able to distinguish between their own imaginations and Divine guidance."—Ed.]

It is on my mind to give some account of a portion of my religious experience. If the perusal shall afford encouragement to one tried mind it may have its use.

From my earliest recollection I was at times the subject of Divine visitation. But in my 21st year the Lord wrought so effectually in my heart, that I was enabled to turn from the sinful pleasures of the world, and to live in the obedience of faith wherein I felt peace to my soul. During this visitation, I received an intimation that it was faithful to manifested duty, I would be called to the ministry of the word; which impression did not leave me, although how, or when such an engagement was to be entered upon was hidden from me. I was for a time preserved in the littleness, without desiring to fathom the mysteries of religion or to meddle with things beyond my measure. The Lord showed me my infant state, He at the same time assured me, that as I grew in stature, the needful knowledge would be afforded.

Not being a member of any religious society, and subject to temptations and weaknesses, I thought that religious fellowship and discipline would be as a hedge to me.

My parents joined the Society of Friends after my birth, and although they did not request for me, they instructed me in the principles of Friends. Their care had the effect to preserve me from grosser evils, even while, in an unconverted state, I walked in the broad way.

In the time of my first espousals I read "Sewell's History," which in connection with my training decided the question of choice, and I joined the Society of Friends. After this a time of deep proving came upon me, this a time of deep proving came upon me, I walked "through dry places" not finding the rest my soul desired. In this condition a disposition arose in me to do something. Not being satisfied with the position of a watchman, an active zeal increased with me, and I began to entertain the thought that the Society of Friends was occupying a position in the background, (no doubt there was lukewarmness with many in membership.) I became interested in First-day school work, and had a good measure of comfort in it; was the Superintendent of such a school for several years; would open and close it with reading a portion of Scripture, and would often put some plain questions to the scholars, and give some instruction in a limited way, for I found my peace was disturbed when I exceeded the proper limit. On one occasion I was enlarged more than usual, and felt some exaltation in it. When the school was dismissed and I was left alone, the language to Israel formerly was addressed with power to my mind: "Who man required more of you than I?" "I was arrested, but felt no liberty to tell the matter to any one. I continued the care of the school until my term of appointment was ended; when I dissolved my connection with it in as quiet a way as possible."

The Lord's hand continued upon me in purging out the old leaven, and subjecting every thought to the obedience of Christ. In order to know this fully, I had to withhold my mouth even from God. As I thus endeavored to abide in the Vine, in a close watch unto prayer in attending to his shavings, I was enabled to lay hold on the hope set before me, and to witness an increase of faith. All the doubts that I had ever heard expressed in reference to the divinity of Christ, were removed; and the Scripture testimony respecting his mission, his atonement for our sins; in a word, all that He did for us, without us, became sealed truths upon my mind. He also gave me to understand, that it was his Spirit He would be my saving help to overcome all my soul's enemies. He proved his faithfulness to me, and withal opened my understanding in the Scriptures from day to day, and gave me to enjoy his peace, wherein my heart was enlarged with desire that others might obtain like precious faith.

It was now that my precious Lord and Master, who had so signally taken me apart from my brethren, had brought me to Himself, the living Stone, and given me a place in his spiritual building, required some active service, by putting in my mouth for the people. This exercise was very unlike anything that I had known before; and being aided by his Spirit, the services were made easy, and great was the reward of peace which followed. But because of the desire to enjoy such peace, together with the approval of men, I was on some occasions prompted to a too forward movement; and condemnation and weakness was the result. The great and good Husbandman did not leave the branch which had borne some fruit to itself, but purged it, from time to time, that it might bring forth more fruit.

And now, after many years' experience, I can bear record, that it is only by the Father's faithful care in the exercise of the needed chastening, that any can know a preservation in the truth.

It is to be feared that many have been induced to enter upon religious service without the proper qualification, and have become as vessels marred upon the wheel.

Bright talents can make no amends for bad morals.

Experience and Incident.—Biting at the Bare Hook.—I was some time since walking upon the wharf where a fishing-boat lay, writes a Christian traveller, and as I was passing and re-passing the master was uttering tremendous oaths. At length I turned to him, and, standing beside his boat, said,—

"Sir, I am unacquainted with your business. What kind of fish are these?"

"They are codfish," replied he.

"How long are you usually out in order to obtain your load?"

"Two or three weeks," he answered.

"At what price do you sell them?"

He informed me.

"Well, have you had hard work to obtain

"Yes, hard work," said he.

"With what do you bait these fish?"

"With clams."

"Did you ever catch mackerel?"

"Yes."

"Well, now, did you ever catch a fish without bait?"

"Yes," said he, "I was out last year, and one day when I was fixin' my line the bare hook fell into the water, and the fool took hold of it, and I drew him in."

"Now, sir," said I, "I have often thought that Satan was very much like a fisherman. He always baits his hook with that kind of bait which different sorts of sinners like best; but when he would catch a profane swearer he does not take the trouble to put on bait at all, for the fool will always bite at the bare hook."

He was silent. His countenance was solemn; and after a pause, as I turned to go away, I heard him say to one standing by him, "I ness runs out towards you: ye are as bone of my bone, and flesh of my flesh. Oh! may the Lord protect and preserve you: may the blessings of the everlasting hills rest upon you; and especially upon such of you as have been as it were separated from your brethren, and devoted to the great work of the Lord in the earth. And be assured, if ye hold fast the beginning of your confidence and engagement steadfastly to the end, no weapon formed against you shall ever prosper; the tongue that riseth in judgment against you shall be condemned; and even though Gog and Magog wage war and oppose you, 'The Lamb and his followers shall have the victory.'—Job Scott.

"LET YOUR LIGHT SO SHINE."

Selected.

Jesus bids us shine
With a pure, clear light,
Like a little candle
Burning in the night.
In the world is darkness,
So we must shine,
Thou in thy small corner
And I in mine.

Jesus bids us shine,
First of all for Him:
Well He sees and knows it,
If our light is dim.
He looks down from heaven
To see us shine,
Thou in thy small corner
And I in mine.

Jesus bids us shine,
Then, for all around;
For many kinds of darkness
In the world are found:
There's sin, there's want and sorrow,
So we must shine,
Thou in thy small corner
And I in mine.

—From a Child's Book.

PROGRESS.

Selected.

Steadily, steadily, step by step,
Up the venturesous builders go;
Carefully placing stone on stone,
Thus the loftiest temples grow.

Patiently, patiently, day by day,
The artist toils at his task always;
Touching it here and tinting it there,
Giving it ever with infinite care
A line more soft or a hue more fair;
Till by little, the picture grows,
And at last the cold, dull canvas glows
With life and beauty and forms of grace.
That evermore in the world have place.

Thus with the poet, hour after hour
He listens to catch the fairy strains
That ring in his soul; then, with magic power,
He weaves their melody into his rhymes,
Slowly, carefully, word by word,
Line by line, and thought by thought,
He fashions the golden tissue of song—
And thus are immortal anthems wrought.

Every wise observer knows,
Every watchful gazer sees
Nothing grand or beautiful grows,
Save by gradual, slow degrees,
Ye who toil with a purpose high
And fondly the proud result await,
Murmur not as the hours go by,
That the season is long, the harvest is late.

Remember that brotherhood, strong and true,
Builders and artists, and hardy siders,
Who lived in the past and worked like you,
Worked and waited a wearisome time,
Dark and cheerless and long their night,
Yet they patiently toiled at the task begun,
Till the dawn of the dawn broke that morning light,
Which gladdens the heart when success is won.

LAND AND SEA.

There are springs that rise in the greenwood's heart
Where its leafy looms are cast,
And the branches droop in the solemn air,
Unstirred by the sweeping blast,
There are hills that lie in the noontide calm,
On the lap of the quiet earth;
And crowned with gold by the ripened grain,
Surround my place of birth.

Dearer are these to my pining heart,
Than the beauty of the deep,
When the moonlight falls in a belt of gold
On the waves that heave in sleep.
The rustling fall of the clustered leaves
That shade a well known door,
Is sweeter far than the booming sound
Of the breaking wave before.

When night on the ocean sinks calmly down,
I climb the vessel's prow,
Where the foam-wreath glows with its phosphor light,
Like a crown on a sea nymph's brow:
Above, through the lattice of rope and spar,
The stars in their beauty burn;
And the spirit longs to ride their beams,
And back to the loved return.

They say that the sunset is brighter far
When it sinks behind the sea;
That the stars shine out with a softer fire—
Not thus they seem to me.
Dearer the flush of the crimson west
Through trees that with my childhood knew,
When the star of love, with its silver lamp,
Lights the homes of the tried and true!

—J. Bayard Taylor.

Selected for "The Friend"

At our Yearly Meeting at Philadelphia, on the 25th day of 9th mo. 1764, John Stair of Marlborough, aged upwards of 80 years, a faithful minister, though not eloquent, stood up in our meeting of ministers and elders, and appearing to be under a great exercise of spirit, informed Friends in substance as follows, to wit: "That he had been a member of the Society upward of 60 years, and remembered that in those early times Friends were a plain, lowly minded people, and that there was much tenderness and contrition at their meetings. That at twenty years from that time, the Society increasing in wealth and in some degree conforming to the fashion of the world, true humility was less apparent, and their meetings in general not so lively and edifying. That at the end of forty years, many of them were grown very rich; that the wearing of fine costly garments, and the use of silver (and other) watches became customary with them; their sons and their daughters and many of the Society made a spacious appearance in the world: which marks of outward wealth and greatness appeared on some in our meetings of ministers and elders; and as these things became more prevalent, so the powerful overshadowings of the Holy Ghost were less manifest in the Society. That there had been a continued increase of these way of life even until now; and that the weakness which hath now overspread the Society, and the barrenness manifest among us, is matter of much sorrow." He then mentioned the uncertainty of his attending these meetings in future, expecting his dissolution was now near; and having tenderly expressed his concern for us, signified he had seen in the true light, that the Lord would bring back his people from these things into which they were thus degenerated, but that his faithful servants must first go through great and heavy exercises therein.—From John Woolman's Journal.

The Will of Martin Luther.

In the archives of the Evangelical Synod of Hungary a document was found some months ago containing the will of Martin Luther, written by his own hand, and signed by Philip Melancthon, Kasper Ernciger, and Johannes Buchenhagen as witnesses. Some doubt was at first entertained about the authenticity of the document, but after a minute examination, a competent committee of scholars and experts have pronounced it genuine, and it has now been given to the public. It reads thus:

I, Martin Luther, Dr., &c., do, by this writing drawn up by my own hand, declare that I give to my dear and faithful wife, Catharine, as a widow's pension, for her to enjoy as long as she lives, and according to her own will and pleasure, and bequeath to her all that now follows:

1. The small property in Zubstorf which I have bought and taken care of and held in my possession up to this day.

2. Bruno's house, for her to live in, which have bought in my Wolf's name.

3. The cups and jewelry, such as rings, chains, and medals, which people have given me, and chalices of silver and gold, all of which may have a value of about 1,000 guldens. I do this—

1. Because she has always treated me as a pious and faithful wife should treat her husband; because she has always loved me, respected me, and taken care of me; and because—Heaven be thanked for that rich blessing—she has given me five living children, and educated them. (God take care of those who may still be alive!)

2. Because she shall take upon herself and pay the debt which I may still have standing and leave unpaid when I die. As far as I can, this debt cannot now be more than 'CCCLF, at it may possibly be a little more.

3. Because I will not that she shall be dependent of the children, but the children shall be dependent of her, for they shall respect and obey her, such as the commandment of God says. I have often seen, and I know from experience how, in spite of this commandment, the devil will allure and incite children, even the most pious, through envious and malicious lips, especially at times when the sons take wives and the daughters marry, and then even Socrus Nurum Nurus Socruum. But I think that a mother is the best master of her own children, and that a little property, or widow's pension, like this, will not be spent to hurt or harm the children, but to their progress and prosperity, for they were made out of her own flesh and borne from under her own heart.

Should she feel compelled to marry again—and I neither can nor will set myself against her will in this respect—I feel sure that she will act as a good mother to our children, and faithfully share with them both this widow's pension and everything else. But I beseech my high master, Duke Johan Friederich, Elector, and her Electoral Grace, that they will maintain this gift and widow's pension, and watch that it is well administered.

I also beg all my good friends that they will testify in favor of my wife, and aid her in defending herself if evil tongues should accuse her of having taken to herself or put aside any sum of money from the poor children. I testify that there is no ready money left, and that the jewelry and the cups belong to the widow's pension, as above set forth. But there shall be made a public account, because people know how large an income I derived from my good Master, and that I have not kept back one farthing or the least bit of any thing; and with respect to the gifts, they are either among the above-mentioned jewelry or they are still due to me.

I have bought and built all, and I have managed my income and my presents very closely. People may wonder how I have been able to pay my expenses, but none shall wonder that there is no ready money left or that the debt is not larger. I beg you to do me this favor, because the devil who has had no power over me, might disturb Catharine's heart and make it appear a crime to her that she became and—God be thanked—still is Dr. Martin's wedded wife.

Finally, I beg all and every one that, as, for certain reasons, I have used no lawyer's forms or phrases, they will acknowledge that I am I myself, and do it publicly, for I am known in heaven and on earth, yea, even in hell, and I have authority enough, and enjoy respect enough, to make my word believed better than that of a lawyer. God, who is an all-merciful Father, has given to me his gospel of his beloved Son, to me, a poor, underserving, and miserable sinner, and He has made me true and faithful up to this very moment, and so perfectly that people in the world have believed me and held me to be a preacher of truth, in spite of the thunder-bolts of the Pope and the wrath of the Emperor, the Kings, the clergy, and all the devils. People ought to believe me so much the more willingly, as my hand writing is well known. I also expect that people will believe that this is the genuine and true confession and testament of Dr. Martin Luther, written down by his own hand and provided with his own seal.

Written and signed on Epiphany-day, 1542.

MARTINUS LUTHERAS.

Unsuccessful People.—The percentage of people who are unsuccessful, in the worldly sense of the word, is a very large one. Often God snatches away, by his providence, through no apparent fault or failure of theirs, the fruit of men's labors when it is just dropping, ripened into their hands. Other men come into life hopelessly destitute of the "knack" for getting ahead at anything. The farmer who thinks he is making a good bargain when every one else sees that it is a bad one; the school teacher who does not know how to win the confidence or inspire the enthusiasm of her pupils; the minister whose "ways" repel people when he takes the most pains to win their good will—such persons are found everywhere. They do the best they know how, but they don't succeed. And since it is an experience that is divinely assigned to so many, we must conclude that the ministry of poverty and defeat is often better for us than any worldly success could be. "Blessed are they who make money or achieve prominence," did not find a place in the Beatitudes—does not, in fact, sound much like them.—Good Company.

Serenity of Mind.—Nothing contributes so much to serenity of mind as a pervading sense of God's good providence, which checks all impatience, softens down every asperity of humor, and gives a steady current to the feelings.—Crabb.

For "The Friend"

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Wright.

There appears to be no entry in the diary of our friend for several years after 8th mo. 16th, 1867. It may be proper to introduce here an incident which occurred in the following year, and which illustrates the meekness of spirit which marked this dear friend, as well as the persuasive power which attended his pleadings with others. It is related by a Friend who was with him on a visit to the Allegheny reservation in the spring of 1868.

"After a toilsome day, having visited eight or nine houses of the Indians, and met a number in council, and walked some eight or nine miles, we arrived late in the evening at the public house a little off the reservation; being unable to reach Tennesassa that night. After supper, Ebenezer was sitting in a quiet frame of mind on a bench at the side of the principal room of the house, when a very rough ruffian, considerably under the influence of liquor, took E. W.'s hat from his head, put it on his own, saying, he guessed he could preach a little. He then paced the floor repeating some broken passages of Scripture, mingled with profanity.

"Ebenezer took no apparent notice of the ruffian's actions, until after a time the Friend who was with him being grieved with the insult offered to one so worthy of respect, asked him if they had not better retire for the night. He then arose, went to the profane man and asked if he would be willing to give up the hat? which was done with a significant air of 'Yes, sir.'

"Next morning at the breakfast-table, there was a repetition of indignities towards E. W., as was a discredit to any landlord to suffer unprovoked, but nothing whatever was said by way of retort.

"After breakfast, Ebenezer seeing the man by himself in the barn or stable, spoke to him in such a way concerning the spirit he was manifesting, and the injurious effects it had upon himself, that he was brought to tears, and before parting acknowledged the respect he felt for those who would speak to him in the way in which he had been approached, and added, if my mother knew the way I have treated you, she would be grieved."

Under date of 7th mo. 19th, 1874, he writes: "I feel a comfortable hope I am not forsaken—what an unmerited favor. I have for weeks past been much comforted in our religious meetings; I hope we have been favored to feel the good presence of the Great Head of the Church to be with us, who can preserve, comfort and qualify for what He is pleased to require of us: one hour spent in his presence is worth a thousand elsewhere. Oh may I be favored to feel more resigned to the Divine will, with an increased concern to serve Him more faithfully.

8th mo. 1st. Have been engaged in carrying round a petition to get signed, asking to have the sentence of William E. Underzook changed to imprisonment for life. I feel for the poor man; have reason to fear he is guilty of the crime he is charged with." Our dear friend paid several visits to this individual, who was condemned to death for the crime of murder; he seemed to feel a great concern for him and no doubt faithfully labored to turn his mind to repentance.

9th mo. 3d. "Left home to accompany

Thos. Wistar and Jos. Scattergood on a visit to the Indians on the Allegheny reservation. Have passed through some humiliating dispensations which I hope have been profitable and may be remembered with feelings of gratitude and encouragement. Bodily indisposition offered great discouragement and was a great trial to faith, (but) I was mercifully favored to feel something underneath to support and enable me to press forward, I hope I may say, trusting in my Divine Master for preservation. Arrived at Tunessassa on the morning of the 4th.

5th. Was favored to have a very comfortable night's rest, perhaps the most so that I have had for a year." After visiting several Indian families, he writes on the 13th, "Sat a comfortable meeting with the family at Tunessassa, and Indian children. I trust the presence of the Great Head of the Church was felt to be with us. After reading in the evening, the Indian children came one by one to J. Scattergood and myself, shook hands with us and bid us farewell.

14th. Had a comfortable night's rest; bid the friends at Tunessassa farewell and was favored to start for home with comfortable feelings; having been much favored with an improvement in my health and I trust a qualification to labor with the Indians. May our labors be blessed to the praise of the Great Head of the Church, who is forever worthy.

15th. Was, in unmerited mercy, favored to get along comfortably and arrived home for dinner. I have much cause to be thankful for the unmerited favors bestowed upon me while engaged in this visit; it is cause for encouragement to faithfulness to what may be required. In feelings of gratitude I desire to record the continued blessings of a kind and merciful Creator to me, a poor sinner, in that He is pleased to enable (me) to feel a sense of his good presence to be with me, particularly in our religious meetings, and I trust many who attend are also favored to feel our Divine Master's good presence in them,—how thankful we ought to be.

11th mo. 4th. Our Monthly Meeting. Evidences (of weakness) come up in the answers to the queries. Oh that there was more watchfulness on the part of our members, and a seeking for strength to overcome that drowsy feeling with which some are tried.

19th. Another memorable meeting held in silence and I trust owned by the Great Head of the Church; cause for gratitude.

26th. Visited E. P., she appeared pretty comfortable in mind, and I trust thoughtful of her situation—appears like one that is far gone in consumption—that her time is drawing near to a close. I think there is a comfortable hope that in the mercy of our Saviour she may be accepted.

Was the Clock Wrong?—Not many mornings ago I took my usual seat in a train on the Central railway, a minute or two before the time appointed to leave the platform. Just as the signal was given for the train to start, two men ran panting up the steps, calling on the conductor to "wait a minute," and declaring that the clock was fast. The conductor, however, did not stop the train; and, as the two men had not time to get their tickets, they were left on the platform to rectify their watches, and await the arrival of the next train.

Ah! thought I. How often have I acted the part of these men! How common it is, when one is clearly in the wrong oneself, to fancy that the wrong is in others! In the constant contact with my fellow-men, how easy it is to give way to the tendency to think that the many flaws in my character are not so much in mine as in theirs, or are at the least attributable to them more than to myself! Such were some of my thoughts as the train moved on, and carried me into the stream of daily employment.

Sometimes it would occur, in my school-days, that a boy in the class would be unable to "give us sum right"; that is, to be told by the master that the answer on the slate corresponded with that given in the book. In our little wisdom, we now and then declared most certainly that the book was wrong, and that all the boys who were successful had made a mistake. What an illustration of fallen human nature was this!—Ep. Recorder.

Religious Items, &c.

Reform at Funerals.—It is said that the clergymen of the various denominations in Minneapolis, Minn., have made a move to do away with so much extravagance at funerals. A circular has been sent out and signed, setting forth the inconvenience and inappropriateness of many things customary at funerals, and recommending more simple and quiet burial of friends. This is certainly a move in the right direction. If there is a time that display is more out of place than at another, it is certainly at the time of burying our dead, and yet how general is the exhibition of it in our Christianized communities! The expenses are spent by the wealthy, in many instances at a single funeral, merely for display. Our brethren have always tried to avoid display, and especially at our funerals, but we sometimes think we are gradually coming a little nearer to the customs of the world in this respect. Let us guard against it.—Prim. Christian.

Testimony Against Hired Ministry.—The late Octavius Perinchief, a minister of the Episcopal Church, who was located near Norristown, Pa., said in reference to this subject: "I am more and more convinced that a hired ministry is a great evil. To preach honestly under such circumstances almost kills me; to preach tenderly is almost impossible. To take pay for preaching is base and unmanly; I feel it more and more every day. To be in the position of a divine teacher and not preach according to my conscience is impossible, and so, what with one thing and another, the difficulty of doing one's duty—the sense of being, or being a hiredling—almost drives me out of the ministry. I ask myself: Is this all that eighteen hundred years can accomplish for man by the Church, and in the Church? Italy could not be worse off without her Church. How is it with the United States?"

Agricultural Fairs.—The Primitive Christian (German Baptist), in reply to a query as to the application of Scripture precepts to participating in agricultural fairs, thus replies: "If the fair was simply an agricultural fair, with no demoralizing appendages, it would be a doubtful question whether it was wrong; but with the present popular fair, the horse-racing, lotteries, gambling, drinking and other sinful and vain things to make it 'pay,' the fair becomes one of the most popular places to introduce and familiarize evils, so that public sentiment supports them. But the Scripture gives us the principle to abstain from the appearance of evil. I would not go into a fair because it is not governed in its principles or details by the Gospel. There is some good in the fair, and there is some good in almost any organization we mention, but there is evil and sinful tendencies in many of them, and for that reason we could not take stock in them."

Tract Distribution.—There was recently meeting of the friends of the American Tract Society, and one of the secretaries of the society said that for fifty-five years the society has been issuing annually, on an average, 10,000,000 copies of books, tracts and papers. The contents it is said, contains the doctrine of the Bible as interpreted by the evangelized churches. These tracts are circulated, most of them, in foreign countries, and the fruits it said have been very manifest."

Mission Statistics.—The following valuable statistical facts were recently contained in the Dahleim, a German literary paper of large circulation, on the subject of foreign missions. The subject is referred to as "one of the civilizations that is little known, and that has accomplished more for the elevation and improvement of the benighted heathen tribes than the whole host of anti-Christian benefactors of the race, notwithstanding all the load 'self-glorification.'" The article furnishes very valuable statistics, that are worth of preservation for future reference.

There are at present seventy large small missionary societies in Europe and America, in connection with the Protestant Churches. The sum raised and expended by the societies averages annually between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000.

Besides the native pastors, catechists, and teachers, these societies have in foreign field 2400 male ordained missionaries from Europe and America. The number of female missionaries, a very important and influential part of the missionary force, is not given.

The Polynesian Islands are almost wholly Christianized. There are in these islands 350,000 native Christians, who have the own well-organized churches that support themselves; they have their own pastors and teachers, and even sustain foreign missionary societies among themselves, that send missionaries of their own to other heathen countries.

In East India and Ceylon there are at present 400,000 persons who have been converted from heathenism; in China, 40,000; in Madagascar, 233,000; in South and West Africa, 200,000. If we add to these 330,000 Christian negroes in Surinam and the West Indies, an 50,000 converted Indians and Esquimaux in North America, Canada, Labrador and Greenland, we have a total of 1,650,000 Christian converted from heathenism.

The result is not only so many additions to the Christian Church, but they are changes in life, their social relations are improved many barbarous customs are abolished, they are raised from their degraded condition, they enjoy a degree of culture and refinement that did not exist before, and they are now a civilized people, whereas many of them were savages before.

Schools are everywhere introduced, and art mighty power for the improvement of the natives. In all the seventy societies there are not less than between 11,000 and 12,000 schools, attended by 450,000 children and others. There are also many higher institutions of learning, called colleges, and that resemble those among us. In one of the East Indian universities, 1821 students graduated between 1862 and 1872, after having passed very creditable examination.

In the South Sea Islands, the London Society have 590 and the Wesleyan Society 1617 schools, with about 75,000 scholars. In these schools the children of the native tribes exhibit wonderful aptitude at learning, and compete favorably with the children of the European and American missionaries themselves.

In East India there are now more than 4000 native ministers, and about 40,000 teachers. A moderate calculation, therefore, are between 10,000 and 24,000 native Christians connected with the various European and American missions, as preachers, catechists, teachers and colporteurs.—The Ep. Recorder.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The English Sparrows.—M. C. Read in the American Naturalist says that in the 6th month, in the grounds of W. H. Upson, of Akron, Ohio, his attention was called to a box for birds that had been occupied in the Spring by the sparrows. The house-martins had given out the sparrows and taken forcible possession of the box, which the sparrows were continually endeavoring to regain. Going to the ponds, he found one of the martins sitting a sentinel at the door of the box, and in a few minutes the sparrows appeared with materials for nest-building in its bill, hanging round apparently waiting for an opportunity to enter the box. It never tried to enter until the martin was sitting in sight, but as soon as the passage seemed clear, made the attempt. It was every time driven away by the martin. He watched the controversy for a hour, during which time many attempts were made to gain possession.

The next month he was informed by the proprietor, that the sparrows finally regained their box. They never made a direct attack upon the martins, but watched the box constantly for many weeks, and at every possible opportunity carried nest-building materials into it, until the patience of the martins was exhausted, and the box abandoned.

Nests of the Orang.—W. F. Hornaday, who sighted Borneo on a collecting expedition in 1878, says that near the source of the Simujan river, he found great numbers of Orang nests, the nests consist of a quantity of leafy branches broken off and piled loosely into the fork of a tree. The Orang usually selects a sapling and builds his nest in its top, even though his sight causes it to sway alarmingly. Sometimes the nest is fully three feet in diameter, it usually not more than two, and quite flat on top. There is no weaving together of branches. In short the Orang builds a nest precisely as a man would build one for himself were he obliged to pass a night in a tree and had nothing to cut branches with. Upon this leafy platform the Orang lies prone upon his back, with his long arms firmly clasped, while he sleeps, the nearest large branches within his reach. He never uses a stick or any other material to support himself, and dry, no doubt because the branches are not comfortable to lie upon.

The Fig.—The fig is a very singular fruit. In its earliest stages it is not very unlike some other fruits, but in its development it undergoes a strange modification. In its incipient state it is an aggregation of numberless flower buds, which in ordinary course would be developed on a long branch; but the branch in the case of the fig, instead of developing into a woody limb bearing flowers, grows up around the multitude of flowers, inclosing them in a conical receptacle, and forming a succulent fruit, as we call it, inside of a woody branch. The luscious fig that we eat is not a fruit at all, strictly speaking, but a succulent branch. Every seed in the fig was a separate regular flower, and the seeds are strictly the fruit.

The figs are cultivated in Turkey, Greece, Southern France, Spain, Italy and North Africa. It has been cultivated from the most ancient times in the East, and its fruit has been highly esteemed and made an ordinary article of food in Southwestern Africa. The cultivation was transmitted from the east to the Greeks and Romans, and through them to all countries where the climate was favorable for its growth.

The figs, when ripe, are dried in ovens, and then closely packed in chests, baskets, or boxes, for exportation. Our best figs come from Turkey. Those coming from Kalamata, in Greece, are said to be most luscious. Italy and Spain export a large quantity. In our Southern States the figs are put up simply as preserves for family use. They might be made an article of commerce, if attention was directed to their preservation. They yield abundantly and require little care. The fig probably is a less costly and more practical blessing which time will call forth into practical application. The figs is most healthy fruit when used in its perfectly ripe state.—American Grocer.

Jupiter has for some months now carried a remarkable rose-colored spot almost motionless upon its surface. This spot is a long oval, a little less than 30,000 miles in length and about 10,000 wide, situated about 40° south of the planet's equator. When first seen, in 7th mo. 1878, by Professor Pritchett, (of Glasgow, Mo.), it was much shorter than now and appeared to have a rapid motion over the planet's surface. In 10th and 11th mos. it seems to have disappeared or been covered up; but during the past summer and autumn has reappeared, changed in form, but retaining its brilliant color and almost motionless and permanent. What it can be it is very hard to say or even to conjecture; for its present permanence and immobility are in striking contrast with its earlier behavior and with that of the other features of the planet's markings.

Paper Collars.—As near as can be ascertained from the most reliable estimates attainable, not far from 150,000,000 of paper collars, or rather cloth-faced paper collars—for no other kind than this latter is now made or called for—are annually manufactured in the United States.

The quantity of paper now used annually in the manufacture of paper collars amounts to about 2,000 tons. In 1875, 10,000,000 yards of cotton cloth were required in this industry; in 1877, 7,000,000 yards; in 1878, 6,500,000 yards; in 1879, 6,500,000 yards for the first ten months of the year.

Silk fiber of the quality used in money paper, with additional lines of untwisted cocoon silk, running through it, half an inch apart, is put into the pulp, and forms the distinctive feature of the new paper for the currency department of the Government.

Paper bricks are now being manufactured in Wisconsin, and lately a few were made by one of the paper-mills of California, in which State they bid fair to meet with much favor, inasmuch as plenty of the best fibrous material—particularly aquatic rushes and vast forests of paper cactus, the latter substance being admirably adapted for the purpose—grows near at hand. Moreover, houses built of these bricks would need no plaster and could be easily constructed. The Chinese make the soles of all their shoes out of paper similarly prepared.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 14, 1880.

Our esteemed cotemporary, The Episcopal Recorder, in extracting from our columns "A Chapter on Faith," written by Nathan Kite, suggests modifying the last two lines, which as printed, are,

"Then fitted for use, and in righteousness drest, Thy justified spirit in Jesus shall rest,"
so as to read

"Then fitted for use, in Christ's righteousness drest, Thy justified spirit in Jesus shall rest."

As a reason for the change suggested (to which in itself, we feel no objection), it says: "Justifying righteousness is made up of the obedience, or operation of, by or in man, has any connection with that righteousness." "The saved sinner shall never be dressed in the tatters and filthy rags of his own righteousness, nor in the robes formed by the Holy Spirit in his final and perfect sanctification."

We probably should not have called attention to this subject, were it not that we have to note in our similar views being advanced by some members of our own Society, who have preached the acceptance of Christ as our substitute, as being almost the one thing needful to secure salvation. In justice to our Episcopal friend, and to those of similar leaning in our own borders, we state, and we are glad that we can do so, that they believe with us that all who are saved will be made pure and holy through the operation of the Spirit of God—but they regard this as a work wrought in them after they have been saved through the simple exercise of faith. The distinction may seem to be an unimportant one, and we desire to be preserved from spending time and labor on merely verbal differences—yet the doctrine on this subject held by the Society of Friends, seems to us more consistent with the declaration of Scripture, and practically safer to follow, than any other.

"Friends" have ever believed as Robert Barclay expresses it, "That the obedience, sufferings and death of Christ, is that by which the soul obtains remission of sins, and is the procuring cause of that Grace, by whose inward working Christ comes to be formed inwardly, and the soul to be made conformable unto Him, and so just and justified." And they have ever firmly maintained the closely connected doctrine, that it is only as we allow the Light, Grace or Spirit of Christ to work in our hearts, purifying and transforming us, that we can savingly partake of the benefits of our Saviour's death and sufferings. This was the teaching of the Apostle John, who declared that if we walk in the Light, as God is in the light, the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin—and without cleansing, the work of the Saviour, who came to redeem us from all iniquity, is not accomplished in us. This accords with the language of the Apostle James, that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only. And in close unity with the teachings of Scripture, George Fox says—that so far as a man is sanctified, so far is he justified, and no farther.

We do not believe that the Omnipotent One, who looks with disapprobation on all iniquity, "accounts" any as righteous, except as they are really made so through his own almighty power, working in them both to will and to do, according to his pleasure. The Scriptures speak of our own righteousness as filthy rags; but they use no such language as to that righteousness with which the Lord clothes his humble, submissive servants, and which, as it is his gift, partakes of the purity and goodness of the Giver.

Francis Howgill, in 1658, addressed some professors of religion of that day, with this language: "You are filled so full of your apprehensions of Christ's righteousness at a distance, that you have forgotten all at home and your own conditions; for his righteousness will not be a cloak for your self-righteousness and unrighteousness; and if Christ be not formed in you—God's righteousness—and live in you, and act in you, and work his work in you, you are in the self-righteousness, and are as dead as the stone which is connected with this doctrine, and F. Howgill's warning words may be usefully pondered by all in this day who are willing to find an easier path to the kingdom of heaven than that which requires the surrender of self. For, as the same servant of the Lord says in a tract issued in the following year: "Thou must repent of all thy sin, and turn from it, and know the judgment of God for it, and deny thyself in every thing, and take up his cross in every thing, before thou come to know Him to live in thee to thy salvation."

We have received from Charles H. Marot, publisher, 814 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, an octavo pamphlet of 140 pages, on the question whether Civilization comes from Natural or from Supernatural causes. The Evolution theory, according to the writer, seeks to explain the phenomena of civilization by Natural causes. In opposition to this, he believes the Divine will the primary source from which all improvement flows, and that the revelation of that will is made in measure to every rational being. After quoting the Scripture text, "Ye need not that any man teach you; but as the same anointing teacheth you," he adds, "The world might safely be challenged to produce a single individual who has not, at some period of his life, felt the influence of this anointing."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The total amount of the public debt on the 1st inst., was $2,000,778,124, against a decrease of $87,995,901.

The product of the Bessemer department of the Penn sylvania steel works for the last month, was 9774 tons steel ingots. The rail mill for the same time turned out 22,000 tons of finished rails.

It is stated that the year 1879 has witnessed the winding up of more railway companies than any previous year, and more than twice the number of 1871. At least 65 roads were sold under foreclosure, representing a nominal investment of $243,000,000, besides a large amount of stock interests and debts. In the last four years about one-fifth of the entire railway mileage and capital of the United States has been compelled to change ownership by forced sale. There is, however, a hopeful side to this gloomy picture of bankruptcy and failure. The improved condition of business gives reason to hope that the railway investments will be reasonably remunerative.

The colored Relief Association of Kansas finding it impossible to maintain the hundreds of destitute colored people arriving there from the South, is about to make an effort to disperse them to other States, where the people are able to care for such as are in destitute circumstances.

A. E. Borie, Ex-Secretary of the Navy, died at his residence in Philadelphia, on the 5th inst., in the 71st year of his age.

The Republican State Convention met at Harrisburg on the 4th inst., and appointed delegates to the National Convention, and instructed them to support General Grant for President.

A bill relative to the establishment of a branch mint in New York city, is now pending in the House.

The total tonnage of anthracite coal from all the regions for the week ending on the 31st ult., amounted to 430,062 tons, an increase of 530,793 tons over corresponding week last year. The trade is extremely dull, owing, it is said, principally to the very mild weather.

The damage by the great storm on the 31st inst., to the buildings and beach at Coney Island, is estimated at nearly $190,000.

The grape islands of Lake Erie have 4000 acres of vines, and the yield in 1879 was 16,000,000 pounds. The wine production was 1,526,400 gallons.

The number of deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending at noon on the 7th, was 288. Of this number 157 were adults and 131 children—62 being under one year of age.

Cotton was firmly held at full prices.—Sales of middlings are reported at 13½ a 13½ cts. per lb. for upland, and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and standard white 7½ cts. for export, and 8½ a 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour in better demand and firmer: 100 lbs. superfine sold at $5; 200 lbs. western and Penna. extra, $6 a $6.25; Minnesota, in lots, medium, $6.50, good, $6.75; do. choice at $6.87½ a $7, and straight at $7; 700 do. Penna. extra family, fair, at $6.75; 400 lbs. do. choice, $7; 200 lbs. Ohio, $6.75; do. choice, $7; do. choice at $7 a $7.30; 100 lbs. Illinois do. at $7; winter wheat, patents at $7.58 a $8.50, and Minnesota do. at $7.75 a $8.50, as in quality, and 400 lbs. City Mills family on private terms. The demand for fine flour has fallen off; small sales at $4.75 a $5. In corn meal there is nothing doing. Buckwheat meal sells at $1.75 a $2.

Feed is firm; sales of 6 cars winter bran at $19 a $20 per ton.

Grain—Wheat was in better demand, and prices were 2c. per bushel higher: 8000 bushels sold, including Pennsylvania red, at $1.4 a $1.47; southern, at $1.44 a $1.45; Pennsylvania and southern amber, at $1.46; southern and western white, $1.46 per bushel, as to quality. Rye was dull at 90 cts. per bushel. Corn was rather easier; 12,000 bushels sold in lots at 57 cts. for mixed and steamer, and 58 cts. per bushel for soft mixed and yellow; mixed, 58 cts., and white at 61 cts. per bushel. Oats were unchanged; 6000 bushels sold in lots at 46 a 47 cts. for mixed and stained, and 48 a 49 cts. per bushel for white.

Hay and straw market for week ending 2nd mo. 7th, 1880.—Hay, 27½; loads of straw, 45. Average price during the week: Prime timothy, 95 cts., at 100 pounds; mixed, 85 a 95 cts., per 100 pounds; straw, 1.10 a $1.25 per 100 pounds.

Cattle, calves were in good demand and a fraction higher. 2125 head were arrived and sold at the different yards at 1 a 6½ cts. per lb., and 1000 head sheep were in fair demand at the former rates; 8000 head sold at 1½ a 6½ cts. per lb., and lambs at 5½ a 7 cts.

Hogs were a fraction higher: 5000 head sold at different yards at 6½ a 7½ cts. per lb., as to condition. Cows were unchanged; 190 head sold at $25 a $50 head.

FOREIGN.—Parliament was opened on the 5th by the Queen's speech occupied but few minutes, in which she briefly referred to the general condition of her dominions. The hope was expressed that the power of self-government enjoyed by the inhabitants of Cape Colony, may soon be extended to her subjects in other parts of South Africa. The unsettled condition of Afghanistan, renders the recall of troops from that country impracticable at present. The distress in Ireland alluded to, and the hope expressed that Parliament would approve the course which has been taken for relief.

The fund instituted by the Duchess of Marlborough now amounts to over £10,000, and the expenditure has been over £13,000. Subscriptions continue to arrive from different parts of the world. A Dublin dispatch to the Times says the relief measures have ready had a beneficial effect. A more hopeful spirit is growing among the people.

Six persons lost their lives by the burning of a steamer in Dublin, on the 9th inst.

The American demand for iron is said to have unprecedented activity in Great Britain. Four vessels loaded with iron ore for Great Britain and rails for New York, on the 4th inst., and eleven others will at the same time chartered to load for American ports.

A dispatch from Paris to the Times says, that since houses have been burnt down at Aytz, near Aix, the department of Ariège, and that the sufferers by fire are in great distress.

It is announced from Berlin, that the Government intends to propose a tax on all persons who are exempt from military service.

Later details from the recent hurricane in the Philippine Islands, give the number of vessels wrecked, and the number of persons and property lost. A number of other vessels were damaged. Forty-six persons were drowned.

The Greek Government has ordered that the Bible shall be read daily in the public schools in the original text in the modern Greek.

It is announced from Naples, says, an eruption of Mount Vesuvius began on the 7th.

DIED, on the evening of 7th of the First month, 18

HANNAH HOFFMAN, aged 89 years and three men a member of Chester Monthly and Darby Preparat Meeting.

She was born in this city, on the 18th of First month, 18

S. ROSAMBA PASEY, only child of Albert and Mary J. Paist, formerly of Danboro', Bucks county, in the 22 year of her age, a member of Northern District Monthly Meeting. When disease laid its chastening hand upon this dear young Friend, she was deeply concerned for the welfare of her immortal soul; and she was called to rest to the pleading of his children, in the tension of Divine love and mercy, favored her with evidence that her transgressions were forgiven, enable her to say, "My sins are all blotted out, and a place rest prepared for me." And having experienced the change for herself, she was earnestly solicited for her dear friends, and near friends, to be last but not least, uttered the petition, "That the Lord would keep & preserve them, that they might be prepared to join in those happy mansions where pain and sorrow no more."

The Volcano of Kilauea.

The following description of this celebrated volcano of the Sandwich Islands, is taken from a recent work, "A-lo-ha,"—the Hawaiian translation of "welcome"—by G. L. Chaney.

"The next morning was clear. It showed exactly where we were,—in a large grassy space not far from the edge of a hole in the world, from five hundred to a thousand feet deep and nine miles in circumference. The ackness of freshly cooled lava was below: one great lake of fire ice;—to make a danger but not unnatural compound. Cooled later and cooled lava take on similar forms; the grouping of these upheaved masses of lava-rock was like the surface of a crater—a floor. A cliff all around the crater, in places exactly perpendicular,—the fragments falling from it, and usually accumulated at the foot of such cliffs in sloping insteps of debris, having been swallowed up and melted the once molten flood. In the far corner of the great crater, a cloud which no sun-shine can disperse; under it, the fire unquenchable. I wonder if I am alone in the impulse I have to turn away from the object I most desire to see; that is, if it is a great object, had the same feeling at Niagara. It seizes me at Kilauea. I am in no haste to go, rather would I turn away and wait. But Captain H— and Forbes and the hardened aides are waiting for me. I must go. The preliminary tumble of six hundred feet is calculated to shake the sentiment well out of me; and following that, further on, another, less, descent completes the disentanglement. We are now walking over a crust [so thin] that we need the confidence inspired by our guide's unconcern, and the assurance that all the numerous visits to the volcano there as never been a serious accident. It seems credible that there is no danger in such wandering over a floor which has been broken up within the week—yes, within twenty-four hours—by the force of undermining fire and food. What certainty can there be that the very path which we are taking may not crack and bulge with liquid lava this very moment? Only an inch or two below the dull, black surface, these blocks glow like heated coal. My walking stick kindles into flame the moment it enters one of these cracks. We actually cross streams of lava which were pressed out and cooled only yesterday. In places there are openings through which the underground rivers of molten lava may be seen. Our guide took us to one of these holes, and, looking into it, we could watch the torrent of melted rock pouring like water from some unseen upper lake to the region below our very feet; its mass a yellow flood, its spray a flaming gas. And still we went on, fascinated by the beautiful peril of the place. Lava in all its varied forms stretched around us. Great coils, like ships' hawsers, twisted and spun in what interminable walk below us! Lava on fold, as smooth as finest satin! Sulphur-tinted scales as gorgeous as the parrot's plumage! Blocks as perfectly quarried as if cut and dressed by the stone-mason. Caves where the lava, cooling as it dripped, has fretted the roof with Venetian red or dull gray pendants. Glittering crusts, so light and porous that they seem like petrified sponges, with every color of the rainbow caught and imprisoned in them. Surely lava is the veritable Proteus, and in all its changes it is always unmistakable lava and nothing else. What else could coil and crack and shimmer and gloom and melt and hold and run and stand still, and make and destroy the world around it in such seemingly indifferent fashion, as the sea of lava not below us? We were all are walking with a faith in Nature which Peter had not in his Lord. And now we are nearing the living fountain of this great, black sea. Cones dripping sulphur and spouting steam and fire appear. We follow our guide around a brook of lava too hot and fresh for us to wade through it.

A steady lift in the surface of the crater. We are coming to the lake. A dull roar as of a lion over the bank! A gust of hot sulphurous air in our faces! One more upward step to where our guide is standing, and Hale-man-mau lies before us,—a lake of molten lava one hundred and fifty feet across, and twenty feet below the edge on which we stand. It looked gray as we saw it in the full daylight, and at first sight it might have been taken for a sea of melted lead; but in its tidal motion towards the southwest, either the wind or its own inner agony roughened its surface, and every ripple bled. Nothing is or can be as it has been painted; least of all this ever-changing volcano. Nature always surprises; but seldom disappoints us. I had looked for fury, tempest, frenzy, in this lake of fire. I found a terrible composure. Only in one place on the opposite shore, where the sea seemed to break, was there any audible or visible outbreak.

There a lateral fountain flung itself thirty feet into the air; and, cooled and winnowed by the passing breeze, scattered shining black grains of lava and the dry, brittle chaff, called Pele's hair, far and wide. But even this wild fountain seemed perfectly controlled. It only added to the impression of power in reserve and under full control, with which Hale-man-mau affected me. Am I putting the gloss of my own faith upon this tremendous Apocalypse of Nature, that all the palpable horrors of this unsearchable world in which we live,—are held in the hollow of God's hand, and controlled by his all perfect and neighboring lake of Kilauea, the second lake to which we passed from the subdued grandeur of Hale-man-mau, was this faith disturbed. Three fire-fountains were flinging shreds of gray lava thirty, forty feet into the air. We watched for an hour its gray billows, dashing into fire-spray against the black shore, and throwing flecks of lava over the adjacent field, and no sense of danger or thought of fear attended us. A pronounced crack all around the rim of Kilauea, about three feet from the edge, warned us not to step beyond its death-line. That broken edge falls into the fiery abyss from time to time, and goes to the burning.

The nearest approach to an accident ever known here was when A— and some friends from Onomea overstepped the line to look more directly into the pit. They had just stepped back from their perilous exploration when the shelf on which they had been standing fell into the burning lake. More prudent, play of the fire-fountains, fascinated by their novelty and splendor. Just before we came away, a mighty commotion began in the centre of the sea. Its surface was upheaved, and the very mountain seemed to shake with the 'swelling thereof.' Slowly, deliberately, as if with settled purpose, the movement was begun, and then, with one tremendous spring, the fountain shot into the air a column of blood-red lava, thirty feet in height, showering burning pebbles upon the surrounding lake, and a spray like spun glass upon the neighboring rocks. For a few minutes it stood blowing like a whale, where it had risen, and then it wallowed slowly to the shore, leaving the gray sea behind it lashed into bloody foam. When we turned away, it was still roaring and fuming under the forbidding cliff which shut it in. But it was only biding its time. That very night, looking from our distant post of observation, the volcano house, we could distinctly see the rushing of the uplifted flood from shore to shore, and the leap of the fiery monsters from their imprisonment."—G. L. Chaney.

The One Baptism.—I saw that either I must be buried by that baptism of Christ with him into death, or else there would be no rising with him into newness of life. There might be a rising into newness of profession; but that would do it, it was newness of life I must come to; or the other I had tried over and over.—John Burnjeat.

If there be not a care, even while we are in one thing doing for the Truth in the outward, in the inward we may lose it.—Ibid.

For "The Friend."

Anne Sears.

The subject of this memoir was the daughter of John and Sarah Doudna, and a native of Greenville county, North Carolina, where her parents lived until about the year 1790, when they removed to Edgecombe county, of the same State. Here there was a meeting of the Society of Friends, of whom her mother had had some knowledge, and whom she now wished to join. The family were much pleased with Friends, and with the exception of one daughter, all became members and continued so through life. Anne was at this time about nine years of age, and she became early attached to the principles of our Society, which she was first introduced to in Ohio in the year 1804, and settled first in Jefferson county, near Short Creek settlement of Friends; here they remained about a year, and then came to Belmont county, near Barnesville, where, in 1810, she married Peter Sears, a native of Prince George county, Virginia.

In those early days and the settling of a new country, the pioneers necessarily underwent many trials; yet we find that they were still diligent in the attendance of their meetings; and it is with a feeling of admiration that we contemplate the zeal which they manifested in this duty. At one time her husband took charge of preparing and warming the meeting house, and as they had a large family, it frequently became necessary for one of the parents to remain at home. In cold weather when she attended, she would go on horseback, a distance of about two miles, and carry a chunk of fire to kindle the charcoal upon the hearth in their humble meeting-house.

She was deprived of her sight in her left eye. The other eye remained healthy for nearly thirty years, when she took a deep cold, which settled in it, and after suffering for eighteen weeks, she became entirely blind. This was twenty-three years before her death, during which time she never saw the light of day or looked upon the faces of her family or the friends who came to visit her, and whom she loved so well. Yet she very much enjoyed their company, and frequently imparted counsel and admonition to them in the love of Truth. She was very cheerful, for as she passed through this long night of darkness, her soul was illumined by a brighter light than that of earth, and a spirit of resignation under this affliction was ever manifest. Her hearing became impaired, but with these exceptions she retained her faculties remarkably well. She had led an active life, and now, although deprived of sight, she could not well give up all the duties in which she had engaged; she therefore learned to sew and knit, which although not perfectly done, yet served to help pass away the time. Strange as it may seem, she contrived a plan by which she could frequently thread her needle. To do this, she would be careful to stop sewing when she had three or four inches of thread left, and leaving it fast, she would push the needle down to the goods; then sharpening the old thread and one end of the new with her knife, she would firmly twist them together; this done, she would carefully slip the needle over the twist, thus passing it from the old to the new thread.

Her memory was very remarkable, and seemed even brighter than before the loss of sight. She could repeat upwards of twenty chapters in the Bible, besides portions of many others, and a number of pieces of poetry, nearly all of which she had learned after becoming blind; and she would very often repeat to herself. She frequently requested some member of the family to find certain passages in the Bible, which ministers had quoted, or which otherwise had come under her notice; the last one was this in the 57th of Isaiah: "For thus saith the high and lofty One, that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy; I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones."

This was one of her favorites; and it was with thankful feelings the grand-daughter, who had found the passage for her, heard, on the day of her funeral, a beloved friend and minister (who knew not of the circumstance) commence her testimony with this very text. She was a diligent attender of meeting, until within the last year of her life, when her health would not permit it, yet she still felt a lively interest and an exercise of spirit that they might be held in the power of truth.

Among her papers was found one in her own hand-writing, which says: "Perhaps these few lines may be seen when they may have a tendency to revive the drooping mind to trust in the Lord, in whom is everlasting strength, and leave all discouragements behind. I was about to take a journey, when in a feeble state of health, and as I was desirous that I might be guided in the right way, it brought me into much thoughtfulness. When in this state of mind, and at a time when retired alone, this sweet encouragement seemed to be with me: 'Go, and the Lord go

For several weeks previous to the close of her life, her health seemed gradually to decline. About two weeks before the change, she spoke of some garments which she had laid by to be placed upon her after death; when the question was asked if she thought she would need them soon? she answered, "Oh! it seems sometimes as if I am almost gone. I hope it may be well with me." When asked, as if she felt really, she said, "I hope I am, and that my merciful Heavenly Father will be with me through the dark valley of the shadow of death. What a mercy Father!" A few days before her close, she and at another time to bear her sufferings, short in righteousness, if consistent with his will. Another time we heard her words, "Praises, praises," falling from her lips. The evening before the final change, being taken worse, she thought the time had come, and said in a distinct voice, "Farewell, farewell all!" Her father said, "I do not know I am going, but I hope I am." These we must consider her parting words, for although yet she was unable to talk with us, or when the silent messenger came, to bid us a last "farewell."

Thus "the sun of her life went down calm and serene." For some hours before the change, she was relieved of her sufferings, and the flame of her life grew feebler, until, even as a lamp whose oil is consumed, it was silently extinguished on the evening of the 5th of Eleventh month, 1878. She was aged 91 years, 8 months and 15 days.

Refugees in Kansas.

Extract from a letter received by so Friends in Philadelphia, from Elizabeth Comstock, dated Topeka, Kansas, 2d month, 5th, 1880.

"We have had loud calls from Parson, Emporia, Fort Scott, Leavenworth, Independence and other parts of the State, and have sent off large quantities without opening. We have requested our agents in these ferent places to report to us every name and address, that we may receipt the goods, or it themselves. But the rush is so great, need so immediate, and the pressure so overwhelming, that we cannot rely upon all being done as we could wish. Of one thing our friends in Philadelphia may be sure of, that every package entrusted to our kind friend, Joshua L. Bailly, has reached Topeka safely, and all have been heartily welcomed, greatly appreciated, and have been wisely distributed to the best of our ability. You will greatly oblige me, and save me much writing, if you will kindly extend this information to all the Philadelphia friends we have so kindly and generously helped us our work.

The assistance Joshua L. Bailly has given us in receiving and forwarding and in securing free transportation, is beyond all moral value—dollars and cents cannot describe or represent it.

Refugees coming in fast, 4500 more on way from one point in Mississippi, expect to land here in a few days. Excuse hast, I have 95 letters before me to answer.

Your friend truly,

ELIZABETH L. COMSTOCK.

May the friends of suffering humanity incited to send liberally of their means, which a kind Heavenly Father has blessed them, remembering it "is more blessed give than to receive."

A Warning.—When I was in Dublin, so after my first landing, I was livingly oper in the life and power of the gospel, at a meeting at Sycamore Alley, in which, among other things, I had a good deal to say about the spiritual fire of the Lord which is in Zion and his furnace which is in Jerusalem, for refining of all such as ever become his sons and daughters. A man, in a stable near I made a great noise to drown my voice, who he continued for some little time, and as my voice raised, he increased his noise; and I told that some heard him saying something in contempt about the fire I spoke of, or however he was heard speaking about the burning of the fire. Another person discharged a gun just by the meeting-house, when I was in the midst of my most fervent engagement; I report was very loud, and disturbed me; but I was carried through as if nothing happened. Blessed be the name of the Lord! But now, on my return to Dublin, I was full informed that the poor wretched man, who I shouted so loudly in the stable to drown my voice, and spoke so ignorantly about the burning of the fire, was, in less than two weeks after, consumed to death by fire in the same stable where he had thus impudently behaved for the stable taking fire by some means who he was in it, he was burnt before he could get out.

This I heard of several weeks before my return, but I chose not to insert it till I had of fuller information and confirmation in the ty; but finding it a fact, and much noticed by many people of different religious professions in Dublin, as a very remarkable instance of the providence or judgment of God; I thought proper to give the relation of it to a friend; and I do it without presuming to say how far it was in special judgment. But God's dealings are all in wisdom, perhaps an instance of his all-wise government which may have a striking and profitable effect upon some of the hardened and daring, who may read it, or at least may tend to guard with caution some of the less abandoned against going way to the suggestions of infidelity, of afeeness or audacity. For, most assuredly, there is a God of justice as well as mercy, who sees and knows all our thoughts, words and actions, and for every evil, will bring us into judgment; yea, for every thing contrary to his holy will and wisdom.—J. Scott's Journal.

For "The Friend"

Extracts from the Diary and Letters of Ebenezer Worth.

1874. 11th mo. 28th. Visited J. B., I think was enabled to feel much for him. Oh! that I may be favored to have a true sense of his state and condition; to be able to make his peace with his Divine Master and be prepared for his admittance into rest. Oh! may I take warning from the sickness and deaths that are taking place around us, and remember my covenants with my Divine Master; how great have been his mercies and long-suffering toward me, a poor unworthy, backsliding creature.

12th mo. 16th. Attended the funeral of
 B. I think before he died he appeared convinced to make preparation for the change;
 his concern may have been felt while in health,
 but I know not. Oh! the danger of putting off so important work for a sick bed. What a number of thoughtless creatures we are. I feel it in myself. I feel concerned on my own account.

15th. 1st mo. 2d. Commenced a new year which we have been permitted to enter upon without doubt in wisdom and mercy, while many think the year just past away have been taken from works to rewards; I believe our fortitude has been in mercy for a wise and good purpose. Oh! may we be concerned to show the will of our Divine Master, and live in obedience to Him, serve and enjoy Him here and be prepared to join the just of all generations in praising Him through a never-ending eternity. Oh! may I in time come love my Divine Master more and serve Him better.

3d mo. 28th. Before going to meeting I felt discouraged on account of indisposition of body, and feeling my weakness and unfitness to occupy the seat I do and the responsibility of closing a meeting for worship. I trust we are favored to feel the presence of our Divine Master, and some ability to perform acceptable worship; to me a favored meeting in which I felt strengthened and encouraged to assist in the Great Head of the Church, notwithstanding my great unworthiness. I think was favored to feel for the welfare of those with attendance with us.

6th mo. 5th he writes: "Humiliating trials and anxiety have been permitted to come upon me; I hope they may work together for my good. I think I have been in unmerited favor to feel the Divine Arm underneath to support me, and I hope my prayers answered,—what encouragement to such a poor unworthy creature.

7th mo. 4th. We were in unmerited mercy favored to have a comfortable meeting; had the company of A. H. I thought she was favored with a sense of the state of the meeting; spoke well to the young people, also to those advanced in life. I have for the last week or two passed through close trials and provings, had not my Divine Master been pleased in his unmerited mercy to help and support me, it seemed as if I could not have borne up under my trials. What an inexpressible favor it is to feel his good presence to be with us, and a sense of his loving-kindness and faith in Him, in the time of trial, that can bless all and make them work together for our good.

9th mo. 14. Saw a number of poor men travelling the road who seemed to be without a home or employment. Had a pretty satisfactory opportunity of talking to two of them.

10th mo. 10th. Attended our meeting at Marlston. I was permitted to feel through a part of the meeting, much weakness; before the close I trust was favored to feel the good presence of our Divine Master to be near, to my great comfort; truly one hour spent in his presence is worth a thousand elsewhere.

14th. Was much tried in the forepart of the meeting with wandering thoughts, was favored before the close to have my mind settled to my comfort,—the praise is due to the Great Head of the Church. I trust I may say I have been much comforted in some evidences of improvement in dear ——. My desire for him is that he may be given up to serve his Divine Master faithfully, and be a burden-bearer in his church militant. I think I may say at times I desire the spiritual welfare of all the human family."

The following appears to be the last record in his diary of a visit to the Indians on the Allegheny reservation, in whose welfare he had been so long interested.

10th mo. 29th. "I think I may say I felt it to be my duty to leave my home to go to the Allegheny reservation to assist Joseph Scattergood, he wishing my advice in relation to the boundaries of the villages on the reservation.

31st. Sat a comfortable meeting with the friends living (at Tunessassa). It being the time of vacation at the school, the Indian children had gone home.

11th mo. 1st. The day being stormy and a good deal of snow on the ground, I remained at Tunessassa.

2d. Visited a number of Indian families; have cause to be thankful for the favors of the day; feel the necessity of being humble and watchful.

3d. Walked down the river to Abel Pierce's, the river being too high to ford (as they were repairing the bridge) could not cross with a team; called at Jas. Pierce's, King Pierce's and Wm. Bones; I hope the day was profitably spent; got back to Tunessassa safely;
 the crossing on the bridge rather dangerous; suppose I walked about ten miles.

5th. Made a very satisfactory visit to Owen Blacksnake and wife. Owen expressed his satisfaction with the visit; his wife asked some questions which I answered, and Owen interpreted to her; I hope the visit may be of use to the visited—the praise be to the Great Head of the Church. May the Indians with myself be enabled to love Him more and serve

Him better, and be grateful for the many unmerited favors received. Was favored I hope in an interview with Jas. Watt, to make some favorable impressions in relation to the doctrines of the Christian religion. Thought I had a favored opportunity with Geo. Jacobs; had many favors during this visit, the morning before leaving Tunessassa."

Thus closes, so far as we know, the diary of our beloved friend; it was commenced in 1843, at Tunessassa, and the last word traced by his hand therein appears to be "Tunessassa," showing his unabated interest in these poor people for a period of about 32 years.
 He survived the last entry near two years,
 and during that time he continued the exercise of his faculties, as his life had been, peacefully, calmly, saying to those about him when near the close, that when the spirit left the body he wished the limbs to be straightened out and every thing in and about the premises to remain perfectly quiet for the space of one hour.

The preparation of the Extracts for the press, can truly be said to have been a labor of love, a desire being felt that they may be instructive and encouraging to both reader and compiler. It seems desirable for us all to notice the reverential spirit manifested throughout the journal; and the avoidance of the use of the sacred name, the absence of strong expressions, frequently using the words "I trust, I hope, or I think; great cause for grate-tude," &c., instead of any positive expression of the existence of the feeling in his own breast; also the desire for humility, close watchfulness over self, and entire surrender of his own will to the Divine will. "Mark the modesty and lowliness of his heart; the end of this man is peace."

Among the papers of the deceased are several manuscripts in his own handwriting;
 some copies of letters written by him; also a few letters written to him by valuable friends, now removed, we humbly trust, from works to rewards—some extracts from which it is thought would be interesting as well as instructive.

Hat Honor.

For "The Friend"

Stephen Grellet while prosecuting his religious engagements in Spain, states in his journal, that his attention was called to "an extract from the Madrid Gazette, with a copy of the order sent by the King to the Governors of the Provinces, and the public authorities, and people where we may travel, directing that due civilities should be shown to us by all, and that free entrance be allowed to us by any place we may wish to visit. It states also, that we are members of the religious Society of Friends, known by the name of Quakers; that it is part of our religious scriptures to enter all places and appear before everybody, without uncovering the head, considering that real honor or respect cannot be properly manifested by taking off the hat; that, accordingly, we had been before the King and Queen, and their young Princess, with our hats on. Orders are therefore given that no molestation be offered us, either on this, or on any other account whatever. It appears that this order was made before we had the places we passed through, and excited the curiosity of the people to see us. Here, also, this order is published in their newspaper. We are thereby rendered very public characters."

Where England found her vegetables.

When Queen Catharine on one occasion expressed a wish for a salad, it is said that there were no materials in England of which to make it. According to Northwick, this was in 1509. If so, it must have been within a few months of the royal marriage, and the young king, to gratify the wish of his bride, forthwith sent over to Holland for gardeners to come and cultivate what was requisite for the purpose. Our native stock, as in the case of fruits, appears to have been remarkably scanty, and, such as they were, have been, for the most part, altogether superseded by foreign importations. We have, for instance, and there in England growing wild; but of the 187 distinct samples mentioned in the Royal Horticultural Society's Journal for last July as having been under culture and examination at Chiswick, probably no one would own to any relationship with the scrubby little indigenous cabbage or colewort.

There is a species of carrot, again, indigenous to this country, and it would seem, indeed, to almost every other country where a light soil is found. In its wild state, however, it is scarcely edible, being strong and unpleasant in flavor, and dry and tough in substance. It has been said that the seed of the wild carrot, sown for two or three years in rich as well as light soil, will yield excellent roots. Those who have tried the experiment, however, emphatically deny the truth of this, and it is probable that all our present varieties came from abroad. Some have maintained that the cultivated carrot came originally from Flanders, and that it was first Elizabeth. Gerard calls the plant the "Carrot carrot," and seems to assume that the best sort came to us from Candia. Very much the same history may be given of the parsnip. This, also, is indigenous, but in its wild state is worthless, and our present edible sorts are from "over the sea."

Nobody knows precisely where the potato came from originally. It has been found apparently indigenous, in many parts of the world. Darwin, for instance, found it wild in the Chonos Archipelago. Sir W. J. Hooker says that it is common at Valparaiso, where it grows abundantly on the sandy hills near the sea. In Peru and the other parts of South America it appears to be at home, and it is a noteworthy fact that Darwin should have noted it both in the humid forests of the Chonos Archipelago and among the central Chilean mountains, where sometimes rain does not fall for six months at a stretch. It was to the colonists whom Sir Walter Raleigh sent out, in Elizabeth's reign, that we are indebted for our potatoes. Herriot, who went out with these colonists, and who wrote an account of his travels, makes what may, perhaps, be regarded as the earliest mention of this vegetable. Under the heading of "roots," he mentions what he calls the "apewack." "These roots," he says, "are round, some large as a walnut, others much larger; they grow on damp soils, many being hanging together, as if fixed on ropes; they are good food, either boiled or roasted." At the beginning of the seventeenth century, Phillips says that this root was planted, as a curious exotic, in the gardens of the nobility; but it was long ere it came into general use. Many held them to be poisonous, and it would seem not altogether unreasonably so, either. The potato is closely related to the deadly nightshade and the mandrake, and from its stems and leaves may be extracted a very powerful narcotic. In Burgundy, the adoption of the potato as food was for a time forbidden by law, being deemed "a poisonous and mischievous root." In England, prejudice against it was for a long time very strong, more especially among the poor. It was believed to occasion dysentery and leprosy.

Rhubarb we obtained indirectly from China. Modern Europe first became acquainted with it in 1535. Our garden peas are said to have come to us from France, and were first known in Norman peas, because the grounds about Fulham, near London, do bring them forward soonest." The introduction was probably in the reign of Henry VIII., whose honey-moon indulgence of his bride's desire for salad seems to have exerted a wonderful influence on English horticulture. In the reign of Elizabeth, however, they were still not grown to any great extent, though they seem to have been imported from Holland. Fuller says, "they were dainties for ladies, they came so far and cost so dear." Gerard says that there is one kind of pea indigenous to England. Beans we appear to have imported from Morocco, and the authority last quoted says there is no difference between the garden bean and the field bean, except such as is to be attributed to cultivation and good soil. The kidney bean is also not a native of England. This, we are assured, was first introduced into this country from the Netherlands in 1509—another importation, therefore, in all probability due to Henry's horticultural enthusiasm at the time, when he was a dotting young sportsman. It is a curious fact that the early introduction of the scarlet runner seems to have met with no little prejudiced opposition from an idea that the color of the flowers was due to blood.—London Globe.

The Great Master.—"I am my own master!" cried a young man, proudly, when a friend tried to persuade him from an enterprise which he had on hand; "I am my own master!"

"Did you ever consider what a responsible post that is?" asked his friend.

"Responsible—is it?"

"A master must lay out the work which he wants done and see that it is done right. He should try to secure the best ends by the best means. He must keep on the look-out against obstacles and accidents, and watch that everything goes straight, else he must fail."

"Well."

"To be master of yourself you have your conscience to keep clear, your heart to cultivate, your temper to govern, your will to direct, and your judgment to instruct. You are master over a hard lot, and if you don't master them they will master you."

"That is so," said the young man.

"Now, I could undertake no such thing," said his friend. "I should fail, sure, if I did. Sam wanted to be his own master, and failed. Herod did. Judas did. No man is fit for it. 'One is my Master, even Christ.' I work under his direction. He is regular, and where he is master, all goes right."—Dr. Bacon.

The Light of Christ.—"The light of Christ in thy conscience which shows thee thy sin, is that which will save thee from it."—Francis Howgill.

"The Beauty of Holiness."

BY W. C. GRIFFITH.

I desired to know of my friend H., a useful and greatly beloved member of the Church at Kingwood, what it was that brought him to Christ. I had known him several years before as an outspoken enemy of the truth, a student of Renan, and a warm admirer of Hume, and I felt curious to learn the secret of so marked a change.

"It was the life of a poor wood-chopper," he replied, "that led me to repentance. I grew up in the country, and adjoining my father's farm there lived an old man who earned a livelihood for himself and family by cutting wood. He owned a three-acre lot, arched and lived in a log-house which had been built mainly by his own hands. There were but only earthly possessions; but here, far from the maddening crowd's ignoble strife, his sober wishes never learned to stray." "He had no cause to stray, indeed, for by dint of long continued care and labor, bestowed on the intervals of his customary vocation, the old man had converted his little freehold for a wild marsh, into a very paradise. Every flower and shrub, every tree that was pleased to look upon, had its representative in the little inclosure. It was kept as clean as a new-swept floor. No wandering leaf could hide from the eye of the owner, and the grass was always evenly shaved once a week. He lived the most contented man it was ever in good fortune to meet. I verily believe he would not have exchanged his humble abode for the rank and wealth of an English nobleman. His patience earned him an enviable reputation; for there was not a boy in the whole neighborhood who did not call him JC. I had seen this trait of his character tried in heavy afflictions, by oft-repeated and withering disappointments, by the grossest insult yet under all no murmur escaped his lips, nor was there even the shadow of a perturbation within. His summer lasted all the year. There were many Christians in the neighborhood, but this man's goodness was conspicuous in the gentleness of his speech, the kindness of his manners, the utter abandonment of self, and the consecration of his powers to religious uses. It was said that he had held more class-meetings in his garden than were ever held in the village church, and there was good reason to believe that this was true; for when the long summer evening came, it was his delight to invite his neighbors and friends to see his flowers and trees, and when they had strolled about the lot for a while, he was sure to draw them inside the little rustic arbor that stood in the center of the garden, and there he would have all seated, and then, striking up some well-known hymn, he would begin a meeting that sometimes lasted an hour. Sometimes I would relate his experience; and at other times he would relate the experience of some friend. Often he would take out his pocket Testament, and reading a few verses would draw his hearers into conversation about the subject. The impressions made upon my young mind on occasions of this kind abided through all the skeptical readings of my life, and was abiding forever. On one occasion, during my dream of an infidel work, I saw him, as I had often seen him in my boyhood, hanging his wallet upon the limb of a tree after dinner, and going into the woods to pray. When I turned his face seemed to be lit up with a heavenly glow. The vision aroused me to new and most serious reflections about my soul, and while the reasoning of infidel writers—particularly that of Herbert Spencer—was very attractive and forcible to my mind, the fact of this man's goodness, as the result of a supernatural influence, ever stood before me with an admonitory certainty I could neither vainly nor lose sight of. It grew upon me, indeed, until my doubts fled away, as the darkness disappears before the increasing light of day, and finally I was led a humble penitent to the feet of the Saviour."

This incident, related in detail, strongly illustrates the power of godly living. The philosophy of holiness has led but few to Christ. Its beauty has won thousands. On its principle Joudet tells us "to make truth beautiful, and not seek to arm her." The Gospel never needs an apology. It only needs to be abundantly illustrated, and those who do all the time undertaking to defend the faith, or to make it plausible and effective by equally-balanced arguments, do greatly mistake the power it is possible for them to wield. It is important to preach doctrines; it is more important to adore them with holy living. A full answer has been known to turn away wrath, when a discourse on anger failed to have any apparent effect. It is the power of living episodes," rather than written letters, that is needed everywhere.

SUDDEN DEATH.

"Sudden death is sudden glory."
Such the utterance that was given,
When I heard the touching story
Of thy quick escape to Heaven.

On the whirlwind's airy pinions
Did the mighty prophet fly;
Thou, like him wast swiftly carried
To thy mansion in the sky.

May the mantle of thy spirit,
Rest on those, that lie 'neath' below!
May we all as gladly follow,
When the call shall bid us go.

Then, or long, or short the warning,
Waiting, ready for the word,
We shall trim our lamps rejoicing,
Going forth, to meet our Lord.

At an hour, not unprepared for,
Shall the solemn summons come,
While angelic hallelujahs,
Bid us welcome to our home.

Ransomed by a Saviour's purchase,
We shall swell the adoring strain,
Glory, honor, high thanksgiving
To the Lamb, for sinners slain.

Selected.

BANISHMENT OF UNBELIEF.

Depart unbelief! my Saviour is near,
And for my relief will surely appear.
If prayer let me wrestle, and He will perform:
'Tis Christ in the vessel, I smile at the storm,
Determined to save, He watched o'er my path
Then, Satan's blind slave, I sported with death.

And can He have taught me to trust in his name,
And thus far have brought me to put me to shame?
How should I complain of want or distress,
Or temptation or pain? He told me no less:
The heirs of salvation, I know from his word,
Through much tribulation must follow their Lord!

How dark be my way, since He is my guide,
To mine to obey, 'tis his will to provide;
His way was much rougher and darker than mine:
Did Jesus thus suffer, and shall I repine?
Though painful at present, 'twill cease before long,
And then, oh, how pleasant the conqueror's song!

MY BIRDS.

Selected.

I lean from the window at morning,
And hear in the street
The chirp of the tiny brown sparrows,
So cheery and sweet.

Around me the swallows come circling
On lightest of wings,
While high on the bough of the elm-tree
A glad robin sings.

My birds! they fill gladly about me,
They twitter and call;
But the message they bring in the morning
Is sweetest of all.

For the sparrows chirp gaily,—“Be cheerful, Whatever befall!”
“Be strong,” sing the swallows above me,
God careth for all.

“Be trustful.” Oh robin, low singing,
Your message is best;
Each day brings its work and its blessing,—
Trust God for the rest.

My bright little songsters, I hear you
With heart glad and free;
For I know that the Father in heaven,
Who sent you to me,

Not only will strengthen and cheer me
Each hour of the day,
But will, in his own loving kindness,
Be with me always.

—Millie Colover.

LET IT PASS.

Selected.

Be not swift to take offence
Anger is a foe to sense;
Let it pass!

Brood not darkly o'er a wrong
Which may disappear ere long;
Rather sing this cheery song
Let it pass!

Strife corrodes the purest mind;
As the unregarded wind,
Let it pass!

Any vulgar souls that live,
May condemn without reprieve;
Let it pass!

Echo not an angry word;
Think how often you have erred;
Let it pass!

Since our joys must pass away,
Like the dew-drops on the spray,
Wherefore should our sorrows stay?
Let it pass!

If for good you've taken ill,
Oh! be kind and gentle still,
Let it pass!

Time at last makes all things straight,
Let us not resent, but wait,
And our triumph shall be great;
Let it pass!

Bid your anger to depart,
Lay these homely words to heart,
Let it pass!

Follow not the giddy throng;
Better to be wronged than wrong;
Therefore sing the cheery song
Let it pass!

A Life that can Suffer.—I was greatly satisfied in my journey, chiefly that I found a life amongst Friends that can suffer; and I am sure it is that, which will reign and conquer in the end; and thence will be the safety of us all,—to follow our Captain in suffering and tribulation, having an eye to the recompense of the reward. For that which can talk and not walk, and can profess and not suffer, is not the heir, nor must be respected as the heir: for all respect shown to that birth, puffeth it up; but the true birth is low in heart.—Stephen Crisp.

The North-East Passage.

The following is condensed from an article in The Christian Advocate.

Since the opening of Japan, and the general revival of interest in the eastern ocean and China, the Swedes and Norwegians have been exceedingly desirous of finding a passage there, by way of the Arctic Ocean, which, if attained, would be short and direct in comparison with the long and circuitous one by way of the Southern and Indian Oceans.

After a great deal of persuasion, Professor Nordenskjöld succeeded in obtaining from the Government and other sources the means for fitting out an expedition of two vessels, with a view to test the practicability of a north-east passage to Japan. They started about the middle of 7th mo. 1878, from the most northern Norwegian port, and were lost to the world till the early part of 9th mo. 1879, when they arrived safely, with their object accomplished, in Japan. They were received with rejoicings and signal honor by the Japs, and the cable sent a winged message over the world announcing their success and their safety.

Since then we have awaited with anxiety a fuller account of their perilous journey, which now reaches us through French sources, by way of correspondence, from Japan. The two vessels—the Vega and the Lena—were both steamers well provided with all necessities for an Arctic voyage of discovery; and they left the lines of northern civilization in the early part of 8th mo., hoping to get through before the close of the short summer. Success attended them through the Strait of Yngor, south of Nova Zembla, and they found upon the Sea of Kara, ~~the sea of Kara~~ where they were met by the ice. Having passed safely through this, they steered north-east toward the dangerous land of Taimur and the North Cape. Here they were arrested for some four days by the ice, when they resumed their journey, and reached the northernmost point of Asia on the 19th of 8th mo.

The Vega ran along the coast and found but little ice, and cast anchor at the mouth of Lena River on the 25th of the same month. To the north they discovered the islands of New Siberia, but could not explore them because of the mass of ice surrounding their shores. The broad mouth of the River Kolyma was found open and free, and they hastened across it in their anxiety to make their way to the East. But their difficulties soon commenced; the ice began to grow rapidly, and on the 28th of 9th mo. they were imprisoned, near a settlement, in 67 deg. north latitude, and 177 west longitude. They wintered on the ice about a mile from the shore, and soon made friends with the natives, of whom they found scattered in numerous villages about four thousand. The health and spirits of the entire crew were good, not having a single case of scurvy. During the shortest day the sun was only three hours above the horizon, and only its upper limb was visible.

The scientists of the expedition employed their time in making very interesting observations, but we prefer to follow those who investigated the queer people found there. Their main occupation is to fish, and hunt the seal, the polar bear, and the reindeer. They were extremely kind toward the explorers, and supplied them with the flesh of the latter. They are called the Tchukckits; and Nordenskjold finds a great resemblance between them and the Greenlanders in their customs. They have no longing for coined money, unless it be perforated so that they can use it as an ornament. A cake of soap is more valuable in their eyes than many rubles, which is something to their credit. They prefer a metal button to a coin, but they are eager for needles, knives, and all sorts of tools, as well as cotton and woolen skirts of bright colors.

They are born traders, and are always on the watch with their furs to obtain their luxuries by means of them—a handsome leaf of tobacco will secure from them a first-class beaver skin. Even the women like tobacco, and are in the habit of smoking it, and chewing the substitute, and they chew in the bargain. Salt they discard, sugar they like, and coffee with plenty of sugar in it, but their peculiar passion is tea. Both sexes dress in skins and much alike, and on grand ceremonies they wear caps adorned with glass ornaments. In their tents or cabins they cast off most of their clothing, and keep warm by means of fire. This is partly to display their ornaments and the painting of face and body. The women are nearly all tattooed. The navigator affected to find among them many of the customs of primitive North American Indians.

At Cape North were found the ruins of a former people whom the present natives say they drove away. Various excavations produced foreign stones, bones of whales, and beams of wood that evidently came from trees of North America. These subterranean abodes were connected by long passages like the cabins of the Indians of Norton Bay, showing that even in these extreme northern regions there has been much emigration. On the 20th of July, 1825, the Arcturion, 100 feet high he enjoyed a grand view of the polar sea, interrupted by immense bergs of towering and dangerous ice lying along the coast. When the spring at last came was quite abundant, and large quantities of birds were caught. But they were obliged to remain till midsummer locked in the ice—counting 294 days—before they were liberated, on the 20th of 7th mo. Soon after this they passed Cape East and came around into Behring's Strait, thus actually effecting their object, namely, the north-east passage to the Pacific Ocean. The Vega stopped several times at the islands along the coast, making interesting and valuable observations, and finally arrived at Yokohama in Japan on the 2d of 9th mo., after a prosperous voyage, in which they did not lose one of the crew. The Vega is the first vessel that has performed this feat, and Nordenskjold thinks that with a little more experience the navigation of the northern seas through this passage can be made in a single season.

A Living Faith.—This I have observed, that all national faith, wherein is not the living virtue, the enemy will let the soul alone with; but his war is desperately against faith in the true power, against faith in the light of life. Oh, how many sore and sharp assaults doth he make against the faith which receives its virtue from God, and causeth the soul to live to God.—I. Pennington.

God hath marked each sorrowing day,
And numbered every secret tear,
And heaven's long age of bliss shall pay
For all his children suffer here.

The Doctrine of the Atonement.

For "The Friend."

The Friend's Intelligencer, of 10th mo. 25th, 1879, (a weekly paper published in Philadelphia), contains an essay under the above caption, giving the views of one who is therein spoken of as "a prominent Friend," in which sentiments are put forth that are so obviously incompatible with the doctrines of the Holy Scriptures on this important subject, that it seems but proper to call attention to them. The writer, after giving the definition of the word "Atonement" as stated by Webster to be "reconciliation after enmity or controversy," and also one taken from the Cyclopedia of Religious Knowledge, says: "I believe the term or word Atonement occurs but once in the New Testament, Rom. v. 11, and nowhere in the sayings of Jesus do we find anything that can be either literally or reasonably taken to mean atonement in the sense implied by the Mosaic law."

Alexander Cruden, in his Concordance of the Scriptures, thus defines atonement. First, as reconciliation or appeasing anger, and cites Romans v. 11 in support of it. Second, as "Ransom," and gives Job xxxiii. 24, as an example of the latter sense. Adopting, then, the two expressions of reconciliation and ransom as synonyms of the ideas this word atonement is intended to convey by the writers of the Holy Scriptures, we shall find in the recorded sayings of the Lord Jesus the same or equivalent terms, viz: "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many." Matt. xx. 28. "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." Matt. xxvi. 28.

It is to be observed, however, that the word Atonement is used in the Mosaic law is evidently parallel with that implied by the above quoted language of Christ, viz., ransom or reconciliation by the offering of the blood or life of one for the remission of the sins of another; as will be proved by reference to Leviticus 16th and 17th chapters. The former describes the ceremonies by which the High Priest made the annual atonement or expiation for the sins of the whole nation of Israel. It was directed to take a bullock as a "sin-offering" for himself, and a goat as a "sin-offering" for the people. "And Aaron shall offer his bullock of the sin-offering, which is for himself, and make an atonement for himself, and his house." * * * "And he shall take of the blood of the bullock and sprinkle it with his finger upon the mercy seat." &c. Likewise the goat was to be sacrificed and its blood sprinkled upon the mercy seat, as "an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins." Then follows the ritual for the "scape-goat." "And Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness: And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities," &c. The 17th chapter of Leviticus, 11th verse, thus speaks of the blood: "For the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you upon the altar, to make an atonement for your souls; for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul." The article in question further avers: "That the vicarious atonement of His (God's) Son was arranged * * * to satisfy His anger & His justice, I do not believe for the following reasons: I find no warrant for it in any sayings of Jesus," &c. "I also think that it required suffering of the innocent to relieve the guilty of their iniquity, or to save them from the penalty of their sin, would in me be the essence of injustice, and cannot be in God, if it were possible for Him to require it."

The expression "vicarious atonement," used above, is understood to mean, the substitution of Christ for man in suffering its punishment due to the latter for his sin. Referring to the language of our Saviour, He came "to give his life a ransom for many," and that his "blood is shed for many for the remission of sins," there seems no escape from the conclusion that He did substitute himself for the human race by assuming the penalty justly incurred by them, and paid the price of their ransom, by laying down his life and shedding his blood for the remission of their sin. That this mode of delivering a fallen race from the fruits of their own transgression was "arranged" by the merciful Father and His beloved Son, is clearly shown by the words of Jesus which are subjoined, "I am the good Shepherd: the good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep. I lay down my life for the sheep. Therefore doth my Father love me because I lay down my life, that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me; but lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again. This commandment have I received of my Father." John 10th chap.

That the end and intent of thus laying down his life for men, was to save or redeem them and give them a new life, is proved by the expressions in the same chapter, "My sheep hear my voice, &c., and I give unto them eternal life." "By me, if any man enter he shall be saved," &c. Also, "if ye believe that I am He ye shall die in your sin." John xiii. 24.

That the sufferings and death of Christ were considered necessary by him for the redemption of man, is proved by the following sayings of his, viz: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have eternal life." John iii. 14. "And I, if I lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me." (This He said signifying why death He should die.) John xii. 32. "At He began to teach them that the Son of man must suffer many things, and be rejected, and the elders and the chief priests and scribes and be killed, and after three days rise again." Mark xiii. 31. "He prayed that if it were possible the hour might pass from Him." Mark xiv. 35. "Father, save me from this hour; but for this cause came I unto this hour." John xii. 27. "But how shall it Scripture be fulfilled that thus it must be." Matt. xxvi. 54. "The cup which my Father hath given me shall I not drink it." John xiv. 11. "Then said He unto them, O fools, as slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken! Ought not Christ to have suffered these things and to enter into glory." Luke xxiv. 25. * * * "And he spake unto you while I was yet with you; that a things must be fulfilled which were written the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and the Psalms, concerning me." "Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day; and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name among all nations." Luke xxiv. 44, 46, 47.

(To be concluded.)

Kindness.

For "The Friend."

[We have received a letter from a correspondent, too timid we suppose to sign his or her name, which says: "Kindness is a subject that has been deeply impressed on my mind some time," and expresses the desire that something in reference to it might appear in the columns of "The Friend." The letter closes some thoughts on this subject, which we append.

One of the first effects which ought to be (and we hope has been) produced by such a concern as has rested on our correspondent, to stimulate to the observance of the Golden Rule of doing unto others as we would that they should do unto us. The practice of this duty to develop the same disposition in others.

If the name and residence of our correspondent had been published, it might have rakened the inquiry of those of our readers residing in that locality, as to what occasion they had given for this concern, by any want of kindness and sympathy towards others.

It is, we can only trust, that in every neighborhood where these lines may come, a desire to be awakened to profit by the instruction contained in such passages of Scripture as these—"Bear ye one another's burthens, and fulfill the law of Christ," "Love one another, thus a pure heart, fervently," "Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love," "Add to godliness, brotherly kindness," &c.—Ed.]

"Ought we not to watch daily and hourly at every act and word is tinged with kindness. Oh yes, be kind and affectionate to one another, it soothes and quiets the spirit, and words and acts should be used freely and freely to the needy. There are many needs of this sweet fruit. Yes, I have known me almost starved for the sweet taste of a kind act or word from their fellow beings, most ready to sink beneath the load of grief and discouragement, when a few kind acts or sympathizing words would have lifted up their down-cast souls, and given strength to mind and body; and instead of weeping there would have been joy.

We all ought to be kind and affectionate to one another, especially to the poor and needy, the sick and feeble, who all have strong claims on those that have health or wealth. The sick have many a pain and ill to bear, at others know not of, and if those about them show any unkindness in word or act, it is to the heart like a two-edged sword, and instead of giving nourishment and strength, is bitter grief from them to feed upon, which then causes increased weakness and suffering. How careful we ought to be that all our words and actions should be seasoned with the loving Spirit of our Saviour; for if we lack of this great duty, we may find in the day of judgment, that the same measure which we have meted out to others, will be measured to us."

Business Reputation.—People often make a great mistake at the very outset of business life. Ambitions to secure a speedy fortune, they offer a poor article to secure a large profit. They dilute and sham—they depend upon show and false appearance for speedy success; they peril reputation instead of trying to place it upon a firm foundation. The unsuccessful men are not to be found among this class. It is the solid, straight-forward man that gains the leadership. Reputation should be the first object. This gained, and the road to fortune is easy.

Look around for the best houses—the men who have achieved the greatest success in business—and you will find them to be those whose reputation for making or selling a good article, has been impressed upon buyers. The best make of gloves, the silk less likely to out, the print known to stand in color, the pool cotton whose reputation for strength, smoothness of finish, and length, is fixed in the world's confidence. These are the goods that lead in every market. Ribbons known to be a yard or two short in the piece, or spools warranted 200 yards, which run but 50, are the goods which buyers shun, and the makers of such have a short run, like the counterfeiters they seek to impose upon the people.

"A gentleman died some time since, at his residence in one of the up-town fashionable streets, in New York, leaving $1,000,000. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church, in excellent standing; a good husband and father, and a thriving citizen. On his death-bed, lingering long, he suffered great agony of mind, and gave continual expression to his remorse at what his conscience told him was been an ill-spent life! 'Oh!' he exclaimed, as his weeping friends and relations gathered about his bed, 'Oh! if I could only live my years over again. Oh! if I could only be spared for a few years, I would give all the wealth I have amassed in a life-time. It is a life devoted to money-getting that I regret. It is this which weighs me down, and makes me despair of the life hereafter.' 'You have never repented my avaricious spirit,' he said to the minister. 'You call it a wise economy and forethought, but my riches have been only a snare for my soul! I would give all I possess to have a hope for my poor soul!' In this state of mind, refusing to be consoled, this poor rich man bewailed a life devoted to the mere acquisition of riches. Many came away from his bedside impressed with the uselessness of such an existence as the wealthy man had spent, adding house to house, dollar to dollar, until he became a millionaire. All knew him to be a professing Christian and a good man, as the world goes, but the terror and remorse of his death-bed administered a lesson not to be dismissed from memory. He would have given all his wealth for a single hope of Heaven."—Gospel Teaper.

I never expect to get to heaven till all that is in me dies, that cannot bear the Lord's chastising hand, without a murmur, or even an unsuspected rising motion of heart contrary to a full renunciation of my own will and entire submission to his. Therefore may his hand not spare, nor his eye pity, till all that is in me bows, and remains wholly bowed, to endure with perfect patience, his whole good pleasure concerning me.—J. Scott.

Deception most Pernicious.—"The false notion, that they may be the children of God, while in a state of disobedience to his holy commandments; and disciples of Jesus, though they revolt from his cross; and members of his true church, which is without spot or wrinkle, notwithstanding their lives are full of spots and wrinkles; is, of all other deceptions upon themselves, the most pernicious to their eternal condition. For they are at peace in sin, and under a security in their transgression. Their vain hope silences their convictions, and overlays all tender motions to repentance; so that their mistake about their duty to God, is as mischievous as their rebellion against Him. Thus they walk on precipices, and natter themselves, till the grave swallows them up, and the judgment of the great God breaks the lethargy, and undecives their poor wretched souls with the anguish of the wicked, as the reward of their work."—No Cross, No Crown.

Sidney Smith says: "I went, for the first time in my life, some years ago, to stay at a very grand and beautiful palace in the country, where the grounds are said to be laid out with consummate taste. For the first two or three days I was perfectly enchanted; it seemed something so much better than nature that I really began to wish the earth had been laid out according to the latest principles of improvement. In three days' time I was tired. A thistle, a nettle, a heap of dead bushes, anything that wore the appearance of accident and want of attention, was quite a relief. I used to escape from the made grounds, and walk upon an adjacent goose common, where the cart ruts, gravel pits, humps, irregularities, and varieties produced by neglect, were more gratifying than the monotony of beauties the result of design, and crowded into unnatural confines."

Wholesome Advice.—At an entertainment recently given by the Mikado to the Imperial Court of Japan, His Majesty addressed his guests in the following language: "I have heard from several sources that for some time past the ministers of the State have adopted a luxurious style of living, and that some of them have built themselves splendid mansions. Such conduct tends to make the government unpopular. The empire is now at peace, and we are exerting ourselves both at home and abroad; but expenses are very great, and the people are grieved at our revenue not being equal to our expenditure. If the ministers live in a state of luxury, the hearts of the people will be estranged; therefore you will do well to pause and consider, and be more frugal in the future."

When sabres are rusty, and spades bright; When prisons are empty, and granaries full; When the steps of the temples are worn by the feet of worshippers, And the court-yards of the tribunals are covered with grass; When physicians go on foot, and bakers on horseback, The empire is well governed.

Chinese Proverb.

Excellent and indispensable as morality of life is, it is only as we come to pass from a state of nature to a state of grace, and our souls experience the renewings of the Holy Ghost, that our conduct amongst men will redound to the glory of God, and be viewed with acceptance in his pure and holy sight.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 21, 1880.

The past few weeks have been a memorable time to many of our readers who reside in or near this city, from the number of valuable Friends who have been recently removed from works to rewards; some after a brief period of illness, and some almost in a moment.

Such occurrences are calculated to awaken serious thoughtfulness in survivors, and we believe it is designed that they should have that effect, and should preach to us the same warning language that our blessed Saviour proclaimed to his disciples when personally present:—"Ye know not the day nor the hour as ye think not, the Son of man cometh."

But in addition to this first and most important lesson, as to our spiritual interests and the preparation for admittance into that Holy City where nothing that is impure can ever enter, we have felt that there was instruction to be drawn in reference to our outward affairs. It would be time well spent for many of us, to reflect calmly and seriously in what we should feel it was wise to do, if we were assured that a very few days would terminate our earthly existence. There might occur to us services of love for others, to whom our minds had been drawn by the Spirit of our Saviour, which we would much regret should be unperformed, but which we had postponed to a future day. We might remember letters of sympathy, of friendship, or of advice, which we had resolved to send to distant friends, but which had not yet been written. We might recall unsettled business transactions, of the details of which no one else could be made acquainted with, and which our perplexity or even loss, if our knowledge or skill could not be used in their completion. We might bring to mind trust accounts unbalanced, or not having those regular and accurate entries of moneys received and expended, which would enable an intelligent stranger to determine their exact situation, and thus protect from loss our own families on the one hand, or those for whom we were acting as trustees on the other. We might feel that we had expanded our business so far beyond the limits of our capital, and that it was so widely diffused, or of such a delicate or uncertain nature, that financial ruin would almost inevitably follow the withdrawal from it of our personal energy and effort.

We might remember that we had delayed from time to time the preparation of such documents as would clearly define the disposition we desired to make of the property we had been entrusted with.

If, on a sober review of our situation, we find anything that has real claims upon our attention, which has been neglected, or received an insufficient share of time and effort, let us heed the lesson we have received, and diligently strive to do our work in due season, never postponing till another day that which ought to be done in the present.

A letter from a valued Friend in Ohio, accompanying the account of Anne Sears, which is published in this issue of our paper, contains the following instructive remarks:

"She was indeed a bright example of Christian patience and resignation, giving evidence that she had attained an establishment on the sure foundation, which proved sufficient to animate and sustain her through long years of varied trial and affliction; and we have no doubt was prepared at the appointed time to enter a mansion of endless rest and peace.

"How cheering and animating are such examples to the weary traveller Zionward!"

We have received the Sixth Annual Report of the Seamen's and Landsmen's Aid Society. The Library for Mariners at Front and Union streets, which it keeps open, is much resorted to by sailors as a place to read, write and receive letters. They are supplied with stationery free of charge. The society has established two Homes for Sailors, where they can be boarded without incurring the temptations of dissipation and vice to which they are often exposed in the usual boarding-houses.

Donations of money, tracts and papers, are solicited.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Five of the regular annual appropriation bills have been reported to the House of Representatives, of which only one, the Pensions bill, has become a law. The House Committee on Appropriations decided to frame a general deficiency bill. The amounts asked by the different departments for deficiencies aggregate $5,779,536. The House Committee on Education and Labor agreed to report in favor of the resolution for the enforcement of the eight hour law.

Governor Cornell, of New York, has signed a bill allowing women to vote for school officers. Columbia has adopted a resolution submitting to the people a constitutional amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the State.

During last month 5839 immigrants arrived at New York. For the twelve months ending on the 31st ult. 67,653, against 52,125 the preceding year.

FOREIGN.—It is stated that the trustees of sayre will have to pay out of the profits of the mine banks in Great Britain hold one-tenth of the net amount. An analysis of the debt gives its net amount $735,845,495. Of this debt over $20,000,000 are due post-office depositors.

The revenue derived from the liquor traffic, in 1879 was over thirty-two millions of pounds. This is about a million less than 1878, and there has been a steady annual decrease since 1876.

The Liverpool Courier says: "The importation of American live cattle this winter has been on a reduced scale, partly owing to the lower prices here, and partly because of the great mortality attending the transit."

The distress in Ireland continues severe in many places, and there is reason to believe the whole aspect of the country is improved. In order to guard against a famine next year, there have been purchased 210,000 worth of potatoes for distribution there.

The food imported into France in 1879, was of the value of $300,722,000, and food and raw materials paid for $100,000,000.

Japan.—A portion of the American attaches of Japan Post-office are about to return home, their term of service having expired. The post-office stands prominent in its working, but this is its thought is owed to the devoted and extraordinary industry of the American employes. The cholera is said to have been completely subdued. The final report of the Natio Sanitary Board shows that there were 168,000 cases and 101,000 deaths.

Russia.—The total length of the Dom Pedro II. R.R. which is the second in importance in the country, is 395 miles. The road was commenced by incorporated company, but in 1865 the Government bought it of the stockholders, and it is now run a branch of the imperial service. On the invested capital of rather more than $40,000,000, the Government receives an average income of 5½ per cent. yearly.

New Friends, (Twenty-third Ward), Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, on the 10th of last mo., 1880, at his residence in Woodbury, N. J., GEORGE M. GLOVER, in his eightieth year of his age, a much esteemed member Woodbury Monthly Meeting. This dear Friend was for more than forty years afflicted with a spinal affection, causing great sufferings, which he bore with patient and heroic resignation. Although unable to attend meetings, yet, in the faith of the faith delivered to the saints, he manifested a lively interest in the welfare of our beloved Society, and often mourned over the many departures from its principles and timonies. Through the call was sudden, there is no ground for regret, as he had been long and patiently and his lamp burning, waiting for the Bridegroom's call, and his now entered into that rest prepared for the people of God.

Camden County, New Jersey.

The county of Camden is one of the districts of West New Jersey from which the city of Philadelphia receives those supplies of vegetables, small fruits, and dairy products that have rendered her markets unsurpassed in cheapness, abundance and excellence.

To contribute to these results the county indeed enjoys very favorable conditions of fertile soil, climate, ease of transit, and the important advantage of close proximity to one of the great consumers of its products. Camden county lies on the east bank of the Delaware river, immediately opposite to the rich Delaware front of Philadelphia, from which it is separated by about one mile of river. Extending in breadth along this river about ten miles, its greatest length is towards the south-east, and is about 25 miles, forming an irregular parallelogram of 274 square miles, or upwards of 175,000 acres.

From the chief city of Camden, opposite Philadelphia, and numbering in 1865 about 10,000 inhabitants, turnpike roads radiate to the heart of the country, and through it to those adjoining. Upon these superior roads of hard gravel, a heavy transit of produce and returning fertilizers is constantly being over easy grades. The immense wagon-burdened with the piles of baskets of green vegetables which often throng these roads and the streets of Camden during the season of activity, give ample evidence of the productiveness of the soil over which they pass.

The climate is mild and salubrious, and in these respects is not surpassed if equalled by any of our other district in the Middle or eastern States. In these characteristics the latter part of the lower lying portion of New Jersey largely participates; those which lie adjacent to the ocean enjoying a more equable milder temperature, and the extreme southern districts an earlier opening spring. The county of Camden is, however, as favorably situated for the growth of early garden vegetables as any other county upon the Delaware river, and its proximity to Philadelphia gives it advantages which some others do not so fully possess.

The Viceroy, the Palatine and the Democrat. As the first settlements attempted in this region, north of those of Virginia, were made within the present limits of Camden county, a hasty recital of some strange events of early days may not be inappropriate. It may interest some readers to learn, that this district was not always and entirely given over to the domain of the prostate; that sweet potatoes, water-melons and large cabbages were not in olden times objects of leading interest; but that here have resounded the clang of arms, that romance, tragedy and comedy have been enacted, and that here nobility essayed to "strut its little day"; but fell before its honors were full blown." It may not be known to many of the inhabitants of the county, that within its borders the first attempt to settle and civilize West Jersey was made by the Dutch or Hollanders, and that the site of the original capital of the new Dutch Dynasty was near the city of Gloucester, at the mouth of Timber Creek, and bore the name of Fort Nassau, so called in honor of the renowned military genius, Maurice, Count of Nassau and Prince of Orange, Stadtholder of the United Dutch Provinces. They may not know that our Cooper's Creek can boast its legends of an Indian maiden with true womanly heroism, periling her life to save the noble De Vries, the commander of the first vessel that entered our waters, from the straits of a hostile people; a Yacouta, though less known, as worthy of remembrance as Pocahontas of Virginia fame.

Hereabout once flourished the renowned John Printz, of Tinicum, extending his ungenial sway over these quiet lands, more despotic at Tinicum than his liege lord Gustavus at Stockholm. John's first early settlement was at Fort Elsinborg, at the mouth of Salem Creek, but the place was much infested by mosquitoes, prodigious swarms of which attacked the garrison and forced it to retreat. So he removed his capital, New Gottenburg, to Tinicum, an island just below the mouth of the Schuylkill, and governed the destinies of the Swedeland Stream, as the Delaware was termed, with a pretty high hand, for ten years. Here he affected entire independence of Gustavus, King of Sweden, turning back emigrants, keeping others in slavery or deterring them to the service of the State in the right royal manner of the velleinage of feudal times. This first king of Tinicum copied too closely the ways he had learned in Europe to please a people who had left their homes for freedom, and he became excessively unpopular and abdicated the throne in 1652, an act that was hailed with great joy throughout new Sweden. Many of us have never heard that perhaps some of our neighbors have descended from fathers who were Fins from Finland, or Laps from Lapland, as well as from Swedes and Dutch. Some readers may not know that the glory of New Sweden and the splendor of Tinicum departed when the renowned Peter Stuyvesant came upon the Swedes unawares, took Sven Schute in the fort at Passunk, a suburb of Philadelphia, and invested the capital, New Gottenburg.

Every effort, says history, was made to reduce the stubborn place, except the use of arms, for—on comparing their forces it was found that the Dutch under Stuyvesant far outnumbered the Swedes, and consequently secured that the most numerous must gain the day, and took the fighting for granted, and the standard of their high-mightiness the lords States-general, the magniloquent title of the heads of the Dutch Republic waved in bloodless triumph over the ramparts of Tinicum.

The lords of Tinicum were not the only vice-regal personages that attempted to sway these virgin realms. A grant was made by the English king Charles, to a certain Sir Edmund Phlyden, whom he constituted County Palatine, with the title of Earl Palatine of Albion, or of the Province of New Albion in America. The earl Palatine, as his name implies, possessed regal power in all things save allegiance to the king, and was authorized "to make such fit and wholesome ordinances for keeping the peace and the better government of the people, as should not be repugnant to the laws, statutes and rights of the Kingdom of England and Ireland." Among the earliest adventurers under this grant was a certain name of Beauchamp Plantaganet, a vagabond cavalier who essayed to escape the righteous contribution which the growing power of a "fierce democracy" was about to hurl upon its hereditary oppressors. Here, in New Jersey, he and his worthless comrades hoped to become lords and live as they listed, whereas, if they stayed in England, it was fast becoming doubtful whether even the humble title of Knight would much longer tickle their ears. So over came Beauchamp, the oldest and boldest, to select the best place for the eight knights, gentlemen, and a hundred servants and twenty of their old tenants and their families, and make a settlement. As he was instructed to follow Cato's rule of colonization, that is, secure a pure air, a fresh navigable river and a rich country, he fixed upon the Delaware river "just midway" as he describes it, "between Virginia, too hot and aguish on the one side, and the cold New England on the other." This adventure was made, it is said, in 1636. Our voyager, however, ascended the Delaware but sixty miles, and did not meet his countrymen who had already come from Virginia and had built a fort at the mouth of the Pensauken, where they were waiting in patient expectation of the golden reign of the Earl Palatine. These few settlers had arrived in 1633, and had seated themselves among the Amarongs, as the Indians were called, and had named their fort after the Sachem Erivooneck.

To L. B.

Dear Friend,—Thy acceptable letter of the 7th has been received. It is pleasant and encouraging to hear thou feelest desirous of being useful among thy own people, and willing to assist in educating their children; we would be glad to have the help of the Indians in this good work; we sincerely desire your welfare, both spiritual and temporal, and rejoice when we see evidences of your being interested in the welfare one of another. We have a female teacher engaged for the school on the Reservation near Owen Blacksnake's, who I expect commenced the school on the 14th. I hope thou wilt not be discouraged, there may a situation offer after a while which may afford thee an opportunity of being very useful amongst thy own people. A good example exerts a powerful influence for good. May thine be of that character and it may prove to be a blessing to others as well as to thyself. I think we read that Godliness is profitable unto all things, having promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come. Mayest thou, my young friend, try to give thyself up unreservedly to serve thy Divine Master, and be just what He would have thee to be, that it may be well with thee in this world and in the world to come. To two women Friends who were about leaving Tennesassa.

Marshallton, 3d mo. 4th, 1871.

Dear Friends,—As you are looking towards Marshallton, I wish to suggest that you get suitable persons to take your places. I have in thinking of you felt much for you. Notwithstanding you may feel pleased with the prospect of being released and getting home to your relatives and friends, who feel most dear to you, I should not think strange if there was a very solemn feeling accompanying the thought of leaving those poor people amongst whom you have so long labored, and for whose spiritual and temporal welfare you have at times felt deeply interested. Your feelings have been perhaps more for the dear little children, as your labors have been with and for their good. I have no doubt they will long remember you, and the recollection of your example continue to exert its influence perhaps through life. I believe the example of those in whom the spirit of our Divine Master rules and reigns, has a sweet savor and a powerful influence and will be blessed. I have a clear recollection of the solemn feeling that covered my mind when I was about to leave the Indians after having spent about six years with them. Oh! the anxiety I felt to be favored to feel my work was done and that I was clear of them, that the Indians should not suffer loss from the neglect of any duty required of me or not performed in the proper time. My dear friends, allow me just to say I desire you may be given up to your Divine Master as the clay in the hands of the potter, seeking earnestly to know his blessed and holy will, and wait on Him for the qualification to perform it acceptably, and that you may be favored to feel the sweet reward of peace, and you and the dear children whom you have had care of may meet in a better world. E. W.

Marshallton, 3d mo. 23d, 1876.

Dear Friend G. J., Jr. * * * Our Society has long felt a strong love for the Indians, and a desire to do all that the great and good Spirit would be pleased to require of us to help you. We have been laboring about 73 years to assist and encourage your people to become good, honest and industrious, to clear up your land, have good farms and raise all the provisions your families need, and have good homes for yourselves and your children. The land that you have is one of the gifts of the Great Spirit to you. I want you to try to love and thank Him for all the good things He has given you, and try to make use of them in that way that would be most pleasing to Him, that will very much increase your comfort and enjoyment in them. [Without date.]

To W. C. H.

Dear young friend,—Some time ago I copied from the Moral Almanac for 1854, an account of an Indian which I thought thou would be interested in reading and thought I would have sent thee before this. I read with interest and satisfaction the piece thou wrote on the effect of intemperance; it is certainly a great evil and one I wish to guard against myself, having objected to taking any intoxicating liquors as medicine, fearing it might become a temptation to me as it has to many others, and have long felt it right for me in a proper way to use my influence to discourage others using the article. While living amongst the Indians, between the years 1843 and 1849, I was much troubled in seeing and hearing of the sorrowful effects of intemperance. I used to visit and talk to such as were in the habit of drinking to witte people who sold intoxicating drink to Indians, and have at times been comforted in believing that our Divine Master blessed the labor. It is his blessing that takes our labors of use to others. I think our Heavenly Father sometimes calls us to labor for the good of others, and it is He that gives the qualification to labor, and can preserve us from evil; we are very poor dependent creatures, of ourselves we can do no good thing. Oh! how necessary it is that we should be continually on the watch that we fall not into temptation. This evening received a letter from L., in which she mentioned that she had requested L. J. to write and give me some account of the sickness and death of his sister Phebe. I have not received any account from L. Susan and Phebe's deaths may be a warning to many of your young people, showing you the great uncertainty of time and the necessity of trying to live a good religious life, and be prepared to meet death at any time * * * have had a heavy cold for almost a week, am getting better—but to get out to meeting to day. I like to go to religious meetings; if I lived within ten or twelve miles of Tennesassa it would be very pleasant to go once in a while and sit with you, for whom I feel deeply interested both for the children and those who have the care of them. I have been comforted and encouraged in reading the account given by L. of the number attending school, the good behaviour of the children in and out of school, and that you are all blessed with good health. The Doctrine of the Atonement.

With regard to the idea of "injustice" being necessarily involved in the gospel plan of salvation, in requiring the innocent to suffer the guilty in order to relieve them of the penalty incurred by their transgressions, depends entirely on the will and disposition of the innocent Mediator towards both. C. Lord has told us that "God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son" for man's salvation. Love to man, then, was the moving cause to this sacrifice on the Father's part and we have the testimony of Jesus that "the Father loveth the Son, and showeth Him things that himself doeth." John v. Furthermore, He assures us that his laying down his life for the sheep was voluntary, his part, and not forced arbitrarily upon Him by his Father. "No man taketh it from I but I lay it down of myself. Therefore do my Father love me because I lay down my life, that I might take it again." Thus we find that Father and Son were in perfect accord in arranging the plan for man's redemption, and the motive for the whole was efficacious love on the part of both. "I and the Father are one." John x. 30.

The portions of Scripture above referred have been confined entirely to the record words and sayings of our Lord himself, we the view of complying literally with the tenor of objection made by the writer of the article in question; but surely if we pay any regard to the doctrines and views of his immediate followers and apostles, we need not search into their writings to find a complete confirmation of the assumptions put forth in the letter. The apostle John declares, that "the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth from all sin." 1 John i. 7. "If any man sin we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ, the righteous; and He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world." 1 John ii. 12. "Whoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father." "Who is a liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ?" 1 John ii. 22, 23. Peter writes to some, "Ye were redeemed with corruptible things, &c., and with the precious blood of Christ, as of a Lamb without blemish and without spot." 1 Peter i. 18, 19. "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness; whose stripes ye were healed." 1 Peter ii. 23. "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us unto God." 1 Peter iii. 18. Paul writes to the Colossians to give thanks to the Father, "who hath delivered us from the power of darkness, and hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son: in whom ye have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins." * * * "And you that were sometimes alienated and enemies in your minds, by wicked works, yet now hath I reconciled in the body of his flesh through death," &c. 1 Col. xiii. 14, 21. Much more might be quoted to the same purpose, as at one conversant with the New Testament we know.

The views put forth in the article alluded to are inconsistent with the ancient doctrine of the Society of Friends, as held by George Fox, William Penn, George Whitehead, Robt Barclay and other eminent writers and miers at the rise of the Society, and represent the sentiments of Friends of the present day. This will be made evident by reference to Evans' Exposition of the Faith of the Society of Friends, in which the doctrines held by its early founders on the Divinity and Deeds of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ are fully exhibited, and proved to agree with those of his apostles and disciples as recorded in the New Testament. A few extracts from his work are subjoined.

George Fox declared, "Christ gave himself his body, for the life of the whole world; He bore the offering for the sins of the whole world, and paid the debt; and made satisfaction that doth not believe in the offering is condemned already." William Penn thus writes answer to some who had charged him with denying the atonement: "I say that Jesus Christ was a sacrifice for sin; that He was set forth to be a propitiation for the sins of the whole world; to declare God's righteousness; the remission of sins that are past, &c., to them that repented and had faith in his Son; herein the love of God appeared, that He cleared his good will thereby to be reconciled; Christ bearing away the sins that are past the scape-goat did of old, not excluding the ward work." "We do believe," says Wm. Penn, "that Jesus Christ was our holy sacrifice, atonement and propitiation; that He bore our iniquities, and that by his stripes we were cured of the wounds Adam gave us on his fall; and that God is just in forgiving true penitents, upon the credit of that holy offering Christ made of Himself to God for us." Isaac Penington, in reply to an opponent, says: "And as for denying redemption by the blood of Christ, oh how will he answer this charge to God, when none upon the earth as a Lord knoweth, are so taught, and do so lightly and fully own redemption by the blood of Christ as the Lord hath taught us to do! for we own the blood of the Lord Jesus Christ both outwardly and inwardly; both as we shed on the cross, and as it is sprinkled on our consciences."

Bidding Defiance to "Pele."

Before the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands had cast aside their belief in heathen deities, the goddess Pele was one of their objects of worship. The volcano of Kilauca was sacred to her. The queen Kapiolani had been converted to Christianity, and in order to deliver her people from the terrors of their heathen worship, she "determined to destroy, if possible, the superstitious belief in Pele, which had weighed upon her land for generations, and been the source of so much cruelty and wrong. Kapiolani left her home in Kona and walked to Kilauca. In vain her terrified and affectionate dependents clung to her by the way, and tried to change her purpose. Over the hard and shining blocks of lava, through cinders and ashes, under great difficulties that shot out their tongues of fire at her, as if to warn her of her approaching destruction,—on and up she walked, until she came to the rim of the great black pit, and lay beyond the floss of fresh lava, still glowing in their seams and containing, with glowing heat, the raging, swelling, liquid fire. When picking the obelisk berries which grow beside her, and which it was not lawful to eat until the first-fruits had been thrown into the volcano, in honor of its divinity, she went down into the pit, eating the forbidden berries, and walking fearlessly over the uncertain sea, until she came to the shore of the blood-red lake, burning and spouting with unquenchable fire; and there, in the very stronghold of Pele's power, she denied the heathen divinity's existence, and prayed to the one true God. In Judge Fernald's studious book on the Polynesian Races, I find it stated that the Pel or Pele of the Hawaiians is probably the same as the Bel or Baal of the Phenicians. Starting from one cradle, in Western Asia, this devastating superstition made its way to the shores of the Mediterranean and to the islands of the mid-Pacific. But in the fulness of time another and diviner faith went sailing seaward, encreting the world with its light and life, and dulling the glow of Pele's lake and Bel's shining idol, with its superior illumination."—G. #### Advice to a Young Woman on her Marriage, by her Grandmother.

My beloved Child:—In looking toward the time when I shall probably be separated from thee and the change of scene that will ensue on thy entering into the married life, I have felt my mind tenderly concerned for thy best welfare, and when favored with access to the place of prayer, have besought the Father of mercies to look kindly down upon and bless and preserve thee in the new station of life to which thou wilt be introduced, when removed from my fostering bosom. Let it be thy care, my love, to second by thy own endeavors the wishes and hopes of thy fond anxious parent, and by daily and humble application to the Fountain of all good, ask of Him wisdom to direct thee in all thy ways.

As the man who has chosen thee for the companion of his life, has given the best proof of his regard that a man can give, and as thou hast accepted his offers, I find no objection to a connection with him; but keep in mind that it will depend much on thyself to secure his esteem and confidence, by prudent and circumspect behavior, both to him and his friends and relations, who are worthy of thy regard; study his temper, and do not suffer thyself to dispute with him on trivial matters, rather give up thine own will than provoke him to make harsh replies; scrupulously avoid every occasion that may arise or tend toward wrangling. In expressing thy love to him let it be chastened by the delicate manner which so remarkably distinguished our admired friend and cousin, S. E., who is a pattern for her sex in all that is worthy of imitation. I think my daughters in the wedded life were much like her.

In regard to the article of expense, I trust prudence will direct thee not to go beyond thy husband's means of supplying thee. Practise frugality, which is a virtue, and avoid parsimony, which is as far from a virtue as extravagance is from economy. As neither thyself nor — are what the world calls rich, and if thou have enough to begin with, and if carefully managed, I hope under the blessing of heaven, it will enable you to live comfortably, and that you will have something for the poor, who, I hope, will not be forgotten by you, remembering it is more blessed to give than to receive. I entreat thee, my dear, not to aim at living in a high style. Be content to live in a plain, frugal manner, agreeably to the way in which thou hast been brought up. In regard to thy conduct to servants, treat them kindly, rather as humble friends, dependant on thee, than as menials, who have no ties of love or gratitude to bind them. Maintain thy own dignity as head of a family, without becoming too familiar with thy servants; this may be done without haughtiness, pride or indecorous language; take thy aunt M. M. for a pattern in this respect; and, indeed, in almost all others she excels. I do entreat thee not to launch out into extravagance in dress; it shows a weak and vain mind to be continually changing one's dress as the fashions change. Respectability of appearance is certainly to be desired; they may be sometimes silent, the attentive mind often receives strength to perform acceptable worship. I wish thee to confine thy acquaintance chiefly among friends of our own Society; this is not an uncharitable wish, but springs from a fear lest thy young and tender mind should be drawn into a snare, and tempted to imitate the vain and foolish fashions of the world; "such as our company is so shall we be." I have good reason to hope that — is an improving young man, and that he will become a useful member of religious society. Endeavor, my love, to cherish in him and thyself a serious turn of mind, and avoid all light conversation; guard against repeating evil reports, and carefully avoid detraction, never speak against the absent; if thou art in the company of those who take the liberty of so doing, show thy disapprobation by keeping silent; this will afford satisfaction to thy own mind on reflection: this will be delicate to others as we would have them to be.

Be very delicate and reserved in the expression of her conjugal love before witnesses. I have sometimes been disgusted in observing the false behavior of young married people in company. I am writing just as I should talk to thee on those subjects, but as I do not expect to be much with thee after thy marriage takes place, I commit my thoughts to paper, that when we are separated, and this scrawl falls in thy way, the hints contained in it may dwell on thy mind, and serve to convince thee how desirous I am that thy future conduct in every station of life may be marked by a blameless deportment. I have noticed with pleasure thy readiness to contribute to the comfort of the sick and the poor, and though thy means of continuing the practice may not be large, yet be not discouraged; remember who it was that pronounced a blessing on the widow's mite formerly; if we can't do all we wish to do, let us at least do what we can.

Written by thy tenderly affectionate and anxious grandmother, M. M.

"The night has a thousand eyes
The day but one,
Yet the light of a whole world dies
With the dying sun.

"The mind has a thousand eyes
The heart but one,
Yet the light of a whole life dies
When love is done."

Peace and War.—War in itself is a mighty evil—an incongruity on a scheme of social harmony—a canker in the heart of improvement—a living lie in a Christian land—a curse at all times.—Times, 1846.

Out in the Rain.—There is a touching story of the famous Dr. Samuel Johnson, which has had an influence on many a boy who has heard it. Samuel's father, Michael Johnson, was a poor bookseller in Lichfield, England. On market-day he used to carry a package of books to the village of Uttoxeter, and sell them from a stall in the market-place. One day the bookseller was sick, and asked his son to go and sell the books in his place. Samuel, from a silly pride, refused to obey.

Fifty years afterwards, Johnson became the celebrated author, the compiler of the "English Dictionary," and one of the most distinguished scholars in England, but he never forgot his act of unkindness to his poor, hard-toiling father; so, when he visited Uttoxeter, he determined to show his sorrow and repentance.

He went into the market-place at the time of business, uncovered his head, and stood there for an hour in a pouring rain, on the very spot where the book-stall used to stand. "This," he says, "was an act of contrition for my disobedience to my kind father."

The spectacle of the great Dr. Johnson standing bare-headed in the storm, to atone for the wrong done by him fifty years before, is a grand and touching one. There is a representation of it (in marble) on the doctor's monument.

Many a man in after-life has felt something harder and heavier than a storm of rain beating upon his heart, when he remembered his acts of unkindness to a good father or mother now in their graves.

Dr. John Todd, of Pittsfield, the eminent writer, never could forget how, when his old father was sick and near his end, he was unwilling to get, and made up a lie "that the druggist had not got any such medicine."

The old man was just dying when little Johnny came in, and said to him, "My boy, your father suffers great pain for want of that medicine."

Johnny started in great distress for the medicine, but it was too late. The father on his return was almost gone. He could only say to the weeping boy, "Love God, and always speak the truth, for the eye of God is always upon you. Now kiss me once more, and farewell."

Through all his after life Dr. Todd often had a headache over that act of falsehood and disobedience to his dying father. It takes more than a shower of rain to wash away the memory of such sins. Dr. Todd repented of that sin a thousand times.

The words "Honor thy father and thy mother," mean four things—always do what they bid you, always tell them the truth, always treat them lovingly, and take care of them when they are sick or grown old. I never yet knew a boy, who trampled on the wishes of his parents, who turned out well. God never blesses a wilfully-disobedient son. —Youth's Companion.

The nature of man is very apt to see spectacles to behold other men's faults, rather than looking-glasses in which to survey their own. —Seneca.

"Be kind to others faults; severe upon thine own." Believe, be much in self-judging. There are none in the world who so much tremble to think evil of others, to speak evil of others, or to do evil to others, as those who make it their business to judge themselves. There are none who make such sweet constructions and charitable interpretations of men and things as those who are most careful to judge themselves. Ah, were Christians' hearts more taken up in examining and condemning themselves, they would not be so apt to judge and censure others, and to carry it sourly and bitter toward those who differ from them. —Thomas Brooks.

GOD OUR STRENGTH.

Man, in his weakness, needs a stronger stay
Than fellow-men, the holiest and the best;
And yet we turn to them from day to day,
As if in them our spirits could find rest.

Gently untwine our childish hands, that cling
To such inadequate supports as these,
And shelter us beneath Thy heavenly wing,
Till we have learned to walk alone with ease.

Help us, O Lord! with patient love to bear
Each other's faults, to suffer with true meekness,
Help us each other's joys and griefs to share,
But let us turn to Thee alone in weakness.

RETROSPECT.

O Loving One! O Bounteous One!
What have I not received from Thee,
Throughout the seasons that have gone,
Into the past eternity!

Lowly my name and mine estate;
Yet, Father, many a child of Thine,
Of purer heart and cleaner hands,
Walks in an humbler path than mine.

And, looking backward through the year
Along the way my feet have pressed,
I see sweet places everywhere—
Such places where my soul had rest.

For, through some human hopes of mine
Are dead, and buried from my sight,
Have sprung, and blossomed into light.

Body, and heart, and soul have been
Fed by the most convenient food;
My nights are peaceful all the while,
And all my mortal days are good.

My sorrows have not been so light,
Thy chastening hand I could not trace;
Nor can my blessings been so great
That they have hid my Father's face.

THE FREE-WILL OFFERING.

Give to the Lord thy heart!
Bring joyfully the silver and the gold;
The rich, are they who keep not back a part;
The glad, the full, are those who never withhold.

Give to the Lord thy heart!
Its morning fragrance, and its noontide night,
And evening dews. All that thou hast and art,
Are but the Lord's, by purchase and by right.

Give to the Lord thy heart!
Bring a whole offering—worthless though it be;
The love which took thy cross, and bore its smart,
Paid the full price, O ransomed one, for thee.

HAVE FAITH IN GOD.

Have faith in God! for He who reigns on high,
Hath borne thy grief and hears the suppliant's sigh;
Sail to His arms, thine only refuge, fly.

Have faith in God!
Fear not to call on Him, O soul distressed!
Thy sorrow's whisper wooes thee to His breast;
He who is closest nearest, there is closest blest.

Have faith in God!
Lean not on Egypt's reed;—slake not thy thirst
At earthly cisterns. Seek the kingdom first,
Though man and Satan fright thee with their worst,
Have faith in God!

Go! tell Him all! The sigh thy bosom heaves,
Is heard in heaven. Strength and grace He gives,
Who gave Himself for thee. Our Jesus lives.
Have faith in God!

The following interesting reminiscence of a dearly beloved Friend, was found among the papers of the late Mary Passmore.

4th mo. 17th, 1849.—Third-day.—In a very solemn manner she said: "I believe I can deliver what appears a little message to me for the prisoners of hope: some of 't little humble ones now present. It seems me the door has been opened and I have been permitted to sit with them a little in the prison houses. Have long patience, my s'ters, the Lord of hosts is purifying his people. Earnestly do I crave that I may be one with you in patiently waiting all the Lord's appointed time, that the Church may be thoroughly purified, for the King's daughter is all glorious within, her clothing is of wrought gold and pure gold, my friends, we know, cannot sustain any loss by the fire; and some of 't obscure ones, I believe, as they abide in 't patience, will be brought to show themselves to the people, will become as the golden pip which were to convey the golden oil in 't sanctuary; that the harmony and unity the spirit in the bond of peace, would on more prevail. It is my firm conviction 't nothing would be permitted to hurt or destroy in all the Lord's holy mountain. Accept 't exhortation of love from one who feels herself standing upon the very brink of an aweful eternity. I leave it as a little legacy to you.

Sixth-day afternoon near the close she said "And now that we are about to separate each to our own, I have earnestly coveted for all, that the good seed that has been sown every heart may be quickened, and this prayer raised in each of our hearts, 'Hail me upon us, O Lord! have mercy upon us lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow.'"

A Brahmin on Hinduism.—One day, writes Leupolt, I was preaching in the city of Inarces. The large crowd was civil and attentive. At length a sepoj (a Brahmin) said "Look at those men, and see what they a doing!"

"They are preaching to us," the people replied.

"True. What has the sabib in his hand—"

"A New Testament."

"Yes, the New Testament. But what that? I will tell you. This is the gospel as into which a European hand has been put. If you come to day, you will find them cutting; if you come to-morrow, you will find them doing the same. And at what are they cutting? At our noble tree of Hinduism—our religion. It has taken thousands of years for the tree to take root in the soil of Hindostan; its branches spread all over India it is a noble, glorious tree. But these men come daily with the gospel-axe in their hands they look at the tree, and the tree at them but it is helpless. The gospel-axe is applied daily, and although the tree is large and strong, it must give way at last."

"True, I replied; but many a poor hand gets worn-out, and many a one breaks; and it takes a long time till the new handle is obtained from Europe, and till that handle is prepared and shap'd."

"Ah!" he answered, "if that were all, it would be well enough, and the tree would have respite; but what is the real case? N oner does a handle find it can no longer bring the axe than it says, 'What am I to do now? I am getting worn out; I can no longer bring the axe; am I to give up cutting?' No, he walks up to the tree, looks at it, and says, but here is a fine branch out of which a handle might be made.' Up goes the axe, down comes the branch; the branch is soon added to a new handle; the European handle is taken out and the native handle put in, and the swinging commences afresh. At last the tree will be cut down by handles made of its own branches."

I suppose you have all guessed that the anchors out of which the Brahmin said new handles are made are the natives of India who were given up their trust in vain idols, and we become servants of the living God.—Church Missionary Juvenile Instructor.

For "The Friend."

The Meeting at Firbank Chapel and its Results.

When George Fox was led by the Spirit to proclaim "God's everlasting truth and word of life" to the people of England, he came in the course of his travels into Westmoreland. Here he found an open door. The Spirit of the Lord had been at work in the hearts of many, bringing them from their sins, and leading them to seek for a more spiritual way of worship than parish teachers had taught them. Many of these gladly received the message which he proclaimed, and the invitation he tended to turn to the Light of Christ which one in their hearts to show them their sins, and which, if heeded, would give them power for a life that was true. It was a time of Divine visitation to many, and great numbers were convinced.

One of the most memorable of the meetings which he there held, both as regards the immediate effect, and the wide-spreading consequences which flowed from it, was that at Firbank Chapel, which is thus described in his journal.

"The next First-day I came to Firbank Chapel in Westmoreland, where Francis Howell and John Audland had been preaching in the morning. The chapel was full of people, but that many could not get in. Francis said, 'I thought I looked into the chapel, and his spirit was ready to fall, the Lord's power did surprise him; but I did not look in. They had haste, and had quickly done, and they had some of the people went to dinner; but abundance staid till they came again.' John Lakelin and others came to me, and desired me not to remove them publicly; for they were not parish-teachers, but pretty tender men. I could not tell them whether I should or no, though I had not at that time any drawings to declare publicly against them; but I said, 'They must leave me to the Lord's doings.' While others were gone to dinner, I went to a brook, got a little water, and then came and sat down on the top of a rock hard by the chapel. In the afternoon the people gathered about me, with several of their teachers. It was judged there were above a thousand people; to whom I declared God's everlasting truth and word of life freely and largely for about the space of three hours; directing all to the Spirit of God in themselves; that they might be turned from darkness to light, and believe in it, that they might become the children of it, and might be turned from the power of Satan unto God; and by the Spirit of truth might be led into all truth, and sensibly understand the words of the prophets, of Christ, and of the apostles; and might all come to know Christ to be their teacher to instruct them; their counsellor to direct them, their shepherd to feed them, their bishop to oversee them, and their prophet to open divine mysteries to them; and might know their bodies to be prepared, sanctified, and made fit temples for God and Christ to dwell in. In the openings of heavenly life, I explained unto them the prophets, and the figures and shadows, and directed them to Christ, the substance. Then I opened the parables and sayings of Christ, and things that had been long hid; showing the intent and scope of the apostles' writings, and that their epistles were written to the elect. When I had opened that state, I showed also the state of the apostasy since the apostles' days; that the priests have got the scriptures, but are not in the Spirit which gave them forth; and have put them into chapter and verse, to make a trade of the holy men's words; that the teachers and priests now are found in the steps of the false prophets, chief priests, scribes and pharisees of old, and are such as the true prophets, Christ and his apostles, cried against, and so are judged and condemned by the Spirit of the true prophets, of Christ, and of his apostles; and that none in that Spirit could own them. Many old people went into the chapel, and looked out at the windows; thinking it a strange thing to see a man preach on an hill or mountain, and not in their church, as they called it; whereupon I was moved to inform the people, 'That the steeple house, and the ground whereon it stood, were no more holy than that mountain; and that those temples, which they called the dreadful houses of God, were not set up by the commandment of God and Christ; nor their priests called, as God and Christ; nor their priests' tithes appointed by God, as those amongst the Jews were; but that Christ was come, who ended both the temple and its worship, and the priests and their tithes; and all now should hearken to Him; for He said, "Learn of me;" and God said of him, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him." I declared that the Lord God had sent me to preach the everlasting gospel and word of life amongst them; and to bring them off from all these temples, tithes, priests, and ordinances of the world, which had got up since the apostles' days, and had been set up by such as had erred from the Spirit and power that the apostles were in.' Very largely was I opened at this meeting; the Lord's convincing power accompanied my ministry, and reached home to the hearts of the people; whereby many were convinced, and all the teachers of that congregation (who were many) were convinced of God's everlasting truth."

Of the condition of the people who were thus visited, and of the effect upon them of that baptizing power which accompanied the ministry of George Fox, we have a further testimony in a Memorial of John Camm (who was one of that company) written by his son Thomas Camm, himself an able and laborious minister of the Gospel. Thomas Camm had long felt a desire to collect the books and writings of his father and John Audland, so as to preserve a record of their labors for the good of mankind, but had been hindered by various causes, partly, he says, by the service and travels the Lord had measurably concerned me in, on behalf of his truth and people in late years. But now, being it hath fallen to my lot in truth's testimony to be called to suffer imprisonment, and thereby at present freed from some of the aforesaid service and travels; and the said concern hitherto resting upon my spirit, I was made willing to set to the work." This interesting statement is in accordance with the experience of many of our early Friends, who, when shut up in prison for their religion, were often led to labor with the pen for the promotion of that blessed cause to whose service their lives were devoted.

Thomas Camm says of his father: "He having been hindered from visiting his people in their empty lifeless forms, and so separated from them, still pressing forward, towards a further manifestation and revelation of the way of salvation, which his soul hungered and thirsted after; and therefore he with many others, who were under the same sense of hunger, often met together amongst themselves; and some openings from the Lord several of them had, from which they could have declared excellent things, having some sight or comprehension thereof, yet wanted the inward possession of the virtue, life and power of what they declared of, and in this state continued many days.

"But the fulness of time being come, wherein the Lord in his everlasting loving-kindness did cause his day to spring from on high, and his light to break out of obscurity, and his glorious eternal Gospel to be preached again upon the earth, and particularly in this our nation, having heard the cries of the poor, and the sighings of the prisoners in the pit; even then the Lord called and directed several of his Witnesses and servants, to publish this blessed day; to bring glad-tidings, and proclaim the year of jubilee."

Friendship in the Family.

It is undoubtedly true that, although many things that render life precious to us are found in the family, friendship, as we commonly understand it, is not often among them. There are strong ties of mutual interest and affection, based partly upon natural and instinctive feelings, partly on the habit of close and constant intercourse, and partly on the duties, responsibilities, and dependencies which these relations involve. But when we look for friendship, either in its poetry and romance, its thrilling intercourse, or its sympathy of purpose and endeavor, it is usually outside, not within, the circle of near kindred.

Many reasons may be alleged for this, the most cogent of which is probably the blunting influence of continual familiarity. Living always together, the members of one family are apt to become monotonous and uninteresting to one another. Having had such abundant opportunity, they fancy they have entirely fathomed each other, and that there is nothing more to find out. There is no longer the attraction of curiosity or the stimulus of variety. They are not vividly impressed, nor do they feel able to impress in their turn. So there comes to be a tameness and insipidity about home-life which is supposed to be inherent in it. The feeling of the uselessness of effort deadens effort, and a lukewarm spirit of calm good-will is all that is even aimed at. That this is the case in numerous families may be proved by the change which they experience on the arrival of any valued guest. New life and energy seem to enter with him and pervade the hitherto listless household; each one feels a new pleasure and an unvoiced desire to please, which are equally exhilarating; but, after his departure, they gradually sink back into the old apathetic routine. Of course the eager heart of youth especially cannot be satisfied with this; it must put out its tendrils and cling to something; it craves animated intercourse, warm sympathy, earnest purposes, strong emotions, and finds them in outside friendships.

Now, while such attachments are not to be indiscriminately discouraged, bringing their own special advantages and pleasures, it is to be sincerely deplored that friendships inside the home are so exceedingly rare, and that the young are so generally growing up in the idea that they are impossible. There are, of course, many honorable exceptions to this, where not only husband and wife have been life-long and devoted friends, but also parents and children, brothers and sisters. Yet the careful preservation of these instances, and the extreme respect accorded to them, proves their comparative rarity. Probably each of us can recall a few such cases, which stand out in bold relief against the multitudes of households who consider themselves highly blessed if they only succeed in avoiding contention, and preserving a tolerable civility among one another.

Yet it would seem as if nearly all the materials for earnest and steadfast friendship might be found within a circle already joined by bonds of instinctive affection and mutual interest. There is sufficient similarity of taste, purpose and position, to win sympathy; and there is sufficient variety of age, sex, and circumstance, to prevent monotony. There is every opportunity for elevating a natural fondness into loftier affection, for developing the germs of respect and love into the rich and full growth of noble friendship. All the more delicate relations of sex are fulfilled in their utmost parity by the friendship of mother and son, father and daughter, brother and sister. Why then should years spent under the same roof so often separate and scatter the affections of childhood, instead of cementing and strengthening them into the rich and steadfast friendships of maturer life?

Probably the chief cause of this is that people rely on the instinctiveness of natural affection as being all-sufficient, without effort. They imagine that family love is strong enough to take care of itself, so they take but little pains to preserve it from the shocks and jars of daily life. And they also suppose that they are so well known to each other that it is not worth while to present their fairer side. In all this they are mistaken. Natural affection offers a fine foundation on which to erect the edifice of a firm and enduring friendship, but it will not rise up of itself. We must build it, stone by stone, if we would possess it. If we have a valued and respected friend, what pains we take to cherish his friendship; how carefully we endeavor to prune away from ourselves that which would dispense him, and cultivate those qualities which he admires; how we strive to gratify him by pleasant surprises, and to avoid all that would wound or trouble him! Yet, to let the familiar house door shut us in, and how many of us take the same pains? Here we throw off restraint, we air our worst side, that has been sedulously hidden, and allow our better qualities, that have been in full exercise, to fall asleep. How many of us anxiously make the most and the best of ourselves to our own family? How many of us regard the home as the arena for giving, not getting, pleasure, for spreading, not absorbing, comfort? It is the simple working of a natural and inevitable law; that which we sow we shall surely reap. If we cultivate home friendships with the same assiduity that we give to those outside, they will yield us even richer and fairer returns. There is no friendship so pure and beautiful in its nature, so rich and full in its power of blessing, or so singularly rare in its occurrence, as that between parents and their grown-up sons and daughters. Where the parental and filial instincts are supplemented by that higher and more spiritual affection that binds together minds in intellectual communion, and souls in heartfelt sympathy, few deeper or more delightful friendships can be imagined. The guardian and dependent gradually lose themselves in the dear companion and true friend of later life; and youth becomes wiser and age brighter, and both nobler and happier, in this loving and abiding union. If, however, we would enjoy any of the precious friendships of home, we must preserve the delicacy and freshness of each family relation; we must cultivate those qualities which endear us to one another; we must have faith in the power of love, and regard its obligations as our highest privileges.—Public Ledger.

Extract from a Letter of Mary M. Sheppard to her Sister.

Greenwich, Ninth mo. 19th, 1858.

How poorly are we qualified to judge of the necessary measures for our advancement in the path human wisdom never penetrated. We shrink from submitting ourselves, as if afraid to trust to a power our lips would acknowledge Almighty. Why is it we so long weary ourselves for nought, and weaken ourselves by our foolish fears, childish surmises, and rebellious reasonings? We are ready to acknowledge the work is not our own; that we have neither power nor ability, and yet we stumble so long at submitting ourselves wholly unto Him, who would do all things for us; prepare a way where our clouded vision could see none; and not only put forth, but go before, now and always. The heart given up in simple, child-like obedience, is the sacrifice called for; and oh! how many weary steps we cause ourselves, by withholding past the time. But while the weakness and reluctance of our nature cause us so many fearful struggles, the operations of the Spirit of Truth, freely and fully submitted to, must undoubtedly produce deep and sore conflicts. Our natural tendencies are toward evil, and to have them wrought upon and subjected to the law of the spirit of life, involves the crucifixion of the will, and a dying unto self daily. Oh! things must be done away; and how thankfully should we submit to every overturning of the holy Hand that promises in any degree to wean us from ourselves, from all outward objects, and fasten our hopes and affections more fully on Himself. Ah, He knows how to keep his children dependent, and I cannot but believe the feeble struggle to stay the mind in patience, when tempests pour upon it, is a sacrifice most acceptable in the Divine sight. It is though, bitterly protesting to the creature; and I think Isaac Pen-ington describes it as a sore travelling an mournful state: but I believe too, nevertheless, it is one productive of the richest harvest, when patiently abode in; it weans from a confidence in any mutable comforts every passing enjoyment, and shows us the insufficiency of all this world can offer us to bring peace. We find, too, our own anxieties of themselves cannot avail us, at last, tired of ourselves, and of everything belonging to us, worn out by resistance, are more and more willing and ready to submit to the terms, whereby we reap the benefit intended, even our separation from eye and close union with Him who offers to wish his people away, even unto the end of the world.

But oh! these doubts, fears, jealousies, he heavily do they dwell upon us, and weigh down the spirit. I often remember the complaint against a rebellious people formerly, "Moab hath been at ease from his youth, as he hath settled on his lees, and hath not been emptied from vessel to vessel, neither hath he gone into captivity; therefore his taste remained in him, and his scent is not changed." (Jer. xlvi. 11.) A state of ease and indifference has been in all ages of the world productive of spiritual lethargy, and if its opposite can be kept alive the fire of devotion, and present in the hearts of mankind the recollections of their weakness and dependence, we have cause to embrace messengers of suffering as our surest friends. Who in heart could say they were indifferent to the requisitions of religion and to the name of its Author, and yet be constantly do we see those surrounded with innumerable blessings, "settled on their lees alike regardless of eternal interests, as of Him who died for them, and in matchless mere wretched not that any should perish.

Oh! it is an awful thing to be neglected the soul's welfare! Truly what a blessing profited if he gain the whole world and be come spiritually bankrupt there? What too much to part with to secure a well-grounded hope of rest, when done with life's turmoil and yet I am often jealous of myself lest I reward be too much in view. Should it not be our first wish and care to serve Him who love can never be sufficiently magnified, if his own sake. The reward is only of mere. We can do nothing for ourselves, and if I last admitted to one of the mansions prepared for those who are made conquerors, the path through which 'tis reached, however marked by suffering, must still bear the indelible character of mercy, mercy.

The Emperor of Constantinople having been greatly offended with St. Chrysostom, asked his courtiers what would be the most effectual mode of punishment. One suggested banishment; another, confiscation of his property; another, throwing him into prison; and a fourth, putting him to death.

A fifth shrewdly said that they were under a mistake. If he was in exile, he would have God with him; if stripped of all his goods, the poor would suffer; if imprisoned, he could still enjoy communion with God. Condemning him to death was only to owe heaven to him. If the emperor wished to be avenged on Chrysostom, he must force him to commit some sin;—"for," said he, "he is a man who fears neither exile, poverty, chains nor death, being afraid of nothing but sin."—The Day of Days.

Religious Items, &amp;c.

Mennonites.—There are about 60,000 Mennonites in America. They have 500 meeting-houses, one eighth of that number being in Canada. They abstain from taking the oath, do not inflict punishment, do not accept public office, and never go to law. They are early all farmers.

Telephoning Sermons.—An experiment with a telephone in half-dozen different houses in Hanover, N. H., recently, enabled various invalids who were sitting in their own rooms at home, to listen to the same sermon, delivered at a distance from any of them.

Suppression of Vice.—The annual report of the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, shows that through the efforts of the Society, laws for the suppression of vice have been passed in Massachusetts and Connecticut, and ordinances adopted in several cities of the West against the sale of The Police Gazette and kindred publications. Similar societies were organized in Detroit, Toledo, Rochester, and Providence, and public meetings were held in a large number of other cities, the result of which has been to greatly enlarge its scope, and correspondingly increase its power. The head-quarters of the New England organization is Boston, and that of the Western, Cincinnati. Operations have extended to Canada, and our Government has received thence a most earnest protest against allowing vile illustrated papers to pass through the mails across the boundaries.

The suppression of fifty lottery and gaming firms, and the exposure and breaking of eight Wall street bogus firms, which tainted money from persons at a distance, by circular and personal letters, for investment in stocks, but never made any return whatever to their deluded patrons, are among good results.

Baptist Statistics, as published by the American Baptist Publication Society, show the number of places of public worship belonging to them to be 24,791—of members 2,133,044, showing a gain of 31,010 in the past year. Of these members, about three fourths reside in the Southern States, where there are 890,739 white, and 616,974 colored.

Cold-water Baptism.—The Primitive Christian says: "A Baptism by immersion was performed recently in Canada, one morning when the wind was blowing sharply, and the mercury stood 26° below zero. The subject was a lady."

On the 12th mo. 16th, 1879, in a small city in eastern Bohemia, thirty-one persons were baptized each for attending to a Bible service connected with the State Church. The order of the meeting was fined $12.50.

On the 12th mo. 14th, 1879, the attempt of a few slavers in Stutzky, near Prague, to hold a Bible service in one of their homes was frustrated by the police. All this in Austria, whose Constitution grants religious liberty to all citizens.

Natural History, Science, &amp;c.

Type Setting Machine.—Machines for setting and distributing the type employed in printing are coming into use with a fair prospect of success. It is estimated that one machine with three attendants will do the work of 10 or 12 compositors.

Electric Light.—The pure whiteness of the incandescence produced by the electric light is as far superior to the yellow light of any flame as the light of an argand burner is superior to that of the pine stick of the savage. Another advantage is its safety—no danger of escape of gas and explosion, nor the taking of fire of oil by accident or imprudence in handling. But a most important advantage is that the electric light, not being produced by combustion, does not rob the air of its oxygen, nor vitiate it by the emission of carbonic acid or oxide or other products of combustion, so that it can be used in small, close rooms without the objectionable features of a light produced under the same circumstances by a flame.

The British Museum has acquired about 1,000 more tablets and fragments of inscribed terra-cotta documents from Babylon. Among them is a tablet of Samsu-Irba, a Babylonian monarch hitherto unknown, who probably lived about the time of Bardses, and was one of the intermediate rulers between Cambyses and Darius, b. c. 518. Another fragment has a representation of one of the gates of Babylon. Shoemaker's wax has been used with success in Glasgow to illustrate to the students of natural philosophy, in a model, the flow of glaciers. It is wonderful how closely the flow of this wax resembles that of ice. Sir W. Thompson has also employed this sort of wax to show the motion of lighter bodies, like cork, and heavier bodies, like bullets, through a viscous substance.

Snow Two Hundred Feet Deep.—The following account of enormous snow-falls in north-western India shows what a world of vapor is carried inland on the monsoons from the Indian ocean, to strike against the loftiest mountain chain in the world and be precipitated in such snows and rains as occur on the middle slopes and foothills of the Himalayas. About the sources of some of the great rivers of India occur the heaviest rains ever known; and farther east, in Cashmere, it seems the snows are sometimes terrific. Some interesting details of the extraordinary snowfall in Cashmere in 1877-78 are given in a paper in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, by Lydekker. Early in the 10th month, snow commenced to fall in the valley and mountains of Cashmere, and from that time up to 5th month, 1878, there seems to have been an almost incessant snowfall in the higher mountains and valleys; indeed, in places it frequently snowed without intermission for upwards of ten days at a time. At Dras, which has an elevation of ten thousand feet, Lydekker estimated the snowfall, from the native account, as having been from thirty to forty feet thick. The effects of this enormous snowfall were to be seen throughout the country. At Dras, the well-built traveller's bungalow, which has stood some thirty years, was entirely crushed down by the weight of snow which fell upon it. In almost every village of the neighboring mountains more or less of the log houses had fallen, while at Gulmarg and Sonomarg, where no attempt was made to remove the snow, almost all the huts of the European visitors were utterly broken down by it. In the higher mountains whole hillsides have been denuded of vegetation and soil by the enormous avalanches which swept down them, leaving vast gaps in the primeval forests, and closing the valleys below with the debris of rocks and trees. As an instance of the amount of snow which must have fallen in the higher levels, Lydekker mentions the Zogi Pass, leading from Cashmere to Dras, which has an elevation of 11,300 feet. He crossed this early in 8th month last year, and then found that the whole of the ravine leading up to the pass from the Cashmere side was still filled with snow, which he estimated in places to be at least one hundred and fifty feet thick. As another instance of the great snowfall, he takes the valley leading from the town of Dras up to the pass separating that place from the valley of the Kishengunga river. About the middle of 8th month the whole of the first mentioned valley, at an elevation of twelve thousand feet, was completely choked with snow, which in places was at least two hundred feet deep. As to the destruction of animal life in the upper Wardwan valley, large numbers of ibex were seen imbedded in snow; in one place upward of sixty heads were counted, and in another not less than one hundred. The most convincing proofs, however, of the havoc caused among the wild animals by the great snowfall is the fact that scarcely any ibex were seen during last summer in these portions of the Wardwan and Tilail valleys which are ordinarily considered as sure finds. So, also, the red bear and the marmot were far less numerous than usual. Lydekker estimates that the destruction to animal life caused by snow has far exceeded any slaughter which could be inflicted by sportsmen during a period of at least five or six years.—Exchange.

To-day the English Fire Brigade came, and in the garden at the back of our palace went through their exercise. They have invented a beautiful means of saving life. But the wonder is in this, that on the one hand, they were once the most efficient of all the great engines, such as cannons, muskets, and similar things, for the quicker and more multitudinous slaughter of the human race.—From the Diary of the Shah of Persia, while in England.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 28, 1880.

In a former editorial we referred to the gradual decline in the number of members belonging to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and to the causes which had led to this. We were sensible that the subject was one which was calculated to depress rather than to cheer the spirits of those who love the principles of the Society of Friends, and believe its doctrines as proclaimed by its early members to be true, and to be greatly beneficial to those who receive and obey them. Yet we believed there might be an advantage in calmly considering the case, even if its immediate effect was saddening and humbling. The prosperity of a religious body depends on its being imbued with the Spirit of its Holy Head; the more fully this is experienced by its members, and the more they come under the government of the Saviour, of whom it was foretold that the government shall be upon his shoulders, the more they will be prepared to promote his cause among men. All power belongs to the Lord; and without his help and assisting grace, our own efforts and labors will not tend to set up his kingdom in the hearts of others. It is therefore cheering to those who love the good cause, to see renewed evidences that the Lord has not forgotten to be gracious, but that He still renews the visitations of his Holy Spirit to the hearts of the people, and crowns their solemn assemblies with a sense of his life-giving presence.

This has often been the case during the present winter in many of the meetings in and around Philadelphia. The solemnity which has spread over those collected during the times of reverential silence, has given cause to believe that true worship ascended to our Father in Heaven from many of those who were met for that purpose; and the feeling which attended the labors of the ministers in many cases showed that they had not spoken without a fresh anointing, and that the Lord was pleased to bless the food which He had given them to distribute to the people. In most, and we believe in all, the recent Quarterly Meetings, there were evidences of Divine favor, which have proved a comfort to the rightly concerned, and tended to strengthen their faith that the Lord is still mindful of his people. Let us then endeavor to hold fast to those precious principles which we have seen to be true in the light of the Lord's Spirit; retain our faith in the all-sufficiency of Divine power to carry on the work of righteousness in the earth; and seek to be found among the willing-hearted in Israel, on whom in his own time the Lord will confer such gifts as may please Him, and whom He will honor by employing in his service.

Is not the language still applicable to the humble, devoted servants of our Heavenly Father, "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so is the Lord round about his people, from henceforth, even forever?"

Oh that our members individually would fully yield themselves up to the guidance and blessing of the Lord, being in the cities which He requires in his store-house, and willingly enduring the heart-changing operations of his Spirit; then indeed would their light so shine before men that others seeing their good works would glorify our Father who is in Heaven. Not only their words, but the whole course of their lives would preach the inviting language, "Come and have fellowship with us, for truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son, Jesus Christ." Those who were under Divine visitation would be attracted to them, and prepared to unite with them in holding up to the world a true testimony to the continued government of Christ, as held over all things to his church; and thus they and we would become one another's helpers and joy in the Lord. Then would be experienced in measure a fulfillment of the evangelical promise—"I will pour water upon you that ye are thirsty, and I will pour my Spirit on the dry ground; and I will pour upon thy offspring; and they shall spring up as among the grass, as willows by the water courses." One shall say, I am the Lord's; and another shall call himself by the name of Jacob; and another shall subscribe with his hand unto the Lord, and surname himself by the name of Israel.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In executive session of the Senate on the 17th, the Committee on Foreign Relations reported back the treaty for the settlement of the French claims, with a recommendation that it be ratified. It was placed on the calendar for future consideration. The Senate bill for providing the detail of a naval vessel to carry contributions for the relief of the suffering poor in Ireland, has been passed by the House.

The Senate Committee on Territories has agreed to report favorably a bill establishing a U. S. District Court for the Indian Territory, and providing for the equipment of citizenship by the Indians, and the allotment of lands to them in severalty, under prescribed conditions.

The President has nominated Rowland E. Trowbridge, of Michigan, to be Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The new State Hospital for the Indigent Insane of Philadelphia, Bucks, Montgomery, Chester, Delaware, Northampton and Lehigh counties, was formally transferred last week from the Building Commission appointed in 1878, to the Board of Trustees to whom its administration has been recently confined.

Nearly 600,000 postal cards were used in the United States last year. They are made in Holyoke, Mass., by a private concern, under the general supervision of the government officer. The work is nearly all done by machinery, even to counting and putting them up in packages of 25.

General Grant and party arrived in the City of Mexico on the 21st inst. Extensive preparations were made for his reception.

At a special meeting of the Board of Health of San Francisco, held on the 21st inst., Chinatown was unanimously declared to be a nuisance, and the authorities were requested to abate it without delay.

Four men were buried by a snow slide near Franktown, Nevada, on the morning of the 21st. One of them was rescued, severely injured; the others could not be found.

Fire-brick building, Nos. 384 and 386 Broadway, New York, was burned on the night of the 20th inst. During the conflagration, two firemen fell through the roof into the fire below. The loss of property is estimated at $1,050,000.

The amount of losses, by fire, in the United States, during the year 1878, as reported to the Insurance Companies, was $77,003,700; the uninsured losses that are not reported, will raise the amount to near $100,000,000.

The anthracite coal trade is said to present a more auspicious outlook at present, than for some time past. The stock of coal has been materially reduced, and the active trade has been decidedly active. An active trade for the balance of the year is expected.

The Pennsylvania Steel Company has loaded a vessel with steel rails and two locomotives, for the Northern Pacific, to be delivered at Portland, Oregon.

The mortality in this city for the week ending on the 21st, was 308. Some of the principal causes of death were: apoplexy, 8; consumption, 49; convulsions, 12; disease of the heart, 11; scarlet fever, 3; typhoid fever, 7; inflammation of the lungs, 29; old age, 26; small-pox, 1.

Markets, &c.—U. S. S. Sices, 1881, 105¢; 5's, 103¢; 4's, registered, 108¢; do. coupon, 109¢; 4 per cents, 106¢. Cotton.—Sales of middlings are reported at 13 1/2 a 10¢, per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Grade, 7 1/2 cts. in barrels, and standard white, 7 1/2 cts. for export, and 8 1/2 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—The market is firm, and but little disposition to operate. Sales of 140 barrels, in lots, at $6.50 a $7.25 for Minnesota and Penna. families; $6.75 a $7.25 for Family, 48 cts. per bushel, $7.50 a $8.25 for patents. Rye flour, $5 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat quiet, but firmer—red, $1.49; amber, $1.51. Rye, 93 cts. Corn is in fair demand—mixed, 57 cts.; yellow, 57 1/2 cts.; and white, 60 cts. Oats are less active—No. 3 white, 45 cts.; No. 2, 46 a 46 1/2 cts.; choice white, 48 cts. per bushel.

Hay and straw.—Average price during the week: Prime timothy, 95 cts. a $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 a 90 cts.; straw, $1.05 a $1.15 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle.—The market was dull—a few choice lots of beef, 1 1/2 cts.; extra, 53 a 54 cts.; good, 5 a 5 1/2 cts.; medium, 4 1/2 a 4 3/4 cts. per cwt.

Milk cows were in fair demand, and ranged from $20 to $40. Hogs, 67 a 7 cts., as to condition. Sheep, 5 a 6 1/2 cts., as to quality. Lambs, 51 a 7 cts.

FOREIGN.—The distress in Ireland is said to be increasing, and requires vigorous aid on the part of relief committees to prevent cases of starvation.

In the House of Commons on the 17th inst., Weldon Home Kuler, Kildare county, introduced a motion in favor of the emigration of the franchise in Ireland with that in England and Scotland. He said the existing law of the United Kingdom is a violation of the act of Union. After considerable discussion, the motion was rejected by a vote of 212 to 118.

The steamship Strathleven arrived in London from Australia on the 1st inst., with a shipment of fresh meat. She left Melbourne on the 7th of 12th month. The meat was preserved in a refrigerator box supplied with cold air, and on arrival was found to be in excellent condition. The experiment is regarded as a complete success.

The British steamer Cacoop, which arrived at Liverpool on the 16th inst. from Boston, lost boats and two hundred and forty-seven head of cattle, in consequence of heavy weather.

The Registrar-General has returned 4,653,551 acres in Ireland under the head of "bog and marsh, barren mountain land, water, roads and fences" for the year 1879. During the past year 8,387 acres have been gained to cultivation or pasture.

The quantity of raw sugar in Paris, in 1879, was 1,545,445, a diminution of 94 on the previous year.

The export of French beet-root sugar for the year 1879, amounted to only 8,000 tons, as compared with 97,000 tons in 1878.

The return of the number of wolves and other wild animals killed in France last winter, has just been published, and shows the following results: wolves 409 young wolves, 153; foxes, 6,771; badgers, 5,036; wild boars, 5,328.

An attempt has recently been made to kill the Imperial family of Russia, by the explosion of a mine filled with dynamite, in the basement of the Winter Palace. The intention no doubt was to fire the mine while the family were at dinner, but owing to the delusion of one of their number, they did not enter the dining hall at the usual time, and thus their lives were saved. Some of the leading officials in St. Petersburg have received letters from a nihilist committee, intimating that the capital will be fired on the anniversary of the Czar's accession to the throne.

From the interior of Russia, accounts are received of very great suffering on account of the failure of the year's crops; and of many thousands of human beings killed by a frightful extent. It is estimated that in the two provinces of Charkoff and Pultava, it has carried off forty thousand persons in the last four months.

In a recent discussion on the bill authorizing the German Government to contract a loan, the Under Secretary of the treasury in St. Petersburg has declared that the country had greatly improved during the current year. The total increase of receipts were estimated at 20,000,000 marks.

The Italian Parliament was opened on the 17th. The speech from the throne recommended the abolition of the grant of the election of electoral colleges. In regard to foreign affairs, the speech says that Italy needs peace, and it is therefore easy for her to support the observance of the treaty of Berlin and remain faithful to her promise to be an element of progress and civilization in Europe.

The Italian Government has offered three prizes amounting to three hundred and sixty pounds, for vineyards raised from grafts of American varieties of grapes, capable of resisting the attacks of phylloxera.

Colonel Sygne, who was sent by Minister Layar last month, to distribute relief among the Mussulman refugees in Eastern Roumelia, has been captured, together with his wife, by Greek brigands near Salonica. The bandits demand a large ransom for their release.

For "The Friend"

For four years the English occupied this land, whose site is now forgotten. The location of the gold mine heretofore proclaimed, equally unknown, unless it exist in the soil his productive district's clept "Pen shore." length Plantagenet published his story of ventures, or his account of Nova Albion, the Earl was stirred up to diligence in the execution of his scheme. Accordingly a grand palatine was projected, the banks of Delaware were set off into manors, which being dignified by well chosen names, several titles to each member of the Earl's family if they never answered any more use. A chivalric order was instituted for the imposing name of "The Albion Knights of the Conversion of the Twenty-one Kings," who professed to have at heart a desire for turning to the true faith the twenty-three tribes living within the limits of the grant of the Earl Palatine." The mode of proselyting the heathen seems to have favored rather of Mahomet than of Christ. His followers were to live like devout apostolic soldiers, bearing the sword in one hand and "the word" in the other, to civilize and convert the heathen to be his majesty's lieges.

Truly this scheme was as crazy as was ever conceived, and yet not more so than has been many a time practised by lordly prebends, whether cavalier or roundhead. The Earl at length came over to see his embryo colony, sometime about 1641, and he led the "royal Plantagenet" marched and lodged and cabined with the Indians for seven years, and the latter got up another book boasting forth the advantages of the country; in order to induce the emigration of the accounts, barons, knights, gentlemen, merchants, adventurers and planters, who had united themselves to settle these thousand islands trained men in this hope that they would be the saviors of the Delaware. But they never came, and may we be thankful therefor. The Lord-palatine-governor, the Council of State or Upper House and Lower House of Burgesses, who were to meet the Lords in Parliament annually on the 10th of November to legislate for the Palatinate, never met at Pensauken; the Dutch Albion subjects were dispersed, the dynasty of the Earl Palatine subsided, and John

I., of Tinicum, reigned in his stead, for the Dutch again became lords-paramount.

At length, in 1676, came the Friends, mostly men of good estate, who fled from their native land to avoid the application of the very principles of government which their predecessors under Ploeyden had here sought to secure. The restoration of royalty and the inquisition this liberal Christian people could not brook; nor regard with favor a profession of religion promulgated by terror of the dungeon and the sword. Hence these unyielding advocates of truth sought an asylum in the new world for that freedom which was denied them in their native land.

The first permanent settlement in this section of New Jersey by Englishmen, was made under the auspices of William Penn. The character of this distinguished man must be, as it has ever been, the theme of admiration of all who honor virtue of the highest order; and his legislative wisdom must command the applause of every enlightened mind. "His fame," says Bancroft, "is now wide as the world; he is one of the few who have gained abiding glory."

In 1675 a portion of West New Jersey became invested in certain joint proprietors, all of whom were members of the Society of Friends. Of these William Penn was a leading partner, and in company with him was afterwards joined the Apologist for the Christian Doctrines of the Society, Robert Barclay. The latter, however, did not visit the new world, though appointed by the unanimous choice of his colleagues the first governor for life of East Jersey, with dispensation from personal residence, and authorized to nominate in his deputy. The title to large tracts of land in our immediate vicinity has been derived from the said proprietaries, and bear the signature of this distinguished Christian advocate.

The first Christian Commonwealth.—Our plan does not include a history of the district under notice, and we pass by much of peculiar interest in the early days of the colony. There is, however, one remarkable transaction worthy of especial notice.

True to their instincts of self-control, and conscious that they owed allegiance to no man, the proprietors, freeholders and inhabitants generally settled in the territory of Gloucester lying between Pensauken and Oldman's Creek, met in May, 1686, at Arwamus, now Gloucester, and formed for themselves a county constitution. A unique paper is this constitution, by which it appears that the inhabitants of the county of old Gloucester deemed themselves a body politic or democratic commonwealth, with full powers of legislation. They thus established courts, provided officers, and prescribed the minutiae of legal practice, fixed the capital at Arwamus, within the present limits of Camden county, which was separated from Gloucester in 1841. No other county of New Jersey can deduce its existence from a direct and positive compact between its inhabitants. The government of the Province of Gloucester was thus organized. A city reaching from Nevers' creek to Tawler's grant located, and that inevitable accompaniment of Christian legislation, a gaol erected. The inhabitants of the new Commonwealth evidently considered themselves an independent government, with power to prescribe punishments, levy taxes, and do many acts equally sovereign, among which we do not, however, discover that of making war! "This peaceful people had, on the banks of the Delaware, established a community which," says Bancroft, "a Fenelon might have envied."

Rhode Island was at this time the only Protestant settlement in which the principle of toleration was recognized; but even there Roman Catholics were excluded from participating in the political rights enjoyed by the rest of the community. Toleration was early established in Maryland, but the persecuted Jew could find no asylum in the State of Lord Baltimore. He was excluded, and punished if he entered, and outrages permitted upon his person, as had been practised in Europe for ages among Saracenic rulers of Spain.

Nor was it in Pennsylvania that was laid the foundation of this equitable government, this first democratic Christian State. The principles advocated by Penn and his associates, were first applied to his portion of the Province of Nova Casarea or New Jersey, and here, on the east bank of the Delaware, and really, begun that "holy experiment." Under the sanction of grants and concessions which formed the charter of the Proprietaries regarding the liberties and rights of the settlers, was the Constitution of the "State of Gloucester," framed in 1686. The government founded by Penn, for his province of Pennsylvania, partook in some features of the character of a baronial manor, the governor was esteemed the proprietor or proprietary, and perpetual rents were to be paid to him and his descendants, nominal almost it may be, but still rents, which acknowledged the title of the feudal lord. The power of the chief was by him, however, voluntarily reduced to the influence of a double vote upon questions in Council, a share in legislation much below that accorded to the veto of our President. But the Constitution of the Province of Gloucester was more truly democratic. "Here," says one of the proprietors, "we lay a foundation for after ages to understand their liberties as men and Christians; that they may not be brought into bondage, but by their own consent; for we put the power in the people."

Thus on our soil of Camden county has the past two centuries and a half seen the successive sway of Dutch, of Swedes, and again of Dutch and English; of lawless viceroys, of county palatines with vice-regal pretensions, of hollow power, and tenanted manors, and the practical substantial exhibition of the true democracy that regards only the welfare of the people, and provides every safeguard for their liberties and rights. The old time notions of lords and palatines here obtained but a mutable existence, the old trunk of feudalism would not flourish upon this new and virgin soil. The law of force has given place to the law of love, the Quaker has succeeded to the Cavalier and the Walloon, sowing the seeds of peace and good-will, liberty, equality, virtue and independence in the soil, that under the semi-barbarous schemes of vice-royalty and baronial domains would have produced only the vile weeds of landed aristocracy and mental and moral degradation.

Extracts from Letters, &amp;c., of Ebenezer Worth.

The following copy of a letter is without name or date, but evidently addressed to an Indian:

"Now George, my dear friend, I want thee to remember that it is in this world that we are to prepare for a better home, and bear in mind the great uncertainty of time and how fast it is passing away, day after day, week after week, year after year, never to return to us, how necessary we should be making a good use of it. I believe in the doctrines taught by our blessed Saviour, and think I may say that I know the Christian religion is a good religion; if we live up to what it requires of us, it will make us what God would have us to be. I want thee to think seriously on this subject; thou mayest feel right for thee to ask thee to do, and give thee strength to do it. He can qualify thee to be very useful to thy own people in giving them good advice, which with thy good example, through the blessing of the Great Spirit, may be of great use to many after thy spirit has gone to another world—may I not say to that good home in Heaven where I very much desire we may all meet. Hast thou heard of the death of our friend Thomas Wistar, who loved God and his Indian brothers and sisters; he seemed willing to do anything the Great Spirit required of him to help the Indians; he spent much time and money in trying to assist them; made several visits to the Indians in the far West, and we have reason to believe that the Great Spirit whom he desired to serve, enabled him to be very useful to them. I would be pleased to receive a letter from thee when thou mayest feel inclined to write. I have had a heavy cold for some time, and my hearing has become very dull. Please remember me to thy father and mother, uncle Thomas, and Wm. Patterson and wife.

Thy friend,

EBENEZER WORTH.

To A. P. and E. D., and L. S.

Dear Friends,—I have felt much for you on account of the close trial you have recently met with in the death of our friend Mary Millhouse, her being so soon removed after leaving her friends, and so far from home, makes it more affecting. I was once very sick whilst at Tunnessassa, and reduced so low I think the doctor and perhaps no one that saw me, had any hope of my recovery; I was very much amongst strangers. After I became dangerously ill, I sent for Jos. Batty and wife, they lived in the neighborhood of Collins, perhaps thirty-five miles north of Tunnessassa, they came and staid some days with me, until I began to recover. I did not inform my relations and friends at home of my sickness until I was considered out of danger. At that time I think there was no railroad nearer than Buffalo, in getting there (to Tunnessassa) I had to go by Philadelphia, New York, Albany and Buffalo—from the latter place by private conveyance—I think it took about a week for a letter to go from Randolph to Marshallton. On account of the time and difficulty of getting from Chester county to Tunnessassa I felt myself a great way from home, and a great way for my relations to come, and uncertain whether I would be living when they got there; for these reasons I felt most easy not to send them any information of my sickness until getting better. I have thought it much more desirable, when we are about to be removed by death, to feel we are in our proper places (though far separated from our relations and friends, than to be with them and feel that we are out of our proper place.

[This expression brings to recollection a visit paid to our dear friend when confined to bed by indisposition at his own home, some time previous to his last sickness, when he expressed somewhat similar sentiments, saying in substance, that "he would rather die in a cabin out in the woods alone, and have the Divine presence with him, than to be at home surrounded by his friends, yet be without that." How comforting and encouraging is the remembrance, that let us be where we may in this world, if we are thus under Divine direction we may with confidence look to that merciful Father for support even under very trying circumstances, which appears to have been the case with E. W. in the account furnished above.]

I hope our dear friend, Mary Millhouse, was not out of her proper place when taken; it is one of the many solemn warnings we have had, to be making good use of our time and talents, and try to be in a state of readiness when it may please our Divine Master to remove us from works to rewards. I have often thought of what an Indian woman, who had lost several of her children, said, "All the Great Spirit does is right." I hope we may all try to be resigned to his blessed and holy will.

I would be pleased to hear from you when it is convenient to write.

Sincerely your friend,

EBENEZER WORTH.

Marshallton, 3d mo. 23d, 1877.

Respected Friend, W. B.,—Though far separated in person, I sometimes think of thee and of the time we spent pleasantly together, when thou used to come and sit meetings with us, and I think sometimes bring thy two oldest children. I was comforted in believing thou wast desirous of serving thy Divine Master from whom we receive every blessing, and who is worthy to be loved, honored and obeyed by all. Since that time many changes have taken place; many who were then enjoying good health have been removed from works to rewards, and some who were quite young have been removed by death; it is a very serious and solemn subject to think of, and ought to serve as a solemn warning to us who are left, to be making a good use of our time and talents in serving our Creator and laying up treasure in Heaven—it is a subject of great importance to all. I have felt for thee and thy family since the death of Susan and Phebe. I thought Susan a remarkable fine girl, she was an example to the other children at school, and from what I have heard she appeared to be prepared for death. I think we may have a comfortable home if her spirit is safely gathered to the mansion of everlasting rest and peace. Phebe, whilst down in this part of the country, seemed to behave herself well, and was loved by the who knew her. I think I felt as much for her spiritual and temporal welfare as if she had been a brother's or sister's child, and often tried to give her good advice. When I saw her last I thought she was concerned to preparing for death—I hope all is well with her. William, my friend, as time is swift passing away it seems to me to be a subject of great importance to thee and me, that I should be trying to make a good use of it. In so doing it will very much increase our happiness in this world, and prepare us for happiness in the world to come. It feels to me to be a fearful thing to die in an unprepared state and to appear before our Creator and to recite the final (last) sentence. William, my friend, there is a great responsibility resting upon parent to bring up his (or her) children in the right way; it is necessary we should look our Divine Master for the qualification to do it in the way that would be most pleasing to Him; a good example is laid precept and through the blessing of our Heavenly Father, has a powerful influence for good. These way parents may have an opportunity preaching to their children daily. I believe religious parents feel a great desire for the spiritual welfare of their children, and will favor at times with a qualification to give them good advice to look to their Divine Master for direction and help. I want to be an example to be one that will be safe and proper for thy children to follow, and may, through the blessing of thy Heavenly Father, be able to use to them after thou art removed from works to rewards. I want thee to try to be out of all bad company, refrain entirely from the use of all intoxicating drink, attend regularly a place of worship, and encourage thy wife and children to go with thee. If I were living at Tunnessassa I would be glad to have thy company at our meeting if thou shouldst incline to attend. The past winter has been rigorously cold, unusually so, the spirit rather backward with us; the farmers had got some ploughing done. Please remember me to thy family and Indian neighbors. I would be glad to get a letter from thee or Laura. Our friend Joseph Scattergood* has been a gooddeal unwell, is thought to be little better. I am in about usual health.

Thy friend, EBENEZER WORTH.

The following copy of an affectionate earnest Address to the Indians, is without date:—

"Brothers and Sisters,—We often think of you and feel much for you in your trouble. The Great Spirit, who made us all, has made us to feel that you are our brothers and sister and taught us to love you and treat you as our brothers. We feel towards you as our forefathers did towards your forefathers (those old people are now dead, and gone to another world, but this good feeling continue * In less than three months after date of this letter both of these valued Friends were removed by death.

be felt by you and us, and we believe will never die as long as our people and yours continue to love the Great Spirit, God, and his Son Jesus Christ; from love to Him will grow the love towards each other, and we shall be able to feel "One is our Master, even Jesus Christ, the Son of the Great Spirit, and that we are all brothers and sisters. Brothers, it is about seventy-two years since our forefathers (Friends) first commenced their labors in the Allegheny reservation. At times when we look about and see so little improvement, we feel somewhat discouraged; notwithstanding we feel as if we cannot give you up, and that there is something more required of us by the Great Spirit, and feel willing to try to fit and be in good earnest looking unto Him who know that He wishes us to do, how to do and give us strength to do all He is pleased require of us, and bless our labors that they may be fruitful of much good to your people, that you may be a good and prosperous people, and be favored to enjoy all the comforts of this life, and be prepared for never ending happiness in the world to come. We feel the same desire for your welfare that we do for our own. We believe in that good religion that was taught by our blessed Saviour (the Son of the Great Spirit) when He was personally in this world. He said, 'Ye of yourselves, without me, can do nothing'; that He is our life, and our light, the Way, the Truth and the life, that no man cometh unto the Father but by Him. We believe He came into this world to save sinners, to save all people of all nations, kindreds and tongues, that He is able and willing to save all that are willing to come unto Him, and He said, 'Come unto me, I will ye ends of the earth, and be ye saved.' We believe this kind invitation of mercy is to all the human family, to all the people in the world, the white man, the Indian and the black man, that He is no respecter of persons. It was this good religion that preserved our forefathers, when they what they were, and to preserve us and you."

Observance of Indian Treaty Stipulations.

[The accompanying petition was presented to Congress by Wm. D. Kelley of this city, and was directed to be printed in the Congressional Record. It was signed by about 43,000 names. Believing that this appeal for justice will be of interest to many of our readers of "The Friend," it is inserted in our columns. It refers especially to a renewal of the former attempt to enter upon the lands of the Indian Territory, made by persons who appear regardless of law or right.—Ed.]

"The petition is as follows:

To the President of the United States and to the Senate and House of Representatives:

We the undersigned men and women of the United States, resident in or near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, do most respectfully but most earnestly request the President and the House of Congress to take all needful steps to prevent the encroachments of white settlers upon the Indian Territory, and to guard the Indians in the enjoyment of all the rights which have been guaranteed to them on the faith of the nation.

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

The accompanying memorial has their origin in a strong feeling of loyalty to treaties. It commenced with individuals, and spread to towns, cities, and States. On it are the names of thinkers and molders, who feel it a right and a duty to express their sentiments when a public interest demands it.

We do not wish to clog the wheels of Government. We suggest no policy to it. We only wish to express our sense of the moral obligation of a treaty, whether the treaty be between the strong and the strong or between the strong and the weak, or for our advantage or disadvantage.

It is said that the Duke of Burgundy, a pupil of Fenelon, in a cabinet council, after hearing the reasons for making war, refused to sign a treaty for violating the treaty which it was thought would be of great advantage to France, placed his hand upon the instrument and said, with emphasis, 'Gentlemen, there is a treaty.'

We would express that when a treaty is changed or modified the free consent of both parties is necessary. We pray that no consideration of interest, no pressure, no combination of difficulties which may arise shall influence our Government to depart from this law of treaties.

We are especially urgent in this case because we are strong and the Indians are weak. Our greater knowledge and power and our relations to the Indians give imperviousness to our obligations.

We cannot afford to seem unjust. The eyes of the world are upon us. The eyes of Him who 'executed righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed,' are upon us. We live also under the law of the harvest; as we sow, so also shall we reap. If we sow justice we shall reap justice; if we sow injustice we shall reap injustice.

Therefore, as citizens of this Republic, who have as individuals obligations to the Republic, we take this method—the only one known to us—of expressing our deep conviction of the moral obligations of a treaty."

For "The Friend."

When the angels announced to the shepherds the birth of Jesus, it was with "Peace on earth; good-will to men," and from that time until now, wherever the kingdom or reign of Christ in the heart of man has been known, there has been measurably known something of this Divine and heavenly peace, with good-will to our fellow man; and also where the usurper has been permitted to exalt himself and his kingdom of darkness, there has been the reverse—war, desolation and hatred between man and man. It is lamentable how little of true love is at the present time manifested between man and man. Although the power of darkness received a great check at the abolition of slavery on this continent, yet as it was achieved by war and bloodshed and also by heavy pecuniary loss, and not brought about by Divine love, such as prompted the Saviour to redeem a fallen world and to restore it to heavenly harmony and blessedness, therefore there exists a spirit of aggrandisement, with a desire for outward greatness and exaltation, out of and at the expense and degradation of his fellow. It was pure love that caused the Saviour to leave the mansion of glory to become the babe of Bethlehem, to endure so heavy a cross, to suffer scorn, to become the poorest of the poor, to endure the contradiction of sinners against himself, so to humble himself, that He has left us an example that we should follow his steps, and at last to die an ignominious death on the cross as an atonement for the sins of the whole world, not a part only. Was ever love like this? And more than this, He hath received power and is waiting to bestow this power on all who are willing to receive it on his terms, viz.: to leave the usurper, and join the royal standard, to follow the Lamb through good and through evil report. When his disciples queried amongst themselves who should be greatest, (ere yet they knew the obligations of his kingdom.) He instructed them by taking saying, whoever should become as such little child should be greatest in his kingdom; and again He assured them of the reverse of his kingdom to that of men, by saying "that the great among men exercised greatness and authority, but it should not be so among them, for whoever should be great among them must become servant of all." Alas! how much have we to learn? Many now would gain the esteem of their Lord by much serving, or display, and by loud acclamation, instead of Mary's part, sitting at his feet, and feeding on the gracious words that came from his lips, "the one thing needful." The Apostle John says the disciples queried how He would manifest himself unto them and not to the world, and that He answered by saying, "that he that hath my words and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me, and that He and his Father would love such an one, and would take up their abode in such. Previous to the exaltation of Christ's kingdom, there must be more of the disposition of Job, who says he was a father to the poor, how poor? How did he make the widow's heart to sing for joy?" Let us remember how the Saviour had compassion on the poor widow of Nain; and at the death of Dorcas, how the poor widows mourned over her, showing the coats and garments which, by her own hands, she had made for them; how was this approved then by the church! Mary Capper was a minister of our Society in Birmingham, England, whom the writer knew, (not one of the new fashioned ones who conform to the ever-changing fashions of the age,) who, although she lived to a great age, lived and worked like Dorcas to make garments for the poor widows and orphans. The blessing of the poor and such as were ready to perish, came upon her. Such as have this world's goods and shut up their bowels of compassion, the love of Christ cannot dwell in. Our beloved friend John Woolman has very much that is valuable in his writings on loving our neighbors as ourselves; and had his advice been regarded, it would have prevented the dreadful war on slavery; and as certain as the judgment of slavery overtook this generation, so sure there is much greater judgment to come, unless men yield to the Divine Spirit, for if we sow to the flesh we shall reap the fruits thereof, but if we sow to the spirit, life everlasting.

S. CHADBOURNE.

Milville, Orleans Co., N. Y., 16th of 2d mo, 1880.

No work for Christ can be done by machinery; can be done mechanically; can be done without the power of Christ making effective the agent and the agency for its prosecution.

For "The Friend."

As "one generation passeth away and another cometh," which of late we have so solemnly and strikingly reminded of, in the sudden removal of so many of our fathers and mothers, that have borne the burden and heat of the day, our minds are turned towards the young members of our religions Society, with strong and fervent desires for them, that they may surrender their whole hearts to the transforming power of Divine grace, that so they may be qualified to fill the vacant places of our branch of the church. My invitation seems to be afresh extended, My son, my daughter, give me thy heart and let thine eyes observe my ways. The Lord's power is bringing you forward to fill the ranks of righteousness, which are being thinned, as it was in the days of our forefathers. He is as able and willing to mould, form and fashion you into vessels of honor in this our day as He was in the days that are past. He is faithful on his part, and will faithfully perform all of his promises; and if you will but perform your part and faithfully obey Him in all of his requirings, He will cause you to grow up and become plants of renown and as polished shafts in his holy hand. Yea; He will enable you to become pillars in his church and to glorify his name. He will have a people to praise Him and to declare his mighty acts, and to speak well of his name. But if you are disobedient to his call, He will bring in those from the highways and hedges, for He will have his table filled with his guests. Deter not until a more convenient season; go now, and "buy the truth."

"Go seek your great Creator,
 And give up to him
 A morning sacrifice."

THINGS UNSEEN.

"For the things which are seen are temporal; but the things which are not seen are eternal."—2 Cor. iv. 18.

There is a state unknown, unseen,
 Where parted souls must be;
 And but a step may be between
 That world of souls and me.

I see no light, I hear no sound,
 When midnight shades are spread;
 Yet, angels pitch their tents around,
 And guard my quiet bed.

Jesus was wrapt from mortal gaze,
 And clouds conveyed him hence;
 Enthroned amid the asphire blaze,
 Beyond our feeble sense.

Yet say not,—Who shall mount on high,
 To bring him from above?
 For, lo! the Lord is always nigh
 The children of His love.

The Saviour, whom I long have sought,
 And would, but cannot see;
 And, is He here? O, wondrous thought!
 And will He dwell with me?

I ask not, with my mortal eye,
 To view the vision bright;
 I dare not see thee, lest I die;
 Yet, Lord, restore my sight.

Give me to see thee, and to feel
 The mental vision clear;
 The things unseen, reveal, reveal;
 And let me know them near.

Impart the faith that ours on high,
 Beyond this earthly strife,
 That holds sweet converse with the sky,
 And lives eternal life.

BIDDING THE SUN "GOOD-NIGHT" IN LAPLAND.

When the short, bright summer of Lapland is ended, and the sun is about to set, to rise no more for seven or eight months, the people of the hamlets and villages ascend the neighboring hills to see the last of the Day, and chant a requiem, or farewell psalm, for the parting day.

"Come, little daughters, hasten,
 Ye should be heavenly dight!
 Make ready, boys, for we go forth
 To bid the sun good-night."

"Four months with steady shining
 Let us make the school most fair,
 And myriad blossoms greeted him,
 And bird-songs filled the air."

"But not October waneh;
 His setting draweth near;
 We shall not see his face again
 For more than half a year."

So forth they go, together,
 Parents and children, all,
 The aged, and the little ones,
 Young men, and maidens tall.

From many a neighboring village,
 From many a bumble home,
 To climb the rocky summit
 The thronging people come.

The sun hangs low in heaven;
 He throws his slanting rays
 Across their loving faces, turned
 To meet his parting gaze.

And now he's gone! The darkness
 Is settling like a pall,
 A long low dring of sad farewell
 Breaks from the lips of all.

In mournful cadence chanting
 The requiem of the sun,
 The dear bright day departed now,
 A long, long night begun.

And yet with cheerful patience
 They take their homeward way,
 The elders talking how the time
 May best be wiled away.

And many a youthful face is bright
 With glad expectation still,
 And unto a merry little child
 Goes dancing down the hill.

—St. Nicholas.

HEAVEN.

Selected.

No night shall be in heaven: no gathering gloom
 Shall o'er that glorious landscape ever come;
 No tears shall fall in sadness o'er those flowers
 That breathe their fragrance through celestial bowers.

No night shall be in heaven: forbid to sleep
 Those eyes no more their mournful vigils keep;
 Their fountains dried, their tears all wiped away,
 They gaze unazzled on eternal day.

No night shall be in heaven: no sorrow reign,
 No secret anguish, no corporeal pain,
 No shivering limbs, no burning fever there,
 No soul's eclipse, no winter of despair.

No night shall be in heaven: but endless noon,
 No fast declining sun, no waning moon;
 But there the Lamb shall yield perpetual light,
 Mid pastures green, and waters ever bright.

No night shall be in heaven: no darkened room,
 No bed of death, no silence of the tomb,
 But breezes ever fresh with love and truth,
 Shall breeze the frame with an immortal youth.

No night shall be in heaven: But night is here,
 The night of sorrow, and the night of fear;
 I mourn the ills that now my steps attend,
 And shrink from others, that may yet impend.

No night shall be in heaven: Oh had I faith
 To rest in what the faithful Witness saith,
 That faith should make those hideous phantoms flee,
 And leave no night henceforth on earth to me.

MY WORK.

He crowned my life with blessings full and sweet,
 In his great love He pardoned all my sin;
 Then to his fold He led my wandering feet,
 And bade me know the peace and joy within:
 "Dear Lord," I cried, "I'll gladly work for thee?"
 His loving voice said only "Follow me."

He led me to his pastures green and fair,
 Beside still waters o'er he bade me stay;
 But I, with heart all full of anxious care,
 Murmured because He made so smooth the way,
 Saying, "I have no work to do for thee,"—
 "Child, this is work," He said, to "follow me."

Yet still I murmured, "Lord, the way is fair,
 And it is very sweet to walk with thee?"
 But shall thy servant have no cross to bear?
 No battle to be fought and no man for thee?
 And in his love,—the half I could not see,—
 My Saviour gave this answer unto me—

"Are there no little crosses for each day?
 No inward battles to be fought with sin?
 Nothing to do to smooth another's way?
 To help a soul the crown of life to win?
 Hast thou remembered my great love for thee,
 And dost thou never live each day, each hour, for me?"

Then seeing all my need, and sin, and pride,
 I knelt again before my Saviour's feet,
 Praying for strength to follow by his side,
 Praying for help temptation's power to meet;
 And now each day, let my petition be,
 Teach me, dear Lord, to follow for thee.

From "The British Friend."

Knowledge of Friends in France.

A late discussion in my own Quarterly Meeting (being read) has brought forward with interest a narrative, which, under the feeling, that it might profitably be revived, I have again and again intended to insert in the Monthly "Contribution."

In the discussion alluded to, inquiry was raised as to how the little community in South France in fellowship with us, came to our notice, or we to theirs. It did not seem known to those present, and is certainly a matter of interest to the church. As I am in a position to give Friends the facts, under the circumstances I thought it might not be thought out of place.

Joseph Fox of Falmouth (the first who became a surgeon) had a share in two cutters with other owners, who, outvoting his objection, at the commencement of hostilities with France in 1778 armed these vessels as letters of marque in order to capture French merchantmen. The enterprise, (adds Burke in his History of Commons) was successful, and some valuable ships were taken. His partners then endeavored to keep him from his share in the profits; but he insisted upon it and lodged the amount in the British Funds, keeping the circumstance an entire secret even from his family, and in fact dealing with the treasure like one who felt it was not his own. His object was to restore it as soon as possible to those whom he considered to be, and who really were, the rightful owners. In 1783, on the restoration of peace, the opportunity occurred, and he then commissioned his son Dr. E. L. Fox (afterwards of Bristol) to proceed to Paris, where he first communicated the matter to him by letter. Much difficulty and delay intervened, trying faith and principle, and giving a good excuse, had he desired one, to abandon the attempt as hopeless. While it was yet in progress Joseph Fox died. But his son had received the duty as a solemn trust and charge which he was ot to quit until the restitution was made. He had a notice printed in the Gazette de France of 2nd Mo., 1785, in consequence whereof applications were quickly made which led to about £1470 being restored. The sufferers thus reimbursed made an acknowledgment in the 8th Mo. Gazette, which need not be quoted. A small sum still remained in Dr. Fox's hands which he could not assign, especially as the Revolutionary War broke out. In 1818, when it had reached £600, he had ventured abroad once more, and going gain to Paris enquired how he could best appropriate it, and ultimately placed it in the treasury of the Invalid Seamen of France for the relief of the non-combatants of the merchant service. The advertisement above noticed drew forth an address from a body of Protestants whom we have since been glad to win in fellowship and belief, for they were rejoiced to learn that anyone was in existence who like them testified against iniquity and sin; and thus they came to the knowledge of the Society.

As the real use of any event we may recall the moral it is fitted to teach, it should be held as an encouragement to all to faithfulness to the Friend who thus through life strove to fulfil his father's long-cherished concern, and at once to obey his earthly and his heavenly parent, was remarkably blessed of our Lord. He was signally prospered and ad a patriarchal tribe of descendants.

I could not but feel that at a time when many under our name are so languidly and abasively holding the great doctrine of peace—as though they might be wrong, and had something in so doing to be ashamed or afraid—it was really animating to have one of so many instances furnished by the experience of our sires brought to notice. We have not to open the records of these, and on every page there are found deeds which evince unshaken fortitude and undoubting conviction for the truth; carrying their possessors—the faithful subjects of that crucifying and enlightening question of peace which is in this day crushed too often, overlooked, or resisted—over difficulty, danger, and trial. I have heard my father say, e. g., that while the simple-hearted Quaker held this fund his house was burned down, yet it remained inviolate—sacred trust of the Lord; and it is plain his holy purpose in claiming it was that he might ease the happy task of restoring it to those whom by a higher law than that of warfare he believed to be the owners.

Wasted Time.

"The day is a round of pleasure from the time the ladies begin rolling tenpins in the morning to the moment the last billiard ball licks in the billiard hall. Those who prefer the rest of repose find it on the lawns, porches and verandas."

The above is a Philadelphia-News relation of how some who resort to the seaside for amusement, try "to palliate dulness and give time a shove." But well might the satiated and mistrusting heart ask, "If this be joy?" And well might the Poet query respecting similar pastimes—

'Ah! What is life thus spent? and what are they
But fanatic, who thus spend it! all for smoke—
Eternity for bubbles, proves at last
A senseless bargain.'

The Apostle Paul has penned for us, "She that liveth to pleasure is dead (to that holy peace and joy which Jesus at times infuses into the bosom of his dependent and obedient children) while she liveth." And this sort of pleasure, indebted to a continual round of novelty and gaiety for its fickle frail support, is but little better than the fearful spectacle of so many maniacs dancing in their chains.

Oh! when will the alone Source and Fountain of all true pleasure be availingly sought? When will the sin-sick and prodigal soul be turned to Him, who is the ever-present Helper, Comforter and Sufficiency of all those who seek with the whole heart to love and serve Him. Can there be more precious assurance than, "In Thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand are pleasures for evermore?" and "Thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures." Oh! that instead of the unsatisfying waters of life's polluted stream, and for whom the Saviour bled, and died, and rose again, might accept his gracious invitation:—"If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink!" A fountain open to all; Christ's promised blessing to all; a well of living, perennial, saving grace to all; "a river, the streams whereof make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High."

Chinese Students in American Schools.

A recent lecture on this subject by Joseph Cook, published in the Christian Advocate, contains some very interesting information. It states there are now being educated in the best American schools about 120 Chinese students. It contains the following letter from Dr. Bancroft, principal of the Phillips Academy at Andover, Mass., where some of these pupils are studying.

Andover, Mass., Jan. 31, 1880.

My Dear Mr. Cook:—The presence of Chinese and Japanese students in our American schools in considerable numbers, studying after a careful method, and with a definite aim, is significant of something more than a spirit of curiosity, adventure, enterprise, the love of knowledge, or the greed of gain; of something more than better means of transit, the increase of traffic, the breaking down of exclusiveness, the victories of diplomacy. The Eastern civilizations are laying hold upon the Western, and not only our industries, our arts, our sciences, but also our history, our literature, our methods of inquiry, and our religious ideas, are going back to the Orient in the persons of educated young men, trained among us from boyhood under careful supervision, and quickened by the inspiration of a career waiting before them.

At present, more Japanese students are going than coming; but the Chinese Government has more than a hundred students now in this country, and, with respect to these, several points are worthy of special mention.

They are selected with care, after a long probation. They are sent here to remain, on an average, fifteen years, and to pass through the successive stages of elementary, secondary, college, and professional or technical education. They are preparing for a great diversity of employments. They are not allowed to denationalize themselves, but all their studies are carried on with direct reference to their future career in their native land. Their conformity to our modes of dress and our habits of society and living is a matter of convenience and courtesy, not a surrender. They come to get the most and the best we can give, but only to take and use it for the benefit of their country. Far more than our boys at West Point and Annapolis, they regard themselves as already in the service of the State. On their return they are expected to devote their education to the service of the nation in its widest sense.

To secure the best results, they are placed two by two in selected families, sent in small groups to our best schools and colleges, yet kept in constant communication with their own countrymen, and in living sympathy with them. They are allowed a generous support, and held to a strict accountability. They are allowed a perfect freedom of opinion and belief, yet restricted, for wise and obvious reasons, in its premature expression.

The results, so far as I may be allowed to speak of them, are just what might be expected. The students are models of industry, zeal, politeness and order. They are willing to pay the price of scholarship, and they get it. In obedience to authority, reverence for superiors, gentleness of manners, and a certain reticence and diplomatic turn of mind, they are characteristically Chinese. Appropriating our learning, they do not renounce their own. Seeking knowledge in all directions, the truths of the Bible engage their special attention, and often win their heart.

For such men, in such circumstances, with such a future, who can forbear to pray?

Yours, very truly,

Cecil F. P. Bancroft."

The educational arrangements in regard to Yung Wing, who when a boy was brought to this country from China in 1847, by a missionary named S. R. Brown, was educated at the Monson Academy in Massachusetts, and became a Yale student of Christianity. He graduated at Yale College in 1854, and returned to China in the following year, where he gradually rose in station and influence, until he was able to interest the Government of China in his long-cherished scheme. "The result was that he induced the Chinese Government to grant $1,500,000 for the founding of a Chinese Educational Commission. He himself chose Hartford, in the United States, as the place for the establishment of this enterprise, one of the most remarkable and significant in the recent educational history in the world. A noble government building has been erected at Hartford by the Chinese Government. Some $100,000 are expended annually on the commission: As a result of its operations, there will be in China, in ten years from now, perhaps an hundred Chinese young men in governmental employment, educated in all Occidental learning, and able to cope with Western diplomacy, and to pour into China the fruits of the civilization of Europe and America."

The following letter from Yung Wing himself explains the motives which actuated this far-seeing statesman, in this noble enterprise.

Washington, D. C., Jan. 31, 1880.

Rev. Jos. Cook—Dear Sir:—The Chinese Government, in sending students here to be educated at its own expense, has taken a new departure from its traditional line of policy.

It virtually recognizes the fact that the isolation to which China was in a great measure involuntarily subjected by natural and geographical barriers, as well by the most cumbersome and difficult of languages, was incompatible with her well-being.

China realizes the fact that her position in the family of nations forced upon her by Western powers is not only novel, but one demanding ideas and resources to maintain it different from those employed in her whole historic experience.

She had met the full force of Occidental civilization. In this contact she was confronted with races whose central idea of the State is the full recognition of individual rights and obligations, and whose political destiny is individual development for the State for the people, and not the people for the State—races who derive their intelligence from scientific knowledge, and feed their religious cravings with supernatural truths.

These central ideas constitute Western civilization, and it is for the study of these truths that the students are sent.

The United States, out of all the Western nations were chosen for the education of these young men, because it was supposed that the doctrines of the inalienable rights of humanity, as enunciated by the United States Constitution, would naturally find in this country the highest development and illustration, as well as a universal application.

China was led to think so, but I am afraid she has good reason to think otherwise.

Let the American people who do not wish to go back on their political principles speak out their convictions.

I am very truly yours, Yuso Wing."

For "The Friend,"
The Meeting at Fitchburg Chapel and its Results.

Of this meeting, and of the people who were there visited, Thomas Camm thus continues his account, in his memorial of his father:

"And first, and more especially, [the Lord] called forth and made choice of his dear servant and faithful messenger to the nations, George Fox, and sent him into the north country, and particularly into Westmoreland, near Kendal; where there was a field white unto the harvest, a people ripe to be gathered, who as aforesaid, were separated in measure from the world's worship, and empty dry forms of religion in many things, and met together as aforesaid, having several that were become teachers amongst them, but the chiefest, John Audland and Francis Howgill, amongst whom the Lord sent his dear servant and messenger George Fox, with the message of life; at the publishing whereof in the demonstration of the Spirit and power of Jesus Christ, the aforesaid John Camm, my dear father, with John Audland, Francis Howgill, Edward Borough, Richard Ingherthorn, and many hundreds more were convinced, and their hearts opened, as was the heart of Lydia in former days, and by the revelation of the day of God, and the insinuing of his heavenly light in their hearts, they came to see, that they wanted the lively possession of what they had made a great profession of, which profession several of them had esteemed of, as great riches, of all which they came to [see] spoiled; their wisdom that stood in words only being confounded, they became as fools, and at the revelation of Jesus Christ, they consulted no more therewith; but it became as dross in comparison of the excellent knowledge of Jesus Christ, revealed by his Spirit, to regenerate them, and sprinkle their hearts and consciences from dead words, to which they were strangers, notwithstanding their great profession, under the sense of which great was the cry and the lamentation of many, unspeakable; for the day of the Lord was dreadful and terrible upon every high and exalted thing, and many lofty ones, and tall cedars (high in profession) were bowed down under the mighty hand of God's power, and judgment begun at the house of God, the heart his temple, and by the spirit of judgment and burning the eternal God entered, and began his blessed work, in order to redeem, purge and make clean vessels for his own use and service, through and by whom He might carry on his blessed design and work in the nations, to the glory of his eternal name.

"And John Camm, amongst many others, was bowed down under the mighty power of the Lord, and the operation of the blessed Spirit was effectually known in his heart and soul, whereby he was made willing to take up the cross, and become a fool for Christ's sake, forsaking the world, and all the glory, delights, pleasures, wisdoms and riches of it, of which he had enjoyed a share equal, if not above many of his degree; for naturally he was a wise man in worldly matters, having at that time great concerns and dealings therein; and the world seemed to smile upon him, and the riches and glory of it had exceedingly increased, and was then likely to increase more; yet notwithstanding all this, the Lord so prevailed by his power and Spirit in his heart, that he was made willing to part with all, and counted it a blessed exchange, to be made an heir in Christ of that durable riches laid up in heaven, that his soul had travelled for, so that it was no hard thing for him to forsake all for Christ's sake, and become a despised follower of Him through many tribulations.

"And after a day of great trouble and inward exercise, through the blessed operation of that spirit of judgment and burning, wherein he saw the old heavens and earth to pass away as a scroll, and all things to be made new, even as a prepared vessel; the Lord filled him with his power and Spirit, and put his word in his mouth, and called him from all his outward concerns and enjoyments, to publish the same word in the demonstration of his eternal power, unto which he of a ready mind was made obedient; and travelled into all the northern countries, to the borders of Scotland, and to London, to declare the message of the Lord to Oliver Cromwell, then called Protector, being accompanied by dear Francis Howgill, who were two of the first that published the message of Truth in that city, as in this our day gloriously revealed and made known."

John Audland was long a fellow-laborer in the Gospel with John Camm, and a very close unity and strong love subsisted between them. When his eyes were opened fully to see the inward and spiritual nature of true religion, his experience was the same as that above recorded of his friend; and like him, he was brought to sit as a humble learner at the feet of Jesus, waiting to hear the blessed words that He, the great Teacher of his people, revealed in his Spirit. Thomas Camm says of him, that when but a child he "was of a very ripe and quick wit of understanding and apprehension, though somewhat inclinable to youthful play, except which, never addicted to any vice; about the age of seventeen or eighteen years, the Lord inclined his heart to sobriety, and reading the Holy Scriptures, and to be very religious in what was then manifested; so that he chose the company and society of the best and most religious in the day, and having a large understanding, and great memory, he became able in the knowledge of the Scriptures; and could largely discourse of things relating to religion, and the duties thereof; insomuch, that amongst society then gathered, or separated from the common national way of worship, he became an eminent teacher, and highly esteemed amongst them; and not only so, but man times he would have gone to chapels, or to the parish steeple-house, where there was some idle sottish priests, and there would have preached, and abundance of people was taken and affected with him; and in great multitudes would have flocked after him."

"But in the fulness of God's appointment, as aforesaid, the Lord sent his messenger and servant, George Fox, and by the message of life by him preached, in the demonstration of the Spirit and power of the Lord Jesus Christ: this John Audland was reached the first time that ever he heard him; and he received George Fox into his house, being full satisfied that he was one that possessed, who he himself had but a notion and profession of, and then by the revelation of Jesus Christ, the light of God's eternal day he came to see the emptiness of his great profession, and his down notion, and that all his own righteousness was but as filthy rags; so that he sat down in silence and astonishment, like Job for many days; and great and weighty was the work of the Lord upon his spirit, being, as a man stript of all his earthly wisdom, and his profession being confounded and brought to naught, under the exercise of the hand of the Lord's power; he did mourn and weep bitterly, bidding adieu, adieu to all the world and all the empty professions therein; a great hunger and thirst the Lord having raised in his heart and soul, for a Saviour, one of a thousand that could give a ransom for his soul, and redeem him from the pit of corruption, for he saw all his great profession, and his wisdom and knowledge could not help him; but it was the Lord alone that his soul thirsted for, who heard his cries and mourning in a time acceptable, in a day of great compassion; and revealed his saving health and redeeming arm of eternal power, in a large measure, by which he raised him up fitting and filling him with all wisdom and strength, for the performance of that work and service that the Lord had predestinated him for, and to be concerned in, to the glory of his eternal name, in gathering home the outcasts of Israel, and the dispersed of Jacob who had been held under a strange king, in great and most grievous bondage; to which work the Lord in a short time called him appointing him to preach and publish redemption in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ to the poor, and deliverance to the captive exile the year of jubilee: and the day of vengeance upon the wicked; in which work he was found faithful, being filled with power and might from on high, and girded with the strength of the Almighty.

"And leaving all outward concerns and joymen, he faithfully travelled through any parts of the nation, and the dread, wisdom and majesty of the eternal God was with him; and the mighty and high exalted ones, bowed before the Lord and his power in all places wherever the Lord called him; and a hundred were convinced and turned to God through him, as a chosen vessel, and prepared instrument in the hand of the Lord hosts; glory, glory to God for ever saith ye soul."

The Duty of Giving.—One of our exchanges links that mistaken views exist on this subject, in some who suppose the rich are under obligations to give than those who have less means at their disposal. It says that they are bound to give more; but that the duty is equally imperative for others to give according to their means—and it quotes the Scripture rule, "Let every one lay by him in store God hath prospered him."

Progress of Ritualism in the Protestant Episcopal Church.—At the recent consecration of Bishop at Newark," says The Episcopal Recorder, "the ceremonies were elaborate and imposing. Lighted candles stood on the altar, a cross was borne aloft before the processions of choristers, priests and prelates, as it entered and left the sanctuary."

An English paper gives the following occurrence at a workhouse in that country:—"The wain, while administering the sacrament to an aged inmate, had spilled a portion of the consecrated wine upon her apron. He then asked the woman to give him the apron, stating that he could not allow it to be washed, and refused, as the apron was workhouse property, and he then cut out the piece and took it to the church, and said he would lock up in the box. This superstition set arose from the chaplain's belief in the Romish doctrine of the Real Presence of the blood of our Saviour in the wine, after its consecration."

Guild of St. Luke.—One of the latest Ritualist developments in England, has been the formation of what is called the Guild of St. Luke. The society, which seeks to band together medical men of pronounced Anglican tendencies, recently held high festival in St. Paul's Cathedral, and in various ways is trusting itself upon the notice of the profession and the public. The Lancet observes of its movement, it says, with unforgotten apprehension. Medical men, in common with the best of free citizens, have an unquestionable right to enter into any combination for the propagation of their views; but something is due, the medical journal thinks, to the instinctive taste and the sense of propriety which prevail in the profession, and which early point to the expediency of avoiding even the "appearance of evil." It would be ill if medical practitioners came to regard as influence their profession gives them in chambers of the dying and the family circles of their clientele as qualifications or opportunities to be laid at the foot of a sectarian altar.

Religious Periodical for Chinese Children.—The editor says, "The Child's Paper is the only thing of the kind published in the Mandarin dialect, and goes all over this great empire. A friend, who has distributed the paper in the heart of China, writes: 'I pity the poor boys of this land; their school-days are spent in real hard study of books that are neither interesting nor of much use, and all the other books they can get hold of, have, to say the least, an impure tone. I always feel a thrill of pleasure when I have the opportunity of giving them The Child's Paper. A few days since, I gave a copy to the son of a mandarin, a boy about fourteen years old, and he ran off delighted to his father. Just as I had finished my evening meal at the inn, this mandarin sent me a most polite note, begging me for ten copies; unfortunately I did not have them. On another occasion I gave a copy to a bright boy at one of the landing-places on my way up the river. Coming down about three weeks after, I landed at this place, and I found my little friend standing with his father at his door. He tried in many ways to attract my attention, and was delighted when I recognized him. We heard of good from these little books in quarters where we least expect it."

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Ocean Floor.—The whole ocean floor is mapped out for us. The report of the exploring expedition sent out from London in Her Majesty's ship Challenger has recently been published. Nearly four years were given to the examination of the currents and floors of the four great oceans of the world. The Atlantic, we are told, if drained, would be a vast plain, with a mountain ridge in the middle running parallel with the American coast. Another range crosses it from Newfoundland to Ireland, on the top of which lies a submarine cable. The ocean is thus divided into three great basins, no longer "unfathomable depths." The mountains are whitened for thousands of miles by a tiny creamy shell. The depths are red in color, heaped with volcanic matter. Through the black, motionless water of these abysses move gigantic abnormal creatures, which never rise to the upper currents.—The Presbyterian.

The Earth's Heat—Fearful Experience in a Nevada Silver Mine.—Recently, a Virginia City reporter accompanied Superintendent Gillette into the Savage mine to examine the great heat issuing from levels lately drained of hot water. While the party were waiting their turn to descend, a miner came up with nothing on but a pair of overalls, shoes and hat, his skin looking as though it had been parboiled. The Superintendent inquired: "How are things getting on below?" "Oh, very well, sir; heavy thing is all right, but hit is very 'ot there now," answered the man.

In a few minutes the party were rapidly descending the shaft, which was so full of hot steam as to produce at first a feeling of suffocation. The steam comes up in a blinding volume, which increases in temperature until the landing place, 1,300 feet from the surface, is reached. Here there is still much visible steam, although the atmosphere feels dryer and hotter than any yet encountered. A sense of horrible confinement, from which there seems to be no escape, and in which there must be a constant struggle to keep from falling exhausted, seizes the visitor, and is not dispelled until he enters the cooling-room, where the mouth of an air pipe coming from the surface strikes him as a grateful blast from the north pole. Without retreats of this kind the miners could not work at all. They are obliged to remain longer in the cooling rooms than at the picks and shovels, so debilitating is any exertion in such a temperature.

After attaining a comfortable condition in the cooling room, the party entered the incline giraffe to go to the 2,100 level, the part of the mine last drained. The iron sides of the giraffe were so hot that they could scarcely be touched without burning the flesh. The heat seemed to come fairly out of the rock on all sides, while a perceptible hot draft proceeded from the bottom of the incline. Each had a large piece of ice in his hand to use on his pulse, arms, neck, or to hold in proximity to his mouth whenever the hot air appeared to scorch the tongue. The water provided, the giraffe was rung down. It descended rapidly until within 15 feet of the 2,100 level. The heat increased with every foot until the station was reached. Here it was so intense that all felt themselves wobbling when they rose to get out of the giraffe.

An air pipe close to the landing place furnished temporary relief, while a bucket of ice water near by was sought with great eagerness. The way from the giraffe down to the 2,100 level was by a narrow ladder placed between the moving Cornish pump column on one side and a donkey pump on the other—a position from which, if one fell, he must be killed outright or horribly mangled. The ice which the party started with had by this time all melted away in their hands.

When the level was reached a stratum of increased heat was entered. The sensation was no longer that of general oppression, but of the danger of being absolutely burned; instead of the feeling extending through the whole body it was confined to the skin and the lungs, which seemed to be fairly scorching. When the level was entered the breath for an instant was taken away. A nearly naked miner, who saw the party going in, cried out, "Don't stay there a minute. It's too dangerous." His warning was unnecessary, for no sooner had all entered than one began to make his way out. The others at once followed, and lost no time in getting to the air-pipe and the ice water a few feet above in the incline.

"You think this is hot," said a miner who had come there for breath, "but you ought to have been here before the blow-pipe was put in."

The drift connecting with the Hale & Norcross on this level displays an interesting phenomenon about midway between the two mines. The drift connects with the lightning drift, running to the Combination shaft, at the Hale & Norcross incline. There is a strong current of cool air coming from the Combination shaft, which meets the hot air of the Savage at the point mentioned. The result is to convert the hot air into visible steam, which fills the drift for about 50 feet. The point of contact as it would be in the case of opposite colors joined together. The temperature is equally distinct. In a distance of twenty feet one passes out of an oppressively hot atmosphere to a comfortably cool one, or vice versa.

The exact temperature of the heated portions of the mines described has not been ascertained since the late increase of temperature, but the water is said to be about 150° Fahrenheit. The effect upon the visitor is to so thoroughly heat him that when he reaches the surface, where, before he descended, he was sweating in the heat of the day, he feels as though he had suddenly been transported to the regions of frost and snow. Cold shower after shower is scarcely sufficient to cool the body. It takes at least half an hour and the application of floods of cold water to reduce the temperature to a normal condition, after which, however, one feels more vigorous than before.—The National Highway.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 6, 1880.

The Apostle Paul speaks of that which came daily upon him—"The care of all the churches"—and to show how close to his heart was the spiritual welfare of their members, he adds—"Who is weak and I am not weak? Who is offended and I burn not?"

Is it not the experience of every true Christian, that a Godly concern for others often rests on the mind? Sometimes our hearts are stirred at the exhibition of unrestrained cruelty, or selfishness or dissipation by those who have refused to submit themselves to the government of Christ; and desires are raised that the Lord would break the yoke in which they are now bound to the service of Satan; and bring them into subjection to his own holy and peaceable Spirit.

Sometimes we discern symptoms of the decay of that freshness and fervency of love to the good cause, and of that humble, reverent and diligent waiting on the Lord for his help and guidance, which had been shown by some who had in measure yielded themselves up to the government of the Saviour. We see the danger they are in of gradually sliding away from the only sure foundation for everlasting happiness, and becoming possessed by a worldly spirit, which is ever inconsistent with true devotion and godliness. And we mourn over them, and fervent desires are raised that the Lord would revive his work in their hearts, arouse them to a sense of their danger, and again make them feel the necessity of keeping their ranks in his army, fighting against sin, self and iniquity in themselves and in the world.

Sometimes we are impressed with a sense of the snares that lie in the way of the young and inexperienced, and how easily they may be drawn into things which will be hurtful to them. We see, perhaps, the errors which we committed when similarly situated; and the remembrance of the sufferings which we endured in consequence of those errors stirs up the desire that others may be preserved from falling into the same pits, and that our bitter experience may be made a means of their safety. When such feelings are awakened in our hearts, may all give them due place, dwell under the exercise, be willing to feel one for another, wait on the Lord for ability to plead with Him for a blessing on the objects of our concern, and as He opens the way, faithfully labor with and for them. Is not this in accordance with the direction of the apostle who desired that "supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks be made for all men;" and who exhorted his beloved Timothy not to neglect the gift that was in him, but give himself wholly to spiritual things; and reminded him that he himself endured all things for the elect's sake.

We commence with the present issue, the gratuitous distribution of a number of copies of our Journal, "The Friend," to persons who are not now subscribers. We design to continue sending it to those of them who are willing to receive it, for a sufficient length of time to enable them to judge for themselves of the general character of its contents, and of its fidelity to the principles and testimonies of the Society of Friends. We hope many among these will be so well satisfied, that its influence will be for good to themselves and to others, that they will enroll themselves among our subscribers.

It would be some saving of labor to those connected with the publication of "The Friend," if communications relating to its business matters, such as forwarding money, renewals of subscriptions, changes of residence of subscribers, &c., were addressed to John S. Stokes, at No. 116 North Fourth St., Philadelphia.

Articles designed for insertion in its columns, criticisms, literary suggestions, and everything connected with its editorial management may be sent to Joseph Walton, No. 150 North Ninth St.

We have received a copy of the Practical American, a new Scientific Monthly, which treats especially of subjects connected with engineering and building. The number which came to our hands contained matter of interest.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The average temperature of 2nd month, at Philadelphia, was 39.1 degrees, which is nearly 4 degrees higher than the average for the past five years. The highest marking was 57 degrees, and the lowest 12. An average barometer 30.11 in. Prevailing direction of the wind north-west and west; maximum velocity 48 miles per hour. Total rainfall 24.3 inches. Snow or rain fell on ten days.

The Secretary of the Navy has ordered a survey of the U. S. ship Constitution, now at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, with a view to using her for the transportation of supplies for the sufferers in Ireland. The contributions to the relief fund continue to be forwarded from nearly all sections of our country.

The total value of imports of the United States for last year amounted to $513,745,748; for the preceding year to $492,000,000. The total values of domestic exports (mixed gold and currency values) were for 1879, $754,656,753; for 1878, $729,223,233.

The receipts of wheat in Chicago last year were 24,000,000 bushels—1,000,000 more than in any previous year.

The custom receipts on the 26th ult. reached nearly $1,250,000—a figure not often reached or exceeded since the war. The total receipts for the current fiscal year ending 6th month 30th, are estimated by the Treasury Department at $185,000,000, and the internal revenue receipts at $117,000,000, making an aggregate revenue with the receipts from miscellaneous sources of about $300,000,000. The total expenditures of the Government, including the sinking fund, and the interest on the public debt, are given at about $278,000,000.

The postal agency at Springfield, Mass., shipped 46,296,485,400 domestic postal cards during the last month. The international card does not have so great a demand as was expected, and but a small part of the country have ordered a supply.

The New York Republican State Convention met on the 25th ult., and the delegates chosen to the National Convention were instructed to support General Grant for President.

The Mayor of San Francisco has advised the working men to discontinue their meetings on the San Luis, as such a course is more likely to retard than advance the objects in view.

Five car loads of Chinamen from San Francisco, passed through St. Louis on the 29th ult., for New York and Philadelphia. It is said more are coming soon.

The recent severe storm in Idaho and Eastern Oregon, is reported to have caused the loss of at least 20,000 head of cattle and stock.

The capture of the mails in Cohoes, New York, the number of 4800, are on a strike for higher wages.

General Pope has ordered troops to the south line Kansas, to prevent a contemplated invasion of the Indian Territory by organized parties from Wichita at Wvandoote.

Representatives of the leading tribes in the Indian Territory appeared before the Senate Committee Indian Affairs, on the 27th ult., and protested against the bill for the establishment of a United States Cot in that territory.

The number of deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending on the 25th ult. was 294. Of this number 17 were adults, and 115 children; 53 being under one year of age.

Markets, &c.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 103; do. 57, 103 1/2 per cent; 4 per cent, 197, 106 1/2.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings are reported at 13 1/2 a 1 cts.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7 1/2 cts. in barrels, and refined 7 1/2 cts. for export, and 8 1/2 cts. per gallon for home use.

Floor.—The market inactive and weak. Minnes extra at 57 1/2; 57; Penna. extra, $50, 50 a $40, 50 cts. do. $45; Rye flour, 85 a 80.

Wheat is dull and lower.—Red, $1.46; soft amber, $1.48. Rye, 93 cts. Corn, yellow, 56 a 57 cts and white, 60 cts. per bushel. Oats, 46 a 48 cts.

Seeds.—Clover is dull at 6 1/2 a 7 1/2 cts. per pound timothy, $3.25 a $3.75; flaxseed, $1.85 per bushel.

Corn is better held than the former, and prices a fraction higher—25 1/2 head sold at the different yards 5 1/2 a 6 cts. for extra, and 3 a 5 1/2 cts. for common to good.

Sheep were unchanged—7500 head sold at 4 1/2 a 6 c per lb. and Lambs 5 1/2 a 7 cts. per lb. as to quality.

Hogs sold at 6 1/2 a 7 cts. per pound.

Cattle are in fair demand at $20 a $40 per head.

FOREIGN.—An inquiry into the disaster of the railway bridge over the Frith of Tay, is now proceeding at Dundee. Much sensation has been created by testimony of painters and other workmen, in reference to the material used, and want of care and skill building, but the evidence cannot be taken. Estimated till the railway inspectors are heard on the subject.

Calmness in Danger.

In the life of G. A. Selwyn, Bishop of New Zealand, is a description of an adventure in the life of the islands of the Pacific Ocean, which visited in 1851, which illustrates in a striking manner the importance of presence of mind in danger, and the effect of mingled calmness and mildness in restraining a savage people, bent on bloodshed. The account is contained in a letter written by the Bishop of Newcastle, who was one of the party.

"Morpeth, N. S. Wales, Sept. 23rd, 1851.

"The main danger to which we have been exposed has arisen from the character of the lives of the islands, and their deep-rooted sense of revenge for previous injury. They are very treacherous, or rather, I would say, when they have, from any cause, decided to attack and kill, they effect their object by pretending to and showing in their manner the greatest cordiality and goodwill, until the moment of attack. The captain of a sandal-wood trader, whom we met at the first island which we visited, told me that on visiting one of the islands to which we were going, some days ago, he had so numerous a crew that he thought himself quite secure, and that the natives would not dare to attack them. He therefore allowed as many as liked to come on the deck; many came and appeared in great good humor, most pleased and friendly; then in one moment, without the slightest warning, seventeen of his crew were laid dead on the ship's deck. Their revenge, or retaliation, is with them a principle or point of honor, and as they can draw no distinction between one white man and another, however different they may be in calling or even in country, when they have received any injury on a ship or boat, they will always retaliate. They can, upon the next white man who comes to their island, and it is of course quite impossible to know what ship or boat may have visited an island some few days or weeks before you visit it, or how they may have treated the natives.

"The greatest danger to which we were exposed arose from the evil design and attempt of the natives in Sandwich Harbor, at the Island of Mallico. Only one ship is known to have visited this harbor before the Fly man-of-war, and the natives did not know one word of English or of the language of the other islands. Numbers collected on the shore as we entered the harbor about noon, and as we wanted to replenish our water, we at once communicated with them—went in our boat close to the shore, and invited them to come on board, and to give us guides to the place where fresh water could be obtained, gave them some little presents, and dismissed them. The place shown by them as the best for obtaining water proved so inconvenient that the Bishop of New Zealand and myself rowed in the evening all along the shores of the harbor to find, if possible, a more convenient stream or pool. We found one more accessible and returned after an absence of two hours to the ship. Whenever we left the ship, we always gave directions to the chief mate to allow a few of the natives to come on board, at a time, if they came in their canoes, and I wished to see the ship, and seemed quiet and friendly. On our return, the mate told us that they had allowed one or two small parties to come on board, but that afterwards so many came and some looked so questionable, armed with their clubs and spears, that he had thought it prudent to refuse permission to them to come on deck. The Bishop of New Zealand still thought it important to procure some water, and we arranged that we should not both go in the boats, as we had usually done, but that he should go in the boats to the place we had selected as the best for obtaining water (which was retired, and near the settlement of a nice old man, with whom we had made friends the previous evening) while I remained in charge of the ship. At dawn the boats went with casks to fetch the water, and I was left in the ship with the mate and one sailor, and two or three of the native boys from the other islands. The natives had probably observed, the evening before, how many sailors were in the ship, and perhaps had been annoyed that they had not all been allowed to come on board!—when therefore they saw the boats go away with so many hands in them, they would know how few must be left in the ship and feel assured that if some ten or twelve of them could get on board, under pretence of merely seeing the ship, they could watch their opportunity, overpower the few in charge, take possession of the ship, and then have also the whole party in the boats at their mercy. Within an hour after the boats had left the ship, two or three canoes came off to the ship, filled with huge men, most of them were armed with their clubs, and bows, and spears. In the first canoe the chief man was such a ferocious looking ruffian, with a formidable club, that I at once determined he should not come on board. When, therefore, the canoe came close to the ship, and they asked by signs whether they might come on board, I refused to allow them, but made them understand by pointing to the sun, and tracing its course in the heavens, that they might come on board about noon, when it was over our heads. By this time I knew the boats would be returned:

and then if we only admitted a few on board at a time, making them leave their arms in their canoes, there would probably be no great risk. They seemed much disappointed, and to them, asked their names for different things and wrote down the words in a book. I then got them to tell me their names, and in order to carry on this amusement and pass the time, I pointed to an old man in the canoe and made signs that he might come and sit on the side of the bulwarks, and tell me the names of things which I wanted to know. The old man came and seated himself beside me, and as I wrote down the first word he gave me, I saw him looking most anxiously all over the ship; and as I wrote down the second word, I detected him making signs to the ferocious chief, with a look which seemed to say distinctly, 'It's all right, only one or two left in the ship: let us get quietly on deck and the ship is ours and the white men in our power.' I immediately sent the old man back to the canoe, and made them understand that no one could come on deck till the sun was over our heads. Five or six other canoes had by this time come off to the ship, and there must have been at least fifty of these huge men in them, many armed, and some five or six looking as if they could do anything. For more than two hours they kept close to the ship, asking again and again to come on deck, which I again and again refused. Every now and then, one more forward than the rest would take hold of the ship and plant his foot on a slight projection, so that one good spring would bring him on deck. No sooner had he planted his foot and looked up, than he saw me just over him, directing him very calmly but decidedly to get back into his canoe. All this time the native boys from the other islands, who were on board, were in the greatest terror. One came to me with a countenance of livid paleness and said, 'Those—very bad men,—they want to kill you and me,—they no come on ship, you no let them come.' Another, the biggest of the boys, a stout strong fellow, came to me with a countenance so ludicrous from the excess of terror depicted on it, that I could not help laughing. Well! after two hours, the men in the canoes consulted together, evidently came to the conclusion that it was no use to try any longer, and began to move off. My work was then done, and the chief mate came up to me and said, 'I am rejoiced, my lord, that those fellows are gone: we have been in great danger; if your calm firmness had not disconcerted them, and three or four had once got on the deck, the ship would not have been now in our possession.'

"Next came the most anxious hour that I have ever passed in my whole life. When the canoes had moved off a little way, they stopped, and every eye was directed towards the two boats of the ship, which were lying off the shore, where the water was being fetched from a pool about a quarter of a mile inland, on a rocky wooded bank. The men in the canoes consulted together, then changed their places, filling the two largest canoes with those who were evidently the greatest fighters, and these two canoes paddled towards the boats. While I was called upon to act and protect the ship, I was perfectly calm, and though I was conscious of the danger of my position, felt no fear. Now I was full of alarm. As the two canoes went slowly towards the boats, I could see other natives running along the shore in the same direction. With the telescope, I could see one man in each of the boats and about one hundred natives on the canoes should reach the boats and overpower the two men before the Bishop of New Zealand came down with his body of men from the water pool—in which case the natives would be in possession of the boats—deprive the bishop and his party of all means of reaching the ship, and destroy them at their leisure. The canoes near the boats. I called to the mate and asked, 'Can we render any assistance?' 'None, my lord.' I pointed to a third small boat still on the ship. 'That would sink if put into the water, and we have only one oar to it.' I paced the deck a few seconds, and then asked again, 'If anything should happen on shore, and the natives taste blood there, have we any means of self-defence in the ship?' The answer was 'None.' This information did not disconcert me: I felt it a duty to inquire whether anything could be done; and if anything could have been suggested, should at once have set about it. But the thought that something fatal might happen to me, led me to the following feeling of reckless disregard as to what might happen to myself. I therefore paced the deck and rendered the only aid I could render—that of fervent prayer to Almighty God, asking in our Saviour's name that He would guard and protect and restore to us in safety my dear friend and his companions. I saw soon the canoes reach the boats: I saw two of the natives in one of the boats: I heard a noise and a shout from shore—I could not trust my eyes, when I thought I saw the boats move from the shore, rowed by our own men—I gave the telescope to the mate and eagerly asked whether he could see the men in the boats and the bishop with them. He looked and answered 'Yes—they are all there—and his lordship steers the first boat.' You can imagine my thankfulness. . . ."

May we of the retiring generation be happily continued objects of Divine regard and compassion, and be endowed from season to season with fresh supplies of heavenly wisdom, that so we may walk in and before our families with propriety, and leave such vestiges in all parts of our conduct, as our successors may safely follow; and may our beloved offspring and their connections, having been favored to see a glimpse of the beauty which is in the Truth, dwell low in humble, watchful fear, that this eye may ever be kept open in them, that the vision may be more and more cleared and extended, and the goal of this world never be permitted to close or obscure with the dust of the earth, or dazzle and dim with worldly splendor: I am anxious for the coming forward of the youth of our day; something or other retards their growth; with many it is not any evil disposition, any criminal pursuit, but I fear there is a want of steady, solid, diligent waiting for the renewal of those baptisms which purge the soul and prepare it for further illuminations and discoveries of duty. There is a seeking and desiring after good, and a looking toward the servants and messengers, and expecting them; but if under a sense of our wants and weakness, our attention was more immediately turned to the Master himself, and our dependence more abstractedly fixed on Him, I believe there would be more of a growing in the root. —Richard Shackleton.

The Meeting at Firbank Chapel and its Results.

The testimony left of her former husband by John Audland's widow, Anne, (who herself labored and suffered imprisonment in the service of the Gospel) as to the effect upon him of the Divine Power attending this memorable meeting, is in unison with that of Thomas Camm, as quoted in the previous number. She says: "When the Lord's blessed and honorable day broke upon him, he was high in notion and profession, imagining that he had been filled with durable riches and wisdom; but in the light of this day he saw the emptiness of it all, while he wanted the substance, life in the eternal Word, and by the same to be sanctified throughout. Therefore under the sense of this great want, many and great were his sighs and groans, and his tears not a few; days and nights of sorrow many a one he underwent, the word and power of the Lord being as a fire revealed within him, to burn the great building, that he had been erecting and setting up of hay, wood and stubble, and in this sense I shall speak with him, and in great lamentation I have heard him often sorrowfully say: Ah! what have we been doing? what have we been laboring for? or what availeth our great profession? all our building tumbles down; our profession is high as the wind; the day of the Lord is upon it, and his word as a fire consumes it as dry stubble; and puts an end unto all empty professions, and high notions without life or substance, to all the wisdom of fallen man; we must forsake the world, and all its glories; it's all but vanity and vexation of spirit; 'tis a Saviour that I long for, 'tis Him that my soul pants after; Oh! that I may be comprehended into his life and overshadowed with his glory, sanctified throughout by his word, and raised up by his eternal power. To this effect did his soul often travail before the Lord; and the Lord who had called him for the purpose of his own glory, was not unmindful of him; but had regard to his blessed work begun, to prosper the same, that so out of the furnace of affliction a pure and clean vessel might be brought forth; and then the Lord plentifully poured upon him of his Holy Spirit, filling him with all wisdom and power to publish and proclaim his everlasting Gospel, and to bring glad tidings to the poor, the day of deliverance to the captivated souls, and to say unto Sion that her King reigns."

Thus fitted and prepared for service, and continuing to abide under that Power which alone enables any to promote the Lord's cause, it is no marvel that a blessing rested on the labors of these good men.

Thomas Camm states that shortly after his father's return from his first visit to London, he with John Audland, Francis Howgill, Edward Burrough, and Richard Hubberthorn,

(who had all been convinced at the Firbank Chapel Meeting) travelled southward; "John Camm and Edward Burrough through the middle of the nation, and others through other parts as the Lord directed them, and after some time they all met together, with several other brethren, at London, where the Lord had a great work; but after some time John Camm and John Audland were called toward Bristol, (after that time travelling together where, and in the countries adjacent, was done effectually opened unto them, and many hundreds were by the word and testimony of truth, by them published, convinced and turned to God."

Among those who were thus convinced was Charles Marshall, who himself was afterward called into the service, and sufferings of the ministry of the gospel. He has left an account of this visit, entitled, "A testimony of the glorious morning of the day of unexpressible visitation of the love of God, (in particular to the city of Bristol, and adjacent parts) and to the great and mighty power of the Lord, appearing in and with his two precious servants, John Camm and John Audland, who came to the city in the year 1654. In this, he describes John Camm as "A ancient man, full of zeal and fervency in the gospel, endowed with the precious gift of discerning and sound judgment, sharp and terrible to the evil, but sweet and friendly to the tender."

John Audland, he says, "was a young man, of a sweet ruddy and amiable countenance, and of a cheerful spirit; one of the wise in heart, filled with the excellent bright sparkling glorious power of the Lord God everlastingly; in which he appeared many times filled; that immortality shined in his face, as his voice was as thunder, therein dreadful in the strength of the Lord of hosts against the man of sin, and those in covenant therewith; terrible in the dread of God against the workers of iniquity; but lovingly tender to all sensible travellers, and poor in spirit. Alas! my soul hath a sensible remembrance, how the doctrine given him of Christ Jesus drooped as dew, and sweetly descended as the refreshing rain; he was a laborer indeed, night and day in the labor of the gospel; in which I extremely spent myself; and his fervent unexpressible travels in and about the city of Bristol, I am well satisfied, laid a foundation for the wasting his natural life; which was spent, and offered up for the Truth, and in the work of it; and indeed he, with the honorable John Camm, was instrumental, in the hand of the Almighty God, of our gatherings; and the spending their lives and strength, was most in their labors and travels among us, in the city and adjacent parts, of which was an eye and ear witness, being with them frequently. These two faithful ministers of Christ Jesus came to the city of Bristol, in the 5th month, 1654, and first they came among a seeking people, who kept one day in the week in fasting and praying, waiting for, and breathing in spirit after the morning visitation of God, and day of redemption; an amongst as they spoke the powerful word of life, in the dread of his name that lives forever; and we were seized on and smitten even to the heart; and that day, and the visitation of it overtook us, which we had longed and waited for, and from darkness to the marvelous light of the Lord we were turned."

The Senecas and the Valley of the Genesee.

Realm of the Senecas! no more
In shadow lies the 'Pleasant Vale';
Gone are the chiefs, who ruled of yore,
Like chaff before the rushing gale.
Their rivers run with narrowed bounds,
Cleared are their broad old hunting grounds;
And on their ancient battle-fields
The green sward to the plowman yields;
Like mocking echoes of the hill,
Their fame resounded and grew still;
And on green ridges and creek banks,
Their hearths will never smoke again.
Fled are their pomp and power like dreams,
By scribe unmarked by bard unsung;
No mountains, lakes and rolling streams
Recall their wild rich tongue,
And names of melody they bear,
Sweeter than flute-notes on the air."

Tribes of the solemn League! from ancient seats
Swept by the whites, like autumn leaves away,
Faint are your records of heroic feats,
And few the traces of your former sway;
Loved woodland hunts, deep shadow and gray,
No longer wade defiance to the roar
And rush of whirlwind; 'mid their cool retreats
The wilder beats their death no more,
And plowmen turn the glebe they darkly clothed of yore.

Where are your thrilling orators, who caught
The eloquence from nature, and allied
Wild words of fancy to the glow of thought,
And grace of gesture to ancestral pride,
Their sylvan voices on the wind have died,
And your last master* of the honeyed tone,
Commanding post and gesture dignified,
No longer war an eagle with the crown,
And near his couch of dust Niagara makes moan."
—Hosmer's Yonondio.

The most beautiful region of Western New York is undoubtedly the valley watered by the Genesee river, and early known as the Seneca Country. "This stream which leaps from rocky fastnesses to descend to green meadows, and flow beside her ruddy orchards of golden wheat fields, blessing and blessed, all typifies the history of the region in its antiquity through the rude barbarism of the savage era, the wildness of aboriginal man, and the hardy endurance of pioneer life, to be succeeded by the quiet thrift of peaceful agriculture, and the evidences of an advanced civilization."

Pleasant Valley, long ago the red-man named is broad deep basin, furrowed by the Genesee, where embowered in groves of stately maples and oaks, the river loiters for mile on file, drifting from side to side of the rich rolling landscape, whose broad expanse of meadows and meadows, dotted with farm-houses, spreads like a vast park over the alluvial plain.

Having passed several months at Avon Springs, the venerated Ganowags of the Indian medicine-man, we feel inclined to give our readers the impressions a residence in this beautiful valley has left upon us. Many scenes in this region are associated with memories of the tribes of Indians whose wrongs have been rehearsed in the pages of "The Friend," and the names of Red Jacket and Cornplanter will prove familiar to many readers. A concise sketch of the Indian occupation of the Seneca country, mainly derived from a history of Livingston county, by L. L. Doty, (876), may be in place.

For many ages this region formed the upper western door of the typical Long-house or derivation of the Five-nations, and was the favorite hunting ground of the Senecas, the most powerful and warlike of the tribes forming the great Iroquois League. Tradition says that they established themselves here at a time more remote than the Christian era, but it was not until they were visited by the Jesuit fathers, about 240 years ago, that any precise information was gained relative to their position in the league. These zealous and self-sacrificing, but erring advocates of the Roman Church, planted their missions near the Genesee river as early as 1636, but their efforts to convert the Senecas were without any permanent result.

"There is no page in our country's history more touching and romantic than that which records the labors and sufferings of the Jesuit missionaries. In the western wilds they were the pioneers of civilization and faith. The wild hunter or the adventurous traveller who penetrating the forests, came to new and strange tribes, often found that years before, the disciples of Loyola had preceded him in the wilderness. Traditions of the 'Black robes' still linger among the Indians. On moss-grown trees they point out the traces of their work, and in wonder decipher carved side by side on its trunk, the emblems of our salvation and the lilies of the Bourbons."

The historian of Livingston county states that among the Jesuit fathers who engaged in this work of civilization with zeal for the interests of the Roman Church, was Fenelon, afterwards the famous archbishop of Cambrai, a man of undoubted purity of life and true Christian devotion. He also says, as if speaking with authority, that the most prominent of the Iroquois missions was that of St. Michael's, to which Fenelon was attached, and which in the fall of his labors embraced the Seneca village situated at East Avon, near our place of summer sojourn.

The belief that we were in the midst of scenes so familiar to this most worthy Christian divine, whose memory we had ever venerated, rendered the story of the early missions doubly interesting. Having never before seen it stated that Fenelon had visited America, our doubts prompted us to consult the authorities, afterwards accessible, where we learned that though Fenelon had early proposed to become a missionary in Canada, by which term the French possessions in America were early known, he had, through the opposition of an uncle, relinquished the project and turned towards Asia and the East. Here was a difficulty, such as many others have found who have probed too deeply into history, to find that a good story has been built upon a very shallow foundation, or on an utter misconception of the truth, or upon the authority of some old chronicler, heedless of those nice distinctions which the lover of truth will ever regard as of the utmost importance. There is, however, a basis for the assumption that a Fenelon was a missionary to Canada, and we have been informed by Francis Parkman, author of "The Jesuits in North America in the 17th Century," that there was an Abbe François Salignac de Fenelon, an elder half brother of the Archbishop of Cambrai, and that this Salignac came to Canada in 1667, and like his younger brother, was not a Jesuit but a Sulpitian. He resided, in 1668, at a Sulpitian mission on the north side of Lake Ontario, and afterwards at Montreal. "I know no reason," says Parkman, "for believing that Fenelon was ever in Livingston county. The

This Salignac, who so closely resembled his younger brother in name, differed widely from him in character. The latter, unlike many of his fellow professors, gave his whole heart to his sacred calling. The archbishop bore the full name of François de Salignac de la Mothe Fenelon. The famous Fenelon, afterwards archbishop of Cambrai, it is thus shown, is not a Jesuit but a Sulpitian, and that he never was a missionary to Canada nor a resident in the Genesee valley.

The Fenelon of several names is well known to many readers. The author of "Telemachus," a popular reading book for students of the French language. Few of those who have been drilled in the book know what its publication, which was surreptitious, cost its pious author. "The book of Telemachus," says Madame de Staël, "was a courageous action." "To insist with such ardor on the duties of a sovereign, and to point with such truth a voluptuous reign, disgraced Fenelon at the Court of Louis XIV, but the virtuous author raised a statue to himself in all hearts."

Had the Jesuit fathers numbered among them many such as the pious Fenelon, how widely different would their history now read, from that which unfortunately confronts us. Instead of a catalogue of base intrigue and unprincipled devotion to the mandates of traffickers for power and place, we would have had the holy offices of love. Many are the dark pages of their history, over which the student pauses to question, "Can these men have been Christians, can they indeed have been human, who have trained the holy insignia of their profession in the blood of the saints, and who appear to have laid aside every attribute of gentle humanity?"

Some of these Jesuit fathers could perhaps sit for the portrait drawn by Hosmer, the Poet of Avon, in his "Yonondio, or the Warriors of the Genesee."

"De Lisle made use of subtle arts

And graft his creed on savage hearts,
And won by gift and guile the bribe
Esteem of many a forest tribe.

Like them, he painted face and lip,
And robbed his limbs in skin of beast,
And sate a joyous fellowship

With quivered warriors at the feast,
And gloating Europe link his name
Among his countrymen with shame—
Some even whispered that he fled

In terror from his native clime,
And bore a keen stiletto, red

From point to hilt with crime;
And many hinted that his soul

Was far too proud for priestly stole,
And that his broad and iron hand

Could better clutch the heavy brand,
Than grasp with meek uplifted eye,
The sacred rase or rosary?"

The most that can be said of instrumental music as an aid to devotion is, that it is alluring and enlivening to the affections, i. e., as long as they are excitable by outward means; but as it has full as great an effect on the passions, and is quite as much employed in enticing and betraying the unwary into folly and wretchedness, it seems most safe for beings travelling through the dangers and difficulties of a probationary state rather to avoid it on account of its abuse, than to indulge in it for the sake of its supposititious advantages.—Dilthey.

Memorandums, &c., in his own handwriting.

"While living at Tunesassa, I called to see an Indian woman in the village of Coldspring on the Allegheny Reservation, who was very sick of pulmonary disease. Her brother-in-law went into her room with me; he was a pretty well educated Indian, a member of the Methodist Society—a man that I esteemed and who stood high in the estimation of his own people—he interpreted for me. I inquired of her how she was; she replied I am a very poor creature, a poor creature indeed, I feel myself to be a great sinner; that there is a great debt of sin resting against me which I have no power to pay. While I was able I was in the practice of praying, but now my mind and body are both sinking together and I cannot pray and am in great trouble. Deep mental exercise and trouble were strongly pictured in her countenance. I felt much for her, and fearing she might be laboring under discouragement, by thinking that prayer that was not offered in a kneeling position was not as acceptable to her Divine Master, I said to her that I believed she could offer up prayer lying in her bed as she then was, that would be acceptable to the Great Spirit. She lived for some weeks after, and was favored to make a peaceful and happy close. A day or two before she died she said, she felt resigned to the will of the Great Spirit, either to die or live. The evening she was taken, she repeated the same and added, My own choice would be to die.

EBENEZER WORTH."

The following appear to be copies of interesting anecdotes, related to him, it is thought, by Asher Wright, a Presbyterian missionary residing among the Indians, and may be new to many readers of "The Friend."

"When the cholera was at its height on the Buffalo Creek Reservation, during the summer of 1834, I had been spending a day in administering to a great number of new cases of the disease, and just before midnight had retired with the hope of getting a little rest, when a loud rap at the door gave warning of another attack; springing out of bed and raising the window, I recognized the voice of a son of the old one-armed chief, Young King, wishing me to come with all haste, as his mother was extremely sick with the cholera; that mother had been one of our most faithful Christian women, and we were intensely anxious that her life should be preserved. For an hour or two the remedies used seemed to hold the disease in check, when she suddenly grew worse, and it now became evident that nothing could be done to save her. She had from the first cherished no hope of recovery, and submitted to medical treatment simply as a matter of Christian duty; but now she desired to be let alone, as none of us could have any further expectation of saving her life, and she wished to have a quiet and undisturbed opportunity for prayer before she died. Her attendants yielded sadly and sorrowfully to her request; when she prayed fervently for her husband, for her children, for the Church and for the people, and closed by asking the Lord to take her now to himself and permit her to go in peace, and to be satisfied with this, and not permit the pestilence to carry off any more victims from among the people. The scourge had been worse on that day in respect both to the number and the severity of the attacks than on any previous day since the outbreak of the disease; but it is not known that another death occurred from it after that prayer was uttered. In my room among the sick the next day, I found every case improving, and I am not aware that any Iroquois Indian has died from that disease in either of the subsequent epidemics of the Cholera."

"George Smith, had been a member of the Mission Church on the Buffalo Creek Reservation for about five years, maintaining a consistent Christian character. He died of a lingering disease, bearing his sufferings with Christian patience and fortitude, and giving earnest testimony to the preciousness and sustaining power of the Gospel. A day or two before his death, he was thought to be already dead by those who had the care of him, and was dressed for the grave. After lying in this apparently lifeless condition for an hour or two he revived, and began to relate the wonderful views of heavenly things with which he had been favored while in that seemingly unconscious state. I called at the house soon after he revived, and found him bearing earnest testimony to the truth and preciousness of Christianity, and exhorting all around him to embrace it. He soon directed his remarks to me, and urged me to make all possible effort for the people, and said among other things, 'I am a poor Indian and do not even know how old I am; but I know this, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, and that He will save all who come to Him. I know He will, for He saved me;—ten them of us, sent it to the Indians, tell it to the white man, tell it to the negroes, tell everybody—He will save all who believe in Him. He will not cast away any who come to Him. Persuade them to believe in Him, that they may live forever.'"

It is proposed to conclude the "Extracts" with a few selections from letters addressed to Ebenezer Worth, by valuable Friends, now deceased.

"Philadelphia, 9th mo. 15th, 1843.

My dear friend:—I have often thought of thee with feelings of affectionate and brotherly sympathy in thy lonely situation, far from the flock with whom thou hast been wont to mingle in spirit and take sweet counsel. But the everlasting Shepherd and Bishop of souls, Christ Jesus, is as near at Tunesassa as He is at Bradford or in Philadelphia; and when He, who is indeed our Light and our Life appears, in our seeking souls, we thirst not for any other streams. I doubt not, thou wilt have thy seasons of desertion and stripping, when the Chief Shepherd may seem entirely out of view; but keep a steadfast and single eye to Him, and He will assuredly appear again to thy comfort and rejoicing. I shall not be surprised if thou feels as though thou wert doing little or no good, and even be ready to call in question sometimes the propriety of thy present allotment. This is no new thing to them that are endeavoring to serve the Master, and it is good to bring us to try the ground of our movements, like proving them by the fleece, both wet and dry; but they are no cause of discouragement; they rather show that the spiritual life is preserved, and the soul not resting at ease upon the unfiled lees of its own works. Thou art not forgotten by thy friends who have unity with thy service in this allotment, and believe thou art in thy right place. Be not too much cast down then, when the enemy may try and buffet thee, for this is his way with the upright in heart; but as they keep their love and allegiance to their Holy Head He will bring them out of the furnace pure; gold. * * * In love, I am thy attached friend,

THOS. EVANS.
"Philada, 9th mo. 27, 1845.

Dear friend, Ebenezer Worth:— * * * In reading thy last letter directed to the committee, I was particularly struck with the impression that thou wast a devoted man, the poor Indian, and I have no doubt the preciation of thy labors among that people, has often afforded thee solid peace and comfort. I desire thy encouragement, my dear friend, every good word and work, and doubt not when the time comes for thy release, that thy retrospect of thy labors will be satisfactory. I feel much for thee in thy secluded situation and desire that the God of all peace may be pleased to sustain and carry thee through his praise and thy own, and friends' comfort which I have a comfortable assurance will be the case. Remember me to the Indians thy inquirer after me, and be assured that my love is to thee warm.

Thy friend,

JOS. ELKINTON."

"10th mo. 5, 1845

My dear friend, E. W.:— * * * I can in truth adore the language of the Apostle. I know that in me, that is in my flesh dwelleth no good thing; but by the grace of God, I am what I am.' But oh! how I feel my weakness, my leanness; I have nothing to glory in, but infirmities; and I believe I now more are brought to be sensible of our unworthiness, and that it is of the Lord mercy we are not consumed, the more compassion we shall feel for others, and the greater willingness to forgive injuries, and desire the restoration of the wanderer to the way of peace, &c., for I do believe his mercies are new every morning. Every renewed vision of his love is attended with the offer of forgiveness of the sins that are past, through the Lord Jesus Christ, and if at any time through unwatchfulness or unfaithfulness I have kept my rank in righteousness, oh, what a distress of mind I have been brought into, great desiring that I might be forgiven and favored with a renewed evidence in myself of Divine regard, and his judgments thus far upon me have been in mercy. * * *

I remain thine, &c.,

SAMUEL COPE."

"Fox Chase, 3d mo. 17, 1863

My dear friend E. Worth:—Thou art frequently the companion of my thoughts, but often with thee in spirit, in visiting the dwellings of the natives, when thy hands may readily be hang down with discouragement as thy knees to smite together through tears. If a word of sympathy will be acceptable, thee, then let me encourage thee to go on thy efforts for the help of this poor people, doubt not thou hast and will have thy reward even the answer of sweet peace, which is more worth than an increase of corn, wine, oil. That it may be so, is the desire of thy sincere friend,

An Application of the Peace Principle.—Prof. Mansum, in the Popular Science Monthly, presents us an interesting and suggestive picture of the calmness and fidelity to principle of a Chinese official under most trying circumstances. It seems strange to go to the disciples of Confucius for a striking illustration of Christian morals:

"The Chinese are eminently a peaceable people. In this respect they conform more perfectly to the theoretical standard of Christian morals than any Christian nations. Duels are unknown among them, and they consider it a disgrace to resort to force as proof of an inferior kind of civilization. They are conservative, and avoid all violent disturbance. Gov. Davis says: 'They have lived so much in peace that they have acquired by habit and education a more than common terror of political disorders; and again, 'Their common maxims, either be a dog in peace than a man in wrath.'" We used to hear many years ago of a quality called moral courage, and it stood for principles in defiance of brute force; but since our great war less has been heard of that very unchristian virtue. It will be refreshing to recall a conspicuous instance of it. On the 28th of December, 1857, a mile of gunboats, English and French, were drawn up in line before the city of Canton. They summoned the Viceroy to render, but he did not comply. The allies in opened fire, and kept up for many hours of bombardment. Nothing entitled to be held resistance was offered—there was no reply. Having battered down a sufficient number of dwellings, and got tired of their voracious sport, the allies stopped the cannoning. A squad was then sent to demand of the Viceroy, Yeh, the formal surrender of the city. "We shall surrender nothing," was the reply, 'because we are right and you are wrong.' 'Then we will take you a prisoner,' they have the power. 'Come with us, then.' At the Viceroy did not move. Thereupon they lifted up the chair in which he sat and tried him on board Lord Elgin's ship. As those who were the real victors in this case, may safely refer to the future verdict of civilization."

The Moustache.

For "The Friend."

There is no little thing that more completely un-friends the Friend in appearance, than the moustache; and hardly any little thing which more certainly marks the presence of vanity within; and in most cases it is a standing insult to both father and mother.

THE SOWER.

Selected.

"I had much seed to sow," said one; "I planned to fill broad furrows, and to watch it spring, and water it with care. But now the hand of Him to whom I sought great sheaves to bring, laid upon his laborer, and I wait, weak, helpless, at his palace gate.

"Now I have nothing, only day by day
Grace to sustain me till the day is done;
I'd some sweet passing glimpses by the way
Of Him, the altogether lovely one,
I'd some strange things to learn, unlearned before,
I'd make the suffering light, if it but teach me more."
—from the bush of that secluded room,
The earth floated winged seeds of thought and prayer,
I rose, reaching many a desert place to bloom,
And pleasant fruit an hundred-fold to bear,
I rose, waited heavenward with song and sigh,
I'd fall again with showers of blessings from on high.

COURAGE, FAINT HEART!

Selected.

"Dear Lord, I am so weary of it all,
I fain would rest me for a little space;
Is there no rock where the cool shadows fall,
That I may cast me down and hide my face?"

"I toil, I strive, sore burdened, and afraid;
The road is broken, and the way is long;
And the weak staff whereby my steps are stayed,
Bends, like a reed, when bitter winds are strong.

"I shrink in terror from the endless task;
I look with horror o'er the barren land;
And ask, as only hopeless hearts can ask,
The meaning of my days to understand."

Such was the meaning of my weary soul;
Ready to sink upon life's burdened way;
When a soft whisper to my spirit stole,
Earnest and sad, and thus it seemed to say:

"'Beary'?" And who is not
That bears life's burdens faithfully?—Press on
A little longer. When thy sun goes down,
Thou wilt have reached the spot
Where thou mayest rest!

"'Afraid'?" Afraid of what?
What dost earth hold that can at all compare
With God's countenance? Trust then to his care.
Make faith in him thy staff—
It will not bend.

"'Burdened'?" Thou sure must know,
Without the toil, and strife, and weary days,
Thou wouldst not long for rest. These are God's ways
To win thee from the world below,
Up to his rest.

"'Thou shrinks'?" O coward heart!
Thou'st but a day's work in a day to do;
The meaning of all days thou soon will know;
Thy task lies with each part,
To do it well.

"'Hopeless'?" When heaven remains?
I see, 'Thou art ever willing to be lost,
Thou dost know by and where thou goes, and dread
The trackless, barren plains,—
Thy weariness doth show.

"'Thy weakness, child of dust;
And how much help thou needs. The way
Is hid; but where thy steps might stray,
God's care guides. Then, trust,
And He will lead."

AT EVENING.

Selected.

When the birds have hushed their music,
And the day is almost o'er,
Sits a woman, singing softly,
Just within her cottage door;
Though her voice is low and trembling,
Very sweet to me the song.—
"And I hope, by his good pleasure,
Safely to arrive at home."

Old the words, and she who sings them,
Sitting still and peaceful there,
Long hath trod earth's changing pathway,
Long hath known its pain and care;
Yet the sweet voice shows no sadness,
Singing softly all alone,—
"And I hope, by his good pleasure,
Safely to arrive at home."

Only these few words she singeth,
And her voice is weak and low,
But I think no sweeter music
Can my spirit ever know;
For the peaceful hush bespeaketh
Victory o'er worldly sin,
And the dim eyes, looking upward,
Tell of God's pure love within.
Long hath been her life of labor,
Hard the burden she hath borne,
She indeed, through earth's temptation,
Christ's own righteousness hath worn;
Now at evening, singing softly,
Those sweet words she long hath known,—
"And I hope, by his good pleasure,
Safely to arrive at home."

So I love to watch her sitting,
With her brow so free from care,
And the sunlight shining golden
In her rings of snow-white hair;
Love to hear her sweet voice quiver
Softly in the dear old song,
As she hopes, 'by his good pleasure,
Safely to arrive at home."

Soon, I know, that she is going
Where they know not sin or care,
And the while I sit and watch her,
To my spirit comes the prayer;
"Father, when for me life closeth,
Let me make her song my own;
Help me, too, by thy good pleasure,
Safely to arrive at home."
—Millic Colcord.

ALONE WITH JESUS.

"Alone with Jesus?" fades the daylight slowly,
Soft o'er the earth the shades of evening fall,
As worn and weary with the day's temptation,
My spirit answers to the Saviour's call.

"Alone with Jesus?" from the day's hard conflict
That have I passed, that I his grace may win?
Only the burden of my sin and longing—
"Only the same heart cry, 'Forgive my sin.'"

"Alone with Jesus?" he hath seen each wandering,
Hath watched each failure, from his throne above;
And yet, to-night, He bids me come, confiding
In the great wealth of his unchanging love.

"Alone with Jesus?" oh the hush, the rapture!
My spirit yieldeth to his gracious will,—
What though the day's sad failure lies behind me?
I am content because He loves me still.

"Alone with Jesus?" in his presence holy Cometh no thought of sin or pain to me;
Close, close, his loving arms are thrown around me,
Almost the glory of his face I see.

"Alone with Jesus?" here can come no sorrow,
From sin and conflict here my soul is free,
As in my prayer, content, I dwell alone with thee,
Teach me through life to dwell alone with thee."

A Concern for the Young.

A correspondent residing in Ohio, desires to see in our columns one of William Dowsbury's epistles, which speaks of the religious care which parents and heads of families ought to exercise over their children and those under their control. He says: "It is a valuable epistle, and may be the means of stirring up some to more 'faithfulness in the discharge of their various duties, particularly parents and those who have the care of children, that they (the children) may be brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord,' and be prepared to take the places of those who have 'borne the burthen and heat of the day,' and who ere long will be 'gathered to their everlasting reward' in the world to come; that there may be a succession of standard bearers raised up, and rightly qualified, that shall 'stand for the law and for the testimonies' that were committed to our forefathers in the truth, George Fox and many more. They witnessed a revival of Primitive Christianity, and of the doctrines of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and his apostles, 'that have a great measure been lost in the long, dark night of apostacy, that overspread the nations,' wherein many were found 'worshipping the beast and his image,' and had received his 'mark in their right hand, or in their foreheads,' &c. 'Great is the mystery of iniquity as well as the mystery of godliness,' and oh! may none that have in any measure begun in the Spirit, ever expect to be made 'perfect by the flesh,' but follow on to know the Lord, follow the leadings and the guidings of the Holy Spirit of our blessed Saviour, as made manifest in the heart. He will give you to see all the wiles of the enemy, dear young people, and as you are concerned to obey the people, and as you are concerned to obey the voice of the dear Saviour, you will be enabled to escape all his wiles and temptations, whereby he lies in wait to deceive. The watch must be maintained; it is as needful now as ever it was, therefore let us watch and pray lest we enter into temptation. In this way we may know an overcoming, and they that know an overcoming shall be made "to partake of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God."—Rev. ii. 7.

On the Internal Use of Water for the Sick, and on Thirst.

The above is the title of a clinical lecture given at the Pennsylvania Hospital by Dr. J. Frisby Meigs, Senior Attending Physician to the Hospital. The lecture itself is a highly interesting and instructive one, from which we propose to make some extracts for "The Friend." There is, perhaps, no medical man in our city whose long and varied experience better qualifies him to speak authoritatively on the subject, than Dr. Meigs, while his conscientiousness in the practice of his profession is well known and recognized by his fellow practitioners.

The author says: "I learned early in my professional career, that it was rarely wise for the physician to refuse water to a thirsty patient. I soon learned also, that young children often suffer from the want of water from ignorance on the part of the mother or nurse, from inattention on the part of the physician, or from some other cause. On theoretic or practical grounds, of this simple and necessary element.

"There is a curious and active prejudice in the public mind against the free use of water, as a drink, under certain conditions; and this prejudice sometimes extends to the sick-room, without, perhaps, the knowledge of the physician. Many laboring people fear to use water freely when the body is heated by work. At the very moment when this is fast losing its fluids, during labor in hot weather, by sweating, and by rapid evaporation from the lungs and skin, the laborer is afraid to drink, lest he may chill, as he says, his stomach, or injure in some mysterious way, his desiccated body. The jockey refuses his panting horse, streaming with sweat, and exhausted by heat, the water absolutely necessary to maintain the due fluidity of the blood and tissues. This latter prejudice is giving way, I am happy to see, under the teaching of the modern veterinary surgeons, who have been instrumental in introducing the practice of watering the horses on our city railroad routes, once or twice on each route, in hot weather. Our public drinking fountains, now placed in various parts of the city, are another proof that a wiser practice in this matter is being developed."

"When I was a boy of twelve years of age, I was sent, with two of my brothers, into the country, to a farm in New Jersey, for the August holidays. We were alone, under the care of the farmer's wife. One of my brothers was seized with a fever, and the neighboring physician was sent for. He ordered some blue pills or calomel, and told us all that might interfere must have no water, lest it might interfere with the action of the remedy. That hot and fevered body, which was evaporating its water from the lungs and skin at a far more rapid rate than in health, must have no new supplies of fluid lest the pill might be incommoded in its action. The only safe guide as to the amount of drink the patient needed, the thirst, must be rudely set aside. We moved and called for water. We were afraid to give it. In two days our mother arrived from home. So soon as she heard the story of the illness, she began to administer draughts of cool water in such quantity as could be taken with ease and satisfaction. The doctor came, and hearing of her action, was in high dudgeon. "Doctor," she said quietly and politely, "my husband is a physician, and always allows, indeed, directs me, when my children are ill, to give them all the cool water they desire." He left the house in a passion. The next day the patient was removed home, where he recovered without any evil consequences whatever."

"A day or two since the writer, when visiting some friends in the country, was consulted concerning a valuable Albany cow, which was thought to be ill, and was then under the care of a veterinary surgeon, who had given positive orders that the animal should have no water for twenty-four hours, lest it might interfere with the action of the medicine he had given her. Such treatment was both unscientific and cruel. J. J. L.

"Some years since, in the month of August, I was sent for to see a little girl, eight months old, whose mother had just arrived in town from the country, where she was spending the summer with her family. The child had been attacked four days before, with diarrhoea. The diarrhoea was not severe, but was attended with vomiting. A physician was sent for, who ordered some medicine, and made some change in the food. The child was not fed. For two nights and days it had rejected by vomiting most of the food taken. It would drink milk and water with some avidity, and almost instantly reject it. During these two nights and days, the child had been restless and almost without sleep. There was constant crying, and great restlessness. The crying was incessant, not loud nor angry, nor with the acute sound of pain, but with a wailing note of misery and distress. I saw the child at ten o'clock in the morning. It did not look ill, but was lean-looking, and had slight feverish heat of the skin. The face was distressed, and the little low cry was continuous, and attended with a certain curious restlessness of the body and limbs. The point in the case was to determine the cause of the crying and uneasiness. Was it from pain, and, if so, where was the pain? The abdomen was soft, not tender to the touch. Could it be the early stage of hydrocephalus, as in this disease there is much pain from headache? I thought not from the character of the cry, from the entire absence of drowsiness, and the complete integrity of the intelligence and senses. Was it carache? There was no inflammation about the ear, and no tenderness on pressure or handling. Suddenly I thought of thirst. Have you given it water? No, the mother replied, I never thought of it, and the doctor said nothing about it. A teaspoonful of brandy was added to a glass of cool water, and offered to the child. It was seized at once and half the contents swallowed without a pause. The glass was withheld for a few moments, lest the quantity might cause vomiting. The child cried for more, and soon drank the remainder. I ordered four tablespoonfuls of milk and lime water to be given every two hours, and was from time to time. Later in the day, I found that the child had soon become quiet and slept. On the following day it was better, and on the third day was taken back to the country with directions to the mother to turn gradually to the usual diet. The medicine given was a chalk mixture. The recovery was rapid. When they returned town, in the autumn, the mother said to me: "How odd, was it not, that I had to come to the way to town to learn that my poor little baby was crying with thirst?"

This is by no means an isolated case, an experience peculiar to our author. No summer passes but, numerous cases are seen where that terribly fatal disease cholera infantum has its numbers increased by the deprivation of water from the poor little sufferers. Let it, then, always be borne in mind by the reader, that as in other diseases, so in cholera infantum, little children need, eminently need—water, pure, cold water; indeed many cases of this disease may be prevented by the habitual, free use of cold water while in others it may be greatly mitigated if not entirely cured by the free use of simple, natural remedy.

Dr. Meigs next gives, in detail, many interesting accounts illustrative of the many results which followed the deprivation of water to persons lost on the plains or sunk from shipwreck. These are impressive and instructive, but our limited space precludes our relating them more largely.

Among the most striking of these results of the deprivation of water, were delirium, vertigo, and great irritability of stomach, which when at last water was obtained it was immediately rejected; conditions, it will note, very similar to those which exist in cholera infantum. * * *

"Physiology shows that, in its healthy condition, the body is composed of about 80 cent. of water; that to preserve its profusion the blood must have its steady, pure supply of water, without which the tissue of the body cannot be repaired in the processes of life." * * *

"Another most important function of water in the economy, one too little considered by medical men, and not often referred to by works on the practice of medicine, is its office of regulating the temperature of the body, whether the normal temperature is influenced by work and the climate in which we live, or the abnormal temperature which we fever." * * *

This, in great measure, is not entirely accomplished by the evaporation from the skin and the lungs. Dr. Meigs next shows the amount of heat abstracted by water during this evaporation, and the force thus expended. "I find that the evaporation of ounces (the average amount evaporated from the skin and lungs of a healthy man in an hour) represents a force which, if converted into actual energy, would produce 1,336, foot-pounds of work. These figures are large that I should hesitate to place them before you, did they not so nearly correspond with those given by Ganot, to wit, that heat necessary to carry a pound of water from the freezing-point of Fahrenheit to full evaporation represents a mechanical work of 8450 mits."

"After determining the quantity of water quired by the healthy man, and the measure best abstracted from the body in the way of regulating its temperature by evaporation, it becomes proper to find a standard, and may, of the amount required in diseases, tended by abnormal elevation of the bodily temperature."

To accomplish this Dr. Meigs carefully noted the quantity of fluids consumed in twenty-four hours in four cases of febrile cases. In the first, during a period of forty-one days, the patient took a daily ration of liquid food, milk, beef-tea, brandy, &c. in all 55 ounces; losing, so far as could be ascertained, 25 ounces daily by evaporation from the lungs and skin. The patient recovered. In two other cases of typhoid fever patients took, on an average, 133 ounces of fluid, of which the quantity of water was 60 ounces, in one, and 60 ounces in the other, in the first two weeks, and 30 ounces a few days later. The water was not used upon them but was offered frequently; they had all their thirst demanded and they might take with pleasure and satisfaction. They both recovered.

A good sermon does not consist in a multitude of words, but in the savor of life and of grace which attends it. Words, though but in number, if fitly spoken under Divine authority, reach a place in the heart, and produce an effect there, which many words without the power, though crowned with eloquence, can never do. #### Natural History, Science, &c.

The First Paper Maker.—The date of the invention of paper-making is not definitely known. The common wasp, however, the inventor. The big wasp's nest, which was always kept at a safe distance, and often concealed down with a stone during the ramification of the nest, was composed of actual paper, the most delicate and elegant kind. As spiders were spinners of gossamer webs of intricate and exquisite pattern when primitive man was about dressed in the shaggy skins of beasts, and could neither spin nor weave the useful and fine cloth fabrics of to-day, so lit-wasps, when people of a later and somewhat advanced age had recourse to such rude and unsatisfactory substances as wood, stone, brass, the bark of trees, and the hides of animals, on which to preserve memoranda, were making a material of far greater excellence.

They made their paper, too, by very nearly the same process employed by man at the present time. Indeed, several of our best discoveries in regard to building, architecture, manufactures of various kinds, if they have not been derived from acute observation of the work of certain animals, including insects, have, when compared with their constructions and their manner of making them, been found to show a wonderfully close resemblance. The beaver gave men their cart and most serviceable knowledge concerning dam building, and to-day no workman surpasses this animal's skill and precision in the erection of such structures.

Architecture is a great teacher, and especially in the paper-making of the wasp illustrated. A valuable suggestive she may sometimes be, for, assuredly, the wasp was the first to show that it did not always require rags to manufacture paper, that vegetable fibres answered for this purpose and could be reduced to a pulp, and that to make the paper strong and tenacious, the fibres must be long.

The first thing the wasps do, when about to build a nest, is to collect, with preference for old and dry wood, fibres about one-tenth of an inch long, and finer than a hair, and put them into bundles, which they increase as they continue on their way. These fibres they bruise into a sort of lint, and cement with a sizing of glue, after which they knead the material into paste, like paper-mache, and roll up a ball; this they tangle with their feet into a felt as thin as tissue paper.

The ceiling of the wasp's chamber, to the thickness of nearly two inches, is often constructed by putting, one above another, fifteen or sixteen layers or sheets of this prepared paper, and between these layers spaces are left, so that it seems as if a number of little shells had been laid near one another. Next they build up a terrace composed of an immense number of the paper shells, until a light and elegant structure, like a honey-comb, has been constructed, and in the cells thus formed they rear their young.—The Paper World.

Lamp-Black.—A new mode of manufacturing lamp-black has been discovered at Marrysville, Pa., where a stream of natural gas was discovered while boring for oil about a year ago, and the flow instead of diminishing has increased to 60,000 cubic feet per hour. It is now to be burned in an immense building 200 feet long and 175 feet wide, in a great number of gas burners, having a capacity of six cubic feet each per hour, under cast-iron plates, on which the soot, "lamp-black" or "carbon black" is deposited. A small car with suitable pans and a scraper attached runs under these plates every ten minutes, gathering the lamp-black. The car runs back and forth propelled by steam, and at each end dumps the load into a receptacle provided for it. The 4000 burners produce 2000 pounds of carbon black daily, and 4000 more burners are yet to be added, making a total of two tons of this valuable substance every twenty-four hours.

Here on a large scale is seen a wonderful phenomenon, one that is scarcely believed by the ignorant masses. The diamond, it is well known, is pure carbon. This invisible gas, by burning out the hydrogen of the carburetted hydrogen in the gas burner, liberates carbon, a substance exactly similar in its impalpably fine state to the diamond.

By removing one invisible element from another invisible element, constituting an invisible compound—burning gas—one part becomes a black visible substance known as lamp-black, one of our best and most durable pigments.—Practical Farmer.

Some Special Household Dangers.—A recent writer in Chambers' Journal says:—"A member of Parliament suffered from a painful eruption of the feet, traced at last to some fashionable socks, which were laid aside, with the result of ending his complaint. Some California miners died from the effects of poisoning, produced by wearing boots lined with bright green flannel, the color in this case being 'Sebeche's Green,' a well-known arsenical compound. A tradesman suffered from wearing a bright maroon flannel shirt. Paper collars, glazed and stiffened with sized white-lead, and containing arsenic, have produced serious illness; and the same results have followed the wearing of hats lined with material containing arsenic, and from gloves and coat-sleeves similarly treated. Five or six persons in a household were rendered suddenly ill by the matter exhaled from, chintz window-curtains and bed-drapery and green Venetian blinds have been known in hot summer weather to give off particles of arsenic with deleterious effect. The green cloth lining of a perambulator has affected its young occupants, and the color from the green gas-burners in a composing-room of a printing-office has produced illness among the compositors. In the kitchen, arsenic has now and then been met with, when used to impart a green hue to dishes such as omelette, &c. In one case a gentleman was poisoned by partaking of a dish innocently enough colored by an arsenical preparation which had been mistaken by the cook for an extract of spinach. And even in the exercise of the perfumer's art, it behooves us to be on our guard against using preparations for the hair colored green by some compound of this substance. We thus find that arsenic is most widely diffused around us, from the facility, and, above all, from the cheapness, with which a beautiful pigment and a favorite hue can be produced through its aid. It is undoubtedly in the form of color in wall-papers that arsenic most frequently meets us. In paper staining, more than any compound of arsenic is used; and in the manufacture of the beautiful aniline dyes, so extensively used, arsenic is also largely employed. One notable feature of this substance, and one also which gives it a special power of affecting us to our detriment, is the remarkable ease with which it becomes volatile, so that by its escape in the form of gas or minute solid particles, and is thus brought into close contact with us in our homes. Green is a very pretty color on walls, but we would say beware of it."

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 13, 1880.

The British Friend, for the 2nd month, contains a communication from Jane P. Crisp of Lynn, England, commenting on certain articles which had appeared in its columns. The writer is evidently sincere in her attachment to the principles of our Society, and earnest in her advocacy of them; and it is encouraging to find such still preserved in various parts of the world.

In reference to the introduction of changes amongst us, such as reading or singing in our Meetings for Worship, which a previous writer says must be resisted in the spirit of power and of love, and of a sound mind, she adds: "I think this has been done for many years, as manifest departures from our first principles have appeared, by some of our faithful members, most of whom have been removed from the militant church. There has been warning and forewarning, so that this people are without excuse; for we sorrowfully see that the larger number would not hear, but despised all their words that bore upon the departures from our well-known principles."

"I send thee a bill advertising a series of public meetings to be conducted, it is said, by H. A. Newman, &c. Are not such meetings gross violations of our fundamental principles? He alone who is the Head over all in his Church, can rightly conduct our public or more private meetings, and anoint his servants either to be silent as a public testimony, or qualify them for speaking the word aright."

Respecting reading the Scriptures in our Meetings for Worship, she remarks: "God, the Unchangeable and Holy One, never contradicts Himself or his own teaching. He raised us up a people, and taught us to wait upon Him in our assemblies set apart for worship, that we might receive His word inwardly revealed, to hear His instructions suited to our several conditions; to feel His presence conversing with our souls, to be comforted and fed by Him. In no instance, I believe, was the Bible read in our meetings during about 200 hundred years, because the Lord Himself taught us, a people, that His Spirit that gave forth the Scriptures was above the letter, and He only could feed us by the true Bread of Life which came down from Heaven, which the Scriptures do indeed testify of, but cannot dispense unto us. This is true Quakerism, and any member attempting to read in our Meetings for Worship, I should consider false to his profession, whatever his claim of being inspired might be."

With the general tenor of these remarks, and with the effort to maintain our testimony to the spiritual character of Divine Worship, we fully accord. Their force would not be impaired, even if several isolated instances of reading the Scriptures in our meetings could be produced, where it had been called for by peculiar circumstances, as in the case which Samuel Bowmas relates, when he attended a convent at Shephonia. A Reverend preacher was present who had charged the Quakers with being heathens and denying the Scriptures. Samuel Bowmas knew not of this, but he felt constrained to take a Bible out of his pocket and refer to it for proof of the doctrines he preached; and also to press upon his hearers the careful reading of the Scriptures, and to seek from the Lord for assistance and power, that they might practise what they read. We do not admit the force of the process of reasoning which would, in such exceptional cases, find a sanction for a radical change in our manner of holding religious meetings. The proper view to take of this, and of many other occurrences out of the ordinary course which might be collected from the records of our Society, and from the biographies of its members, is that expressed in a private letter recently received from a valued Friend in England, as follows:

In the early days of our Society, as well as at many times since, many abnormal things have occurred under unusual religious impressions, but there has generally been enough of that solidity of judgment and calmness of spirit in those more prominently engaged at such times, as has kept them in check. Now, the tendency is to foster these impulsive demonstrations, in the exuberant zeal for immediate 'conversions.'"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Over 2500 hands are now employed in the Baldwin Locomotive Works, which are running to their fullest capacity; some of the department working day and night.

The Citizens' Irish Famine Relief Fund of this city, now amounts to $26,920.75. At a meeting of delegates of various Irish Societies of Brooklyn, N. Y., it was decided to send to the suffering poor of Ireland, the money usually appropriated for parades on St. Patrick's day.

The machine-shop of the Danforth Locomotive Works at Paterson, N. J., was destroyed by fire on the morning of the 1st inst. Five locomotives in course of erection, and valuable machinery were burned. About 300 of the 800 employes will be temporarily thrown out of employment. Several other large fires, in different parts, occurred the same night, with losses ranging from $50,000 to $150,000.

The President has signed the bill providing for the free entry of foreign goods for the relief of coffee emigrants; also the bill for the purchase of a post-office site in Baltimore.

There is now $45,000,000 worth of gold bullion in the Treasury, Assay Office, for transportation to the Philadelphia Mint for coinage.

On the 1st inst., the net gold balance in the U. S. Treasury—$45,000,000—the first which had decreased since $200,000,000—and the net balance of standard silver dollars had increased about the same amount—the stock of silver dollars increases steadily.

The total receipts of lumber in Canada during 1879, were 1,467,720,000 feet, only a very small quantity being from Canada. The figures show an increase of 1 per cent. compared with the receipts of the previous year.

The snow blockade along the Manitoba boundary continues, and the traffic south has been suspended.

A bill has passed the Kentucky House of Representatives, forbidding railroad companies passing through the State to charge as high a rate for way freights as for through freights, under a penalty of from $25 to $100 fine.

The imports of foreign dry goods for New York for last month, exceeded those of a year ago, by more than $3,900,000. The increase is said to be largely in cotton and silks.

Count de Lesseps, the French engineer, had an interview with the President on the 6th. He explained the features of his canal project, and said, it was not contemplated that it should be under foreign control, or under any circumstances interfere with the interests of the United States. He had not looked at the work with the eyes of an engineer. He wanted most of the stock taken in this country, which would be a guarantee that it would not be controlled by foreign influence.

Three men were killed, and one severely injured, by an explosion in shaft No. 2, at Nanticoke, Pa., on the 5th inst.

The anthracite coal trade is said to improve steadily. The demand for coal is on the increase, and prices steadily advance.

The number of deaths in Philadelphia for the week ending at noon of the 6th inst., was 337, an increase of 41 over the previous week. Of this number, 63 died of consumption; convulsions 20; diphtheria 13; disease of the heart 7; inflammation of the lungs 17; old age 13—there were two deaths from small pox. The whole number of deaths during the winter just past has been 3996; for the winter of 1878-9, the number was 4002.

Markets, &c.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 106 3/8, 103 1/2, 101 1/2, 101 1/2; 4 per cents, registered, 106; do. coupon, 107. Cotton.—Sales of middlings are reported at 131, a 131 cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Wool.—Woolen trade, 7 1/2 cts. in barrels, and refined, 87 cts. for export, and 8 cts. for home use.

Flour.—Sales of 1200 barrels, including Minnesota extra at $6.25 a $6.87 1/2; Penna. extra family, $6.37 1/2 a 6.87 1/2; western do. do., $6.75 a $7.12 1/2; patent and other high grades at $7.25 a $8.25. Rice flour is steady at $5.

Grain.—Wheat is dull, and a 1 1/2 cts. lower.—Penna. and southern red and amber, 51, 43 a 51.44. Rye, 91 a 93 cts. Corn, mixed at 55 cts.; yellow, 56 cts, and white at 60 cts. Oats, white, 45 a 47 cts.

Beef cattle were in fair demand at about former prices; heavy arrivals during the week, and sold from 3 to 6 cts. per pound, as to condition.

Sheep were in good demand, and a fraction higher—7000 head sold at different yards at 4 1/4 a 62 cts, and Lambs 5 1/4 a 7 cts. per lb. as to condition.

Hogs sold at 61 1/4 cts. per pound, as to quality. Cows, 220 a 8 1/2 per head.

FOREIGN.—The receipts of the Mansion House Relief Committee now amount to £102,860; and the total sum expended to date £54,201. The Duchess of Marlborough, writing to the Lord Mayor of London, says the distress in Ireland is not yet diminishing, continues to increase, and in some parts, and in some districts.

The number of deaths in London for the week ending 2nd month 7th, was 3376, or 1657 more than the average. This increase is attributed to the poisonous character of London fog. The increase was in great measure in deaths from diseases of the respiratory organs, which rose to 1557, or nearly four times the average.

The Court of Inquiry into the collision of the Guinean steamer Arizona, with an iceberg on 11th mo. 1 has found that the lookout on the steamer was inactive, and has suspended her certificate of the captain for the space of six months.

There are now published in the United Kingdom 1825 newspapers; much the larger part of which is distributed in England. The magazines now in circulation, including the quarterly reviews, amount to 1033, of which 270 are of a decidedly religious character. In the years 1871-73, the British cruisers carried 152 slave vessels, of which 115 were condemned, 37 restored to their owners. The number of slaves captured was 2185.

A new anti-slave-trade convention has been concluded between Great Britain and Germany, whereby coin between the war vessels of the two Powers in suppression of the slave trade is assured.

The British consul at Salonica has received a letter from Colonel Syngé, saying that he and his wife were treated. The chief of the brigands has then interrupted, and negotiations for their release are then interrupted.

The festivities on the occasion of the recent anniversary of the Czar, passed over without any of the threatened disturbances. The man who recently attempted the assassination of General Melkoff, has been confined in a prison, and will probably be shot.

Distressing accounts continue to be received at Constantinople of the suffering in Armenia. A num persons have already died of starvation. Those are endeavoring to emigrate to neighboring ports but the roads are covered deep with snow, and have perished on the journey.

The Turkish Embassy in Asiatic Turkey, situated at the supposed site of the Scriptural city, "Ur of the Chaldees," has been nearly destroyed by fire.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE CONTRIBUTORS TO THE ASYLUM.

A Stated Annual Meeting of the "Contributors to the Asylum for the Relief of Persons Deprived of their Reason," will be held on Fourth-day, the 20th month, 1880, at 5 o'clock, p. m., at Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia.

WILLIAM BETTLE, C.

WEST-TOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

Friends who may feel drawn to apply for the positions of Superintendent and Matron of this Institute are requested to communicate with either of the undersigned—

- William P. Townsend, West Chester, Pa.
- John S. Comfort, Fallington, Bucks Co., Pa.
- Charles J. Allen, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia
- Elizabeth R. Evans, 222 Union St., Philadelphia

Deborah Rhoads, Haddonfield, N. J.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE. Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward), Philadelphia. A Christian and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL. Applications for the Admission of Patients are made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

MARRIED. at West Chester Meeting, on the 2nd month, 1880, GILBERT COPE to ANNA GAUGHAN of West Chester, Pa.

DIED, at West Falmouth, 8th mo. 21st, 1879, IS. SWIFT, an highly esteemed member and minister of Sandwich Monthly Meeting, Mass., aged 86. Although he did not feel it required of him to minister from home, yet as he increased in years, interest for the spiritual welfare of all also increased; it may well be said he was a peacemaker in the neighborhood and in the church, being deeply concerned in the promotion of love and harmony among all whom he mingled. On being visited by a near relative from before his decease he requested his bed placed near his bed, and then stated he believed time here was near its close, and that he should never be at rest. And wished to express his firm reliance on the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, who had redeemed him by his own precious blood.

Memoir of Hannah Marsh.

BY HER DAUGHTER, PRISCILLA PITT.

She was the daughter of Samuel and Annas, Corn-dealers in Warwick St., London; her father died in the prime of life; the latter the age of 75. My mother often told me how deeply she honored her parents, and how would have grieved her to cause them pain; where her father used to collect his children, I make them sit quietly on the sofa, when I used for meeting, before it was time to start; where they sent her to Ackworth School for 6 years, at the age of eight, with an older brother and sister; and it seemed to her that vast number of children collected there, as marbles shaken together in a bag, good, bad and indifferent, and how she endeavored to choose out one or two good girls for her particular companions. She gained the love of her teachers there, as well as at a girls' school at Tottenham, afterwards.

It was her pleasure to obey her parents when young, and to her latest days she remembered a dutiful remembrance of them. When her father in his office, she got up on his stool and wrote impromptu these lines—

Teach me Thy will alone to seek,

And strength it to perform

That wilt in judgment guide the meek,

And shield him from the storm;

'Tis Thine the fainting heart to cheer,

The drooping soul to raise—

From sorrow's eye to wipe the tear,

And time the soul to praise.

She was favored to feel earnest aspirations and understand fully what that Grace is which is so frequently heard spoken of.

One of her aunts marrying out of the Society, she used to visit her. Her husband was quite a fashionable man, and their daughter played on the piano; so that Hannah engaged herself in sitting to her uncle and cousin; after a time had to take up the cross and speak the plain language to all. Her uncle was angry at first, and said: "What has come of Hannah?" One day she was chatting with my young friends upon the impropriety of using thou for thou in the nominative, and they all agreed to speak it properly, but soon Hannah felt it very awkward, and she was when she must wait for a higher motive, and that it was grammatical, to have strength carry it out—which in due time she did.

In 1816 she was sent to accompany her eldest sister, who was unwell, for the benefit of the Bath and Cheltenham waters. It was in Bath Meeting she first spoke in the ministry. One day at Cheltenham she went as usual to the mid-week meeting, and sat down, but no one else came. She queried with herself, should she go back? when she felt this answer, "Whom do we come to meet? God. Then why should I go back?" And she not only sat the usual length of time, but so enjoyed it, she sat longer. Afterwards she called on one or two of the Friends and admonished them. This same beloved sister afterwards met with a very serious accident, and Hannah nursed her with great assiduity, and after that their aunt had a long and very serious illness, and Hannah nursed her for many weeks with unremitting fidelity, being peculiarly gifted for that office; but it laid the foundation, as she believed, of delicacy in her own constitution for the greatest part of her future years, being an undue strain on so young a person.

She had heard talk of the danger of thunder and lightning, and had imbibed such a dread that it was real suffering to her. One night after she was in bed, there was a great storm, and she removed her watch with its steel chain from under the pillow, and placed it on the drawers, and laid down again, when it was impressed upon her mind that by so doing she had taken her life into her own hands, and she had no peace till she had tremblingly replaced it under the pillow; and for that act of faith she was rewarded, for from that time the fear of storms was entirely taken away. When she became a mother, she would never allow her children to be intimidated needlessly, that they might be spared the suffering she had had. She was one day working at embroidery, and Thomas Shillito being there, remarked, "What! Hannah, making holes to sow them up again." She took the reproof, and did no more.

In 1819, 4th mo. 13th, at the age of twenty-eight years and eight months, she was united in marriage to John Finch Marsh, with whom she had played when a child. Leaving Tottenham for a business house in Whitechapel, London, the parlor behind the shop having only a skylight window, she would often rise at five in the morning, and opening an upper window in the house, enjoy the sweet air of the morning before it was spoiled by smoky chimneys. My father had a little before taken the drapery business of John and Isabel Kitching, valuable Friends, who moved away to Stamford Hill, but came in on First days to attend their old meeting at Devonshire House, and regularly dined at Whitechapel; and from Isabel she learned many instructive lessons,—one was to be particular to be as neat in her dress after marriage as before; and another was, never to reprove one servant in the presence of another. These things my mother always observed; also when a servant gave her cause of vexation, she would not speak to her in a heat, but wait till she felt she could speak coolly and profitably.

Her first child was a remarkably sweet little girl, Rachel. This darling was called away after about two weeks' illness, during my father's deep, protracted, unrelaxing, and mother thought that the child was beyond the reach of suffering. She used to say, "You should never let children see you ruffled, nor yet say before them, 'I can't get them to do it,' nor speak loud and harshly to them, nor yet ask children at meals what they will have; give them what you think proper for them, and not pamper their appetites, nor make a talk about their dress, not allowing a nursemaid to tell them this or that is pretty, to make them vain—dear pretty little innocent children require no setting off."

After Rachel's death, Hannah was born, then Lucy, who died at the age of five months. Then Priscilla was born, being six years younger than Hannah. These two only grew up. Hannah died in 1859, in her 37th year. When mother entered her sick room, a feeling over-spread her mind concerning her beloved daughter, "She does not belong to me;" which was a preparation for the solemn event.

My mother's care and solicitude for her child—never flagged. She used to say, "Any one can clean the house, but it's of the greatest importance to have suitable persons to look after the children. The children should be the first consideration." This concern was evinced by her letters to me while at school, and that school was selected as one where I should be under the most guarded care. My ignorance sometimes asked permission to read them to my schoolfellows, because of the valuable advice they contained.

Our parents were careful to guard us from intimate association with those not of similar persuasion, that we might be spared the suffering it had cost her to lay down what she had improperly taken up with. She kept up a constant jealousy in her mind against things that might tend to her children's injury, being willing to risk the loss of our affection, but it returned upon her four-fold. She used to say, "Having the care of children is calculated to make us watchful over our own spirits and conduct, that we may not say or do things improper for them to copy." She used to say to us, "It would be well to try and behave, when no strangers are present, as nicely as if such and such Friends were here, and not do things we should be ashamed for our best friends to see."

Her frequent poor health and sharp severe attacks of headache, were patiently borne, under the belief it was for her good, and feeling it did help her to "sit loose" from transitory things. An aged friend in Croaydon, who lived in apartments, on whom mother occasionally called, used to ask her questions on the news of the day. Mother had to tell her she did not enter into those matters, and that it was commonly said of her when young, "It's no use to ask Hannah anything about such matters," (politics, &c.) This friend, when near her end, was anxious lest she was not prepared, and glad to see mother, who endeavored to administer to her spiritual condition.

The Senecas and the Valley of the Genesee.

Though the origin of the word Seneca or Seneka is still in controversy, we doubt not that the Seneca nation was so named by the trik Woh-wah-wah of New Amsterdam. New York, which was early written by the Jesuits, Chenussio, and which by an easy corruption into the harsher language of the Hollanders became Seneca. By themselves the nation was known as Nundo-wah-oo-no, or the people of the great hill, from a tradition that they sprang from an early tribe settled on a hill near the head of Canandaigua lake. They were first known to the whites as part of the Five-nations, and have a history earlier than the League of the Iroquois, and were probably derived from the ancient Hurons, from the region north of the great lakes.

The Iroquois or people of the Long-house, embraced the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagos, Cayugas and Senecas, and their league was formed as early as about 1450. The Tuscaroras were afterwards admitted, when they became known as the Six-nations. Their territories extended from the Hudson to the Genesee. Legend says that this League was advised by Hiawatha, in order more effectively to accomplish. His great mission having been accomplished, Hiawatha is said to have gone down to the water, seated himself in his mystic canoe, and to the cadence of music from an unseen source, to have been wafted to the skies. Thus it is that in the absence of written records, the imagination of untaught man surrounds the avatar of a benefactor of the race, with the marvels of the spiritual world, while authentic history would have preserved but a hard kernel of practical truth. Longfellow lays the scene of his beautiful Indian Edda, the song of Hiawatha, among the Ojibwas, on the southern shore of Lake Superior. In this poem he has preserved the traditions lingering among the N. American Indians respecting this "Child of Wonder."

The other Iroquois, it is said, came from beyond the St. Lawrence, near Montreal, where having arisen against their masters, the Adirondacks, and failing to obtain independence, they were forced to quit their homes and finally found their way into the region, now Central and Western New York. This League has many points of resemblance to that of our Federal Government, guaranteeing the independence of each tribe, while recognizing the due powers of the Confederation, and the personal liberty of the individual. The aboriginal Congress consisted of fifty sachems, whose authority was derived from the good opinion in which they were held for courage, wisdom and integrity, and found their only reward in the veneration of their people. Subordinate to these was an order of chiefs famous for courage and eloquence, among whom were Red Jacket and Cornplanter, and whose reasoning moved the councils, or whose burning words hurried the braves to the warpath.

No trait of the Iroquois is more to be commended than the regard they paid to woman. The sex was often represented in the Council by orators, known as Squaw's Men, and Red Jacket himself won reputation in that capacity. The Indian women could thus oppose a war, or aid in bringing about a peace. In a war, or aid in bringing about a special right the sale of land they claimed a special right to interfere, for they argued that "land belongs to the warriors who defend and the women who till it," an argument that could not be justly urged by the most strenuous defenders of "woman's rights" in any community of civilized men. Though deeper drawn motives long since led to legalized regard for the wishes of those who are most deeply interested in the alienation of land. Our framers of constitutions might draw a lesson from the Iroquois in their respect to the wishes of women in questions of war and peace, and though she has undoubtedly been the inspiring cause or motive for many bloody and long continued contests, she has not in any community degraded itself civilized, been permitted to sit in Council and give a vote upon a question of such vital interest to herself and her children.

This high regard for woman was not peculiar to the Iroquois. Their hereditary enemies, the Kah-kwas, who ruled west of the Genesee to the Lakes for ages, were at one time governed by a female chief, named Ya-go-we-na, in whose keeping was the symbolic house of peace. She received chiefs of the tribes, formed treaties, and made alliances, and the fiercest strife was hushed in her presence. Tradition concedes to her much wisdom, and that she long enjoyed peculiar influence which, in a moment of passion she forfeited. Two Senecas, while smoking the pipe of peace in her castle, were, in flagrant contempt of omens, permitted to be murdered for an alleged outrage upon one of her subjects. This rash act was followed by instant orders to her warriors to cross the Genesee, and destroy the Seneca villages, if possible, before the new-made enemy could become aware of her perfidy. While these measures were hastening, a woman of the Kah-kwas, friendly to the Senecas, secretly made her way to Canandaigua, the residence of the war chief, who immediately assembled a large band of braves, who lay in ambush for their enemies, and destroyed or drove them from the field. The Onondagas had also been aroused, and with a band of five thousand warriors besieged the queen in her fastness, near Lewistown, who soon sued for peace. The above events, legend says, occurred three hundred and fifty years before the advent of Columbus, or about the time of the Crusades.

The arrival of a strong race from beyond the great waters, who should drive the Indians from their hunting-grounds, is said to have been divined by one of their prophets, and the arrival of Columbus to have been heralded by the fleetest of foot along the myriad pathways of the continent. All these traditions are at best of uncertain authority, since unlettered man is prone to mingle his knowledge of the present with memories of the past.

In numbers the Senecas exceeded any other nation composing the League. In 1650, the period of their greatest prosperity, they are said to have numbered ten thousand. Recent enumerations place those remaining in New York at about thirty-five hundred, of whom nearly one-half reside upon the Cattaraugus reservation—many have been removed West of the Mississippi. In 1865 they reported over 1100 children between the ages of 21 and 21 years. They receive annually about $14,700 from the General Government, an $5000 from the State of New York; also share in the common school moneys, 600 their children being regular attendants school. Their reservation comprises 215 acres of land, mostly under improvement situated on both sides of Cattaraugus creek in the county of that name, and in Erie & Chautauqua counties, New York. Many their farms are well cultivated. The Iroquois Agricultural Society was formed by the younger Indians, in 1860, and its exhibitions compare favorably with those of average county fairs. Its meetings are held at V. S. 25 miles from Buffalo, where, says observer in 1865, the corn, beans and squashes were superior to any he had seen elsewhere. But the people were themselves the most interesting exhibit. Grandchildren of T. chief, and relatives of Red-Jacket and other of note were among the exhibitors, in whom no physical deterioration could be perceived. Native family names, such as Two G. Blinkey, Jacket, Silver-heels and Ghas Darkness, appeared among the officers, judges or exhibitors, and a grandson of Governor Blacksnake, who led the Senecas at the massacre of Wyoming, was chief police officer of the ground.

The Indian reservation is governed by President and a Congress, elected annually by native voters under authority of an act of Legislature of the State of N. York. Though the power of the Iroquois is utterly broken their ancestral pride adheres to this semblance of authority, while they preserve their traditional divisions and keep intact their traditions.

From an investigation of the Indian era for the period of European acquaintance with them, my opinion has been reached that the Six Nations as they exist to-day, though widely scattered, number more than they ever since they became the terror of the frontier settlers. At least 13,668 members are accounted for at known points, which is not far from the number reported in 1763. A people exhibiting such vitality when confronted by the waves of invasion and the onrush of civilization, themselves among the most pristine apostles of personal liberty, should be made citizens of our republic.

In common with the other aboriginal nations, the Senecas have been belied. Neither they, nor other tribes, were the natural enemies of the whites. In this opinion the navigators and writers all concur. Before the era of systematic wrongs, they were equitable and kind, and disposed to friendly relations with the pale faces, and for one hundred and fifty years they scrupulously served their engagements with the Dutch English. But the American people permitted the Indians to be grossly defrauded, content to divide with them their ancient patrimony of a continent, pioneer traders being allowed to wrest from them their hunting grounds and invade their burial places, and to crown injustice, a horde of squawkes, in the official guise of commissioner superintendents and agents, have purloined them into their far western retreats, to ca-on them their paltry annuities and wheedle away their newer reservations." No skilled advocate has appeared for them, no medium is offered through which he could present an array to mankind, the merciless impositions practised upon them for many a dark year; few friendly voices save that of the "friends," and orators of their own race, whose speech fell upon deaf ears, have been raised in their defence.

"It was the dictates of policy during the revolution, to paint the Indian as black as possible, and to hold him responsible for deeds which it might easily be shown the British were alone guilty." That the Indian committed excesses and barbarities the burning of benedict, and the ravaging of Cherry Valley, a Massacre at Wyoming and the destruction of hundreds of peaceful pioneer homesteads attest.

With the exception of a portion of the Peorias and a few Mohawks, the Six-nations are all in arms against the colonists, having in actual thereto by their sanguinary wars, the tories, and to the lasting disgrace of the British Cabinet of the period, were urged the commission of atrocities unparalleled in history, some of which are above noticed. Every effort for protection against these predatory onsets went up from the frontiers to Congress, and after much delay an expedition was sent under General Sullivan to Western New York.

For "The Friend."

Remoulding the Walls.

George Withy, in his farewell address to friends in North America, under date of 9th, 10th, 1822, says—"The principles would be the principles of Truth, they have stood the test of investigation; our worship and discipline, are evidently not the product of the contrivance of man, and there is nothing wanting but consistency on our part enable us to hold up to others the invitation; and encouraging language of the Prophet Isaiah; 'Look upon Zion, the city of our enemies: thine eyes shall see Jerusalem, quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken.' Isa. xxxiii. 20. The Prophet goes on to proclaim; 'For the Lord is our Judge, the Lord is our Lawgiver, the Lord is our King; He will save us.'

We still have the same Judge who will judge our cause; the same Lawgiver who writes his laws upon the heart; and the same Lord is King over all, as in the days of the prophet. Wherefore then is not our Jerusalem a 'quiet habitation'? Why need we have a weakening of the stakes—surely the stakes shall not be removed, neither the cords of the tabernacle be broken—these shall all stand firm, for the same power upholds, and just as able to keep all together as in former days when Zion was threatened by her enemies. And by whom did the Lord expect in these days of threatenings that the Church build be upheld? was it not by the faithful, as such, as said the prophet, 'that walketh theologically and speaketh uprightly; that doeth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh hands from holding bribes.' These are not gone, even in our day, when we may feel that there is a need of a stirring up of the faithful, an arising of those who are made willing to stand forward and help to bear the banner, which may for a season have seemed to droop.

But where are the young men and the strong men, that should be coming up to the help of the Lord against the mighty? Are they leaving the heat of the battle to be carried on by those who have long been the true and faithful standard-bearers? who, as they have been enabled to stand faithful, have been strengthened to endure hardness as 'good soldiers' of their invincible Captain. 'These valiant are of fact being removed from our midst; and how are the ranks to be maintained? Soldiers will still be needed; enemies will take advantage of any appearance of weakness, or thinning of the ranks; and where weakness is apparent, greater will be their increased vigilance and efforts to lay waste the remnant. The day is fast hastening onward, there is no time for delay, neither for halting by the way-side; men must be at work seeking to repair the breaches. There are still Nehemians who are made to weep and mourn: and these are humbled and brought low because of the people's transgressions, and their disobedience to the commandments of the Most High. These, though they are "not sick," give evidence by their countenance that they are sad, because "of sorrow of heart." They have warned us of the distress in Jerusalem, and of the need of repairs;—who then will rise up and help build? for their hands shall be strengthened for this good work; and as in former days, so shall it be with those who are willing to be his servants now, whom the Lord calls to labor; "the God of heaven He will prosper" them; for the work is the Lord's, and the power is his also.

Dr. Meigs, to give a striking picture of the importance of both food and water in disease, quotes Professor Haughton, who, speaking of typhus fever, says: "Your patient lies before you nine or ten days, supine, fasting, subdelirious; the picture of weakness and helplessness; and yet this unhappy sufferer actually performs, day by day, an amount of work that might well be envied by the strongest laborer in our land." "We have seen," he goes on to say, "that the work due to Animal Heat would lift the body through a vertical height of six miles per day; and it thus appears that an additional amount of work, equivalent to the body lifted through nearly one mile per day, is spent in maintaining the temperature at fever heat."

"When a patient lies comatose, without sense or appetite, an inexperienced, thoughtless person might be influenced unconsciously to some carelessness in the administration of aliment or water to so inanimate a machine. But the body continues, as before, its destructive assimilation, and still burns off its tissues and fluids. * * * It is our duty, therefore, no matter how low may be the condition of the patient, to supply him with at least liquid and fluid aliment."

"Thirst does not mean that the mouth and throat, or stomach merely, want water poured over or into them, but that the hand, the foot, the brain, the body and all its members need water. The thirst corresponds * * * to the excess of demand in the system over the supply afforded by the blood, and it is caused to abate by the introduction of the requisite material into the circulating fluid, even though this is not accomplished in the usual manner by the ingestion of food or drink into the stomach."

"What is to be the guide as to the quantity of water to be supplied to the sick? I answer, unhesitatingly, that, so long as the patient retains his natural senses or appetites, there is no guide so sure, and so safe, as the thirst. When this is lost, the trained knowledge of the physician, or the common-sense and experience of the nurse, must determine the amount, for which I say, 'I say, 'Why? It is the appetite implanted in the body by the Creator, for the determination of the amount of water needed. The infinite wisdom which made the eye, the ear, the mind, the soul, established also the appetites of thirst and hunger, by which to regulate the amounts of food and liquid necessary for the sustenance of the animal. These senses are quite as wonderful and unerring as the instinct of the bee to make its mathematical cell, or to suck honey from the flowers; of the ant to lay up store of food for its young; and of the migratory bird to seek its nutriment in new climates. For myself, I dare not oppose this divine sense in a thirsty patient, any more than I would oppose the instinct of the infant to take from its mother's breast the material it needs for its growth."

"What is to be our guide as to the amounts of fluid food and free water, when the patient falls into insensibility, and we have no longer the sense of thirst to assist us? We must, in the needs of the body. * * *

"One simple and proper rule would be to continue the amount he was taking before he fell into insensibility. The temperature of the body will furnish another excellent criterion. So long as the heat rises to 102°, 103°, or 104°, and when the skin is dry as well as hot, the tongue and mouth pasty and desiccated, it would be proper to aim at administering in each twenty-four hours, two or three pints of milk and one of beef-tea. If he can be made to swallow four ounces of milk or beef-tea every two hours, he would get forty-eight ounces, or three pints of fluid, in this time. If besides this, four ounces of water can be administered every two hours, he would gain an additional forty-eight ounces, or ninety six in all. It may seem rough work to be dosing an insensible man with food or drink, every hour, through all the weary days and nights. But, the life of a man in this condition has become so much that of a vegetable, that this practice does not disturb him as much as one might suppose. This stupor is not sleep, and I know, from experience, that such a patient may often be made to swallow thin liquids without any great disturbance.

"There is another point in practice in regard to the use of water for the sick, which will surely occur to you, before you shall have been long in your profession. When the stomach is irritable, so that vomiting occurs after the ingestion of liquids, and in cases of diarrhoea or dysentery, are we to deny water because its use is followed by vomiting, or because the bowels are opened frequently? I think not. So long as there is acute thirst, I believe that water ought to be given. It may be well to try ice from time to time, but severe thirst is never, so far as I know, slaked by the slow process of melting ice in the month. The amount of water obtained in this way is not sufficient. I am in the habit, in such cases, of giving water in moderate doses at frequent intervals. Even though most of it be rejected, some is absorbed, and, after a time, the irritability of the stomach usually diminishes. This is especially true of children suffering from cholera infantum, diarrhoea, and indigestion, who will reject, time and again, for some hours or a day or two, milk, beef or chicken tea, and yet, after a while, begin to drink a small quantity of water. The addition of a little brandy, or of a teaspoonful to a pint or half pint of water, will, for some reason it is difficult to explain, enable the stomach to retain this mixture, when free water is rejected. At all events it is well to make frequent and numerous trials with water, especially so long as the patient craves, and takes eagerly, this simple aliment."

Dr. Meigs relates two seemingly desperate cases in which life was saved; in the one instance by dropping between the half closed lips teaspoonfuls of weak brandy and water into the mouth of the unconscious patient, and in the other where liquids were for days dropped into the mouth of the drowsy child from a little glass tube with a small india rubber bulb attached to the end.

The concluding page of the lecture has this very true paragraph.

"When the body is desiccated by fever, or by the loss of its fluids, through numerous evacuations from the bowels or skin, or by vomiting, there is no drug to take the place back to the tissues and blood, the water they plead for by the appointed appetite, thirst."

The early sacred writers again and again recognize the need and the value of water to them that are athirst, and many of the most striking illustrations in the Bible are founded on the recognition of this need.

The prophet Isaiah, speaking in the name of the Most High, uses this language, beautiful both in its literal and spiritual application, (Chap. xli. 17.) "When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none and their tongue faileth for thirst, I, the Lord, will hear them. I will open rivers in high places and fountains in the midst of the valleys. I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water."

One additional remark seems necessary before concluding this subject. It is of great importance that the water used as drink, either in health or in disease, should be pure water, free, so far as is possible, from contamination of any kind. This applies to cities and elsewhere, and persons living in the country should see to it that the wells and springs from which their drinking water is obtained be frequently examined and cleaned, and that the house, barn and other outbuildings be so placed that the drainage from them should neither directly nor indirectly find its way into it. From a neglect of these precautions water, so essential for health, has, in more than one instance, become a pestilential and far-reaching vehicle of disease. * J. J. L. *

NATURE'S WORSHIP.

The ocean looketh up to heaven,
As 'twere a living thing;
The homage of its waves is given
In ceaseless worshipping.

They kneel upon the sloping sand
As bends the human knee,
A beautiful and tireless band,
The priesthood of the sea.

The sky is as a temple's arch,
The line and way air
Is glorious with the spirit march
Of messengers at prayer.

VENTS A HELDING HAND.

Lift a little! Lift a little!
Neighbors, lend a helping hand
To that heavy-laden brother—
Who for weakness scarce can stand.
What to thee, with thy strong muscle,
Seems a light and easy load,
Is to him a ponderous burden,
Cumbering his pilgrim road.

Lift a little! Lift a little!
Effort gives one added strength;
That which staggers him at rising,
Thou canst hold at arm's full length.
Not his fault that he is feeble,
Nor thy praise that thou art strong;
It is God makes lives to differ—
Some from wailing, some from song.

Lift a little! Lift a little!
Many they that need thy aid;
Many lying on the road-side,
Neath misfortune's dreary shade.
Does not like the Priest and Levite,
Headless of thy fellow-man,
But with heart and arms extended,
Be a kind Samaritan.

NEED TODAY MET.

"As for me and my house we will serve the Lord."

O happy home! where Thou art loved the best,
Dear Friend and Saviour of our race;
Where never comes such welcome and honored guest,
Where none can ever fill thy place;
Where every heart goes forth to welcome thee,
Where every ear attends thy word;
Where every lip with blessings greeteth thee,
Where all are waiting on their Lord.

O happy home! where man and wife in heart,
In faith and hope are one,
That neither life nor death can ever part
The holy union here begun.
Where both are sharing one salvation,
And live before thee, Lord, always,
In gladness or in tribulation,
In happy or in evil days.

O happy home! whose little ones are given
Early to thee, in faith and prayer—
To thee their Friend, who from the heights of heaven
Guard's them with more than mother's care.
O happy home! whose little voices
Their glad hosannas love to raise;
And childhood's lisping tongue rejoices
To bring new songs of love and praise.

O happy home and happy servitude!
Where all alike one Master own;
Where daily duty in thy strength pursued,
Is never hard or toilsome known;
Where each one serves thee, meek and lowly,
Whatever thine appointment be,
Till common tasks seem great and holy,
When they are done as unto thee.

O happy home where thou art not forgot,
When joy is flowing full and free;
O happy home! where every word is brought Physician, Comforter, to thee;
Until at last, earth's day's work ended,
All meet thee in that home above,
From whence thou camest, where thou hast ascended,
Thy heaven of glory and of love!

Calumnies in Danger.

When Job Scott was on his way to England on a religious visit in 1792, he encountered violent storm, which lasted for two nights and a day, and which he says was "truly terrible," reminding him of Addison's line "When wave on wave, and gulf on gulf, o'ercame the pilot's art." He says in a letter to his family: "It seemed at times as if the briny waves would soon swallow us up; yet I never really lost my confidence, for all this was more than for months I had firmly expected to meet with. You know it was sealed on my soul, that the loud roar of wind, and the drenching of the waves, would awfully attend my passage. And now indeed it proved my hope on Heaven. I said in my heart, It is the Lord let Him fulfil his purposes. Let Him do just what He will with me in time and in eternity. Nought else beside his holy will can ever good for me; and why should I wish even the most disagreeable parts of it averted, mitigated, or shortened. I thought I had had his promise who cannot lie, that I should live through these dreadful tossings on the bosom of the ocean, and once more set my foot on firm ground, yea, bless his holy name in waters yet to come on shore. I cannot say I had no reasonings; but I will remember the clearness of prospect wherein I had seen this dispensation on the ocean. I also living remembered the holy warmth, energy and assurance that attended the promise of safety through all; and though it was now the time when I saw that the evidence of divine truth should be low in my mind, yet I could not cast away my confidence." "My all I surrendered up to his disposal, nor once wished myself on shore, nor in another vessel."

This devoted servant, in this verified measure the truth of the Psalmist's declaration—"God is our refuge and strength, a present help in trouble: therefore will we not fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea; though the waters thereof roar and be troubled."

Little Foxes.—Except to those who know their habits, the East-ox fox, especially the young or "litter fox," never would be suspected to be such a depredator. I remember that when I was shown one, it was with the greatest difficulty I could persuade myself that the little, very little creature—not larger than a ferret, or our common kitten—was playing with deft footfall and kindly intelligence about its cage, really was the destructive spoiler represented. It so happened, however, that the keeper of the gardens where I was, on coming round to arrange its cage, made a discovery that satisfied me of its character, or no character, of the very "litter" deceiver before me. Lifting up the floor-stair he discovered a deep-burrowed hole that went right beneath the separating wall of the adjoining den, a tiger's; and with a start, examining it, the keeper found that another hour of secret working would have overthrown the wall, and let loose the fierce beast of prey. The whole had been done within a few hours. Those "litter" greyish-white feet, licked proud and clean of all betraying soil, and that "litter" sharp nose, so innocent and pitiful-looking, had done their stealthy work, an appalling might have been the issue. I remember well how, as the littered, conce-

ing straw was raised, the consciously guilty "little" hypocrite slunk back with drooped brush into the corner.—Grosart.

For "The Friend."

The Meeting at Firbank Chapel and its Results.

Charles Marshall thus continues his account of the labors of John Camm and John Audland at Bristol:

"Some meetings we had before the more general gathering in and about that city, which began on this wise: On a First-day the morning I went with these two servants of God, about a mile and a half from the city, to a little spring of water, where I often had spent many solitary hours in my tender years, seeking the Lord; where we sat some time, and drank of the spring. After some hours the morning were spent, I saw in them a great travail in spirit; trembling, J. A. said, 'as we go being into the city; so we came to a street called Broadmead, to a house where were several people met together, enquiring after these two men of God. John Audland as under a great exercise of spirit, and said, 'here any one that has any interest in the world? An ancient man said, I have in a field lately near; notice being given to the people the house, they came forth; and as we went along, people in the streets went also to the field, called Earls-mead; so that we came a pretty number, where some seats or stools were brought. Dear John Camm began to speak tenderly, and in great zeal, directing the heavenly Grace of God, and testifying against sin and iniquity fervently; to which we were attentive in this season; I perceived a great exercise of Spirit on my dear friend, and father in Christ Jesus, J. Audland, so very much trembled. After dear John Camm stood down, he stood up, full of dread and shining brightness on his countenance, and set up his voice as a trumpet, and said, I proclaim spiritual war with the inhabitants of the earth, who are in the fall and separation from God, and prophesy to the four winds of heaven; and these words dropped amongst a seed; and so went on in the mighty power of God Almighty, opening the way of life, that all the seizures of souls, and prickings of heart, which attended that season; some of us on the ground, others crying out under a sense of opening their states, which indeed we experimental knowledge of what is recorded, Acts ii. 37. Indeed it was a notable work, worthy to be left on record, that our children may read, and tell to their children, and theirs to another generation, that the worthy noble acts of the arm of God's salvation may be remembered, which have been the way of the Lord, leading his servants through generations, &c.

"At this meeting many were effectually convinced, and from darkness to light turned, or which our meetings grew larger and larger. They visited the meetings of them called Independents, and Baptists, testifying amongst them in great power the things given them of God, directing the poor and needy in Christ, that saw their want of the Lord Jesus Christ, no longer to seek the living amongst the dead, but look from the mountains and valleys dead ways and worship, unto Christ Jesus the foundation of life and salvation; and there was added unto the gathering daily, and great dread was round about, and in our meetings, under the seasonings of the Holy Ghost,

Oh! the tears, sighs, and groans, tremblings, and mournings, in the sight of the middle wall of partition, that we saw then in our awakened states, that stood between us and the Lord, and in the sight and sense of our spiritual wants and necessities: Oh! the hungerings and thirstings of soul that attended daily, and great travails of spirit, to obtain through the working of the mighty power of God's dominion, and spiritual victory over the enemy of our souls, who had led us in the paths of death and darkness; and indeed as the visits of God's holy and ever blessed day was signal and unexpressible, as aforesaid; so I testify in the fear and dread, and awe of God Almighty, and with broken hearts, and a ready mind, and gave up to follow the Lord fully, casting off the weights and burdens, and the sin that easily besets, and from the evil ways and vanities of this world departed. Oh! the strippings of all needless apparel, and the forsaking of superfluities in meats, drinks, and in the plain self-denying path we walked; having the fear and dread of God on our souls, that we were afraid of offending in word or deed; our words were few and savory, our apparel and houses plain, being stripped of superfluities; our countenances grave, and deportments weighty; amongst those we had to do with. Indeed we were a plain, broken-hearted, contrite-spirited, self-denying people; our souls being in an unexpressible travail, to do all things well-pleasing in the sight of God; for our great concern night and day was to obtain through Jesus Christ the great work of salvation, and thereby an assurance of the everlasting rest, and Sabbath, of our God; and in those days, oh! the unexpressible labors, and travails, and seasonings of the states of the servants of the most high God, in great assemblies in that city, and countries round about; our meetings were so large that we were forced to meet without doors, and that in frost and snow; in which meetings, oh! the extending of voice of these servants of God, to reach over these great multitudes, when several thousands have been assembled together, and as the work of the Lord increased, so the enemy was at work in priests, and people, in those days, who stirred up the youth of the city, into a tumulting, like the men of Ephesus; and once we had a very great tumult that the streets were crowded, and these two servants of the Lord were seized upon by the multitude, and were in great hazard.

"But the Lord signally delivered them, as in days past he had done his servants on such occasions, and all came to be quieted, and our meetings peaceable, and many grew in grace, and in the knowledge of God, and Christ Jesus, who is eternal life; much more of particulars I might write, but affecting brevity, for several reasons; I say, in short, such was the effectual working of the Almighty power of God, and makings bare of his arm of salvation, that attended those servants of the Most High, and the great work of our gospel meeting with the various trials and exercises that attended them, and as that were the fruits of their labors in the Lord, that my tongue cannot express what I was an eye and ear witness of, and a soul sharer in. Therefore to the God of this bright morning of our day of visitation, arise, springs up, as in covenant with himself through Christ Jesus, holy heavenly high praises; might, majesty and dominion is ascribed to the Lord God, and the Lamb. So let it be, saith my spirit, in fear and trembling, through ages and generations, for ever and evermore.—Amen."

For "The Friend."

—, 10th mo. 6th, 1879.

(After noting the attendance at their Monthly and Quarterly Meetings, of several ministers from other parts of the Yearly Meetings,

"Thou canst easily imagine without my attempting to describe them, what kind of a Monthly and Quarterly Meeting we had. That flood of words, of which some in these days seem to possess an unceasing flow, was poured out without stint upon the gathered people. Words poured out,—to the utter wearying of all who love true worship and a living ministry—seems to be all that many speakers seek after, and too many hearers desire at this time.

"I have been deeply interested of late in looking carefully into the lives of Samuel Fothergill, John Griffith, Samuel Bowmas and others of that middle period of our Society, and gathering somewhat of the rich stores laid up, in regard to the ministry and discipline of our Society. Very clearly did these set forth their views and experience in these things; and what a contrast they are to those propagated by many now! Deserting first one point of our standard doctrines after another, ministry substantially upon the ground of other sects, by training it in a college and then saying it afterwards. * * *

"One thing I have long believed with increasing depth of conviction, that as our present troubles largely came upon our Society through a vitiated and sometimes altogether spurious ministry, so if we ever surmount them, it must be in good degree through one that has been truly called and deeply baptized of the great Head himself.

"At —, in looking at a late number of 'The Friend,' I noticed a most excellent editorial in regard to 'traditional Friends.' I have been much led at times to reflect on the responsibilities of 'conservative Friends' at the present time. In the midst of a conflict like that now raging in our Society, where a flood of innovations threatens to sweep, if it were possible, true Quakerism from the earth, how needful that all those who profess to stand for ancient grounds, should not only have a correct theory, but be able to enforce their words, by a life that is unmistakably under the power of the Holy Spirit. * * *

Deeply do I fear we have those among us professing loudly to be Quakers of the ancient sort, while they are practical unbelievers in the great doctrine of the Gospel, that 'all men everywhere should repent,' and that 'except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.'

"Yain is our labor for a more correct doctrine and practice, with the holders of radical sentiments, many of whom we cannot deny have a degree of true life about them, however much it may be mixed with the baser iron and miry clay; and worse than yain as regards ourselves will be this profession of a better knowledge, unless we truly possess the living substance, and yield ourselves to its power. * * * To say nothing of my own peculiar spiritual infirmities, situated as I am where those who have of latter years borne the burden of Society's responsibilities, are rapidly passing away, while nearly all of those of younger years to whom we naturally must look for succession of the standard bearers, are much like those of old, who wanted to be excused from attending to the Master's invitation, because one had bought a yoke of oxen, another a piece of ground, &c. vainly do these seem to imagine, that by shirking present duty, they thereby excuse themselves. Will some day find this is far from being the fact. So, like, it may be, many others scattered ones up and down, I dwell much in my own tent, seeing much I fear is amiss, even among those I can mainly unite with, and deeply longing to see, especially among the younger members, more of a willingness to enter into the vineyard, and to labor there; not in human strength or wisdom, but under the enlightening baptizing power of the Holy Spirit himself. * * *

"I am Strong in Him."—Dr. McLeod relates that he was requested to go and visit a dying child. Some remarkable things were told him of this boy, eleven years of age, who, during three years of sickness, had manifested the most patient submission to the will of God, with a singular enlightenment of the Spirit. He says I went to visit him. The child had suffered excruciating pain; for years he had not known one day of rest. I gazed at him, and he gazed at me, and we both looked at me with his blue eyes—he could not move—it was the night before he died—and breathed into my ear these few words: "I am strong in Him." The words were few, and uttered feebly. They were the words of a feeble child, in a poor home, where the only ornament was that of a meek, and quiet, and affectionate mother; and these words seemed to lift the burden from the very heart; they seemed to make the world more beautiful than ever it was before; they brought home to my heart a great and blessed truth. May you and I and every one else be "strong in Him."

When you pin a child down to give his conception of a Scripture term or phrase, just as it lies in his mind, you know that you not unfrequently make some odd discoveries. Only to-day I heard a teacher telling of a bright little girl of ten or eleven years who was reading the story of Peter's vision of the great sheet; and on being asked what a trance was, replied that it was something that Peter fell into—evidently having in her mind the image of a pit or ditch, or a great vat, into which the apostle was bodily precipitated. Look out for those images in the child's mind; those are the things which stand for facts. Take care that they stand for the right facts.—N. S. Times.

Moan Blindness.—The close oppressive air between the decks often encourages the sailor to carry his mattress into the open air and sleep under the canopy of the sky—a proceeding not altogether without danger if no awning be spread, inasmuch as heavy dews often fall, and rheumatic affections are liable to ensue. If the moon be shining with its accustomed brilliancy in a cloudless sky, an other danger is encountered, concerning which, however, there is a certain difference of opinion. The ill effects of the direct rays of the moon upon sleeping persons are very generally recognized among nautical men, although of course very considerable allowance must be made for prejudice as well as for superstition, and no story should be received without careful examination, and the most searching investigation, in order to exclude all sources of error. There can be no doubt whatever that thousands of persons do sleep in the moonlight without experiencing any ill effects, but though that fact may be admitted, it does not follow that everyone is therefore exempt.

The most remarkable instance which I have been able to meet with occurred in a ship with whose personnel I was well acquainted; and my inquiries, made directly of those who were personally cognizant of the occurrence, elicited the following particulars, which are not without interest; and unless I was intentionally deceived, which I have not the slightest reason to suspect, they go far to prove the reality of moon blindness.

In this case the lad was 18 years of age, of fair complexion, full face, and large, light, greyish blue eyes, which attracted attention from their remarkable appearance. His hair and eye-lashes were darker however than the color of his eyes would lead one to expect. In February, 1864, on a certain night, about the time of full-moon, this lad was sleeping on the fore-castle, with his face turned upward, fully exposed to the direct rays of the moon. The first complaint was remarked by his mess-mates, who called to him, and assured him he would feel bad effects from it; but in spite of these remonstrances he persisted in keeping his place. Nothing occurred that night, but on the following night he was one of a deep-sea sounding party, and was beating the line, when the moon rose, and as it did so he suddenly exclaimed that he could not see, and would have fallen overboard if he had not been stopped as he was deliberately walking into the sea. For ten nights after this occurrence, as soon as the moon rose above the horizon, he complained that a cloud seemed to develop itself before his eyes, and he forth with became temporarily blind, so that it became necessary to lead him about the deck; but this only happened during moonlight. On two occasions he narrowly escaped serious accidents from falling down a hatchway, and it became necessary to place him upon the sick list. The surgeon, a gentleman of superior attainments, with whom I am acquainted, examined his eyes minutely, but could detect nothing abnormal in them. When the man was between decks and out of the moonlight, he had no difficulty in distinguishing objects; nor was his vision affected during daylight, nor after dark before the moon rose. Ultimately, when the next moon came round he had recovered from this singular affection, which did not return again.—Collingwood's Naturalist in Chinese Seas.

African Alligators.—The number of alligators in the Seacambeys is prodigious, and in this river they are more savage than in some others. Many children are carried off annually at Seshoke and other towns; for, notwithstanding the danger, when they go down for water they almost always must play awhile. This reptile is said by the natives to strike the victim with his tail, then drag him in and drown him. When lying in the water, waiting for prey, the body never appears. Man calves are lost also, and it is seldom that a number of cows can swim over at Seshok without some loss. I never could avoid shuddering on seeing my men swimming across the branches of the river, after dark taken by the low. He, however, retained, as nearly as possible, in the most trying circumstances of his full presence of mind, and, having a small square, ragged edged javeline with him, which he dragged to the bottom gave the alligator's stab behind the shoulder. The alligator writhing in pain, left him, and he came off with the deep marks of the reptile's teeth on his thigh.—D. Livingston.

Carib Baskets.—The Indians in the small islands of West Indies still retain the art of making water-tight baskets of their ancestors preserved from the teaching of their ancestors. Their baskets have such a reputation throughout all the islands that they command high prices, and were it not for their innate lowness, and the scarcity of the peculiar shrub which the baskets are composed, these people might attain to a degree of affluence. The "panniers" or baskets are made of all sizes, some as large as a common trunk. They are made sometimes of a reed called rosau, but the best are made from a plant called maohoe, which is now so scarce that the basket makers have to take long journeys into the forests to obtain it.

By burying it in the ground, and using some the juices of certain plants, they give the plants a variety of colors. There are two layers of the material, one of wild plantain, which make them perfect water tight. I have one which was in nearly a year, being constantly carried on the heads of my attendants; and even yet it will I think, hold water. All the country people desire to possess a pannier or Carib basket which serves them as a light and portable trunk.—F. A. Ober.

Sleeplessness.—Physiological experiments have shown that in sleep the blood moves more slowly through the vessels of the brain, and the vessels themselves are smaller, than when the animal is awake.

From this fact it has been concluded that sleeplessness may be due to either of two conditions, both of which will cause an increase of blood in the brain; an increase of force of circulation, or a dilated state of blood vessels. It is supposed that wine, coffee, and certain forms of heart-trouble can wakefulness in the first of these ways; a that exhaustion, mental care, and worry a nervousness act in the latter by affecting the little nerves which ramify in the coats of blood-vessels and whose function it is to give them tone and regulate their caliber.

It is often asked why coffee, &c., will sometimes cause sleep and at others wakefulness in the same person, and the answer probably is that in certain states they act by increasing the force of the heart's action and thus produce the latter effect, while in other and exhausted nervous conditions they give strength to these little nerves, cause a general toning up of the blood vessels, less blood in the brain, and sleep.

Besides these causes of wakefulness the physical pain and any thing which acts directly on the senses, as loud noises, a bright light, or foul or irritating air.

The custom which many nervous sufferers get into of dosing themselves with chloral, bromide of potash, and the like, is to be deprecated. For not only do all of these things carry the danger of forming a bad habit in themselves, but as a rule their administration would not be considered good practice by a good physician. If a woman is so nervous as to be constantly sleepless, she needs treatment not so much for the nervousness rather than for the other. Rest, change, food, exercise, are the key-notes to cure, and not the combating of a single symptom by medicines which are pretty sure to have equally consequent in their train.—Exchange.

Typhus.—The poisons of typhus, small pox and yellow fever are best antagonized by pure r, water and soap.

The longer I live, the nearer I think of human activity, and the more certain I am to be and will be baffled and confounded all its mighty movements in religious things, except as under Divine influence.—J. Scott.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 20, 1880.

The British Friend of 3rd month has been received, containing some interesting articles, and manifesting (as several previous numbers have done) a more decidedly open advocacy of the original doctrines of our Society; or perhaps we should say a clearer insight into the present causes of weakness in its borders, than I have seen the case at some former periods.

In an Editorial on the condition of the meetings in America, "more particularly in western parts," it says:—

"It is no little satisfaction that there is one reason—would there were more—for believing that a reaction has set in, that the causes of unrest and disunity have at length been discovered to proceed not from a recurrence to first principles, as was imagined by many, but by wide divergence from them, and that consequently, in order to a restoration of unity, every innovation must be turned on its head and denied. Our reason for the belief now spoken of is the publication in Kansas a new Journal, entitled The Western Friend, devoted to the interests of the conservative cause in the Society of Friends. We quote in No. 2 the following:

After a lapse of more than two centuries, many of distinguishing doctrines of the Society of Friends now either openly or covertly assailed by those who pretend for our name; and to-day, we as Friends find ourselves fighting the same battle for those precious principles with those in our fold, which the early days fought to martyrdom with those who sought ruthlessly to crush the system of doctrine and practice, which God by the light of his Holy Spirit had called to proclaim and defend.

The Western Friend enters the field of Journalism in the Society of Friends as the avowed and fearless advocate of the Ancient Type of Orthodox Quakerism. In maintaining the doctrinal standard of Fox, Pennycuik, Barclay, the Western Friend will press the necessity that inward experience and acquaintance with the work of the Holy Spirit, which alone qualifies us to attest for our faith; which alone gives that access to the spiritual worship, wherein is seen the harm of a worldly, the danger and inconsistency of "Mourners' meetings," "Sanctification Altars," "Outward Consecra-tions," and all human dictation of outward acts, as 'means of grace' in worship.

Besides the hope of reaction to be drawn from this extract, we have received within the last few days a very encouraging letter from an esteemed minister in one of the Western States. He thus writes:—

A time of searching and sifting is upon us in this country about gradually. Our Society has been trained to the utmost tolerance during these years of "Revival Work." There has been a very prevalent desire to encourage all that was good. And while the movement gathered all for itself great results for good, it has counter; and those most instrumental in swelling the cause have seemed most impatient of restraint. Had there been a disposition to see to it that the best, and to welcome the checks designed to resist those outgoings which cause scattering, there would have been a far different state of things among us now.

But a time of reaction has come. It is evident, not the vision of the world alone, but to the common judgment of our people, that toleration must have a limit; that individual liberty must not be suffered to the extent of bringing the whole body into bondage; and that the depressed authority of the Church must again be abandoned. We have been wonderfully swept by revolutionary tendencies, but not altogether moved from our foundation. There is still a Society of Friends within our pale; and how many without are struggling up into the light and liberty which it has been our mission to proclaim! The witness to the perfect truth, the trumpet giving a certain sound, is responded to with rejoicing by many hearts among those who abide in a living concern to stand in their allotted places, and to do their appointed work according to the will of God.

May the reaction in due time reach our shores."

We believe, as above expressed, that there is "some reason, and we cordially unite in the wish, that the eyes of some among us are being opened to see that they had not properly understood the nature of that concern for the truth which has long rested weightily on the minds of many in different parts of our Society. The conviction we think is spreading throughout our borders, that the stigma of narrow-mindedness, prejudice, and want of charity, has been unjustly attached to those who felt bound to oppose the early developments of that spirit of change, whose ripper fruits are now startling many others. We have seen evidences of this, especially among the members of those smaller bodies which have within a few years become separated from the Yearly Meetings of Canada, Western, Iowa and Kansas. As these have been brought into suffering through their attachment to the ancient doctrines and practices of the Society of Friends, (whether the steps they have taken here in all cases been wise or not), they have found their former prejudices melting away, and have discovered (probably in many cases to their surprise) that they were really in unity with Friends in other sections of the Society, whom at one time they regarded with coolness, and whose real position they had misunderstood. This change in feeling is by no means confined to the members of the bodies just referred to. We believe there are many honest-hearted Friends in Yearly Meetings who no such divisions have taken place, and among the members remaining connected with the larger bodies of those Yearly Meetings which have been thus divided, who are alarmed at the departures which have taken place in their borders, who are asking for the old paths, and who desire to see a standard lifted up against the progress of error. Such Friends will naturally be drawn towards those who are of like mind with themselves; and therefore we expect to see on the part of such, an increasing appreciation of that testimony for the truth of primitive Quakerism, and for its adaptation to the wants of mankind, which has been upheld by the Yearly Meetings of Philadelphia and Ohio with a good degree of faithfulness.

The true ground of unity among our members is being baptized by the one Spirit, and being led by it into the same belief and the same practices. We long for the coming of the day when all such will recognize each other, and the obstructions which now arise from differences in organization will be done away—when it may again be truly said, that from whatever part of the world Friends come, they all speak the same language.

Our readers may remember seeing in our columns extracts from a Memoir of John Finch Marsh, an aged English Friend. We believe these were encouraging and satisfactory to many who perused them, from the evidence they afforded, of a close walking with the Lord's Holy Spirit; and that this had produced the blessed fruits of faith, gentleness, meekness and purity, which flow from such holy fellowship.

We have received from his daughter, Priscilla Pitt, a manuscript memoir of her mother, Hannah Marsh, who survived her beloved partner about four years, and was removed to a better world in the year 1877, at the age of 87. The memoir was accompanied with a few extracts made the last entries in her diary. In reading over these papers, we have been impressed with the many instructive and practical remarks they contain, and with the holy, self-denying, watchful frame of mind, which this dear friend so steadily maintained. We believe that she was one of those of whom our Saviour said, "Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord, when He cometh, shall find watching." We propose inserting portions of these documents, for the benefit of our readers.

We have received from the Depository of the Pennsylvania Bible Society, N. W. corner of Seventh and Walnut Sts., Philadelphia, a pamphlet of 48 pages, containing specimen verses of the Scriptures in 215 languages and dialects, in which they have been printed and circulated.

Judge Butler, of the U. S. Circuit Court, having directed a notice of the distribution of funds, under the will of Sarah Zane, to be inserted in "The Friend," we depart from our usual rule of refusing all advertisements. We do this the more readily, that the design of the Judge may be answered in bringing this to the notice of such Friends as may have an interest in the case.

The Book Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, have just printed an edition of the Memoirs of Daniel Wheeler, from new stereotype plates. In this, the text of the original English edition has been followed without alteration. An index has been added. It forms an octavo volume of 600 pages, and is sold at the low price of $1.00 bound in cloth, and $1.50 in half morocco binding.

The Report of the Bible Association of Friends in America shows a distribution from the Depository, for the year ending 9th mo. 30th, 1879, of 5573 volumes, consisting of 509 Bibles, 1688 Testaments and Psalms, and 4509 Testaments. Of these all but 480 were donated. We observe, in looking at the list of prices, a considerable reduction from former rates—the large Reference Bibles, in sheep, being now sold at $1.75, and the smaller Testaments in cloth at 15 cents.

UNITED STATES SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

The report of the State Treasurer on the finances of Pennsylvania, for the year ending 11th mo. 30th, 1879, shows the receipts from ordinary sources amounted to $5,392,361, and the expenditures for purposes other than the redemption of loans, to $1,844,111. Nearly four million dollars was collected in the form of taxes. Licenses, chiefly those issued to retail store and tavern-keepers, yielded eight hundred thousand dollars. The chief item of expense is interest on State debt, which amounted to $1,200,664—$735,500 for educational purposes; for charitable institutions $526,000. The Legislature cost $253,000, exclusive of the public printing $283,140; and the general expenses of government, including the pay of inspectors, &c., amounted to over $300,000.

The Board of Trustees of the State Hospital for the Insane, decided to admit 500 patients during the first year.

One hundred and ninety-seven graduates received the degree of Doctor of Medicine at the annual commencement of the Jefferson Medical College in this city.

Our exports of petroleum and petroleum products during the 1st month of this year, were $3,528,070, against $1,897,802 for the same month last year. For seven months ending 31st of Oct. last, we have shipped there arriving, there arrived, 1,137,800 barrels of oil, 8288 emigrants, against 2818 for corresponding time last year. The total immigration for 1904e months was 40,000.

The Senate of Wisconsin, by a vote of 19 to 11, concurred with a joint resolution from the House, looking to the sale of surplus land.

The lower Mississippi is very high, and apprehension is felt for the levees in some places. Some crevasses have been reported, requiring immediate attention to close the openings and strengthen the banks.

There is annually manufactured on the Mississippi and its tributaries about 1,500,000,000 feet of white pine lumber, with its proportionate accompaniment of shingles, laths and pickets. This is mostly consumed west of the river. St. Louis receives more lumber annually than any point on the river.

The temperature at Clatsop, Wyoming Territory, during the last three days of last week, ranged from zero to 18 degrees below.

The severe weather in the Pacific coast region of British Columbia, continued at last accounts, and it was feared the remainder of the live stock would perish before spring. The loss is estimated at $3,000,000, and many stock-raisers have been reduced to poverty. The snow is from three to five feet deep on a level.

On the 9th inst., a steamer left Detroit in the morning and arrived at Cleveland in the afternoon. This is said to be the earliest trip recorded between these places by more than a week.

The Grand Central Hotel and Webster House and some smaller buildings in Oakland, Cal., were burned on the 9th. Loss $275,000.

The expense of removing the Alexandrian obelisk, from Alexandria to New York, will be $75,000—which, it is said, is to be borne by W. H. Vanderbilt.

The total tonnage of all kinds of coal for the first week in this month was 399,367 tons; and for the year 4,043,997 tons; an increase of 143,913 tons over the same period last year.

The mortality in this city the past week numbered 327. Of this number 191 were adults, and 133 children—55 being under one year of age. There were 66 deaths from consumption, and 31 from inflammation of the lungs.

Forfeits, for 1879, were $1, 8 sixes, 1881, 1052; 5's, 103; 4's, 107; 4's, 1907, 1061.

Cotton.—No market given. Sales of middlings are reported at 13s 1 1/4 cts. per lb.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7 1/2 cts. in barrels, and refined at 7 1/2 cts. for export, and 8 cts. per gallon for home use. Flour continues dull. Sales of 1500 barrels of flour, at $6.75. Penna. extra family flour, Minnesota extra do., $6.75; 5's, $7.12; patent, $7.25 a $6.25; a $6.75; medium, $6.75; 1's, $7.12; and white, $7.25. Rye flour $5 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat is in better demand. Penna. red, $1.45; southern amber, $1.40; 1's yellow, $2 a $3; 2's, $1.45; Corn, mixed, 54 1/4 a 55 cts.; 51 1/4 cts. and white, white at 59 cts. Oats, mixed, 40 1/4 a 46 cts. and white, 47 1/4 a 48 cts.

Clover-seed, 7 a 8 cts. per pound; timothy, $3.20 a $3.35; flaxseed, $1.80 a $1.90 per bushel.

Beef cattle were in good demand—2443 head arrived and sold at 31 a 61 cts. per pound, and 7 1/2 cts. per lb.

Sheep were active, and sold at 53 a 73 cts. per lb.

Lambs were in demand at 63 a 73 cts. per pound, as to condition.

Cows were dull—Sales at $15 to $40 per head.

FOREIGN.—The dissolution of Parliament is to occur on the 23rd inst., and it is expected that writs for the new election will be issued on the 24th. The present Parliament will have existed six years and eighteen days. Since the first Parliament of Great Britain, in 1265, the British people have had no longer than the present Parliament. The Lord Bunsfield, in two have lasted longer than the present Parliament. The House of Commons, reviews the important operations of the Government during his administration, and claims for it general success and prosperity. "The immediate dissolution of Parliament, he says, will afford an opportunity to the nation to decide upon those measures which, in his opinion, will best secure its future fortunes, and shape its material destiny. Rarely in this country, has there been an occasion more critical. The power of England will largely depend upon the verdict of the country. Her Majesty's present Ministers have hitherto been enabled to secure peace, so necessary to the welfare of our country, but that ineffable blessing cannot be obtained by the passive principles of non-interference. Peace rests on the presence, not to say the ascendancy, of England in the councils of Europe."

The Chancellor of the British Exchequer states the revenue for the year to be £2,195,000 less than was expected, making a total deficiency of £3,356,000. More than £5,000,000 were squandered upon the war in Zululand.

An appeal has been issued in London, for assistance to the sufferers from the famine in the East. The distance, from whom the most appalling accounts continue to be received. The famine is said to extend over the whole of the East.

The Guion Line Steamer, Montana, from New York to Liverpool, ran on the rocks in Church Bay, about 3 o'clock on the morning of the 13th. Her forward compartments are full of water, and there is no prospect of saving the vessel. The passengers were all safely landed. Dixon's Colliery at High Blantyre, near Glasgow, is on fire from a gas explosion. One person was killed by the explosion, and a thousand are thrown out of employment by the disaster.

In the French Senate, the Ferry education bill, has been rejected, rejecting clause 7, which referred to the Jesuits.

Information has been received of a rupture between France and Madagascar, in consequence of a misunderstanding between the French consul and the Government of the Island. The consul has handed down his bill and appealed to his Government for support.

The French Cabinet, is strongly censured by the St. Petersburg Journal, for refusing to surrender Hartman, whose complicity with the Moscow explosion was proven beyond doubt. It says, "The Cabinet's decision amounts to encouragement to assassins, and is, therefore, greatly to be regretted."

The Globe publishes an article urging reforms as the most deadly weapon against sedition and anarchy.

A great fire occurred on the 8th inst., at the weaving works in Moscow. The entire building was destroyed, and 20 persons were burnt to death, and twenty-nine injured. Three-fourths of Nevsingie, Herzegovina, were destroyed on the 9th, including the residence of the commandant and the post and telegraph offices. Many persons are rendered homeless, but no lives were lost.

Reports from various parts of the Ottoman Empire, give the idea of a condition of almost hopeless confusion and dilapidation. The consuls at Salonica have informed the ambassadors at Constantinople that, except in the immediate vicinity of the towns, the whole region of Macedonia has become a desert. The principal Mussulmans and Christians indiscriminately. Up to the 12th inst., no further news regarding Col. Synges and his wife had reached Constantinople.

TRACT ASSOCIATION OF FRIENDS.

The Annual Meeting will be held in the Committee room of Arch St. Meeting-house, on Fourth-day evening, the 31st inst., at 11 o'clock.

Friends generally are invited to attend.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE.

Near Frankfort, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, at his residence at West Falmouth, Mass., the 25th of 11th month, 1879, JOSEPH N. SWIFT, son of Daniel and Hengibah W. Swift, in the 51st year of age, a member of the Friends' Meeting, who was distinguished by remarkable gifts of thought, memo and conversation, he showed from early years, through Divine influence, a tendency to turn them upwa above the concerns of time and sense, into higher spiritual channels. During his maturer years he was often and deeply engaged in those heart-searching baptisms of Divine Grace, through which he was quickened and constrained to bear public testimony to the searchible riches of Christ, to the perceptible influence of the Holy Spirit, and to the necessity of obedience thereto. While engaged in his daily labor, or in his retirement, he traveled the spirit for the spiritual welfare of his neighbors, often calling at their hon with a word of encouragement, instruction, or exhortation in love to their souls. He was anxious lest the cares of this life, and the deceitfulness of things which so seemed grasping after, were choking the words of his heart, so that it was becoming unfruitful. "thy affection on things above, and not on things on earth;" attend diligently to the grace of God which bringeth salvation through Jesus Christ, was increasingly the testimony of his life and ministry.

At his residence in this city, on the 12th Second month last, SARAH FOLWELL, in the 86th year of her age, an esteemed member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

At her residence in Philadelphia, Second mo. 17th, 1880, REBECCA, wife of Thomas Scattergood, in her 95th year of her age, died. She was a member of Friends of Philadelphia for the North District. Having submitted in early life to the visitations of Divine Grace, and being earnest in her desire faithfully to follow on to know the Lord, she became a true and beloved member of our religious Society, experiencing the presence of his Spirit in her heart in many seasons of deep conflict, she was refined through suffering, and was a bright example of Christian virtues. Among her last expressions near the close of a painful illness which terminated her life, was "Bless the Lord with all my soul, and doing not all his benefits;" "Blessed forever be his holy name."

For "The Friend"

Memoir of Hannah Marsh.

BY HER DAUGHTER, PRISCILLA FITZ.

She resided for a little time before her marriage in Houndsditch, London, keeping house for her brother Charles. She often spoke to us with grateful recollections of Simon Bayley, an elder in Devonshire-House Meeting, who appeared to have unity with her little sittings, and at length invited her to come and take a seat facing the meeting. She did to tell me how sorry she should be to see her conduct might cause them grief—this was from her young years; and as she grew she prized exceedingly that blessed unity spirit which is as the dew of Hermon—that I reverently believed she was graciously permitted to partake of with many choice ends, whom she yet esteemed far above herself—among these I do very especially remember Sarah (Lynnes) Grubb and Lydia Ann relay. She had a place in the hearts of many Friends, who apparently lived less under a cross than herself, but she ever turned to from courting favors of any, knowing that gifts tend to blind the eyes. Often did she take up her cross, and endeavor to clear her mind to Friends and others from "little bits," as she used to term it, "that felt laid on her to discharge; after which," she said, "I feel I can meet them in love, and shake hands with them." "I believe," she said, "I am helped to do it without wounding, but I do not speak close—will repaid if I get the any of peace." She did not like to neglect to improve "little opportunities, in traveling, sea side visits and calls, to the good of the near her.

and the following memorandum made by her mother, Ann Lucas, in the year 1826, viz: "On the Sixth month, it being Devonshire House Monthly Meeting, my dear daughter, Hannah Marsh, was by said meeting acknowledged as a public minister. Simon Bayley and Peter Bedford were deputed to inform me of the same, but dear aged S. B. being in the present, such information was postponed for my chamber on the event, it struck me very forcibly that according to my small gift, I could set my seal to the propriety of the measure, and add, I do believe her to be a plant of the Lord's right hand planting. May she be upheld in the work of the ministry by that Divine arm who has brought her out of the world's vanities to perform the glorious task of her heavenly Master, that she may be crowned with success here, and when time terminates her existence, from which, to rewards, she may occupy a place amongst the saints in bliss."

She often longed that some day they might be privileged with a cottage in the country, which was granted in 9th month, 1829, when I was ten months old, my parents having left London to reside at Rose Cottage, Park Lane, Croydon. My father lived there 44 years, and my mother 47. There it was her delight to walk before breakfast in the garden, and pass the weeds, and often compared the bad dispositions of our hearts to the weeds in the garden, which require a constant watch to pull up, for she "was not blind to the faults of her children." Often when so unwell that the attendance of some meeting on the following day was hardly to be expected, she would say, "I find I must live one day at a time—for me to go, I shall have a shiver when I then it invited to be able, she would rise and go. If not able to attend both the select and general Monthly, Quarterly or Yearly meetings, she would say, "I feel most bound to the select ones; they press most heavily upon me." She made a point of "holding her meeting at home," alone in quiet, while others went at meeting, when prevented from going to the meetings for worship through indisposition.

When my sister left home for long terms of teaching, she felt it very much, and used to like to sit quiet as soon as my sister was gone, and commend her in secret to the Lord, and wait on Him to recruit her strength, and enable her the better to bear the parting; and when, in later years, I and mine were her guests, she would generally commemorate the goodness of the Lord in having granted us the privilege of mingling together.

Often would mother say, referring to her delicate health, what a tenderly kind husband she had. In sentiment they were essentially alike, and so complete was their union felt to be, that mother would often remark to me, "Husband and wife are one." She was always ready to promote father's service for truth, careful not to interrupt him when writing letters, encouraged him to attend meetings and be faithful therein, and cheerfully gave him up repeatedly for service in distant parts. She believed it better for a minister to dwell under the weight of his own concern rather than lean on a wife or any other friend, unless they were truly brought under a similar exercise, which in two or three instances she was, and proved a helpful companion to him. He did not like to have to go to his own meeting without her, who sat either next to him or near him. She used to say she endeavored to have her mind as a blank sheet of paper on sitting down in meetings, that she might be preserved from offering anything of lowly sacrifices. At various times she was constrained to ask for liberty to pay a visit to men Friends in their meetings for discipline—sometimes to seek family sittings or private interviews. "Was often brought very low in the prospect of such weighty engagements, but dared not be disobedient, and miss of the sweet reward of peace" that she was no stranger unto. Referring to intercourse with persons, she would sometimes remark to me, "I was obliged to seem blank to such a one—I could not manifest more than I felt." She felt she had a tendency to hold her children too close, but strove against it, saying, "We mustn't have idols." "I feel I am not my own—I am bought with a price." She used to stand over me when I was in bed, and advise me to cast up my accounts before I went to sleep. Often counselled us to watchfulness and inwardness, and not to think we must fill up every spare moment with reading.

About the year 1839, John and Maria Gardner, who were some months and a quarter to my parents, to give them an opportunity to look round for a house to suit themselves down there, several friends having a desire we would remove and live among them, and my mother especially wishing to live in a meeting which she fancied would cause less weight on her spirit than Croydon with its large school. The bait was alluring—besides having a brother and sister there. They gave notice to leave Croydon, and partly because to pack. Mother went to Manchester to visit a sister, not expecting to settle down again in Croydon. Father went down to Chelmsford once more to see J. C.'s house. At Manchester mother began to feel very uneasy in the prospect of moving. She was reluctant to grieve father, still it came to her, "Husband and wife are one, I must tell him my mind." She wrote, and what was her joy to have a letter from him next day, which had crossed her's on the road, telling her that on his going down to Chelmsford, and while he was there, such a cloud rested on him, he felt he dared not proceed in the affair. This circumstance she often related, under the firm persuasion we ought to look for Divine direction in all our steps—"What an attainment it is to have no will of our own. That's what I strive after."

But experience has taught me, that even in those places, where the people are favored with a living ministry, by their calling for, and relying upon help from the servants, they fall away from the life of religion in themselves.—T. Greer to J. Conran.

SULLIVAN'S EXPEDITION AGAINST THE NEW YORK INDIANS.

This expedition was sent by Washington, in 1779, and succeeded in the object of its mission. In this connexion the reader, if well read in the history of the school reading, or even if familiar with the school reading books of a half century ago and more recently, will recall the thrilling burst of eloquence from the lips of William Pitt, Earl Chatham, when he denounced in Parliament the government that proposed "to let loose the inhuman savages of the woods upon our countrymen in America, and to use by every tie that can sanctify humanity." The venerable orator, our noble advocate, rose in invective and poetic sublimity until upon the tapestry that adorned the halls of parliament he seemed to see the "immortal ancestor of the noble lord" who had proposed this horrible scheme, "frown with indignation at the disgrace of his country."

For months, at intervals, the subject of the Indian outrages had been considered in Congress, and the Massacre of Wyoming called forth special resolutions; but other matters were suffered to intervene, and no action resulted from so much well-worled sympathy. New York at length took a decided step towards protecting the outlying districts, and Congress listened to the communication from that Province, whose Governor, George Clinton, intended to conduct an expedition in person, against the common foe. Measures were taken to collect an army, but there were many obstacles to be overcome. The country was Bread was scarce, wages high, employment abundant, while the pay of the soldier was small and uncertain. Many considered the war virtually at an end, and were unwilling to make sacrifices or supply the means necessary for important military operations. A defensive policy only was finally assented to, with the exception of this western expedition against the Indians, whom Washington declared "must be warred upon in their own style, their country penetrated, their villages and settlements laid waste, and at the same time the British fort at Niagara, that nestling place of Tories and refugees destroyed." This policy prevailed, and the campaign was at once set on foot.

The head quarters of the force was first established at Easton, Pennsylvania. The troops were thence removed to Wyoming, then recently the scene of that bloody massacre that had so shocked the sensibilities of Christendom. Here three thousand troops were assembled, and on the 31st of 5th month, 1779, this army began its march for Tioga, by the way of the northern branch of the Susquehanna, being conveyed up that stream by one hundred and fifty boats. The commissariat was poorly supplied, more than one-third of Sullivan's men were without shirts. Many of the cattle were too weak to walk, and of the horses supplied, fifty were worn out and unable to travel a day's march beyond the Chemung river, where they were abandoned and shot. Here the Indians afterwards collected the heads of the slaughtered animals and arranged them along the trail, which circumstance gave to this place its present name of Horse-heads.

The New York contribution to the army, under General Clinton, the Governor, amounted to sixteen hundred men, having marched from the Valley of the Mohawk by way of Otsego Lake and the easterly bank of the Susquehanna, joined the army of Sullivan north near the junction of the Tioga and north branch of the Susquehanna rivers. The advanced branch of Clinton's army into the region around Otsego Lake, was so unexpected and so formidable in character, that it spread terror among the families of the Indians, who fled in great numbers to near Newtown, now Elmira, and after the battle at the latter place, sought refuge among the Senecas of the Genesee Valley.

On the 26th of 8th month, the combined armies began their march through an unknown wilderness, in which unbridged creeks and rivers were to be forded, and mountain defiles to be threaded, and morasses to be crossed, while guides were utterly untravellers were very untravellers. A foe familiar with every pass, and at home on every trail, hovered upon their flanks. Three days after they arrived at Newtown, where the Indians and Tories, one thousand strong, under Butler and Brant, were found entrenched behind well-constructed earth-works, a short distance below the present city of Elmira. Field pieces were at once opened upon their defences by Sullivan, and their retreat was cut off by the light troops. Seeing that they were in danger of being surrounded, they quitted their works and took themselves to precipitate flight. The defeat proved decisive. The leaders could not again bring the savages face to face with the army marching to invade their homes, and were obliged constantly to retreat, though not without some success, until they were driven to the Seneca blow.

Red Jacket, it is said, held private councils with the young chiefs and more timid sachems, to induce them to sue for peace. He at one time sent a secret runner to Sullivan's camp, to advise the general to dispatch a flag of truce with certain propositions. Brant being privately informed of these proceedings, but fearful to disclose them, detailed two confidential warriors to waylay and kill the bearer of the flag of truce before he should reach the Indian camp.

The Indian village of Newtown was laid in ashes, and the surrounding crops of corn and beans destroyed, and the army resumed its march for Catherine town, the home of the half blood Queen Catharine Montour, near the head of Seneca Lake. With indomitable persistence, Sullivan pushed on in intense darkness through a hemlock swamp, in which his men and horses often sank deep in the treacherous slough, and from which many of them were unable to escape until the following day. He arrived at the town at midnight. A few Indians might, in many a defile, have almost destroyed the band, but they ceased to watch their enemy through the night, believing the swamp impassable. In the mazes of this swamp many cattle were killed and a number of pack horses lost, but the men all arrived in safety in the morning. Catharine's town was found and consisted of thirty houses, several of them quite good, but all were destroyed, together with orchards and growing crops of beans, corn and other vegetables.

An incident here occurred which proves that there was some humanity on the part of the army, however ready to destroy the towns and crops of the Indians as a military necessity. A Cayuga squaw of great age had been left in Catharine's town by the Indians in their precipitate flight, and was found in the neighboring woods. The soldiers at once provided for her present wants, and treated her with kindness during their stay. Before leaving the town, which had nearly while been burnt, they erected a hut for her and gathered a quantity of wood for her use. They also left her a supply of provisions which she was found using on the army's return. Such unexpected treatment drew tears from her eyes, and made her quite communicative, and she assured the officers that the squaws generally were anxious that the Indians should remain in their village and make peace with the Yankees. Red Jacket, who was often the advocate of the squaw's council, was probably endeavoring to serve them by his course above referred to.

Translation of a Letter from some Quakers France, to Edward Fox, in consequence of Advertisement from him in regard to his father's share of Prize-money to the sufferers sundry captures of a privateer whereof his father was part owner, amounting to several thousand pounds sterling.

[The following letter will probably be read with interest, in connection with the account which appeared in "The Friend" of the 11th month 6th (as copied from The British Friend) concerning the circumstance set forth in the foregoing title. This manuscript translation appears to have been found among the papers of Robert Pleasants, of Charles Neck, James River, Virginia. The said R. P. maintains an extensive correspondence with Friends in Philadelphia, and among the rest with Anthony Benzet, to whom he may have been indebted for the translation. I am not aware that it has heretofore appeared in print. The letter of these Frenchmen manifests the real Christian spirit of true Friends, in that, while commending Dr. Fox for his part in so honorable and so eminent a service, yet they believed it due from them not to repress their expression of a concern that he might be misrepresented as "the unblemished vice of a corrupt metropolis." The paragraph in the letter where George Fox is referred to as "one of our venerable founders," is historically worthy of remark, inasmuch as it had been supposed that it was not until the circumstance of the refunding of the prize-money, that the existence of a body of people professing nearly identical religious principles in England had been made known to these Friends of France. J. W. L.]

The Quakers of Congenies, Calcutta, to the virtuous Fox.

Friend Fox:—The testimony which the East borne to France, of thy inviolable attachment to the true principles of Christ, and thy pacific and humane disposition which inclines thee to do good to thy enemies, has caused the hearts of our brethren, who are thy friends—though sequestered from the world and 150 leagues from thee—to leap for joy.

We are a little flock of about 100 persons who being restored to the divine life by faithful obedience to the Divine Spirit, are united in heart and brotherly love, and are commissioned by them to inform thee of this heart-tendering effect of thy proceedings in their minds, and the esteem and affection which they have inspired them with.

We do not offer thee worldly praise; thou hast done no more than obey the voice of the internal light; the reward is in thy own breast. Even those who live after the flesh admire thee, being astonished at proceedings of which they find themselves incapable; for our part, who think as thou dost, and who only practise spiritual worship, all our minds are united in approbation of thy late eminent act of humanity, whilst thou art fulfilling these divine precepts of Christ: "If thy enemy unger, feed him, if he thirst, give him drink, and revenge not yourselves." "Although thy countrymen were the enemies of France, thou and all our friends called in contempt Quakers are always regarded us as brethren, and have part in our prayers and our breathings.

The enlivening breath which has led thee out of our country, has also penetrated our souls, and excited us afresh to all the good works of which thou hast given us an example. Proceed, dear friend, with undaunted courage and uncorruptible zeal in the good work thou hast begun. Let not the numberless voices of a corrupt metropolis convey any injury to the purity of thy faith; escape victoriously from all the snares which many people will lay for thy integrity; consider in the approved crowd, who will narrowly scrutinize if thy actions to attempt to invalidate that eminent virtue from whence thy good works arise, and [to] turn the peoples' eyes from the stre with which thou hast appeared to them, at thou canst do nothing unseen by the supreme Being; also, that as thy actions pass under the rigorous examination of slanderers, they must either occasion in the spectators the greatest respect or the greatest contempt of our religious principles.

Perhaps friend Fox will charge us with presumption for admonishing him after this manner unknown; but our minds which are united to thee require it of us, and we implicitly obey the requirements as a sincere testimony which we give thee of our esteem and our most tender affection.

Thou hearest, dear friend Fox, the name of one of our venerable founders, as dear to our hearts as that of William Penn, and we all hope that the spirit which enlightened his soul will always direct thy conduct to make thee still more respectable to all men.

Thy first testimony has much contributed to strengthen the courage and the faith of our amicable Society, and in the first effusions of our minds we all united to testify the sincere affection thou hast inspired us with and the love which thou hast renewed in us for all our brethren, amongst whom thou wilt always hold a distinguished rank. Condescend dearest to communicate what may concern thy welfare, in which we shall always take a most affectionate part.

Although we are here the objects of hatred and contempt of the Catholics and Protestants, we rejoice in being hated and despised for the name of Christ, who foretold such things, to only answer their injuries with blessings and acts of kindness, and daily give thanks for the toleration which the clemency of a virtuous Prince* and the goodness of his ministers hath for a long time granted to us. We hope that our submission to our sovereigns, our love to our brethren, and our peaceable tenets, (which make us blame war and ancient revolt of the Protestants as an abominable rebellion against the divine will,) which we have always faithfully preserved to all the sovereigns which God hath granted to us, will one day incline this benevolent father and pity on his submissive children who re-lect the little number of Quakers who live under his laws to bearing their arms, which are so expressly forbidden to be used. "Do good to thy enemy, and resist not him that striketh thee."

O worthy friend who has just fulfilled this divine precept towards us, receive kindly all the testimonies of our joy and of our love, as the emotions of a heart sincere, and true desires to do as much, and daily making all its efforts to imitate thee. All our worthy friends embrace thee, and ardently desire the pleasure of hearing from thee, which they request of thee as a mark of friendship. If thou think us worthy of an answer, direct it to A. M. Marolier, at the post-office, Nismes.

We all wish thee peace and felicity.

For "The Friend."

The weather during the last three months has certainly been remarkable, but a historian is said to report itself, no doubt the first of weather is within the recollection of many. Referring to a record kept by the writer, it appears that the average of the temperature of the three winter months, at sunrise, has been nearly alike, viz: for the Twelfth month nearly 35 degrees, and the coldest morning was the 27th, the thermometer then standing at 12°, the warmest on the 11th, being then 61°. The average for the First month 35°, the 14th being the coldest, viz, 8°, and 52° the warmest on the 12th. The average for the Second month, 34.3, 11° being the coldest, which was on the 2nd of the month, and the warmest on the 13th, it being then 58°. The following notes on the weather are taken from Robert Sutcliffe's Travels in this country, in the years 1804, 1805, and 1806, published by B. & T. Kite, in 1812:

"1805. 1st month 4th. This day was remarkably cold, far beyond anything I had ever experienced in England. The thermometer being down as low as 12, about 20 degrees below the freezing point. The river Delaware, which is more than a mile over, and which has a strong current, was quickly frozen over to that degree that horses and carriages, heavily laden, were seen traversing from one side to the other in great numbers; chiefly with fire wood from the Jersey shore. Exclusive of these, parties of pleasure were seen driving along in sledges or sleighs upon the ice. These kinds of carriages are made in various fantastic forms, resting upon sliders shod with iron or steel.

"1st month 6th. In company with T. W. I crossed the Delaware upon the ice. The tide flows to the height of about six feet in this river, and in it are some sand banks, which are seen at low water. These circumstances produce a very singular and romantic appearance, by the large sheets of ice being obstructed and accumulated in various parts of the river, having the resemblance of large blocks of white marble piled on heaps. There being a constant intercourse between the two shores of the Delaware, it is curious to observe the various means which the owners of the ferries-boats use, to counteract the effects of the frost, on its first setting in, so as to preserve the communication open. On these occasions they make use of a boat that has two sliders, one on each side of the keel, shod with iron, and as the shallow parts of the river are first and on coming to those which are frozen, they drag the boat out of the water, and push it along the ice, until they come to the deep places, when the boat is again plunged into the water. Thus they go on till they reach the opposite shore; and as it will of course sometimes happen, in the early part of the frost, that between the ice and the shallow water, the ice is not sufficiently strong to support the boat; in this case it is common for one of the ferrymen to sit at the head of the boat, with his feet hanging out, loaded with a pair of heavy iron-bound boots, and with a long pole in his hands. With these he labors with all his might to break the ice, and make way for the boat.*

"1st month 21st to 1st month 31st. The frost still continuing very severe, I made frequent excursions upon the ice of the Delaware, where a great many ships lay bound fast by the frost. One very large vessel, I noticed, called the Connecticut, which had now been frozen in for nearly a month, being nearly a hundred in number. This ship was intended for a voyage to Domingo, and was completely armed as a regular vessel of war. As most of the men had received part of their wages in advance, and the owners were fearful they might take advantage of the ship being thus detained and leave her, they had fixed a strong net-work all round her, reaching from the beam nearly as high as the yards. The crew being thus inclosed, had the appearance of a flock of birds in a cage. This kind of net-work is sometimes made use of in time of action, to prevent being boarded by the enemy."

The following which brings to remembrance a worthy Friend, is now transcribed as bearing on the times though not on the weather.

"The negroes in the Island of Domingo having thrown off the French yoke, and set up an emperor of their own color, the French Government had, in consequence declared them rebels; and, having prohibited all intercourse with them, this circumstance occasioned the Americans to arm their ships which traded to that island. About this time James Pemberton sent a number of Friends' books to the Black Emperor, as a present, accompanied with a letter; to which James received a reply and acknowledgment, written in a very singular style; the substance of the reply was, as I understood it, that he was obliged to him for the books; but that he was determined to be Emperor of Haiti, (the Indian name for Domingo,) in defiance of both the Friends and Quakers. Notwithstanding this determination, he has since been cut off by his enemies.

"2nd month 4th. I attended the Quarterly Meeting in this city, in which a testimony on account of W. Savery was produced and read, expressive of the high estimation in which he was held by Friends here.

"2nd month 21st. I still continued in Philadelphia; and this afternoon was pleasantly spent at S. S.'s. The next day I attended the Middle Month Meeting, where I was gratified with the sight of a young man presenting an acknowledgment to Friends on account of having been cut off, which he had been disowned. During the time of his separation, he had married an amiable young woman who was convinced of the truth of Friends' principles, and joined the Society. The impression made upon the meeting, on his presenting an acknowledgment, was such that he was reinstated in the Society before the meeting separated."

OCCUPATIONS OF A RETIRED GENTLEMAN.

How various his employments, whom the world Calls idle; and who justly in return Esteems that busy world an idler too!
Friends, books, a garden, and perhaps his pen,
Delightful industry enjoyed at home,
And nature in her cultivated trim,
Can he waste time, inviting him abroad—
Dressed to his taste, inviting who has these?
Will he be idle who has much to enjoy?
Me therefore, studious of laborious ease,
Not slothful, happy to devote the time,
Not waste it, and aware that human life Is but a loan to be repaid with use,
From whom we'd at our dressings, o'ermiss uns
E'en here: while sedulous I seek to improve,
At least neglect not, or be unemployed,
The mind He gave me; driving it, though slack
Too oft, and much impeded in its work
By causes not to be divalged in vain,
To its just point—the service of mankind.
He that attends to his interior self,
That has a heart, and keeps it; and a mind
That hungers and supplies it; and who seeks
A social, not a dissipated life,
Has business; feels himself engaged to achieve
No unimportant, though a silent task.
A life all turbulence and noise may seem
To him that leads it, wise and to be praised;
But wisdom is a pearl with most success
Sought in still water, and beneath clear skies.
He that is ever occupied in storms,
Or dives not for it, or brings up instead,
Vainly industrious, a disgraceful prize.

TRUST.

"In quietness and confidence shall be your strength,"
Isaiah xxx. 15.

Selected.

Be quiet, soul:
Why should'st thou care and sadness borrow
Why sit in nameless fear and sorrow
The livelong day?
God will mark out thy path to-morrow
In his best way.

Be quiet, soul:
There is no need of thought and crying,
There is no need for anxious sighing,
God's love to know;
Dost thou remember not his dying,
Who loved thee so?

Be trustful, soul:
Each day, for sweet thy Father careth,
Each day, in thee compassion alarheth
Thine every ill;
Even thy sin for thee He beareth,
And loves thee still.

Be trustful, soul:
When some dark cloud shuts before thee
Light that hath hitherto shone o'er thee,
Doubt not, nor fear;
But know God does it to assure thee
That He is near.

Be trustful, soul:
Remember God forgets thee never;
He who in grace stands waiting ever
Thy way to guide,
Shall surely hold thee, soul, forever
Close to his side.

SIMILARITY OF THOUGHT.

In these days when not a little is said about progress, it may interesting to see how the thoughts of different persons often run in the same channels. The following extracts from Pythagoras, George Herbert, Charles Wesley, Longfellow, Watson, and two anonymous writers, show how similar thoughts are often similarly expressed. We can hardly suppose that either of the writers of these pieces, especially the first four, intentionally borrowed either the thoughts or expressions of another, and yet there is a likeness, both of thought and expression, running through all. Each of the extracts impresses an important lesson, and may aid the reader to a wise and helpful self-examination.

I.

Thrice ask, as fades each sun's last ray,
What's been my life throughout this day?
What have I learned that's worth the knowing?
What have I done that's worth the doing?
What have I sought that I should shun?
What duties done, or left undone?
Such self-inquiries are the road
That leads to virtue and to God.

Pethonaras.

II.

Sum up at night, what thou hast done by day,
And in the morning what thou hast to do.
Dress and undress thy soul; mark the decay
And growth of it. If with thy watch, that too
Be down, then wind up both. Since thou shalt be Most surely judged, make thine accounts agree.

George Herbert.

III.

At evening, to myself I say,
Where hast thou been and gleaned to-day,
Thy labors how bestowed?
What hast thou rightly said or done?
What grace attained, what knowledge won,
In following after God?

C. Wesley.

IV.

The day is drawing to its close,
And what good deeds, since first it rose,
Have I presented, Lord, to thee?
What wrongs repressed; what fruits maintained;
What struggles passed; what victories gained,
What good attempted and attained,
As offerings of my ministry?

Longfellow.

V.

As sets the sun, search thou thine heart,
And ask how thou the day hast spent;
If faithfully thou hast improved
The talents that thy God hath lent.
What hast thou learned from failures past?
What evils hast thou sought to shun?
What's mine subdued; what wrongs redressed;
What good to others hast thou done?
Thus to each day let thought be given,
'Twill aid thee on thy way to heaven.

Watson.

VI.

What have I learned this day?
What good deeds have I done?
What kindness shown, what victories gained;
What wrongs sought to shun?
Such tests for every passing day,
Aid us to walk the upward way!

Exchange.

VII.

If you set down at set of sun,
And count the acts that you have done;
And counting, find
One self-denying act, and word
That eased the heart of him that heard—
One glance most kind,
That fell like sunshine where it went,
Then you may count that day well spent.
But if, through all the livelong day,
You've cheered no heart by yea or nay;
If, through it all,
You've nothing done that you can trace,
That brought the sunshine to one face;
No act most small,
That helped some soul, and nothing cost,
Then count that day as worse than lost.

Rise of Superstition.

A recent work on Madagascar, by Jam Sibree, contains an instructive chapter, pointing out how some of the superstitions early crept into the Christian church, and illustrations and counterparts among the Malagasy tribes who have of late years professed belief in Christianity. It also explains the necessity for those exhortations to morality which are contained in the epistles of the apostles.

In the heathen state of the Malagasy there was no stigma attached to such sins as impurity, deceit or fraud; these latter were rather admired as proof of supercunning, as things to be imitated, so far at least as they would not bring the offence within the penalties of the native laws. Such was very much the condition of the old Pag world. Those who had long been exposed to such influences, who lived in communities where the same feeling was strong around them, and where there was no purified opinion to restrain, would be easily led into these evils, and would require line upon line and precept upon precept. It is not therefore surprising that men and women who are capable at times of rising to a sublime elevation of self-denial for Christ's sake, should in the seasons of unwatchfulness descend to vile and unworthy actions. Superficial converts are apt to infer that the religion, such weak brethren is a piece of hypocrisy and deceit from beginning to end; but this is an unfair and untrue conclusion.

Our author says: "The Malagasy miracle that of the most other semi-civilized peoples, is a fertile soil for the rapid growth of all sorts of superstitious notions. Malagasy idolatry is mainly a belief in ody or charms—charms to prevent evil of various kinds, to obtain certain benefits. So that unlike great care is taken on the part of the teachers and guides of such people when they have only lately come out of heathenism, the superstitious ideas are almost inevitably transferred to the two great symbolic ordinances of the Christian religion; and Baptism as the Lord's Supper are immediately regarded as the Christian ody or charms. So much the case that I have often seriously debated whether it would not be best to defer for a considerable time the introduction of both sacraments until the people's minds had been further enlightened, and some groundwork of knowledge laid down. Otherwise they are almost certain to regard those two symbolic observances as means of obtaining some vague benefit, quite irrespective of the moral condition of those receiving them.

"It would be ludicrous, were it not al adding, to see how baptism is regarded amongst the semi-heathen Malagasy. In some cases people have come up from the country districts saying they wished "to pray to the apostles"; in others they ask that they may drink baptism, probably confounding the two sacraments together. Soon after the burning of the idols in the central provinces in 1869, when the Queen and Government gave in their adhesion to Christianity, there was a great rush to worship; and when they heard that their sovereign and the Prime Minister had been baptized, immediately eagerness came forward to receive the ordinance, while yet utterly ignorant of its meaning, and in very many places, especially in those away from the control of a missionary or an enlightened native pastor, great numbers of people, sometimes even by hundreds at once, were baptized. In a very large proportion these there is no doubt that a desire to do their rulers had done was almost the sole motive of their action, while in others there is probably the vague expectation of gaining some unknown spiritual benefit. Even among our more intelligent Christian people is curious to see what a superstitious notion attaches to the symbol itself. Some years ago one of my brother missionaries as preaching in a village congregation in his district, not far from the capital, and being on a first Sunday in the month he had to preach at the Lord's Supper. But before that he had partaken of it had also to baptize several people, and the water for that purpose was brought (as is frequently the case) in one of the cups used for the wine at the other sacrament. As soon as the baptism was over the water was, of course, needed for this special purpose; but here a difficulty occurred to the deacons. What was to be done with the water? A little consultation took place; they appeared to think it improper to throw away what had been used for a sacred purpose, and so at last, to solve the difficult problem, one of them took up the cup, and drank its contents!

"But the sacrament of the Lord's Supper still more liable to abuse by ignorant and enlightened people."

"By a considerable number of the communicants the Lord's Supper is certainly regarded a kind of charm, for many come to no purpose except that on the first Sunday morning of the month, when very large congregations assemble; and they evidently think at by thus once a month receiving the sacrament they have sanctified the rest of the time, and gained some spiritual advantage. Not a few do not even attend the preceding service of worship and preaching, but just come in to the communion service only; while now and then, some will even slip in towards the conclusion of the service, and ask the deacons to procure them some bread and wine."

Indian Honesty.

A Canada correspondent of The Episcopal Aard, who takes satisfaction in its efforts denounce the wrongs done to the Indians of our country, sends to it the following interesting item from the Saskatchewan Herald.

"Battleford.—Some months ago four head cattle belonging to the Lieutenant-Governor strayed away from Battleford. They traveled north, and were discovered by some Indians on the plains about seventy miles from here. Reasoning that they had strayed from the north, two of the Indians were deputed to drive them to Battleford in the hope of finding an owner for them. The conduct of these men, who were non-treaty Indians, in thus undertaking to bring the cattle across the plains in the depth of winter on the mere chance of finding an owner for them, at a time when they were short of provisions and a fear had killed the animals without any reward of five dollars a head for bringing in stray cattle, the Governor gave the Indians a substantial evidence of his appreciation of their sterling honesty.

"The fact is, Indians can, in this dominion, be raised in the moral scale and made to appreciate a paternal government and to value institutions which punish vice and reward honesty, but the custom is to depreciate and destroy, and make sport of 'Lo, the poor Indian,' by American journalists and publicists.

Yours,

JOHN HILLARD.

Ontario, Feb. 25, 1880."

The Meeting at Firbank Chapel and its Results.

The thoughtful reader may have noticed in the lively narrative by Charles Marshall, that those who were convinced under the powerful ministry of John Camm or John Audland, and turned to their Saviour as revealed by his Light and Spirit in their hearts, were led in the same steps as those preachers had themselves been compelled to walk in. They were made to feel their alienation from God, and brought into fervent concern and anxiety to have all removed from them that the divine controversy was with; and were made willing to know the spirit of judgment and of burning to work effectually in them for their purification. They became, as C. Marshall expressed, "a plain, broken-hearted, contrite, spirit, self-denying people." Such will ever be the effect on those whose greatest concern is "to obtain through Jesus Christ the great work of salvation, and thereby an assurance of everlasting rest."

Charles Marshall further remarks: "I have learned of the Lord through many exercises unexpressed, that after the visitation of the Almighty to any soul, the Lord requires an inward worthy receiving his love, and spiritual watch to be kept in his holy sight, in which * * * supplicating breathings arise to the living, eternal God of love and compassion. When there is an abatement of the inward and spiritual care, and a gradual lessening of the inward watchfulness, then the mind becomes both unworthy and incapable of the enjoyments of the power of the Lord that began and carried on the work of the Lord."

John Camm and John Audland did not altogether escape that persecution which so plentifully attended their brethren in those days; yet their portion of physical suffering on this account was less than that of many others. On one occasion as they were going to a meeting about two miles out of Bristol they were assaulted by the rabble who violently abused them with beating and kicking; crying "knock them down, kill them, hang them." Thus they were driven back and forced into the city again, narrowly escaping with their lives.

Thomas Camm says of his father that through his many travels, "his outward body did waste and his strength spend exceedingly, having a most violent cough, so that for several years before his death, he was never able to walk on foot half a mile at one time; nay, many times he was not able to go up one pair of stairs into a meeting-place, without help, yet nevertheless while the meeting continued (through the enlivening power and Spirit of God) would have been over the sense of his bodily weakness, but after the meeting was over, many times as one ready to be dissolved.

"In this outward weakness he travelled through many countries and places of the nation, to the confirming and strengthening of the work of God, and strengthening himself taking me along with him to wait upon him, his weakness being grown so great, that he was not able many times to get on or off his horse without help; through all which the Lord brought him, his faith being fixed in his power; and his life and whole delight was in the prosperity of truth and righteousness in the earth among the sons of men.

"When he grew near his end, his weakness increasing, he had great joy as he always had in the company of Friends that were faithful, of which many came to visit him; and many times he would have been wonderfully opened with the power of the Lord, and overcome with the sense of his love and peace, and a fresh testimony thereof he would often bear, to the great refreshment of Friends and his family, when he lay in great weakness upon his bed.

"His great care in all his travels was, that the gospel of Christ which he had to publish, might be without charge, for that he given up to the service of truth, so that he was willing to lay out part of the same in his travels; also his heart and house was open to entertain all Friends that came in truth's service, having a great comfort therein; he was a pattern of faithfulness in suffering for truth's testimony; though never much in prison, yet his goods were often spoiled or taken away, which he suffered joyfully in truth's testimony against tithes, in which testimony, and all other relating to truth, he was ever firm, and never shrunk in the least; his frequent exhortations were to all Friends and his family, to be valiant and noble for truth, and to keep their faith in God's power, and never to look out, or consult with the wisdom of the world.

"He did often call his children and family together, and exhort them with much fervency of spirit, to fear the Lord, and walk in holiness of life, as becomes the gospel that they had believed in; and would often pray to the Lord for us, and bless us in his name, some months before he died; he would often call for me to be with him, for he loved me entirely, and it was my joy and delight to serve and obey him in all things; and many times he would wonderfully extol the name of the Lord, and praise Him for his goodness and great mercy, counting his bodily weakness a happiness, being sanctified unto Him by that word eternal, which had sanctified his soul, and made him an honorable vessel, to the praise of his God, under the sense of which he would say, 'How great a benefit do I enjoy beyond many, who have such a large time of preparation for death, being dying daily, that I may live for ever with my God in that kingdom that's unspeakably full of glory; my outward man daily wastes and moulders down, and draws towards its place and centre, but my inward man revives and mounts upward towards its place and habitation in the heavens, in the sense wherein his soul would often wonderfully magnify the Lord.

"That very morning that he departed this transitory life, he called my mother, the children and family unto him, gave us many good and reasonable instructions, to fear the Lord, love his way and truth, and to walk in it with upright hearts; charging us that his loving unto one another, telling us that his glass was run, the time of his departure was come, he was to enter into everlasting case, joy and rest; charging us all to be patient, and content with God's parting with him, as to the outward, and so presently fainting passed quietly away into a sweet sleep; whereupon we were all so overcome with sorrow and weeping, some of us aloud, as one out of sleep he was again awakened, and desired to be a little helped up in his bed, speaking to this effect, 'My dear hearts, you have wronged me, and disturbed me, for I was at sweet rest, you should not so passionately sorrow for my departure, this house of earth and clay must go to its place; but this soul and spirit was to be gathered up to the Lord, to live with Him forever, where we should meet with everlasting joy;' so again taking his leave of every one of us, and charging us to be content with his departure, lay down (and we being troubled, and reflecting upon ourselves for the disturbance we had given him through our impatience, endeavored contentedness) and in a little time he departed, as to the outward, but lives with us in the spirit; and being dead his life preaches, and is a sweet savor to the Lord and his people. His departed this life in 1656, being the seventh day of the week, and the next day was his body laid in Friends' burying-place at Birkrigg-Park, he being the first that was buried in that place."

Female Education in France.

Professor Wells, in the Christian Advocate, regards with much satisfaction the action of the French Chambers in giving the privilege of founding schools of a higher order for the education of girls, and granting money for that purpose. Heretofore a large part of the girls belonging to the upper classes of society have been instructed in the convents, where they are secluded during the years in which they are approaching womanhood, and placed under priestly control. Of the education there received, he says:

"Their religious instruction consists of little else than the lives of the saints, and the repetition of the Catholic catechism and the duty of intense loyalty to all the commands of the priests. This work, with daily religious duties, absorbs most of their time, while they learn but the merest elements of a civil education, to which are added what are understood as feminine accomplishments in the line of needle-work and music. They leave these institutions absolutely destitute of any practical knowledge that will aid them in the duties and burdens of life, and, as a rule, they remain for life under the influence of the priest, who interferes in all their affairs from the cradle to the grave.

Now the present Republican State is jealous of this power of the Church, which imbues the mothers of France with an antagonism to free institutions, and it is endeavoring to wrest the girls of the country from the grasp of the priests, and provide them with a liberal higher education.

The women of France are notoriously ignorant of what is known as secular instruction, and the [Roman] Church has had hitherto entire control of their training; it alone is responsible for this. The Republic wishes to raise the modern woman to the level of the modern man, and proposes to do it by means of higher schools for women than they have hitherto enjoyed.

It is needless to say that it was a very bold move on the part of the French Republicans, to make a demand so contrary to the general sentiment of the country as the public education of girls, who in France are kept so closely under surveillance as to make it a natural belief that they need always to be locked up in a convent, or somewhere else, to keep them safe; and it is a very gratifying fact to ourselves to know that the friends of the measure draw their weightiest arguments from the female colleges in the United States, and the general system of female education among us. Many very well-meaning Frenchmen held up their hands in horror at the thought that girls are here taught Latin and Greek, and the physical and mathematical sciences, and, forsooth, even rhetoric, philosophy, and political economy; and acknowledged that this virile education might do for an American woman. But what in the world can a French woman do with such knowledge?

And this was the wise reply: 'She can become capable of training her children for the result, therefore, was a resolve to establish in all populous centres high schools for girls at the expense of the State, with a liberal curriculum in studies, and no interference with the religious leanings of the pupils. These are simply to be day-schools, unless the local authorities choose at their own expense to add boarding-schools to them. This is a stupendous undertaking, and requires a great deal of money. Two hundred millions of francs was voted.'

The following advices are taken from the third English edition of our Discipline, printed in 1840.

To Ministers—Let ministers be careful how they enter upon disputed points in their testimony; or make such objections as they do not clearly answer; or give repeated expectations of coming to a conclusion.

Let ministers at all times be tender of each others' reputation; and let them be watchful not to hurt each others' service in religious meetings, but let every one have a tender regard for others. Let nothing be done or offered with a view to popularity, but in humility and in the fear of the Lord.

They are advised to have a godly care of judging or contradicting one another in public meetings; or showing any marks or signs of division therein, amongst ministers or others; it being of a very pernicious consequence to bring blame or contempt upon the ministry, and a great hurt to our youth and others.—Printed Epistle, 1716.

Means for Worship.—In all our meetings appointed for religious worship, wait with reverence and devotion of heart and soul for the power and life-giving presence of God which is the crown and diadem of our assemblies. Take care, we beseech you, in this day of ease and liberty, lest lukewarmness and indifference prevail over you, to the stopping of the streams of the water of life, and render you like the barren heath in the desert which knoweth not when good comes. Went out you to be especially watchful in the behalf, that an indolent and sluggish disposition appear not among you, to the stumbling of such serious inquirers as may attend of meetings, in expectation of that life and power to which the observation of your indifferency and unconcernedness may give them too just cause to suspect that ye yourselves are strangers.—P. E., 1741.

In all your meetings for the worship Almighty God, let your deportment be such as may demonstrate that you are in earnest in the great duty of waiting upon and worshiping God in Spirit; that serious and tender-hearted inquirers may be encouraged, and also partake in your assemblies, of the inward and spiritual consolation and refreshment, which the Lord is graciously pleased to impart to the souls of such as are humble in his sight, and approach his holy presence with reverence and fear.—P. E., 1744.

Let every one be watchful against an earthly spirit, for that will choke the good seed and bring forth a slighting or neglecting your testimony in your First day and weekday meeting, and bring a decay of yec strength and zeal for God and his truth, a bring a weakness upon you, by reason where you will not be able to stand in an hour temptation.—P. E., 1689.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Valuable Rubbish.—Turning from natural processes to those of man, we find that he doing his best, however clumsily, to follow the thrifty example she sets him. For many a year no doubt the pine tree shed its pointed, needle-like leaves in the Silsbee forests, and there they were left to decay a turn into mold at their leisure, until M. Pannwitz started a manufactory for converting them into forest-wool, which, besides being efficacious in cases of rheumatism when applied in its woolly state, can also be curdled, or woven. Mixed with cotton, it has even been used for blankets and wearing apparel. The history of gas-making best shows the value of "rubbish." To begin with the coal which yields most gas is what termed "canal" coal, and is now worth twenty-five to thirty shillings a ton or more; whereas fifty years ago it was looked upon as almost worthless. In distilling coal gas, a liquor is produced which for a long time was so great an inconvenience to the gas companies that they actually paid a permission to drain it into the common sewer as the simplest way of getting rid of it. This gas liquor contains salts of ammonia, together with naphtha and tar, and the tar is now made by repeated distillation to yield pitch, benzene, creosote, carbolic acid, the substance known as paraffine and aniline. It seems strange now that these valuable products should have been thrown away as useless; it is stranger to it to learn that we derive from one of these waste substances the whole series of beautiful colors called aniline dyes. Naphtha is another resinous product, by a novel application of which it is said that the light giving properties of gas may be enhanced manifold, at a very trifling cost. But the uses to which the waste liquor of the gas works may be put are not yet exhausted; for not only is it turned to account itself, but combined with the slaty shales found among the coal, which were also at one time a source of perpetual annoyance, it yields alum—used in the manufacture of paper and preparation of other; copperas or green vitriol (sulphate of iron), used in dyeing, tanning and the manufacture of ink, and Prussian blue, and sulphuric acid.

Rags are now recognized as such a valuable commodity that in some countries their export is forbidden by government; nevertheless, from one source or another the paper-makers of England alone import annually some eighteen or twenty thousand tons of linen and cotton rags, and collect large quantities at home. These rags are of very various degrees of cleanliness, as may be imagined, and all of the English ones require no bleaching at all, while those of Italy bear away the palm for dirt. Old sails are made into the paper used for bank-notes, so it is said, and ropes reappear as brown paper, but many other things besides flax, hemp and cotton are now used in the manufacture, and paper made and remade over and over again. Not scrap of paper need be wasted, for there are plenty of persons ready to buy it, and if not good enough for remanufacture as paper, it always be converted into papier-mache, matter what its color or quality. Cuttings, paper covered by bookbinders, paste-board makers, envelope cutters, pocket-book makers &c. paper hangings are readily bought up; so, too, are tons' weight of old ledgers, account books by the paper-mache manufacturer, together with old letters and any other paper rubbish, giving a pledge that all will be promptly consigned to destruction in his large vat; and out of this heterogeneous assemblage he produces a substance so strong and firm and durable that it has been suggested as suitable for making soldiers' hats even ships.—Chambers' Journal.

Too Innocent to be Killed.—The venerable Dr. Dana, of Yale College, graphically debases to his classes the "perfect little birds" of the South Pacific Islands, which he visited, and his feelings when capturing specimens in the interest of science. One bird, says, completely disarmed him. "The bird stood still; it turned its head and looked me; its eyes shone with a singularly soft, unshed light. I lowered my gun. How did I fire? I crept toward it. It was a useful creature. It did not move. I thought it was gratified at the sight of me, as if it had never seen a man before; I do not suppose that it ever had. I crawled up; I stretched out my hand, and yet it did not fly; I touched it, I stroked it—with my hand I stroked that magnificent unknown creature. It did not shrink. I took out my knife, opened it, and laid it down. The bird came at me confidently. I put the blade to throat, but it would not stir; it trusted I came away; I could not kill the bird." What is a Cold?—It is startling to discover, in the London Lancet, how little we know of the commoner forms of disease. For example, a "cold," what is it? How is it produced, and in what does it consist? It is very easy to say a cold is a chill—a chill of what kind? of the organism? We know by daily experience that the body as a whole, or any of its parts, may be reduced to a considerably lower temperature than will suffice to give a man a cold, if the so-called chill be inflicted upon the surface suddenly. Is it, then, the suddenness of a reduction of temperature that causes the cold? It would be strange if it were so, because we would take cold from simply handling a piece of cold metal or accidental contact with ice. The truth would seem to be that what we call cold taking is the result of a sufficient impression of cold to reduce the vital energy of nerve centres presiding over the functions in special organs. If this be the fact, it is easy to see why nature has provided the stimulus of a strong fit or sneezing to rouse the organism's centres, and enable them at once to resume work and avoid evil consequences. This explains why the worst effects of cold do not as a rule follow upon a "chill" which excites much sneezing. Shivering is a less effective convulsion to restore the paralyzed nervous energy, but in a lower degree it may answer the same purpose. The shivering that results from the effect of a poison on the nervous centres is a totally different matter. We speak only of the quick, muscular agitation and teeth-chattering which occur whenever the body is exposed to cold, and evil results do not ensue. It follows from what we have said that the natural indication to ward off the effects of a chill is to restore the vital energy of the nerve centres, and there is no more potent influence by which to attain this object than a strong and sustained effort of the will. The man who resolves not to take cold seldom does.

The English journals publish an abstract of an interesting paper on two ancient samples of butter. The first, known as the Irish bog butter, and its estimated age was about 1,000 years. It contained 4 per cent. of curd, consisting partly of vegetable matter derived from the bog, but enough of animal matter to show that the butter had, in fact, been made from the milk of animals, and was not a mere animal fat. Its fatty character had, however, been entirely changed, and the glycerides of which the fat had originally consisted had been decomposed, so that a mixture of fatty acids only remained. That is to say, time and exposure to moisture had converted the butter into a substance of both the character and composition of the material of which composite candles are made, and which has to be produced artificially for industrial purposes by heat and acids. The other sample was found in an alabaster vase in an Egyptian tomb. Its age was thought to be about 2,500 years. It had first been melted and then poured into the vessel, which was afterward carefully sealed. There was no decomposition very apparent. With the exception of a slightly rancid taste, it had all the flavor and odor of butter, and had none of the cheesy smell of the Irish bog butter. The perfect state of its preservation is remarkable.

Affection in Birds.—In Gloucester City, a sparrow, evidently in search of winter quarters, stuck its head in a knothole in the weather-board of a house on Jersey avenue, and by some means it got fast and was unable to extricate itself. Two of the imprisoned bird's companions, realizing that something was wrong, took turns in trying to pull the poor bird from its dangerous position. They would fasten their claws in its back, and by a fluttering up-motion of the wings, try to lift it out. This was continued for some fifteen minutes, when one of the spectators chanced out of an upper window, and relieved the bird, but little injured, from its involuntary hanging. Its two companions were in waiting, and when their mate was set free they almost carried it on their backs to other quarters.

"Everywhere and in whatever denomination of Christians, I can see nothing but oppressing and stupefying form, and well if it be no worse—for the mind may struggle by inborn elasticity out of stupefaction; but, 'My people love to have it so,' is too much the case when the prophet used the expression."—Frances De Banson.

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 27, 1880.

In the parable of the Sower, our blessed Redeemer has taught us the danger there is of the "cares of this world and the deceitfulness of riches" choking and rendering unfruitful the Seed of Life, which He, the Good Husbandman, plants in our hearts. It is a lesson we all need to learn, and to bear in mind as we pass on through the world. The duties and cares which rightly devolve upon us are many; and those who do not heed the restraining voice of Christ, which makes itself intelligibly known in the watchful heart, will almost certainly be led to undertake other labors than His Heavenly Father, on which His blessing will not rest, and which therefore will obstruct it not prevent any progress in the heavenward path of true religion.

This has been the bitter experience of many who have ventured into more extended business than they were designed for, and who have found its multiplying cares to be so absorbing as to require almost every energy of the whole man, so that there was not ability left to devote the needful attention to the only concerns that are of much real importance—those which relate to the preparation for a future and never-ending existence. In these persons the Seed of the Kingdom has indeed been choked, and rendered unfruitful! We believe it has been in measure the experience of others also, who have been drawn from various influences into spheres of labor, sometimes of a benevolent or professedly religious character, which they have entered upon without sufficiently regarding the guidance of the Spirit of Christ. We are all called upon to labor in the Lord's vineyard, but it is the prerogative of the Great Husbandman to assign to every one that portion of service which He sees fit; and for want of humble waiting for His directions, some, on reviewing their lives, have been forced to acknowledge "mine own vineyard have I not kept." We are not so wise as our Maker, and greatly err when we attempt to promote his kingdom in any other way than as He directs and appoints.

Yet, as said before, "the duties and cares which rightly devolve upon us are many;" and persons of a tender spirit will often feel a concern that these may not hinder the growth of the good Seed. This honest watchfulness over themselves, we believe, is acceptable in the Divine sight, and such persons may hope for the preservation of their spiritual life. The apostle Paul in his Second Epistle to the Corinthians, enumerates many of the exercises and tribulations which he had to encounter, and among them he mentions "that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches." But though so heavily laden, he placed his dependence on the power of Christ, having been taught of the Lord, "My grace is sufficient for thee; for my strength is made perfect in weakness." This it was that preserved him through all, so that when he was ready to be offered and at the time of his departure from this world was at hand, he was able to say, "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith: henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness."

The same Grace of God which brought salvation and hath appeared unto all men, to which Paul testified, operates on the hearts of all in this day. As we abide under its influence, we may know a settlement of mind and a calmness of spirit even when many cares and trials press upon us. Though it may seem difficult or impossible for us to accomplish all that opens before us as duties to be performed, yet we may be strengthened quietly to go on with each succeeding step, trusting in the Lord that He will enable us to do all He designs we should do. The Psalmist said, "My heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord;" and they who are thus anchored on the immovable Rock, which has been the safe abiding place of the righteous in all generations, need not be dismayed.

In Pilgrim's Progress, the Interpreter is represented as showing Christian a fire on a pile, endeavoring to extinguish by throwing water upon it. The mystery was explained, when Christian was taken behind the wall, and another man was shown to him, who was constantly feeding the flames with fresh supplies of oil. If it were not for the fresh supplies of this precious oil, the blessed visitations of Divine Grace, the fire of true religion in our hearts would soon be put out by the cares, anxieties and concerns of this life, and the temptations of the evil one. But it is an unspeakable favor that the Lord does not leave his people in their need, but watches over them day and night, and gives them strength and nourishment according to their wants.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The total tonnage of anthracite coal from all the regions, for the week ending on the 13th inst., was 324,105 tons; and for the year 3,702,241 tons—which is 229,938 tons less than for the previous year. The returns from the Schuylkill region show a very large yield, and with it a very heavy death rate from coal mine casualties. It is stated, one life was sacrificed for every 89,000 tons of coal mined—or one for every 251 men employed. In Great Britain the rate is 25, which was considered exceedingly heavy. There are great hopes of life results from experiments with us from C. G. and C. G. and C. G.

The supplies offered for shipment to the suffering poor in London having proved greater than the capacity of the ship ordered to receive them, the secretaries of the Navy announced that they will send the tank to be used to be removed to increase her storage. Such a device is not inadvisable, and another cargo is made up, and a second ship will be provided. On the 22nd inst. the total amount of money contributed was $22,699.91. During the first week of this month, the steamer sailing from New York to Liverpool carried 4,124 head of cattle, 60 sheep, 290 hogs, alive; also 2,083 quarters of beef, 850 carcasses of sheep, and 665 tons of fresh meat—some of the steamers reporting the death of one man, and others several months. The largest shipment carried, only by weight.

At the annual report of the Pennsylvania Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, states there are 176 boys and 143 girls in the home.

One hundred and fifty negroes from Arkansas, the advance guard of a number intending to emigrate to Liberia, passed through Memphis recently on their way to New York.

The rivers in Louisiana, and the Tennessee river, are greatly swollen by recent heavy rains, causing some inconvenience to travel and the apprehension of serious loss, should they continue rising.

It is said that during the 11th and 12th months last, the arrivals at San Francisco of Chinese were but 57, whilst the departures for China were 2119. During four months, ending with 12th month, the arrivals were 5,669, and the departures 10,347.

The authorities of New York have adopted an amendment to the State Constitution, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors as beverages.

The debt of the State of Michigan is said to be only $200,000, and there is more than enough money in the sinking fund to pay it.

The train and track men on the Cumberland and Piedmont Railroad have struck for an advance of fifty cents per day in their wages. All the trains have stopped except one passenger train daily.

Both north and south Louisiana have been compelled to stop mining for want of transportation, and 10,000 men are idle. The mortality in this city for the week ending on the 20th, was 321. Of the whole number 180 were adults, and 141 children—57 being under one year of age.

Markets, &c.—Government bonds quiet and unchanged.—Sixes, 1881, 105½; 5s, 100½; 4½s, 1891, 107½; 4s, registered, 105½; do. coupon, 103½.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings are reported at 13½ a 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ a 7½ cts. in barrels, and standard white, 7½ a 7½ cts. and 8 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—The market depressed. Sales of Minnesota extra, at $6 a $6.60; Penna. extra family for $6.12 a $6.25; western, do. do. at $6.75 a $7, and patent, $7.25 a $8. Rye flour sells slowly at $4.87 a $5.

Penna. red, $1.43 a $1.43½; southern amber, $1.44 a $1.44½. Rye, 91 a 93 cts. Corn, mixed, 55½ cts. and yellow, 56 cts.; white, 58 cts. Oats, mixed, 45½ cts. and white, 48 a 48½ cts.

Cheese.—Cloverseed dull. Sales at 7 a 8 cts. per lb. flaxseed, $1.80 a $1.85 per bushel, and timothy, $2.20 a $2.25 per bushel.

Hay and straw.—Average price during the week—Timothy, 90 cts. a 91 per 100 pounds; mixed, 80 a 90 cts. and Straw, $1.15 a $1.25.

Beef cattle.—The market moderately active, but prices a fraction lower—2941 head were sold at 3 a 6 cts. per pound, as to quality. Milch cows, $15 a $40 per head.

Hogs.—The market active, and prices unchanged. Sales 67 a 7½ cts. per pound.

Sheep, 57 a 7½ cts. per pound, as to quality. Lambs, 61 a 7½ cts. per pound.

FOREIGN.—The cable telegram from London on the 20th, quoted U. S. bonds at 105 for the 5s, 110 for the 4½s, and 108½ for coupon, for the 4s. Silver is quoted at 92½ per ounce.

The electoral campaign increases in activity. It has been almost impossible, during the past week, to get a sufficient number of members of Parliament together to make a House.

Parrell, an Irish member, who has been on a visit to this country, arrived at Queenstown on the 24th, and was enthusiastically received. He says, "The general verdict of American opinion throughout the Union, as far as I have been able to ascertain, is in favor of a radical change in the Irish Government."

A despatch from Cape Town says, the General Post Office has been robbed of all the diamonds awaiting shipment by mail. The diamonds are valued at £75,000. The Duchess of Marlborough, writing to the Lord Mayor of London, says there is no farther of furniture, and that the directors dire destination in the furniture, parts, and on the sea coast there is great need of clothing and seed.

France. On the 16th, the Ferry Education bill, as amended by the Senate, was adopted by the Chamber of Deputies. The Senate and Chamber have adjourned till the 18th.

Germany.—The 31st birthday of the Emperor was celebrated on the 20th inst. He is said to look hale and well.

Prince Bismark has presented a paper in the Reichstag, on emigration from Germany in 1873, showing that 33,237 persons, two-thirds of whom were males emigrated, by far the greater number going to the United States and British North America.

Under the operation of the new protective tariffs, it is said foreign goods are being gradually driven from the German markets.

The past winter is reported to have been the coldest that Austria has experienced for the last fifty year. The average temperature was 23° Fahrenheit, the lowest 14 degrees below zero. Lakes were frozen which have never been known to be closed before.

It is reported from Constantinople, that the most demanded for the ransom of Colonel Frazer and who has been sent to the brigands, and the captives has been liberated.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

A Stated Meeting of the Committee having charge of the Boarding School at Westtown, will be held at Philadelphia, on Sixth-day, 4th mo. 22d, at 10 o'clock.

The Committee on Admissions will meet the same day at 11 o'clock A. M., and the Committee on Instruction 2.30 P. M.

The Visiting Committee, appointed to attend examination at the School, meet there on Second-evening, 23rd inst. For the accommodation of the committee, a convalescence will be at the Street R. S. at 10 o'clock on the 29th inst., to meet the trains that leave the city at 2.30 and 4.35 P. M.

Whitall, in the 77th year of her age, was a beloved and esteemed member of the Mon Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the West District. Having early in life surrendered her husband in obedience to her Divine Master, she endeavored to follow Him unto the end. Hospitable in her feelings and concerned to use the means entrusted to her good steward, it may be said of her as of Phoebe of "She hath been a sinner of many."

For "The Friend,"

Scripture Illustrations from Malagasy Customs. The inhabitants of Madagascar mainly belong to the Malayan race; and many of their customs throw light upon Bible allusions. In chapter on this subject, in his work on Madagascar, James Sibree says:

"It is not very easy for a foreigner to immediately understand the absolute character of a government like that of Madagascar, ere every person, from the highest to the lowest, is a servant of the sovereign, and ere no one can take any step in life—change residence, build a house or a tomb, go on a journey, be married, or even be buried—without reference to his immediate superior rank, or directly to the head of the State. All this is much more like the state of society described in the Bible, like the autocratic character of the Jewish monarchy, to nothing of other monarchies referred to the sacred records, than is our own social and political system. And, therefore, such things as, 'The king's wrath is as the roaring lion, but his favor is as dew upon the lily' (Prov. xix. 12); 'The wrath of a king's messengers of death,' &c., are in thorough sympathy with Malagasy ideas.

It should, however, be understood that there are many influences now at work in the land of Christianity, and the growth of European ideas, to modify the absolutism of former times. What this may be was gathered in an incident related of Queen Ranavalona. Soon after the promulgation of the laws instituting Christian worship, some of the people came to certain of the missionaries and asked them if they did not tremble at the word of the sovereign? They replied that they were indignant that the Queen wished to prevent the knowledge of the Word of God, but that they did not tremble, because, after all, the sovereign was only human. The natives rejoined, 'You may be well for you to say so, because you are white people; but as for us Malagasy, when our sovereign frowns upon us we are as people in death!' The ascription of divine honors to King Agrippa in the shout, 'It is the voice of a God, and not of a man,' was paralleled, of course, with a far less degree of blame to the former appellation of Malagasy sovereigns, who were called Andriamandira—Andri—'the god seen by the eye,' the visible deity.

When passing the chief entrance of the palace yard, and noticing the crowd of people and officials sitting at the gate-way. I have often been reminded of the Eastern custom of suitors for any favor or office 'sitting at the king's gate' (2 Sam. x. 2). Etiam sic est. This is not only seen at the royal gateway, but also at the entrance of the houses of the highest officers of state; people are there 'watching daily at his gates, waiting at the posts of his doors' (Prov. viii. 34). And just as in the East, those who seek to have justice done to them in any law-suit, have to wait and waylay the great men, and by their very importunity force them to attend to their cause (see Luke xviii. 1-5), so have we known women who have sat for days together at the palace gate, for the purpose of pressing their case upon the attention of the high Government officers as they went in and out from the presence of the Queen.

"There is also in Madagascar a custom that if, on any royal progress, a criminal can contrive to put himself in the way of the sovereign, so as to be seen and looked upon by her, he can claim pardon for his offence. (Malagasy offenders are not, as a rule, kept in prison, but have light fetters put upon them, so that they can walk about and do their wonted work in various out-door work. When, therefore, the sovereign goes abroad, orders are issued that all convicts, gabra lica, (must keep out of the way.) This is strikingly like Eastern customs, for there are numerous passages which show that to 'look upon,' or to 'regard,' &c., are expressions equivalent to gaining favor and compassion (see Exod. ii. 25, iv. 31; 1 Sam. i. 11; 2 Sam. xvi. 12).

"When a Malagasy sovereign goes on a journey to any distant portion of her dominions, she is always accompanied by an immense crowd of her subjects, including all the upper classes of the people, with their bearers and attendants. Like the Queen of Sheba, she goes 'with a very great train,' 'a very great company, she and her servants' (1 Kings x. 2). On recent royal 'progresses the number of these followers has amounted to as many as from 20,000 to 30,000 people! And in the preparations for these journeys we always have illustrations of many Scripture passages. As there are no roads, properly speaking, in Madagascar, the local authorities along the line of march are responsible for improving the paths, or, in many places, for making altogether new roads. The elevations are cut down, the hollows filled up, timber bridges are constructed, and the jungle grass and thickets are cleared out of the way. It is, in short, an exact illustration of the words, 'Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain' (Isa. xl. 3, 4). At every halting-place on the journey the camp is formed with most scrupulous care and order: the royal scarlet tent in the centre, and around it its courts; opposite the entrance are the tents of the chief officers of state, and then in regular order on all four sides are those of the different tribes and ranks of the population. The royal tent, by its elevation, bears a striking resemblance to the camp of the Israelites, as it must have appeared on their march through the desert.

"Throughout the whole of the East it is indispensable, when seeking an interview with a person of authority or influence, that a present be brought to propitiate his favor; for 'a man's gift maketh room for him, and bringeth him before great men' (Prov. xviii. 16). It is exactly the same in Madagascar; nor can these presents be properly termed bribes, for as the majority of Government officials have no regular or fixed salary, such presents are one of the chief means they have of keeping up their position. So much is this the custom that, even when coming to see us, their missionaries, the people usually bring some little offering—a bunch of bananas, half a dozen oranges, or other fruit, or a young fowl; and if they have nothing they make an elaborate apology for coming empty-handed. And I have often thought, when reading that story of Saul and his servants, 'When they had a great concern at finding they have nothing left to offer in approaching the great man, Samuel. (But, behold, if we go, what shall we bring the man? for the bread is spent, and there is not a present to bring to the man of God; what have we? 1 Sam. ix. 7); the servant's finding a quarter-shelkel; his master's immediately appropriating it—all this is true to the life to what continually happens in Madagascar.

"As among the Jews and most Eastern nations, the staff is a sign of office and authority, so also it is among the Malagasy (see Num. xvii.). When the elders of the people, chiefs of villages and tribes, come in from the country to the capital, they frequently carry with them this staff or rod of office as a sign of their position.

"Up to a very recent period, the punishments for political and other crimes in Madagascar were very severe. The code of laws in the time of sovereigns preceding the present one commenced by pronouncing death for a number of offences; but beside this it provided also that the wife and children of the culprit should 'be lost,' that is, reduced to slavery. And so 'the sins of the fathers were visited upon the children,' a thing which, although prohibited by the law of Moses (Deut. xxiv. 16; Ezek. xviii. 20), was often practised by Jewish rulers, as well as by neighboring nations (see 2 Kings x. 6, 14, xi. 1; Dan. vi. 24).

The Meeting at Firbank Chapel and its Results.

The last number of this narrative related the blessed end to which the Lord brought his faithful servant John Camm, enabling him to leave this life in the full assurance that a crown immortal awaited him in the world to come; as it certainly does to all those who continue unto the end to love the appearing of the Lord Jesus in their hearts.

The experience of his dearly beloved friend, John Audland, was very similar. He is described as a man whose "company was exceedingly delightful and pleasant, being always conversant in the way of edification." "It was his great joy to see the Lord's work to prosper, and the testimony of Truth spring in every bosom." Thomas Camm says, "Our hearts [were] perfectly united and knit together in that love that's everlasting; I never thought travel hard or tedious at any time, so that I might enjoy his company, in which I was always delighted." The same loving friend further says of him:

"After he was first called forth into the world and service of the Lord, he was very diligent therein, almost in continual travels, and several times was in prison for his testimony's sake; as at New Castle in the north, and Bristol; often in great perils in the beginning, having many rough places to break through, where many times he suffered sore beatings, and many strokes, together with cruel mockings, revilings and scourgings from the wicked rabble often; and sometimes from angry bitter-spirited professors—through and over all which the Lord preserved him to his lasting—for he counted nothing dear unto him for the gospel's sake, but left his dear wife and child (whom he loved extremely) and trade, and all to follow the Lord Jesus Christ, the Captain of salvation, having an eye to the eternal recompense of reward, that the Lord hath given him fully to enjoy.

"His dear wife was not long after him, called forth into the same work and service, and travelled into several parts of the north country, and after into the south, where at Banbury, in Oxfordshire, she was a prisoner for one year and seven months, the Lord making her instrumental in his hand, to the turning many from darkness to light in that place, and many other places where she travelled.

"When J. A. did grow weaker, by his lingering distemper of a sore cough, his lungs wasting, he would often complain of an inward soreness in his breast, though he seemed to look well, being of a ruddy and fair complexion, and would often say: Ah! those great meetings in the orchard at Bristol, I may not forget; I would so gladly have spread my net over all, and have gathered all, that I forgot myself, never considering the inability of my body; but its well my reward is with me, and I am content to give up, and be with the Lord for that my soul values above all things.

"Between two and three weeks before he died, he was taken (as was supposed) with an hectic fever, and daily it increased upon him; so that his sleep for many days and nights was taken from him, in which time I was often with him, being his desire, and my delight to serve him; in which time Friends in abundance flocked to visit him from several parts; for, as I said before, he was a man greatly beloved of the Lord, and all his people, yea, many of the world had a good esteem of and loved him, and many times the Lord did wonderfully open his mouth in testimony to Friends (as if he had been without sense of his sickness) to their great refreshment and exceeding joy; and often he would be raised upon his knees upon his bed, and supplicate the Lord in the behalf of his whole heritage; and to prosper his work in the nation and nations round about: he said that there was nothing in all the world that he desired to live to enjoy, except the comfortable enjoyment of his friends and brethren in the fellowship of his life of truth, and that he might be a comfort to his dearly beloved wife; whose associate condition he often bemoaned; but in this he said his will was in true subjection, submitting to the will of the Lord, whether life or death; to God he often and again committed and recommended all the whole flock, heritage and family of God, together with his dear wife and child, to be kept, cared for, and preserved; saying that He would be a husband to his desolate widow, and a tender father to his fatherless children, often entreating his dear wife freely to give him up to the will and disposing of the Almighty, whose he was, being made acceptable in the beloved Son; often sweetly comforting her in her sorrow and great distress, making as little show of his illness (for her sake) as ever he might: yet we saw that he was under a great weight of sickness, and that his strength daily wasted, so that in less than three weeks time after the fever took him, he finished here, and was sweetly taken to rest in the joy of the Lord forevermore, it being the 24th day of the First month, 1663, and the next day was accompanied to his grave by many Friends and others, and his body interred in the aforesaid burying place at Birkrigge Park.

His widow testifies that "he was a man of an exceeding sweet disposition, unspeakably loving and tenderly affectionate, always ready to lend a helping hand to the weak and needy, open-hearted, free and near to his friends. He was greatly beloved, and highly esteemed of in the Lord, for his work's sake; notwithstanding not lifted up thereby, but preserved in great humility and lamb-like lowliness. In the time of his sickness he was exceedingly filled with the high praises of God, being as one overcome and ravished in the sense of God's love, joy and peace everlasting.

"He was greatly afflicted in the sense of my sorrow (occasioned by his great weakness which I saw daily to increase upon him); and therefore did very wisely and tenderly comfort me, withal desiring me to give him up freely to the disposing of the Lord whose he was, and enjoyed His pure peace. And although it was hard to part with so dear and beloved a husband, yet the Lord strengthened me, and I seeing the extremity of his distemper to be exceeding heavy upon him and to increase, I was made willing to go to him, and freely recommend him into the hands of the eternal living God, to dispose of him according to his Divine pleasure, and unsearchable wisdom and counsel, whether life or death; the which added to his ease and my peace, in true submission to the will of the Lord; so his body daily weakening and his distemper prevailing; he notwithstanding being mostly kept sensible to the last, continuing in prayer and praising the Lord, he sweetly fell on sleep, and finished his course, being passed into the fullness of eternal joy, which his eye was only to, and his soul breathed forth more than length of days in the enjoyment of the world or its riches: Glory, glory and eternal praises to the Lord for ever and ever more."

For "The Friend."
The Seneca and the Valley of the Genesee.

The work of destruction to Indian property was pursued relentlessly, and desolation marked the army's route. Grain and crops were destroyed, orchards of apple, pear and peach trees, raised in most instances from seeds under advice of the missionaries, met the common fate. In one place fifteen but dreed peach trees, bending under the ripening fruit, were cut down. In this ruthless destruction the army exceeded the barbarism of the savage. The Indians themselves, in the incursions upon the white settlements, spare the fruit trees, the growth of many years, but it may well be questioned whether this compassion was not due to the fact, that they seldom carried weapons with which to destroy large trees. To the credit of some of Sullivan's officers it should be added, that they remonstrated against this barbarism, but here quote his instructions from Washington, that "the blow must be sure and fatal, otherwise the Indians will derive confidence from our ineffectual attempts and become more insolent than before," and "that the immediate object of the expedition are the total destruction of devastation of their settlements," and the country must be "not merely overrun but destroyed."

Between Cayuga and Seneca lakes, the Indians did so suddenly before the advancing guard, that kettles of corn were occasional found still boiling over the fire. Near Genesee a fine white child, about three years old, was discovered abandoned, nude and nearly famished. On being spoken to he replied, "Sage (How are you?) and used a few Indian words. He was evidently of Dutch parentage, and had probably been captured the year before on the Pennsylvania border. General Sullivan took no small interest in the boy's welfare and prepared a rough panner upon a horse in which he was carefully enclosed. An excellent milk cow accompanied the expedition from first to last, and afforded nourishment for the little stranger. The child was taken to near Newburgh, after the return of the army, where he caught the small pox and died.

At length the army reached the borders of the valley of the Genesee. A scouting party having been sent forward with the intention of discovering the site of the capital town of the Indians, the adventure proved fatal to many of them, who were led into an ambush and surprised by five hundred Indians under Brant, and five hundred royalists under Butler. A few of the Americans having broken through the surrounding enemy, gave the first hint to Sullivan that a body of British and Indians were near; but they fled immediately after destroying the scouting party. This engagement has been called the battle of Groveland, and its centennial anniversary was lately celebrated at that place.

At length the army reached Honeyoe, an Indian town situated on a fine plain near the lake of that name. It consisted of houses of hewn logs, and around it were several large corn fields and orchards of apples and other quits. From the hills above, the rich country through which they were about to pass could be seen stretching for miles to the westward—a forest mainly of oak and hickory, with intervals of broken fields covered with luxuriant grass. While the American army was here encamped almost undisturbed, the wretched villages of Beardstown, Canaseruga, Big Tree, Canawaugus and other towns on the river were scenes of consternation. The Indians were engaged in gathering a great crop of corn. Skirmishing was frequent between the advancing pioneers and the Indian avers, yet none of them fled from their villages until they heard the echoes of the yankee's big guns, those terrible engines, which abounded to Indian superstition all the dread mysteries of hostile "medicine men." On hearing them the women set up a wail, the children bawled an accompaniment, and excitement grew every moment greater. By taking the ear to the ground, they could hear the tread in Sullivan's camp. Preparations were hurriedly made for the long journey to Fort Niagara. A small body of Americans followed the retreating fugitives, who were protected by a detachment of British troops, dressed in green uniforms, the more readily concealed themselves among the bushes and trees.

The whole army was soon upon its march westward, over the trail for the Indian towns of the Genesee, and in the evening took possession of a village on the Canaseruga creek, and soon commenced their work of havoc by destroying the corn by plucking the ears and throwing them into the river, and having fired the huts, resumed their march towards the Beardstown, moving over a plain of extraordinary fertility, on which grew grass thicker than a man, in which the guns only the soldiers could be seen, and reached the Seneca near the present village of Mt. Morris. In length the capital town or Little Beard's ledge was reached, where the fires in some tents were yet fresh. This town consisted of a hundred and twenty-eight houses, "most-very large and elegant." The surroundings were beautiful, and upon the cleared flat which extended for a number of miles, were extensive corn fields and every vegetable the Indians were accustomed to cultivate. Here they destroyed the orchards of sixteen hundred trees, collected the corn and burned it in the Seneca, the product of two hundred acres having thus been destroyed. A detachment then proceeded to Canawaugus, near the present town of Avon, and destroyed it, and returned and laid waste the Big Tree village near Mt. Morris, afterwards the scene of the Morris massacre.

The work was declared finished, the total loss of the Indian settlement and the destruction of their crops having been completed, an immediate return of the army was ordered. Eighteen days had elapsed since they had left Newtown, near the present Elira, during which time they had destroyed by Indian towns, large and small, and had burned or otherwise wasted 160,000 bushels of corn, and vast quantities of vegetables of every kind. Before quitting this spot on their return homeward, a woman with an infant, who had nearly starved, came within the lines. She had been captured at Wyoming the previous, and informed the Americans that the woman had constantly fretted and begged the warriors to sue for peace.

The Indian warriors and their allies, together with 150 British regulars from Niagara, by whom they had been reinforced on the eve of quitting the Genesee, fled to Fort Niagara. Meanwhile Indian women, children and old men, were flocking thither from their burning towns, and as the plain became covered far and near with knots of fugitives, it strikingly resembled, says an eye witness, the diversified landscape formed by groups returning from an English fair. The Senecas were urged to make their future dwelling-place in Canada, but they continued to remain at Fort Niagara until the following spring, when the larger remainder of the tribe settled near Buttaio Creek. Scanty supplies were furnished them, and during the remarkably cold winter, when multitudes of deer perished from starvation, the refugees were fed upon salt provisions, which caused scurvy to appear among them, of which they died in great numbers. In the spring of 1780, several Seneca families came back and temporarily settled in the neighborhood of the former villages on the Genesee, but the greater portion of them never returned.

W. H. C. Hosmer, the poet of Avon, has in fitting language expressed the sorrow of these exiled children of the forest, on returning to their loved Genesee, in the following strain—

"THE SENECA'S RETURN.

The waves, dark rolling Genesee,
Still lave the flowery shore,
To look upon thy rippling tide
I have returned once more;
Thy daisy bosom pictures yet
The sunbeam and the cloud,
Though aged oaks that fringed thy banks
The ringing axe hath hewed,
The sun shines on the meadow green,
Once shadowed by the wood,
And flocks of beauty crowd the hill,
Where our rude cabins stood;
When rang the hunters' call of yore,
And blazed the Council Fire,
The plowman's whistle shrill is heard,
And skyward points the spire.
The moss of age has overcrept
Our hallowed altar-stone,
And traces of our former sway
Are gone—forever gone.
The dusky pilot guides no more
His dancing bark canoe,
And bows of strength are snapp'd in twain,
From which our arrows flew.
The pale face long since offered us
The cup with poison brim,
Our hearts grew weak with craven throes,
Our falcon eyes grew dim;
The bird-right of our fathers brave,
We sold in our despair,
And vanished is our old renown
Like smoke in empty air."

The centennial celebration of the conquest of the Genesee Valley by Sullivan's army was celebrated at Genesee on 16th of 9th month, 1879. An extract from one of the speeches is worthy of note as the testimony of a pioneer to the worth of the Indians. The speaker said he could give them some of the unwritten history of Livingston county. "Sixty-one years ago I stood where the battle was fought in Groveland. * * The Indians simply defended their homes to the best of their ability. Indians were my neighbors when I lived across the river. They were good neighbors." Another followed in the same strain. "The Indian has been dispossessed by fraud and injustice, and I would rather be the advocate of the Indian than of the white man, before an impartial tribunal.

We shall never do justice to the Indian until we make him a citizen. For every act of kindness to the race we may cite ten of fraud."

Faithful Watchmen.

For "The Friend."

There is no doubt but that our Society has been greatly benefited by the care and concern of those who, from time to time, have extended a word of caution to such as may have felt it their duty to speak to the people.

John Crook, one of the early ministers of our Society, it is said was distinguished (in times of persecution) for the baptizing, recovery of his ministry, and the saving of many souls when persecution had ceased, his communications seemed to be devoid of thisunction which had formerly characterized them. This became a source of concern to some of his friends. Two of them, who stood in the station of elder, from a sense of duty, waited on him, and with all the tenderness due to his age, experience and great worth, communicated their fears to him on this head, and desired that he would take the matter into serious consideration. It is said he received their communication with great meekness, and, after a time, waited on them in a broken tender frame of mind, and informed them, with many tears, that he believed they had ample cause for their concern; and expressed his gratitude to them for thus pointing out his dangerous situation to him. He continued silent after this for three years, and then again broke forth in a few words, just as he did in his first appearing in the ministry. "He that runs may read." I have reason to believe have an oversight of the ministry, would be faithful in the discharge of their duties. I am well aware that it requires great caution in proceeding in this direction; but I am also well convinced that there is need of close self-examination on the part of those who speak, as well as close scrutiny on the part of those who hear.

Justice Marshall and the Turkey.—Chief-

Justice Marshall was a great man; but great men are not apt to be proud. He was not too proud to wait upon himself. He was in the habit of going to market himself, and carrying home his purchases. Often would he be seen going home at sun-rise, with poultry in one hand and vegetables in the other.

On one of these occasions a fashionable young man from the North, who had removed to Richmond, was swearing violently because he could find no one to carry home his turkey. Judge Marshall stepped up to him and asked him where he lived. When he heard, he said: "That is my way; I will carry your turkey home for you."

When they came to the house the young man asked, "What shall I pay you?"

"Oh, nothing," said the Judge; "you are welcome; it was all in my way, and it was no trouble to me."

"Who is that polite old man who brought my turkey home for me?" asked the young man of a by-stander.

"Oh," said he, "that was Judge Marshall, Chief-Justice of the United States."

"Why did he bring home my turkey?" "I suppose he did it," said the by-stander, "to teach you not to feel above attending to your own business."—Golden Threads.

Letter from Sarah (Lynes) Grubb, to a daughter when about to leave school.

My Dear Child,—Having some experience in the path which now opens to thee, I wish, if possible, to be instrumental in affording thee instruction and encouragement in thy future steps through life. Take, therefore, the affectionate counsel of a tender mother.

Place the Fear of God continually before thee; have reference to Him in all things. He hath not only given thee a being, but endowed thee with a good understanding, and granted thee many blessings; let it be the sincere language of thy heart, "How shall I give thanks unto the Lord for all his benefits?" so will He teach thee His Divine law, and enable thee to delight therein. Thus wilt thou possess religion; real, vital Christianity. It is the greatest of all treasures; befriends the godly through this world, and leads thee to a better.

What are we without religion, even in our best state? We know not how to estimate our existence, nor any of the blessings offered; how then can we truly enjoy them? In distress, in sickness, in the dark and gloomy seasons which will overtake us sometimes, in the course of our journey, what have we to flee to for safety, if unacquainted with the name which is the power of God? Therefore, my dear child, "get wisdom;" "for sake He not"—"the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom."

Never give way to a fretful disposition. To repine at the crosses and difficulties attendant on our probationary state, betrays a little mind, and want of resignation to what Heaven permits; besides, it renders things trying. Whenever tempted with peevishness, seek with all thy might, to be quiet, and wait upon the Lord, who will bring thee near to Himself, and convince thee, that with Him who is light, there is no disquiet; and so He will grant thee peace. Thine enemies are thine own natural evil propensities: to overcome these in the Lord, is a most glorious victory. Thy dear Saviour is able and willing to grant thee this victory with holy triumph.

Give no place to an envious disposition; it would corrode thy mind, and prevent the incomes of heavenly love. The sweet and the bitter are more equally dispensed than man perceives. We cannot of ourselves promote our happiness, but, by watching against all wrong things, we may become strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might, to avoid all that would render us the authors of our own misery. Be assured, my precious child, that if there is not tranquillity in thine own breast, from suffering the all-regulating principle to operate there, thou never wilt find true felicity in any situation which may fall to thy lot; and while a kind Providence may permit thee to be surrounded by temporal good, thou mayest be without capacity for enjoying His bounty. Be wise, therefore, and submit early to the humbling power of truth, that it may be well with thee in time and in eternity, which is the desire and prayer of thy affectionate mother.

And now, with respect to domestic economy let me say, for thy future comfort—do every thing in its season; although it may seem very often, at the moment, as if this method was inconvenient and troublesome, thou wilt find thy account in it. Thou wilt hereby save much of thy precious time, and avoid confusion and hurry. Make suitable arrangements, and be sure to observe them. Have few servants; treat them kindly, but give no up-vants; treat them kindly, but give no up-thine own judgment to gratify their will, lest thou lose that government which is essential to the comfort of a family. Be industrious, but be not in the habit of doing that thyself, which properly belongs to the servants; for which only renders them negligent. Be sure to manage everything with frugality and prudence; thou wilt have the more to spare for the needy. Look well to thy household in all things. Let thy countenance be as sunshine to thy family, through the calmness of thy temper.

Be ever anxious in trouble, but endeavor to leave all to the Lord, in doing according to the best of thy capacity; and thus let thy whole life bring glory to Him who is worthy of all glory, honor, and dominion, for ever and ever. Amen.

1858. THE WILLOW.

How dear to my heart is the old weeping willow,
Whose green, waving branches, so gracefully bend,
From its ocean of leaves, as a gently tossed billow;
There speaks to my heart, the sweet voice of a friend.
The old weeping willow—the dear ancient willow,
What happy enjoyment thy shadows can lend.

The first tree in Spring to put forth its green leaflets,
And the last one in Autumn to wither and die—
Is the old weeping willow—thru' whose leaflets branches
Bleak Waters in turn will so contentedly sigh.

How dear weeping willow, the time-honored willow,
How grand is thy form neath the blue vaulted sky.
The birds seek thy boughs and build for the Summer—
Their little ones rock in thy branches to rest,
The wind's trailing arms receive every corner,
That seeks in thy shelter—a place for its nest.

Fair beautiful willow, thou large-hearted willow,
Thou songs-troop of thy temple art palace most sweet.

The horse-block, that stood in the yard, at the corner,
The swing that hung down from thy strong, sturdy bough,
Were pleasant resorts, where youth loved to linger—
And drink the cool breezes that fann'd every brow.
Dear honest old willow, grand, noble old willow,
No tree on this earth is so cherished as thou.

Adieu! I would wish that long life be thy portion,
And the birdlings sing sweetly as ever for thee,
While happy young hearts still pay their devotion,
And age smile as calmly, as tranquil and free.
Thou time-honored willow, our dear mother's willow,
A father's hand planted her favorite tree.

1868.

I have gazed on thy form, 'neath age it is bending,
Thy branches seem dwarfed by the breath of decay,
We have left thee alone—a memento of dear ones,
That time in its kindness will soon bear away.
Thou time-honored willow, our dear mother's willow,
What fond memories crown thy lone dying day.

1880.

Thou art gone, honored willow, the strong branch of Heaven
Blew hard 'gainst thy form in the day of decline,
Thou bent 'neath the blast, to earth was thou given,
And I mused to be ashes, all heart of thee
With tears in my eyes by the grave of our willow,
We mourn'd o'er the past—yet would not repine.

The life thou' so noble—in death is now ended,
My "harp" has been hung in thy branches to rest,
The song of the captive to Heaven ascending
Recalls soft anthems from realms of the best.
The "land" is not "strange" where loved ones have gone.

The songs of the ransomed are sweetest and best.

"For though we are required to 'show the people their transgressions, and the house of Jacob their sins,' how can we reach the heart except we take along with us this holy softening influence, which is like precious oil?"—
Sarah (Lynes) Grubb.

Grangemouth and the Earl of Zetland.—I may not be generally known to our readers especially to those south of the Tweed, that in the little town of Grangemouth a great battle is being fought on the side of prohibition of the sale of strong drink. The Earl of Zetland has given notice, to all parties concerned, to the effect that, "The prohibition contained in the feu-charters of properties in Grangemouth, of which he is superior, again using them as public-houses, dram-shops, &c. or in the sale of malt or spirituous liquors will be put in force on or after the 15th of May next."

This announcement has given rise to strong feeling not only in Grangemouth, but through out the country, and it is said that very vigorous efforts are being made to induce the Earl to change his mind, or failing that, to resist his authority in the Court of Session, at even in the House of Lords itself. The town of Grangemouth has about 4000 inhabitants it is situated at the mouth of the little river Grange, which unites with the Carron and joins the Forth at the east end of the Forth and Clyde Canal, which has been used for the passage of vessels from the east to the west of Scotland and vice versa. The port of Grangemouth is therefore capable of harboring iron-steamers, &c., very large ships, and the timber trade is extensively carried on, great boats being filled with the floating logs. The prevalence of water intersecting the town resembles some of the towns of Holland, and carries special feature not only in the place but in this matter of prohibition, for it very frequently happens that persons under the influence of drink, fall into this canal and fatalsults not infrequently occur.

A short time ago three men were drowned and a few weeks since three men fell into the water and were only rescued with great difficulty. A public-house in Grangemouth is most valuable property as may be noted from the heavy rents obtainable for it. The railway-tavern, having only four dining places, but situated at a corner on the main thoroughfare calculated to excite the "drouth" alike lumpers and bargemen, affords over £1000 rent. One licensed house, which as a bake shop drew an £8 rent, returns to the landlord £10 as a dram-shop. A contemporary has ridiculed the idea of the uses to which a back-shop of a licensed shiphandler may be turned; but in the same issue the writer may have read a paragraph of one in Grangemouth being fined for breach of certificate. All this has for long been a thought to the more respectable inhabitants, and the action which has now been taken by the feudal superior the outcome of it.

Though Lord Zetland resides mostly in Yorkshire, both he and his lady have shown themselves interested in the social and moral well-being of the people, and representation as to the real state of matters in Grangemouth by those well qualified and entitled to maintain, have led to what is believed an abiding resolution.—Daily Review.

That the cry of distress should be heard over Europe is no great wonder when the leading Powers are spending $800,000,000 on the maintenance of military establishments. The vast armaments of modern times are intolerable burthen upon the masses of the people from whose ranks they are recruited, and by whose hard-earned money they are cept up. There must come a time when the garden, having grown beyond endurance, will be thrown off forever, and the whole political organization of Europe be destroyed and made a wilderness.

For "The Friend"

Memoir of Hannah Marsh.

BY HER DAUGHTER, PRISCILLA PITT.

In dress she was a model for Christian women. When young she had been rather tasty, but as she yielded her heart to the power of grace, she found it easy to take up the cross and appear as a consistent Friend. Not only so, but she kept to the peculiar style then commonly worn, but she gave as little thought and attention to it, as it would be possible in any age—at the same time always looked neat. At the age of seventeen," said she, "I had a new pattern for a sleeve; it fitted me, why should I alter?" So she had it for years. She wore black silk bonnets for many years. The reason she gave me was—"When I wore light colors, there was a fuss about choosing the color, so I thought I would have black, and then when I wanted a new bonnet, it would only be to 'Make me another.'" She spoke many years ago to a friend about dressing her children too smart. The friend asked her how she would have her dress them? Mother replied, "There is no need for me to dictate, I had one who can show them." My mother kept to what she felt easy to use and wear, not imitating even her dearest friend who was led into greater plainness. Our household truly comfortable, though plainer than any, as we neither had pictures, nor bookshelves, nor anti-macassars, nor many ornaments about the rooms. Mother kept a very small stock of goods. She maintained that Society had a testimony to bear against changeable suits of apparel.

With regard to her position as a member of religious Society she felt such unity with us, was truly a mourner of later years at the ages taking place in our discipline and offices. So much so that she could not flatter so heartily into the transactions of meetings, or to labor in concert with those who advocate new views—nevertheless, she was the word of retreat had not been sounded in her ears. She believed there never was a man when Friends were more called upon to stand firm and keep to their principles in the present. She repeatedly lamented our meetings for discipline, that our Queries done away with, or more properly speaking, altered, and not to be answered earnestly, with other changes. She attended meetings for worship and discipline, especially select ones, as long as she was able, which was to within two weeks of her end. Her labors in the ministry in distant parts were all compared with those of dear father, who went with Lydia Ann Barclay as her companion, into Oxfordshire and Warwickshire; in father into Norfolk and Suffolk, Cornwall and Devonshire, and to some families in our own Quarterly Meeting, and in family sittings in Croydon to many of the in-habitants; and they together held a public meeting occasionally when out for change of air.

The last time she was liberated by the Monthly Meeting for service, was three months prior to her end, viz., in the 7th month, 1877, she held a meeting for the working classes in the Friends' meeting-house, Park Lane, Croydon. At this she imparted much motherly instruction and encouragement, in a clear and audible manner. On the 17th of 9th month, at our Monthly Meeting, in giving in as usual, some statement on returning the minute, she used these or similar words, "With humble gratitude I can confess that through holy help I was permitted to perform that little service which I believed required of me in the 7th month, and for which sweet peace has been mercifully afforded." H. Binns desired a minute to liberate him to hold public meetings in and round London. Mother expressed the importance she felt there is in such a service, that a friend so engaged should draw the people onward to the principles of Truth, and should not introduce the reading of the Scriptures in meetings for worship. This was the last Monthly Meeting she was at, for she died an hour before the following Monthly Meeting came around. But she had said enough to be understood, and I know how desirous she was, as she knew her life must be drawing to a close, to clear her mind on this subject, knowing that Friends in various parts are trying to get it introduced.

I do not profess to believe my mother was without failings, but I believe the bent of her heart was perfect with the Lord. She did not (since I knew her) give out her mind to literary pursuits, or worldly company, or politic matters; neither was she one of those extraordinary women who seem as if they could compass sea and land. She was remarkably watchful over her own heart; she was content to be little and lowly, and only desired the esteem and friendship of those who could love and enjoy to receive letters from her relatives and friends, but in her late years felt more restriction in this indulgence. The bedroom window being opposite the letter box, she told me she felt restrained from looking out while dressing, to see if there were any letters come, but believed it right to give her mind full time to begin the day well, by committing all her affairs, and those she most tenderly loved, to the kind care of our heavenly Father, and endeavor to stay her mind and look unto the Lord to enable her to go through the day, and wait till she went down to breakfast for the letters. She often said concerning little things and events, the anticipation of which troubled her, "How we are helped when we have committed it to the Lord." And at night, before dropping asleep, she said she remembered us each one in prayer. She was very cheerful in conversation, father being oftentimes very silent in company, left her to take rather too great a share. In her latter years she was very much more drawn into stillness, and would seem pained to hear me encourage the keeping up unprofitable talk with callers in, and often admonished me to watchfulness, and a guard over the tongue, quoting the apostle's words: "Let your words be few and savory, that they may minister grace unto the hearers." "We must not let the enemy get advantage over us." "It won't do for me to have my mind disturbed with so and so. It won't do for me to let my mind out, to take it off its centre, and rob it of quietness."

Kindness is an invisible force of unmeasured power.

The Martyrdom of John Huss.

Catholic as Constance is, it recognizes that its chief claim to fame is, its connection with the poor Bohemian preacher, who was burnt without its gates just 464 years ago. It is, however, absurd, as some have done, to say that Constance glories in its crime. The city was no more responsible for the death of Huss than were the inhabitants of Smithfield or the martyr-fires that were lighted there, or than Oxford was for the death of Latimer and Ridley. No, it was the crime of Christendom, not of Constance. The wooden car or chariot in which Huss arrived in Constance at the end of his long journey from Prague is still preserved in the Wessenberg Museum.

He put up at a little mean house near the Schuetzthor. Probably in the time of the Emperor Joseph II. a little tablet, with a medallion in stone of the Reformer, was let into the wall, and within the last twelve months his Bohemian compatriots have adorned the front of the house with a fine medallion portrait, with a suitable inscription in Bohemian and German. The city was crowded to overflowing with visitors, for it is estimated that no fewer than from 100,000 to 150,000 strangers had come from all parts of Christendom in the train of the great Council. Having received a safe conduct from the Emperor Sigismund freely to go and return, Huss seemed at first principally concerned about how he and his companion should obtain the means of subsistence until such time as the Council permitted him to depart. He writes at this time, "Living is very dear here; a bed with a room costs more than half-a-guilder (about 1s.) per week. I am greatly afraid to see my friends about this in B-hemia." Within a fortnight of his arrival he was arrested, in defiance of imperial safe conduct, and after several removals, on the 4th of January, 1415, he was thrown into a miserable dungeon close to the refectory in the Dominican Convent, now the Insel Hotel. The refectory is now the restaurant of the hotel, the handsome church of the monastery having been secularized into a magnificent dining hall. The traveller on rising from his luxurious table à la carte has only to take a few steps to see what sort of accommodation Huss received in his narrow cell. The stone to which he was chained—only, I believe, however, at night—and the door with a little hole in it through which food could be passed to him, are preserved in the Wessenberg Museum. He suffered much from wet and cold, but through the kindness of his guards, whom he won by his gentleness, he was able to write letters to his friends, and even short theological treatises. With touching quaintness he writes from here to his knightly friend and countryman, John of Chlum, "Do not allow the great expense (of his keep) to trouble you. If God should free the goose (Huss in Bohemian means goose) from his prison, he will not allow you to regret the expense. To-morrow it is eight weeks that the goose has been lying close to the dining room." His prison was soon after changed to a tower of the Franciscan Convent, and then to the strong castle of Gottlieben. His offence was the preaching of those doctrines which all Protestantism has since adopted. It was in vain that every possible means was employed to make him retract. With gentle firmness he appealed to God and the Holy Scriptures, and was immovable. At length, on the 6th of July, 1415, he was brought into the cathedral to be publicly condemned. Kaiser Sigismund was there, in his imperial robes, and with him were assembled all the spiritual and temporal lords who had come to the Council as the representatives of Christendom. It is natural for us to think of Huss as supported by all the Protestant sentiment which now exists in the world, but then it had not come into being. With many worldly, sensual, and cruel men, both among priests and laymen, assembled at the Council there were also the best and wisest of their generation, and it was these who held he was guilty of deadly sin. Against this consensus of opinion, Huss stood out, and by his individual conviction of right and duty based upon the Scriptures.

He was bitterly alone, and in his cold, dark prison cell, as well as now, standing before his judges, who were about to hand him over to a shameful and cruel death, the agonizing doubt may have come to him whether, after all, these men of learning and piety might not be right and he wrong.

A modern poet has said:—

"They are slaves who dare not be In the right with two or three."

But the choice spirits to whom the world owes most, have often had to tread the wilderness absolutely alone; and who shall estimate the agony of this loneliness, compared with which the stake, and even the rack, are small torments? The stone is still shown in the Cathedral where Huss stood while being degraded from his priestly office, and where he was publicly condemned and cursed.

When, having fixed his eyes on the Kaiser's conduct, the hot blood mounted to the saint's cheeks, so that all present observed it. One hundred years later this blush saved the life of Luther. When the youthful Emperor Charles V. was urged by his clerical counsellors at Worms to disregard the safe-conduct he had given to Luther on the ground that no faith was to be kept with heretics, he replied, "I should not like to have to blush like Sigismund." It is a melancholy instance of the perversion of conscience that in his mature age Charles never ceased to reproach himself for this act of good faith. The awful ceremony of public condemnation and anathema over, Huss was given over to the secular arm.

The Pfalzgraf leading with 800 soldiers, took him to the place of execution. With them went a vast multitude, the spiritual and secular lords on horseback. We can still trace every step of the way to the place of martyrdom. It now leads through a rather pretty suburb of the town until you come to an ugly gasometer, when you turn down an avenue of poplars which leads to a little spot enclosed with an iron railing, in which stands a huge boulder overgrown with ivy. On one side is the simple inscription "Joannes Huss, Julii 6, 1415," and on the other side, "Hieronymus von Prag, Junii 7, 1416;" for on the same spot, within a twelvemonth, Jerome, the friend and disciple of Huss, also witnessed a good confession.

Before we bid farewell to Huss and Constance and the Bohemians, there is one incident I should like to recall, which seems to me one of the most touching in the chronicles of the martyrs. Huss has commended his soul to God, and solemnly asserted his integrity and the joy with which he seals with his blood the truths he has taught. The executioner is about to light the fatal pile, when the martyr observes a peasant adding a fagot to the pile in the assurance that this act will further his salvation. It causes no emotion of anger or indignation in the mind of the sufferer, but he admires the simple faith that prompts it, and gently says, "O sancta simplicitas." Those who sadly feel that they can no longer say "Shibboleth" as their fathers have said it, do not always possess the gentleness and humility of Huss, nor realize that the censure of good men who remain in the old paths is motivated by this "holy simplicity."

The Allegheny and Cattaraugus Reservations.

The following article was written by one of the girls at the Boarding School for Indian children under the care of Friends at Tusnessassah, and was first read at one of the meetings which are occasionally held among them for literary improvement. It is interesting not only on account of the information which it contains respecting the homes and habits of the Seneca Indians in New York, but as an evidence of the proficiency which children of this people may attain under favorable circumstances. The writer of the article has lately left the Boarding School, and is now teaching one of the public schools for Indian children on the Allegheny Reservation.

"There are in the State of New York, seven reservations, being tracts of land set apart by the government of the United States for the use of the different tribes of Indians living thereon.

But I will confine my subject to the two with which I am most familiar, viz: Cattaraugus and Allegheny, which are closely allied. The former contains about thirty-six square miles and the latter thirty-nine. They are situated thirty miles distant from each other, in the south-western part of the State. The population of both is near two thousand six hundred, and consists of three nations, the Seneca, Onondaga and Cayuga, which tribes are again divided into clans. The names of some of the clans are Bear, Wolf, Turtle, &c. The children retain the name of the clan and tribe of the mother. All the people of the same clan are said to be related to each other, and are not allowed to intermarry. The Senecas have a Republican form of government, and their officers are President, Treasurer and Clerk, several Counsellors and Peacemakers, all chosen by the people, and holding their offices only one year; but there are other officers, such as the overseers of the poor, and the police marshals, who are sometimes in office two or three years. Their sessions they call councils, and are held alternately on the two reservations.

There are ten schools on the Cattaraugus and seven on the Allegheny reservation. In some of these, Indian teachers are employed. One at Cattaraugus has been teaching successfully for a dozen years or more. There is also on that reservation an Orphan Asylum, established as a home for destitute orphan children of any tribe in New York, and is kept up by the State. It is a large building situated on a farm, and capable of accommodating over one hundred children, of all ages and sizes, from infants to those grown up almost to man and womanhood. The boys, as they are capable, are taught to do all kinds of farm work, and the girls receive practical instructions in housekeeping and other useful employments. All who are old enough attend school a part of the time. The institution is managed by trustees, six of whom are Indian and six white men, and under the care of necessary officers to conduct the affair. There is also a boarding school on a large farm adjoining the Allegheny reservation, where thirty pupils, ranging from seven to twenty years of age, are very comfortably provided for. Meetings for worship are regularly held twice a week, and on Sunday afternoon there are scripture recitations and reading. All the pupils are in school a certain number of hours each day. Most of them can read, write and spell, and there are classes in mathematic geography, grammar, United States history, natural science, philosophy and physiology. When not in school, the boys assist on the farm, besides having plenty of time for youthful sports. The girls are instructed in branches of systematic housekeeping, and those who incline to read, have ample time to do so, and have access to a good assortment of books. There is a large playground in which they spend their leisure time in innocent amusements. This school was established and is supported by the Society of Friends, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, who commend their labor amongst the Indians in the year 1798.

There are some Indians on both reservations who still hold to the old Indian religion and many of the modes of worship seem singular, but they are undoubtedly sincere in them. They have three festivals during the year, called the Strawberry, Green-corn and New Year's festivals. They have built for this purpose, with seating capacity some hundreds, and warmed by a fire-pit at each end. At these gatherings they dance and play games and partake of an appropriate feast which is prepared by some of the women; after which their great men make speeches in the native tongue. They hold a feast on the tenth day after the death of any of their party. At this meeting they call together the relatives and friends of the deceased, and after the feast they dispose of the clothing and other articles which was his or her possession to those present as tokens of the love and esteem which he or she had for them; and this is followed by the form of religious services. But a great number of Indians profess Christianity, and there are several buildings in which religious services are held, some of them expensive and commodious structures, capable of seating some hundreds of persons, and are occupied by Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist congregations. On the Cattaraugus reservation an agricultural exhibition is carried on every year. It is twenty years since it was started and there have been many and great improvements. The cattle which they exhibit are all of good breeds, and produce of first quality. Many of Indian women show as good bread, pies, canned fruits, &c. as their white neighbors can produce.

On account of the geographical position these reservations, the Cattaraugus Indians have better advantages for farming, and surrounded by a better class of white people and therefore they are a more intelligent and enterprising community. The Allegheny vation lies for thirty-nine miles along the shores of the Allegheny river, and averages if a mile in width on each side of the river. It is surrounded by a lumber country which gives a poor class of white people, many of whom are of low moral character, of whom the Indians obtain whiskey and tobacco, and who in many ways a disadvantage to our race. A great amount of lumber is rafted on the river in the spring of each year, so that the Indians engage in it. For the sake of high prices they neglect their farming until it is late to raise a good crop. But all do not do so, for many of them have good farms which are well cultivated, and which, with their homes, will compare favorably with some among thrifty white people. Many of the women are good cooks, and keep their houses clean and neat, and some of them are dexterous nurses, seamstresses, &c. In the summer they have picnics and other like pastimes. In winter sewing parties, New Year's parties, &c. At this meeting a person who had been appointed for the purpose, announced a number of deaths which have occurred among the Indians during the year, which he carefully noted down. After this three persons were appointed to distribute the New Year's cakes among the company. On Christmas they have Christmas trees in the school meeting-houses. Indians are seldom seen to swear, for there are no such words in their native language, and but few are so ignorant as to swear in English."

Kansas Refugees.

For "The Friend."

Elizabeth L. Comstock writes to Joshua L. Baily from Topeka, Kansas, under date of 2d 18th:

A steady stream of emigration continues. Refugees come to Topeka at the rate of 200 to 300 per week. We hear of our emigrants in different parts of the State of fresh arrivals in still larger numbers. From Paris we hear of large arrivals in great destitution. The same reports come from Coffeyville, Chaptawa, Oswego and other parts. The man who has charge of our receiving and shipping department has just informed me that at the present rate of demand our supplies will not last two weeks. Canst thou send more bedding and clothing as quickly as possible?"

In the 23d inst. E. L. C. writes: "The refugees are crowding in faster than can be cared for. The cry of suffering and destitution comes to us from other towns." The most reliable estimates place the number of Refugees who have reached Kansas in the last few months at 18,000 to 20,000. Gov. Johnson, of Kansas, says in a recent letter to me he has reason to believe that the colored migration to the North this spring will not be short of 100,000.

E. L. C. Comstock addressed a meeting at "Well Hall," in Chicago, on the 16th inst., which was very fully reported and favorably commented upon by several of the papers of that city, and it is believed will arouse a larger interest among the people of Illinois on behalf of the Refugees.

The earnest solicitation of Gov. St. John, of Nebraska, is about to go to Nebraska in endeavor to bring about a like interest in that State. It is desired to procure homes and employment for the Refugees in other

Northern States, now that the emigration is becoming greater than it seems possible suitably to provide for in Kansas.

Since the first of the Eleventh month last, the undersigned has received in this city and transmitted to Elizabeth L. Comstock, for the relief of the Refugees, $1500 in cash, and supplies as follows, viz: 32 boxes, 35 bales and 146 barrels of clothing; 2 bales burlap and bed sacks; 2 boxes bibles and school books, 2 boxes crockery and queensware, 2 boxes tin hardware, 3 boxes soap and 6 boxes seed. In all 231 packages.

At least one third of these supplies were sent from New England, a few from New York and Delaware, and the remainder from various parts of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. Free transportation was procured from Boston and Providence to Philadelphia, as well as from Philadelphia to Kansas.

"The Kansas Freedmen's Relief Association," with which our friend E. L. Comstock is co-operating, does not propose to support the Refugees in idleness, but every endeavor is made at once to distribute them where employment can be had. The readiness of these people to take the positions found for them, the alacrity with which they enter upon work, is evidence that the emigrants are of the most energetic sort, and their general sobriety and good conduct has been a most gratifying feature of the work.

But very few of these people can be put on their feet at once, and made wholly non-dependent. Under the most favorable circumstances to be looked for, most of them will need aid for some time to come, at least until they can make their way to other parts of the country.

The appeal for aid is therefore renewed, not only for those who have already reached Kansas and are needing help to help themselves, but for the still larger number whom continued persecution in the South is driving northward.

The undersigned will continue to receive and transmit, as heretofore, any moneys or supplies that may be entrusted to him. The most desirable form of donation is either in money or made-up clothing. Articles sent by rail or boat, should be securely packed. To avoid misarrangement, each package should be distinctly marked "Joshua L. Baily, Philada., for Kansas Refugees" and should also have upon it the name of the donor or shipper, in order that its receipt may be properly acknowledged. Shipping receipts should be mailed with each shipment.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 3, 1850.

One of the reasons why the children of men do not more generally accept the gracious invitation of the Lord to take up their daily cross and follow Him, is a want of real faith in His goodness. It is too true, that there are multitudes who do not really believe that their happiness will be promoted by denying themselves those pleasures which the Light of Christ shows them to be opposed to the Divine will. Yet those who have given themselves up to be willing servants and obedient children of their Heavenly Father, unite in their testimony to the blessedness of the way in which they are walking; and their sincerity is shown by the earnest desires raised in their hearts that others, especially those who are the nearest and dearest to them, may enter on the same path that leads to everlasting rest, peace and happiness. There is a beauty and dignity that are very attractive in a life whose love to God is the ruling element in the character, and where its proper fruits are manifested—even love to others and a course of conduct consistent with the Divine requirements. These reflections have arisen from reading the Memorial of that valuable minister of Christ, one who died in Philadelphia 110 years ago.

In his early years, he had few opportunities of going to places of Divine worship, nor does he appear at that period of life to have had much help in an outward way in his religious progress. "But," he says, "the Lord was pleased by his grace and good visitation, to operate on my mind, that I was made to dread and fear the great Almighty Being, and it was given me to know, that 'God is a spirit, and they who worship Him, must worship Him in spirit and truth'; and through the blessed knowledge of God by his Holy Spirit, I had great reproof in my breast for sin and transgression, and dreaded to speak bad words, or to do what was evil, and was brought by inward conviction, to mourn, and seek for mercy to my soul; and at a time when I heard of the suffering of my dear Saviour on the cross, and how he suffered unto death, my heart was broken before the Lord, and I went alone and wept, being much afflicted with the Jews, and of his hard-hearted people, the Jews, and of his being crucified. Great was the goodness of the Almighty to me, in giving me a sense of many things appertaining to godliness, in the time of this tender visitation; and I found by the divine witness in myself, that if I would be a disciple of Christ, I must take up my cross daily to that which displeaseth God; He being greatly to be feared and obeyed, and was worthy of the deepest reverence that my soul, body and strength could ascribe to his all-powerful name."

Yielding to this blessed visitation, his mouth was opened in the ministry, whilst yet an apprentice; and throughout the remainder of his life he was often engaged in pleading with others, "to come, taste and see that the Lord is good," to which truth, he could bear witness from his own experience. In illustration of this, we quote the following passage from his journal. "Blessed be [the Lord's] holy name! He sustained and supported me, and through his gifts and grace preserved me in the fear of God; his fear was a fountain of life as well as unspeakable pleasure in my first setting out in the world for myself. Oh! the streams of the celestial fountains or waters of life stand open to all that are athirst, that they may drink, and they may have wine and milk without money, and without price."

In the last page of his journal, written shortly before his death, when his previous life had been passing in view, he confirms the above testimony: "I know I have endeavored to serve [the Lord] in fear and trembling, and frequently have been bowed under a sense of my great unworthiness; but great hath been his mercy and power, extended toward me a poor tribulated sufferer in spirit, for the blessed Seed's sake; magnified be his eminent name! He hath hitherto been my rock, fortress and deliverer, and through his great kindness, I have a fixed hope in my mind of his salvation, through Christ Jesus my dear Redeemer, whose glorious name let it be magnified and adored for evermore."

We cannot desire a more happy course of life for our dearest friend, than that he should enjoy in his partake of the Lord's "grace and good visitation;" through submission to this, he led to fear the Lord and seek his mercy and preserving care; be enabled by Divine help to perform the allotted share of service in the world; know the Lord to be his "rock, fortress and deliverer;" and be enabled to see the end of life draws nigh, with "a fixed hope of salvation through Christ Jesus."

May all who are conscious of the Lord's visitations, of the pleading of his Holy Spirit, trust themselves unreservedly in his hands, hold nothing back, but with full assurance that He designs to bless them, surrender themselves, all that they have and all that they are, to his guidance and disposal. They that trust in the Lord shall never be confounded.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—An analysis of all the rainfall and snowfall observations of the Signal Corps for the past winter, shows the total amount of precipitation for that time over the great grain-growing districts, except the far Northwest and California, is considerably in excess of the average for many years past. This fact, it is stated, gives good promise for a better harvest. The House of Refuge states, that on First month last, there were in that institution 282 white boys, 77 girls, 143 colored boys, and 41 colored girls, from whose labor the State received $34,600. The average for New York for the 27th ult., with instructions to land the cargo at Kingston, Queenstown, or Galway, as desired by the Herald Relief Committee.

Eight hundred and thirty-eight German immigrants arrived at New York on the 26th ult., who are said to represent a desirable addition to agriculture. The imports for the last week at New York, were valued at $8,522,763, of which $2,806,376 was dry goods. This is a large falling off compared with the previous week, and the opinion is expressed in commercial circles that the bulk of the season's importations has been received.

Six thousand half chests of tea, valued at $90,000, consigned to a New York agent, have been seized at Toronto for violation of custom law.

The journeyman tailors and girls employed on custom-work in New York, have resolved to demand higher wages or strike. The packing box makers have also made a similar resolution.

Secretary Schwarz is informed that large numbers of Sitting Bull's band of Indians have applied for rations at Fort Peck, offering to surrender their arms, and paroles. The Secretary of War consents they can only be received by his department as prisoners of war.

Ouray and the other Ute Indians who have been in Washington, left for Colorado on the 29th.

The recent snow storm in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, has been more severe than any during the winter. The roads are blocked, and trees, chimneys, and fences were levelled by the wind. In some places in New Brunswick the snow is from five to six feet deep.

High winds prevailed throughout the West on the 27th ult., resulting at St. Louis a maximum velocity of thirty miles per hour. Several points along the Ohio river, small boats were damaged; and at Cincinnati navigation was almost suspended.

MARRIED at Hordham Meeting of Friends, 3rd 11th mo, 1879, GEORGE L. THOMAS, of Chester, Pa. MARIETH C. SHOEMAKER, of Montgomery Co., Pa.

DEED, on the 31st of First month last, MARY MADON widow of the late Daniel P. Madara, aged 65 years, and her executors, sold to the Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District.

2nd mo, 1st, 1880, at his residence, Germantown, Pa., CHARLES WILLIAMS, aged nearly 82 years, a member and elder of Northern District No. 1 Meeting, Philadelphia. This beloved Friend will be remembered to the Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, consistent life, and his strong attachment to the principles of the Society he belonged to. His religious care was always his first concern, and as a consequence approached the termination of life with a most comfortable assurance, saying a few days before his death "I have nothing to do but to wait for my Redeemer and the sweet innocent serenity of his countenance evidence of his peace. "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God."

shdally, in the city of Philadelphia, on 2nd of Second mo, 1880, in the 78th year of his age, at the residence of the Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, a useful member of Somerset Monthly Meeting, O. acceptably filling the station of overseer and elder. Earlier life, he travelled considerably as companion ministers; often passing through very trying exertions in his own account, and in sympathy with those who were endeavoring to support, as well as those amongst whom he visited. When the eventful life came on, and with it a release from active service he retained an earnest concern that the Sacred Principles should be maintained, and that he might be a witness that "himself might be found with his triumphant and burning at the coming of his Lord, he had long anticipated might be at an unexpected moment. "Blessed is that servant whom his Lord, who he counsell, shall find watching."

At the residence of his husband, near Hadfield, New Jersey, 2nd mo, 11th, 1880, LYDIA H. LINSER, (late Jones), wife of John H. Ballinger, daughter of the late Christopher Healy, in the 7th year of her age, an esteemed member of Hadson Monthly Meeting of Friends. Though her death was sudden, her friends will be grieved at the loss of a girl in Christ Jesus, she has been admitted into mansions of rest and peace.

in this city, on the 11th of Third month, WILLIAM NORRIS, in the 79th year of his age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

The Seneca and the Valley of the Genesee.

SETTLEMENT OF GENESÉE VALLEY BY THE WHITES.

The whole army was greatly impressed at the beauty of this country, and with the arable fertility of the soil, and the attention of settlers was early directed thitherward the glowing descriptions brought home by soldiers. The restlessness which follows wars was favorable to emigration, and a states and officers who had formed part of the army and others attracted by their tents, removed hither and were preparing to make this region their future home.

England and Pennsylvania did much toward peopling the Genesee country. The talists of Connecticut and Massachusetts first to risk their means in the inviting which peace had thrown open to their rprise. Before any title could be given, important question of jurisdiction, involving a history of England's grants, had to be decided. Patents for this land had been granted to Richard Hackett and others, "a firm and try lovers of colonization," by James I., 1606, for that part of America commonly called Virginia, between the 34th and 45th degrees of north latitude, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, a rather extensive grant a king who had no rightful claim what thereto. The Virginia company did not prosper, and its charter was annulled in 1624, on account of the jealousy of the Spaniards, and of James' desire to conciliate them in order to marry his son Charles to a Spanish princess. This produced much contention because of monstrous assumption of the crown, and the decided struggle between the foreign and Parliament, which led to the death of Charles the head.

The Pilgrims who are supposed to have landed on Plymouth rock, in 1620, obtained a patent from this Virginia company, but it was carried far to the northward of their lands and their charter thus become void and useless. They afterwards obtained a charter for the province of Massachusetts Bay, which fifty century later was vacated, but renewed in 1691 by William and Mary, who expressly recognized the western boundary, as had each of the others, to be the Pacific Ocean.

In 1663, Charles II. conferred upon his brother, the Duke of York and Albany, afterward King James II., all land lying between the Delaware and Hudson, and northwards to the boundary of Canada. This embraced the present limits of New Jersey and Pennsylvania, which latter claimed the whole area of the present State, as far eastward as the Connecticut river. Massachusetts claimed to the Hudson, and likewise the western half of the territory of New York and westward to the Pacific. Disputes hence arose, because of conflicting grants to settlers in this debatable region, followed by bloodshed, and the strife continued until hushed by the dangers that threatened the common country, at the beginning of the Revolution. The contention was at length quieted, and Massachusetts surrendered to New York all claim and title to the government, sovereignty and jurisdiction of the lands and territory in controversy, and New York released to the former State and to her grantees, the right of pre-emption of the soil from the native Indians, and all title and property in that portion of the State lying west of the old "pre-emption line," which extends northward through Seneca Lake, and terminates at Sodus Bay, on Lake Ontario, embracing about one-third of the present territory of the State.

In 1789, a land office was opened at Canandaigua, which was the first of the kind for the sale of unoccupied lands. The system employed in the surveys of United States lands was adopted, which method may be described as the establishment of ranges six miles in width, running north and south through the whole purchase, which ranges are crossed by parallel lines six miles apart, running east and west. These spaces enclosed were called townships, and were mostly divided into lots of 160 acres each, for actual settlers. This is the quarter section of the western land surveys. This land office was opened in the interest of Phelps & Gorham, who had purchased a large portion of the original tract, and had secured a release of the Indian claims. A very large part of the tract that had been purchased by Phelps & Gorham, having reverted to the State of Massachusetts, it was resold to an agent of Robert Morris, of Philadelphia, the eminent financier of the Revolution, who fully believed, to use his own language, "that he would make a greater fortune out of it in a short time than any other person can now believe." By this purchase Morris secured the exclusive power to extinguish the Indian claim. He paid or was to pay therefore, one hundred thousand pounds Massachusetts currency, and the extent of four million acres included most of Western New York. To effect its sale agencies were established in the principal capitals of Europe, and before Morris became aware of the great value of his lands east of the Genesee, William Temple Franklin, a grandson of Dr. Franklin, had sold them to an association in England, composed of Sir William Pultney, an eminent British statesman, and John Hornby, an ex-Governor of Bombay, India, and others. The lands lying west of the river, were soon sold to the Holland Land Company, Amsterdam, Holland. For more than half his life, William H. Seward was the principal agent and attorney of this company.

Robert Morris had stipulated with the Holland Land Company to extinguish the title of the natives at his own expense. In the summer of 1797, arrangements were made for the treaty. President Washington nominated Commissioners who were confirmed by the Senate with the understanding that no action should take place until the Indians themselves requested a treaty. Their consent was at length obtained, at the treaty of "Big Tree," now Genesee, in 1797, at the unfinished residence of James and William Wadsworth, and in a temporary council-house not distant.

At the opening of this council Corn-planter spoke first, addressing the Commissioners, acknowledging the speech of invitation conveyed through Horatio Jones and Jasper Parrish, and returning the string of wampum that had reached him with the invitation. Tentative, and Colonel Wadsworth assured the Indians of his purpose watchfully to observe the proceedings, in their interest. Robert Morris was not present, but his son Thomas and Captain Williamson, agent of the Pultney interest, submitted his speech and a belt of wampum, which were laid upon the table. On reassembling on the next day, Red Jacket thanked the Great Spirit for his care of the dignitaries, and turning to Thomas Morris, said, "It appears to us as though something is kept back. From the candor and veracity promised by you we hope that all will be said before the Indians fairly." On being assured of this the chief observed that as the sun was nearly down, it would be well to adjourn until the next day. On the next day the objects of the treaty were presented, and the Indians were left to their private deliberations. Five or six days passed without a public session, and the interval was spent in considering the speech of Robert Morris, and in drinking the whiskey that had found its way to them. Several among the chiefs had been drinking, and Red Jacket was found among them, and was in a quarrelsome mood. The chief, under advice, seized the offending barrel of spirits, and knocked in the head, but not in time to prevent a general fight.

Again the council-fire was uncovered, and speeches were made in reply to Robert Morris' proposals. Red Jacket was unfavorable thereto, and referred in glowing terms to the importance which the possession of their fine lands had given the Seneca among other nations of Indians. "It raises us in our own estimation," said he, "It creates in our bosoms a proud feeling which elevates us as a nation."

* * * "We are courted while the Oneidas are considered fit only to make brooms and baskets. Why is this difference? It is because the Senecas are known as the proprietors of a broad domain, while the Oneidas are cooped up in a narrow space." At a private conference with the chiefs, Morris offered the Indians $100,000 for their lands, a sum, he said, which placed in the Bank of the United States, would bring them $6000 a year interest. The idea was altogether new to the natives, who were as yet unable to count a hundred, and they could not comprehend how money could grow without being planted in the ground, nor how great a sum $100,000 was. To aid their comprehension, Thomas Morris told them that it was worth more than a hundred of robes, and would require thirty horses to draw the silver hither from Philadelphia. The speech was well received, and the Indians consulted together on the following day. Much opposition existed to the sale of the lands, and Red-Jacket boldly asserted in council, that the Indians did not want to sell, though they had assented reluctantly to holding the treaty, and offered Thomas Morris a single township in Pennsylvania at one dollar an acre, which he asserted would sell at an advance sufficient to cover the expense he had incurred. The Commissioners were determined to bring the proceedings to a close, and insisted against Thomas Morris' advice, that this proposition should be instantly rejected, and the natives brought to the consideration of the original offer, otherwise they would return home. Red-Jacket sprang to his feet, and in great passion said, "We have now reached a point to which we wished to bring you. You told us we were free either to sell or retain our Here is my hand on it"—thrusting his arm across the table—"let us shake hands and part friends. I now cover up this council-fire." All was now tumult. The whooping and yelling of the Indians was such, that persons unaccustomed to them would have imagined that they intended to tomahawk all the whites."

The result was a bitter disappointment to the Commissioners, who did not understand the Indians as well as did Morris.

(To be concluded.)

Selected for "The Friend."

In the spring of the year 1761, I informed my friends that I had a desire to attend the Quarterly Meeting at Salem, in New Jersey, and having their concurrence, on the 17th of the Fifth month I left home and went to Wilmington, and next day in company with several Friends from thence by water to our friend Joshua Thompson's, at the mouth of Salem creek. At the meeting of ministers and elders we were comforted together through the goodness of the Lord. On First-day there was a large gathering of a mixed multitude, and quiet, the Divine power being felt and gospel truths preached, by the influence whereof, many hearts were tendered; though I thought the beauty and solemnity of the meeting were a little marred by one Friend speaking too long; to begin in the life and conclude in the power and life, is becoming a minister of the gospel.

Atended the general meeting at Uxehlan—it was large and measurably attended with the ownings of truth, under the influence of which, admonition and counsel flowed freely to the youth, the Divine witness in several of whom was reached, and the name of the Lord praised, who is for ever worthy!

In these large meetings, as on all other such occasions, it is necessary in order for a proper qualification to minister to the people, humbly to wait to know the inward life and baptizing virtue of the Spirit and power of Jesus Christ, our all in all, without whose help we can never do his work to his praise, but instead of gathering the flock, we shall minister to their scattering from the true place of feeding.—John Churchman.

For "The Friend"

Memoir of Hannah Marsh,
BY HER DAUGHTER, PRISCILLA PITT.

In her ministry, Hannah Marsh often referred to the prophetic testimony to the Word nigh in the heart: "After those days, saith the Lord, I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel, I will put my law into their hearts," &c., was very, very often the subject of her ministry. She also very often comforted the poor and needy ones, and encouraged all to seek first the kingdom of heaven and the righteousness thereof, then all things needful shall not be added. "My faith is strong," she used to say, "I want to encourage my friends to exercise faith." "Mind the Lord's business, and He will mind thine," said a worthy friend. "Where's our faith?" she would say; she wished Friends would exercise more faith, and come to their week-day meetings. "If we give the heart up to the Lord, we give Him all."

She wished our meetings for discipline to be kept up under the same Divine power in which we were gathered. She reproved Friends sometimes for offering remarks without rising from their seats. She dearly cherished the memory of many dear valuable Friends, who in their day and generation conducted the discipline and were true elders and overseers of the flock; and she greatly deplored that so few seem now to be prepared to walk in their footsteps, and she would not spare herself the unpleasant task of lamenting occasionally in these meetings, in her latter years, the changes that have been allowed in individual practice, and in the ordering of these meetings, and in abolishing the wholesome Queries and the drawing up of Answers to them. She used to say, "It's not that I feel animosity to any one, but it won't do for me to turn aside. Whereunto any have attained, let them walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing. I undoubtedly believe the testimonies of Truth professed by Friends, were given to us as a people to bear before the world, and that we were intended to be as lights in the world, and as a city set upon a hill." My father used to go further, and say he "believed if we did keep to our principles people would flock to us as doves to the windows." My dear mother was very often heard in meeting to quote the "dear Saviour's" words, "If any man will be my disciple, he must take up his cross and follow me." She labored in private to oppose the modern liberty for music in families. Though she was so grieved at the modification of the discipline, and the laxity in its enforcement, yet could she not feel excused from attending Meetings for Discipline when able.

In this state of things, when year by year the discipline relaxed more and more amongst us, and her beloved and honored fellow-laborers followed one by one the way of all living and some of them, alas! took up, or at least tolerated modern views, another great trial had to be endured. Some with whom my parents enjoyed sweet unity, believed themselves called upon to absent themselves from our meetings, and meet apart with those only who still loved and cleaved to ancient principles. This left my parents still more solitary, while as my mother remarked, "We have yet heard the sound of a retreat." She often would remark, "I believe there never was time when it more behoved those who to the Truth, to stand faithful and be at the posts. It won't do for father and me to swerve from what we have known to be right. The who truly buy the Truth, can't sell it. Noting could make up to me for the loss of sweet inward peace—oh! there's nothing to compare with it." "Be still and know that I; God" was a very frequent text with her, a when enjoying the society of "dear friend;" "Then they that feared the Lord spake oft one to another," with the blessing attached and truly my parents ever had an open door for the "living remnant" in an especial manner—and for those less faithful or less experienced, they often made way to their tab saying "we must not live to ourselves, I shut ourselves up in a box; we are not our own—we are bought with a price. We be a heir here to promote his glory."

Her scattered memoranda often bear the poetic prayer—

"Oh! for a closer walk with God,
A calm and heavenly frame—
A light to shine upon the road
That leads me to the Lamb!"

How often in her latter years she would lovingly quote sweet simple stanzas of the children's hymns. She would say, "I have nothing to boast of, but I do feel thankful my Heavenly Father that good desires still uppermost with me as in my very childhood days.

The last eight years she was quite blind with one eye, and the latter years the sight of the other eye gradually failed, till she could only see to read and write in a good clear light; but she often remarked with a cheerful voice, "But what a favor it is to have my ward sight preserved!" It was after an attack of erysipelas in the head she lost sight of that eye; the doctor said it would turn; she used every morning on coming down, to put her hand over the seeing eye to prove whether the sight were returning the other; and after awhile she felt it better, desist, and leave off anxiety, for "if Heavenly Father saw it right, He would store it." Thus under every change and trial she was enabled to "come at resignation." When dear father was taken from her, was wonderfully shielded from overmuch grief or murmuring, nor did she "sit down fret," as father told her not to do. She would say, "It is so calming to my mind to think dear father," "I feel my loss very much very much miss him, but I think it's a favor he was taken first." "I desire to be resigned to whatever may overtake me—I wish to do no will." It was natural that in low moments she should feel her loss very closely, for beloved John was not only a companion to outward life and walk through this world, also a true helpmeet and sharer of her inward troubles and joys; but as the Lord had in in his wisdom to take him, she felt she must have all and trust to his Almighty power and aidance alone; living only hour by hour—never looking at the past, nor at the future, but living for the present, and leaving all to Him.

Scripture Illustrations from Malagasy Customs.

"The power of the crown is theoretically limited over the property and personal service of the people, so that for all Government work, such as building a palace or fort or priskoh, every one is liable for an uncertain amount of labor and expense until its completion, and without any payment. The depiction given by Samuel to the Israelites as to the demands that would be made upon them by their future king, with its somewhat sarcastic conclusion as to their ultimate gain on account of their folly, might have been applied very well to Malagasy sovereigns to a recent period. But the present Queen, under the influence of Christian teaching, has shown a laudable desire to lighten the burdens of her subjects, and is known universally by a appellation, "exceedingly kind and gentlered."

Marriage and Family Life.—In few countries is more respect paid to age and to elders than in Madagascar, and very fully is the respect carried out. "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honor the face of old man" (Lev. xix. 32). And such sentiments as those expressed by Elihu, "I am aging, and ye are very old; wherefore I was afraid, and durst not show you mine opinion" (Job xxxiii. 6), might be paraphrased by many a passage taken from the kabarys or public speeches which have been noted down. And as respect for age is also carried out to a considerable extent for seniority. Thus, if two brothers are taking a journey and any burden is to be carried, the younger one always carries it, as a matter of course."

The Hebrew law, by which a man was, the death of his elder brother, bound to bury his widow and so preserve his name and family possessions, finds a very close parallel in Malagasy usages (Deut. xxv. 5, 6); and there are special phrases to denote such marriages. This is closely connected with the strong family and clanish feelings of the Malagasy, in accordance with which people very seldom marry out of their own tribe and family, so that property may be kept together; and as by the Jewish law all land was to be retained in the possession of the same tribe or family originally holding it. (See Numb. xvi. 7. "The inheritance of the children of Gad shall not remove from tribe to tribe; every one shall keep to himself the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers.")

As, however, large families are very common amongst the Malagasy, and a considerable number of women are childless, adoption is far more common among them than it is with Western nations, and there are many passages in the Epistles, such as the adoption of sons, "the spirit of adoption," have greater force to the people of Madagascar than they have to us. And further, there is much less extreme poverty among the Malagasy than in our overcrowded Western civilization, children are most easily supported, and are ardently longed for, often with the passionate earnestness shown by Hannah the mother of Samuel (1 Sam. i. 10-16).

"Benedictions, Curses, and Salutations.—From what has just been stated, it naturally follows that to have children is looked upon as one of the greatest of all blessings; and the benediction upon a bride in the patriarchal times. ("Be thou the mother of thousands" (Gen. xxiv. 60), finds its parallel in the Malagasy blessing, "May thy heirs and descendants be multiplied."

"In Malagasy benedictions and salutations the Divine Name is most frequently invoked, as it is indeed by all Eastern peoples; but it would be an utter mistake to suppose that this frequent use of sacred words is any evidence of deep religious feeling. On the contrary, now that our Christian people are beginning to appreciate the obligations imposed by the Third Commandment, we always consider that a man is rather more of a heathen than others if he is profuse in the use of the name of God. Ignorance of this Eastern habit has led to some very edifying, but most mistaken, comments upon such passages as that in the Book of Ruth, where Boaz says to his reapers, "The Lord be with you; and they answered him, 'The Lord bless thee' (ii. 4). And it has been sometimes inferred from these phrases that there was a delightful and earnest religiousness of character in those using such beautiful language. But the fact is, that these were, and are still, the ordinary Oriental salutations, common to all religions; and a reference to other passages shows that people of very questionable character were equally profuse in similar pious language; see what was said by the murderers of Ishbosheth (2 Sam. x. 1), and by Laban, and by many others. And just in the same way, the Tahia Andriamainty hianao ("May you be blessed of God") of the Malagasy is the most common expression of thanks and of farewell, and is used in the vast majority of cases without any more religious feeling than we are conscious of when we say "Good bye" (God be with you) or "Adieu."

"Amongst all the tribes of Madagascar the commands of a father or an ancestor are held as most sacredly binding upon his descendants; and so one frequently meets with tribes or families who are prohibited from passing a certain place (as the royal family are bound not to pass along a particular act, or from the capital), or from doing certain acts, or from eating some kinds of food. One of my bearers was bound by the injunction of an ancestor not to eat pork, and another not to eat onions. We have examples of this in Scripture in the commands of Jacob to his sons, and of Joseph concerning his bones (Gen. xli. 1-25); and also in the injunctions of Rehob to his descendants not to drink wine, or plant or sow, or live in houses (Jer xxxv. 6, 7); and something similar in the abstinence of the Jews from a certain sinew in the thigh (Gen. xxxii. 32)."

"In the more primitive state of society existing in the still heathen tribes of Madagascar, it is common to see menial offices, which are left to slaves in the more civilized capital of the country, performed by the female relatives of the chiefs. Thus at Ivohitrosa, among the forest people, I remember being surprised to see the daughters and wives of the king and his family pounding rice and fetching water, &c., while still arrayed in the ornaments proper to their rank. But it will be remembered that this is just what both Rebekah and Rachel did, although they were near relatives of a wealthy and prosperous man, doubtless a sheikh, or chief of the district where he resided (see Gen. xxv. 15-20; xxix. 9, 10). There is, however, the same distinction among the Malagasy as among Easterns in the way of carrying the water-pitcher; free women carry it on the shoulder, as did Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 15), while slaves carry it on the head. Almost every Malagasy town and village presents the same scene now, morning and evening, as is described in 1 Sam. ix. 11: "Young maidens going out to draw water for the daily use of their households; and in every house there are two or more waterpots placed, as there was at Cana in Galilee (John ii. 6)."

"Mention was made just now of the 'rice-pit.' These are dug in the hard red clay soil of Imerina, and are a bottle-shaped excavation for storing rice in the husk; a flat stone is placed over the mouth, and then the whole is covered with earth, so that it is not very easy for a stranger to discover the store of food. These rice-pits form a common place of concealment from an enemy, and many Christians have been hidden in them during the time of persecution, just as the cisterns of the East are often used as hiding places (see 2 Sam. xvii. 15-21, describing the stratagem by which Jonathan and Ahimaz were concealed in the cistern, and so escaped Absalom's servants.)"

(To be concluded.)

Indian Ideas of Honesty.—Indians may be called honest, and who shall say how far the dishonesty of others has led to their treachery. They know when they are cheated, as our Government has found to its cost. An old trader, who had established himself at what happened to be a favorable locality among the Northern Indians, told a good story of his first trials with his red customers. Other traders had located in that same place before, but had not remained long. The Indians, who evidently wanted goods, and had money and furs, flocked about the store of the new trader and carefully examined his goods, but offered to buy nothing. Finally their chief, with a large number of his tribe, visited him.

"How do, John?" said the chief. "Show me goods. Ah! I take that blanket for me and that calico for squaw—three other skins for blanket and one for calico. Ugh! pay you by'm by—to-morrow."

He received his goods and left. On the next day he returned with a large part of his band, his blanket well stuffed with skins of various kinds. "Now, John, I pay."

And with this he drew an other skin from his blanket and laid it on the counter. Then he drew a second, a third and a fourth. A moment's hesitation, as though calculating, and he drew out a fifth skin—a very rich and rare one, and passed it over.

"That's right, John."

The trader instantly pushed back the last skin, with—

"You owe me but four. I want only my just dues."

The chief refused to take it, and they passed it several times back and forth, each one asserting that it belonged to the other. At length the dusky chieftain appeared to be satisfied. He gave the trader a scrutinizing look, and then put the skin back into the blanket. Then he stepped to the door, and gave a yell and cried out to his followers: "Come—come and trade with pale face John. He no cheat Indian. His heart big!"

Then turning to the trader, he said: "Suppose you take last skin, I tell my people no trade with you. We drive off others; but now you be Indians' friend and we be yours."

Before dark the trader was waist deep in furs and loaded down with cash. He found that honesty had a commercial value with these Indians.

Business Immorality.—All kinds of deception practised upon others for personal advantage are as forbidden as they are frequent. In a shop window an article is ticketed at a certain price. You enter the shop and are shown another article similar, but inferior, which, with many assertions and protestations, is declared to be identical in quality. You see an advertisement of "special bargains," in consequence of bankruptcy, or fire, or wreck, and while the initiated pass by with a smile, some, for whose behoof it was placed there, have no suspicion that it is a lie. You purchase a piece of calico "warranted" thirty-six yards, which measures thirty-one; and a piece of tape measuring fifteen yards, which is "warranted" eighteen. Herbert Spencer tells the story of one manufacturer who, hesitating to follow this custom, had his goods returned to him, and finally, as a great favor, he was permitted to satisfy his scrupulous conscience by sending in blank labels! It is and price is lowered in consequence, so that no harm arises." But what does that mean? It means that at first some unscrupulous manufacturer reduced the length "warranted," and so made unjust profit till he was detected; others, finding themselves unable to compete with him, were compelled to follow his example, the weakest men first, the strongest last, until the practice became tacitly allowed.

But how that diminishes the immorality of the practice, we fail to see. Examples of deception might be adduced, however, which have not even that flimsy excuse. A clever salesman will sometimes present samples in such order as to disqualify the eye, or the taste, or even the touch of the purchaser; or assuming an air of singular honesty, he will point out defects in the first purchases, till, having won the confidence of the customer, he abuses it by passing off inferior goods. In all such acts the sin lies in the deception of the more ignorant or weak. If you sell milk and water, or shoddy, as such, no wrong is done; but if the one is sold as cloth, and the other as milk, then the very sin is committed of "selling the refuse for wheat," on account of which Amos threatened punishment from an offended God. Such deceit does not prevail only in trade transactions. The barrister commits it who takes his fee for the work he does not mean to do, or advances a plea in court which he knows to be invalid. The candidate for municipal or parliamentary elections commits it, when he makes promises which will never be fulfilled, to gain the suffrages of the electors. The politician is guilty of it, if he keeps the people in ignorance till their passions and pride are sufficiently aroused to impel them to an unrighteous course, from which a false sense of honor will not allow them to draw back. All such offences stand condemned at the bar of God, by the great and changeless law, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."—Sunday at Home.

SOWING TIME.

"In due season we shall reap if we faint not."

I seek not the harvest at here,
From the seeds of truth I sow;
I willingly wait to bind the sheaves
In the world to which we go.

To buy am I in the field
To seek them as they fly;
But I know there's a germ of life in each;
And they cannot, cannot die.

The breath of the Lord will waft
Each one wherever he will;
And there it shall spring, and bear its fruit,
His purpose to fulfil.

'Tis a joy to bear the seed,
To go with the store of grain,
To scatter it here and scatter it there,
And sow and sow again.

In the morning's dewy hour,
'Mid noontide's sultry heat,
At evening time when the shadows fall,
To drop the gospel wheat.

I know not which shall thrive,
But the promise of God I take;
His eye will follow the smallest grain
I sow for his dear sake.

"Blessed are ye that sow!"
Yes, Lord, the work is sweet;
The hardest toil is the dearest joy,
The soul's most dainty meat.

Thank God for the sowing time!
When the work is done, and the workers throng
To the harvest jubilee!

DEVOTION.

BY S. D. BURCHARD.

'Tis not beneath the fretted dome
Alone, God listens to our prayer;
'Tis not when crowds behold us kneel,
To pour our spirit's incense there.

'Tis not when wealth, and joy, and love,
Leave life's gay path without a thorn;
Or pleasure with her honied cup,
An early offering brings each morn.

'Tis when the spirit lowly bends,
Unseen by eye, unheard by ear;
'Tis in the hour of grief and pain,
We feel His gracious presence near.

A humble heart and spirit meek,
Are all He asks for all his care,
In any clime, in any tongue,
For God, our God, is everywhere.

He sits in majesty enthroned;
But not the slightest breath of prayer
Is lost, for angels hover round
To wait it up for record there.

"Little by little," the tempter said,
As a dark and cunning snare he spread
For the young, unwary feet,
"Little by little and day by day,
I will tempt the careless soul away
Until the ruin is complete."

"Little by little," sure and slow,
We fashion our future of bliss or woe,
As the present passes away.
Our feet are climbing the stairway bright
Up to the regions of endless light,
Or gliding downward into the night.
"Little by little, day by day."

A LEGEND OF THE TRAILING ARBUTUS.

Was in the early history of the land,
When yet the Red Man owned its forest bowers,
Two little English children, hand in hand,
Went forth into the woods to seek for flowers.

The dreary winter had been long and wild,
No living thing might brave its deadly frost,
Above the garden-fence the snow lay piled,
And all the outer world to view was lost;

And oft while aiding in her household task
Their busy mother, moving to and fro,
The little ones would pause, and wistful ask,
"Will spring come back again? we fain would know!"

Then, gravely sweet, the mother would reply,
"The seed-time and the harvest shall not cease,
For God has promised, therefore you and I
May trust His gracious Word, and wait in peace."

"And will the woods have flowers, like those we kneel
And loved to gather in the English dells,
The sweet, pale primrose, and the violet blue,
And hyacinth, with all its fragrant bells?"

"My children, He can make the flowers to grow
And bloom in beauty here, as well as there,
If not the very same, yet still we know
That what His Hand has planted, will be fair."

And lo! one smiling morn, the little maids
Awoke from sleep, and Spring was come again!
Her balmy breath had thrilled the forest glades,
And softened all the winter's icy chain.

The oak and elm put forth their swelling shoots
To lure the happy birds to rest and sing,
And far beneath, amid their starchy roots,
Grew moss and fern, and many a lovely thing.

And forth into the woods the children went,
The breezes sported with their golden hair,
Their eyes were beaming with a sweet content,
And their glad voices stirred the vernal air.

And as they sought o'er all the mossy ground,
Where vines o'erarching made a tangled bower,
"O see!" cried one, "the treasure I have found!
As fair and sweet as any English flower!"

Beneath this tree, the wintry leaves between,
I saw its face just peeping at the sky,
And here are more amid the mosses green,
On yonder bank, and all around they lie.

Laden with sylvan spoils, the children came
To where the waiting mother sat and smiled,
"O look, and tell us what shall be its name,
This lovely stranger of the western wild!"

"'Tis like the Mayflower* of the old home-time,
The pink-tipped blossom with its snowy heart,
But then it grew so low we need not climb,
And had no thorn to make our fingers smart."

The mother praised and blessed the lovely flowers,
Then softly said: "The Mayflower let it be
In memory of the land that once was ours,
And the good ship that brought us o'er the sea.

And when the sky of life seems overcast,
And hope grows faint, by wintry tempests driven,
Remember how the flower came forth at last,
And 'mid the faded leaves looked up to Heaven."

In after times the men of science came
With learned words for every leaf and spray,
But still the dower maintains its simple name,
And Spring's first darling is the lovely May.

It is somewhat questionable to complain to speak of "a remarkably well-preserved old person." It commonly means that the person has lived to take care of himself; that chief aim in life has been to live, and that he has obtained his reward. To be well "worn" is ordinarily a great deal better than be "well preserved." Wrinkles and deep lines belong to the face of one who has died and borne his part in life. A fair countenance in maturity is often an evidence of a use life.

For "The Friend."
A Copy of Giles Knight's Testimony.

To our well beloved Friends and Brethren in the Truth at Nailsworth in Gloucestershire or elsewhere, we send greeting—

Signifying that our ancient Friend, Giles Knight, having some occasion to see his native country, and his outward affairs requiring his personal appearance, doth induce him, as well as affection, to undertake his voyage to see his old friends; now he having made application to our Monthly Meeting in order to have Certificate, and persons appointed to make inquiry how he leaves his family; and withal the ship could not stay until our next Monthly Meeting he might have a Certificate, signed by the Particular Meeting where he belongs, to wit Byberry.

These may certify that enquiry being made no objection found, we recommend him as an elder and one well esteemed by us for many years; having left his family with a great deal of love; he has had that great comfort in having sober and well inclined children, and the Lord has blest him with outward substance, which we hope may be well disposed to his useful offspring. We heartily wish the Lord may spare his life to see his friends and family again; having left us in unity and love. We wish and pray for his preservation in the truth; with all the faithful throughout the whole world: We salute you and bid you farewell in our Lord Jesus Christ.

Signed at Byberry the 8th of 7th mo. 1717, in order of Abington Monthly Meeting.

For "The Friend."

Notes from Florida.

Perhaps it might be right to let our readers "The Friend" know a little of our labors the lovely clime of the far South. During my stay here of near two and a half years, finding what seemed right for us to do, we find a Good Master who works for his humble servants here as in other lands. Little by little the work has been growing. We let our deeds be known to some extent of a want of open literature, and many friends and unknown parties have kindly sent us tracts, &c., & free distribution. We have received in 34,841 pages of tracts; 3,156 temperance, first-day school and religious papers; and 5 bibles and testaments. Nearly all the love have been distributed to the best of our ability. We are now quite short of nearly all deeds, and would be thankful to any who love the cause at heart if they would send us other supply. We are not working for money, nor for self-honor, but for the good souls. We have not means at our command that we can spare much to purchase additional matter with; but trust the Lord will through his servants, supply what is necessary.

Our work in the above way is largely among colored people, who are quite poor generally, but always glad to get what we can give them. Many of them seem quite interested in education; the State furnishes equally to white and black a limited amount of money for free schools. The unnecessary use of liquor is quite prevalent with all classes; consequently we need much temperance literature. Our temperance work has been blessed. A number of hard drinkers have reformed; yet there is much labor needed.

For "The Friend."
The Meeting at Firbank Chapel and its Results.

John Audland's wife was one of the members of the congregation that met at Firbank Chapel, and in her heart, as in that of her husband, the seed sown fell into good ground and brought forth fruit abundantly. The previous parts of this narrative give some hints of the Christian spirit with which she was animated, as well as the Gospel labors that she performed. In a testimony concerning her husband, she says, "The eternal God, who by his providence joined us together in marriage in our young days, in his blessed counsel also caused his day to spring from on high upon us; in the marvellous light and bright shining whereof He revealed his Son Christ in us, and gave us faith to believe in Him, the eternal Word of life, by which our souls came to be quickened and made alive in Him; and also in and by the quickening power of his holy Power we were made one in a spiritual and heavenly relation, our hearts being knit together in the unspeakable love of Truth, which was our life, joy and delight, and made our days together exceeding temporal enjoyments were sacrificed and made a blessing unto us.

"Notwithstanding I loved his company, and the enjoyment of him with me, above all the world; yet nevertheless in submission to the will of God (whose chosen vessel he was) and also in respect to the honorable service of Truth, and the publication thereof, which he was called unto; I could freely give him up as to be separated from him in the outward as great part of our time after we were convinced of God's blessed truth, and made living witnesses of the virtuous life and powerful operation thereof, as in this our day gloriously made known to the everlasting joy of our immortal souls."

A letter which she wrote to her husband when from home in 1654 on the service of the Gospel, manifests not only her affection, but her zeal for the Lord's cause, and what a faithful helpmate she was in strengthening him in the good work in which he was engaged. In this she says: "O! how am I refreshed to hear from thee, to hear of thy faithfulness and boldness in the work of the Lord. O dear heart, I cannot utter the joy I have concerning thee. O blessed be the day in which thou wast born, that thou art found worthy to labor in the work of the Lord; surely the Lord hath found thee faithful in the little, therefore He hath committed much unto thee. Go on in the name and power of the Lord Jesus Christ, from whence all strength cometh, to whom be all glory and honor forever. Now is the time of the Lord's work, and few are willing to go forth into it. All the whole world lieth in wickedness doing their own work; but blessed be the Lord forever, who hath called us from doing our own work into his great work. O dear heart, thou knowest my heart, thou mayst read daily how that I rejoice in nothing more than in thy prosperity in the work of the Lord."

Of this good woman the following interesting account is preserved in Piety Promoted.

"Anne Camm, late wife of Thomas Camm, of Camm's Gill, was daughter of Richard Newby, in the parish of Kendal, in Westmoreland, a family of good repute, being always religiously inclined. Her father was convinced of the blessed truth in 1652, and died therein a faithful man. Anne Camm was born in the Eighth month, 1627; and was well educated in learning proper for her sex. About the year 1640, when she was 13, she was sent up by her parents to an aunt at London, where she became acquainted with a religious people called Puritans. Her stay in London was about seven years, from whence she returned to Kendal. After some time there, she removed to the city of York, and dwelt in a family of great account in the world, her mistress being a pious woman, after whose decease she returned again to Kendal, her society still being with the most religious where she came.

"At Kendal there was a seeking people, who met often together, sometimes sitting in silence, other times in religious conferences, and often in fervent prayer. John Audland living remote, yet sometimes fell in amongst them; and about the year 1650, John Audland and she married, and they were both convinced of truth in the beginning of 1652, by the ministry of that honorable servant of Christ, George Fox. So powerfully did God, by his sanctifying word and spirit, work upon instruments in his hand, to preach the gospel unto others in the next year, 1653, and so forth, until the Lord put a period to their days.

"The first place she said Anne Audland was called of the Lord to visit, except about home, was the county of Durham, about the beginning of the year 1654, and she preached truth to the people in the town of Auckland, in the said county, on a market-day, for which she was imprisoned in the town jail, where she spoke to the people through the window, and several were affected with her testimony; and towards evening she was discharged. John Langstaff, who was of great repute among his neighbors, owned her testimony, and went with her into prison, and when released brought her to his house; but John's wife being no Friend, chid with her husband, which made Anne very uneasy to stay there. So she walked out in the fields to seek some covert place to take up her lodging in; but Anthony Pearson, of Ramephaw, a late justice of the peace, who lived some miles distant, having knowledge by George Fox, who was at his house, of Anne's coming to that town, came with a horse and pillion, and took her home to his house that night.

"After her service in those parts was over, she returned home; and in the winter following, she, with Mabel Camm, wife of John Camm, travelled through Yorkshire, Derbyshire, Leicestershire, into Oxfordshire, to the town of Banbury, where Mabel Camm had a concern to go to the steeples house; and spoke to the priest and people, and Anne accompanied her. Whereupon the people rudely hurried them out of the house, and abused them in the yard. The priest passing by, Anne Andland said, "Man, behold the fruits of thy ministry." Next day they were sent for before the mayor, who had got two witnesses to swear Anne had spoken blasphemy, for which they committed her to prison. Mabel Camm was dismissed, and travelled to Bristol, where she met with her husband, John Camm. After some days, two men in Banbury gave bond for her appearance at the next assize, by which she was a kind of prisoner at large, which gave opportunity for her to have several meetings with the people in the town. Her two bonds-men, and several hundreds more, came to be convicted of truth, and turned to the Lord Jesus Christ. For the official general ministry God had called her to bear, so that many were added to the church, and a large meeting of Friends there was in that town, and several other meetings in the country adjacent were settled. For this cause their adversaries were angry, and they threatened that she should be burned when the assize came."

For "The Friend,"
Robert Sutcliffe's Travels.

"1804. 8th month 15th. In the evening I called on Wm. Savery's widow, who appeared to be dejected, on account of the recent loss of a beloved husband. Few men have finished their course in the possession of more esteem and regard from mankind in general; and his mind dwelling near to the Fountain of Life and Love, his charity was unbounded. Exclusive of the testimony of the meeting to which he belonged, I met variety of periodical publications, both in prose and verse.

"8th month 16th. Spent a pleasant evening at D. Bacon's. He, like the last mentioned Friend, was a man highly esteemed in the circle of his acquaintance; and, being of a sweet disposition, had a great place amongst young friends, when his advice was wanted. He is since deceased.

"8th month 17th. I dined and spent a part of the day at James Pemberton's, a kind and hospitable Friend of this meeting. Although approaching to his 90th year, he was then of considerable activity in offices of kindness to his friends. Having lived nearly all his time in this city, he has had the opportunity of observing its regular, although rapid progress, from a small town to a great commercial city. Amongst other things, he mentioned to me that he well remembered the time when there was but one iron monger's shop in the place; and when there was only one ship in the trade between Philadelphia and London; and the arrival of this vessel used to be of so much importance, that marriages were sometimes delayed until its return. Such is the great increase of this city, that it is now said to contain 106,000 inhabitants; more than 1000 families of whom are of our Society."

Under the head of "Occurrences, &c., in Philadelphia during a stay of several months," R. S. writes:

"11th month 2nd. I supped and spent the evening at S. S.'s, where a sister of John Pemberton's widow was present. She informed me that her father was frequently in the practice of entertaining different parties of Indians, who came to Philadelphia on public business; and that having once invited a number of chiefs then in the city to breakfast, they came to the house rather earlier than the servants expected, accompanied by their interpreter. However, they were introduced into the breakfast room, where a servant was engaged in brightening up some of the brass work about the fireplace, and were desired to sit down until her master made his appearance. They had not sat long, before one of the Indians made an observation in his own language, which the interpreter was desired to put into English; but this he objected to, alleging that what the Indian had said was a matter of in-difference, and not worth repeating. On being closely pressed to keep back nothing the Indians might say, as every thing from them would be interesting, he complied, and said that the remark which the Indian made was this: 'Look,' said he to his fellow Indians, 'at that servant, how she labors at those andirons. I dare say if we had come yesterday, we should have found her at the same employment; and if we come to-morrow morning, it is ten to one but we shall still find her at the same work. How foolish these white people are! thus to labor and toil about things which can answer no good purpose; certainly these white people must be fools! Thus the Indians judge the civilized part of the world; and what is called the civilized part is not behind in judging the Indians; so apt are we to judge one another.

"1805. 1st month 8th. I spent this afternoon at J. D.'s, a Friend who some years past came from the neighborhood of Darlington, with his wife and family. There is something so remarkable in the circumstances of his leaving England, that I am tempted to relate a few lines from his own mouth. He being a merchant of great respectability and liberality, who, by industry, has realized a large property, I believe they may be relied on. For some time before he left England, his thoughts had been turned towards Pennsylvania; but before he had come to any fixed resolution, he dreamed that he had met with a Friend from that country who was able to give him every necessary information on the subject. A short time after this dream he came accidentally to Darlington, where he saw a person in the street who exactly resembled the Friend he had seen in his dream. He accordingly applied to him, and found the individual he was speaking to was John Pemberton, of Philadelphia, who was at that time on a religious visit to Great Britain. Having received what information he thought necessary, he made arrangements for his voyage to America, and, with his wife and children, took a final leave of England."

There are doubtless many readers of "The Friend" who will be reminded by the above narrative of Isaac Jackson's removal from Ireland to Chester County, Pennsylvania, in 1725. He too was favored with a remarkable dream or vision, which confirmed him in the belief that his removal to America was in the ordering of Divine Providence. For an interesting account of which and of his son William Jackson, see "Biographical Sketches and Anecdotes of Friends," p. 240.

"1st month 14th. I dined at J. W.'s in company with Doctor Fothergill, of Bath, who had lately come over on account of his health. At J. W.'s hospitable table we were treated with wild venison, which had been sent to him from among the Indians. Another of the company was a partner in a house at Antwerp. I was sometimes ready to think that Philadelphia might be considered as a kind of central depot, in which is found people of every nation on the earth; and where all appear to unite cordially as in one common family. Such are the beneficial effects of a free and liberal policy, the seeds of which were sown by that enlightened patriot William Penn."

War Debt.

The U. S. Consul at Frankfort, Germany recently sent to the Secretary of State, some suggestive tables, which give a sad picture of the burthens to which the people of Europe are subjected—largely through the military system. By these it appears that the aggregate indebtedness of the European nation has increased from about $12,503,000,000, in 1865, to $20,585,000,000, in 1879. The annual cost of conducting the governments has advanced in the same period from $1,898,000,000 to $2,788,000,000. The amounts expended for military purposes in 1865 was about $560,000,000 per annum, and in 1879, $766,000,000. In his letter our consul says:—

"In this connection it may be remarked that there seems to be little prospect at the present time of any material reduction in the immense military burthens borne by European countries. Between these countries the present situation is that of an armed truce. In Germany, for example, the tendency is toward an increase rather than a reduction of military forces, and a bill having such increase in view is now pending in the Imperial Parliament. The other great powers are in like state preparation for an impending conflict. All them demand additional forces, and threaten to lay additional burthens of taxation."

Natural History, Science, &c.

A Struggle with an Octopus.—Mr. Smale, the Government diver, who was attacked by a large octopus, while at work recently on the bed of the Moyne River, at Bedford, in the colony of Victoria, gives his account of the affair: "Having thrust my arm into a hole found that it was held by something, and the action of the water was stirring up the loam, and therefore I could not see distinct, for a few minutes; but when it did clear away I saw to my horror the arm of a large octopus entwined around mine like a boa-constrictor, and just then he fixed some of his suckers on the back of my hand, and the pain was intense. I felt as though my hand was being pulled to pieces, and the more I tried to take it away the greater the pain became. I bit the greatest difficulty in keeping my foot down, as the air rushed along the interior of my dress and inflated it; and if my feet had got uppermost I should soon have become insensible, held in such a position, and also if I had given the signal to be pulled up, the master would have held on, and the chance would have been that I should have had broken arm. I had a hammer with me, but could not reach down to use it on him. There was a small iron rod about five feet from me and with my foot I dragged this along until I could reach it with my left hand. And no, the fight commenced, and the more I struck him the tighter he squeezed, until my arm got quite benumbed. After a while I found it grip began to relax a little, but he held on until I had almost cut him to pieces, and the relaxed his hold upon the rock, and I pulled him up. I was completely exhausted, having been in that position for over twenty minutes. I brought the animal up, or rather a part of it. We laid him out, and he measured over eight feet across, and I feel perfectly convinced that this fellow could be held down five or six men."—London Times.

Lost Countries found in Coin.—In citing the historical information derivable from coins, we are obliged to be very particular in our geographical facts we acquire from them of equal importance. A case was started some time ago how an island of the Ægean which had been lost, was discovered by means of a coin (the piece not bigger than a halfpenny), and how recent soundings proved the existence of this isle. There was a lost city which owed its place to a coin. For over a thousand years no one knew where Pandosia was.

History told us that at Pandosia King Pyrrhus collected those forces with which he invaded Italy, and that he established a mint here; but no one could put their finger on Pandosia. Eight years ago a coin came under the sharp eyes of a numismatist. There were letters, Pandosia, inscribed on it, but what is better, there was an emblem, indicative of a well-known river, the Crathis. Then everything was revealed with the same certainty as if the piece of money had been an Athenian, and Pandosia, the mythical city, was at once given its proper position in Bruttium. Now, a coin may be valuable for artistic merit, when it elucidates a doubtful point in history or geography, its worth is very much enhanced. This silver coin, which did not weigh more than a quarter of a dollar, because it cleared up the mystery of Pandosia, was sold to the British Museum $1,000, the price paid for it.

A writer in Nature says: "While engaged on a survey of the Disang River, in Eastern Sumatra, I had occasion to submerge a line the end of a pool called the 'Deo Dube,' (or deep of the Demon.) While seated in a small boat, and very slowly drifting on the water, I became aware of a number of large fish (Barbus macrocephalus) moving about the water below and around me. Sitting feebly still, I had the pleasure to see them gradually approach the surface and move about me at a foot or so distance, passing along, under, and round the canoe, carefully mining it, bow and stern specially. It is very easy to guess a fish's thought, but in the manner in which they examined my symmetrical and gray-colored canoe they appeared to think it might possibly be a huge shark, and dead, of course. While watching their movements I was aware of a peculiar tick, or percussive sound—frequently repeated on all sides, and coming from below, close to me. Eventually I found that this was made by the mahsir, and one—passing along on my right, by itself, made several distinct sounds as it went on—that seemed answered by others to the left. If seated, say the bank, the sound would be loud enough to be heard at forty feet distance. A large mahsir is also common in some parts of Eastern Sumatra that sings loudly in concert."

A curious occurrence has lately taken place at the London Zoological Gardens. One night the lions were observed to be in a state of great tribulation, rolling about, and trying to get something out of his mouth with his paws. Upon examining the animal to see what was the matter Mr. Bartlett found that a great bone had become a fixture in the poor brute's mouth. The difficulty was to remove it, as the lion was in a fearful temper. This was done by getting the lion into a "shifting den," where his face would not be very far from the bars. It was then ascertained that the object in the lion's mouth was the spongy, round bone, as big as a cricket ball, which forms the hip-joint of the horse. The lion had had part of a haunch of horse for dinner and in amusing himself with the bone first got his upper large canine tooth into the soft part of the bone, and biting on it, the corresponding canine tooth in the lower jaw came through so far into the bone that it almost met with the point of the upper tooth; and this jaw thus became fixed. The animal was prevented from taking food or water. Bartlett, with a great deal of tact and manœuvring, managed to get this bone out of the lion's mouth, and lucky he did so, as it was found that the long projecting part of the bone was pressing hard upon the lion's tongue. This is the third clever operation in dentistry that Bartlett has performed—first removing a big tooth from the hippopotamus; second, operating on the base of the tusk of the big elephant; third, taking a horse's leg bone out of the lion's mouth.—Land and Water.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 10, 1880.

It was one of the very interesting features of the rise of our religious Society, that so many of its first members were independently convinced of the same truths and led to observe the same in their hearts and minds, without having learned them of any man. George Fox often speaks of his knowledge of heaven's things as having been given or opened unto him by the Lord. When he was sent forth by his Divine Master to preach to others the truths which had been made known to him, he met with many whose hearts had been prepared to receive his message by a similar experience.

In the present day, the want of deeper religious experience, of a more faithful waiting on the Light of Christ, and of seeking to be instructed by Him who teacheth as never man taught, is one of the causes of the tendency to scatter and divide which is manifest among us. If it should please the Lord Omnipotent to send to his church such a visitation of his grace, as will bring the members generally to sit as humble learners and faithful servants at his feet, we may then expect them to see more nearly eye to eye—being "all taught of the Lord" to mind the same things; and the peace of the body will be greatly promoted thereby.

It is very encouraging to notice, how the operation of the same Holy Spirit in this day is leading one here and another there in a path that seems very familiar to those who are much conversant with the literature of our Society. A friend recently described an instance of this which had come under his observation within a few months. He met with a nice young colored woman, in a distant city, a member among the Methodists, who had felt it her duty to take part in the public ministry of the gospel. To her natural diffidence and shrinking from publicity, was added the discouragement that such labor was only partially recognized among her people as this, her husband, who was an Episcopalian, was strongly opposed to such public exposure, and could not believe it was a right course. So the poor woman was brought into a great strait, and like many another one, sought to find some substitute which might be accepted in lieu of the service required. With this view, she took charge of a First-day school, and labored in that employment. She then undertook visiting the sick, reading the Scriptures to them, and endeavoring to help them spiritually. But none of these things brought that peace of mind, which she longed for. She had learned to listen to the inspiring voices of her Saviour—and his command was intelligible to her. So she finally yielded in simple obedience; and, as she was drawn to the service, from time to time spoke in the assemblies of the people that which was given her in charge.

The same Light of Christ which had given her to see the true ground of Gospel ministry, opened to her the duty of conforming to the Scripture injunction as to plainness and simplicity in dress. She had been like many other young women, fond of ornament and gay attire. But as she came under the discipline of the cross of Christ, she found one ornament after another had to be given up. On one occasion, as she was putting on the earrings which she had been in the habit of wearing, the command came to her with startling distinctness, to lay them aside. She reasoned not, but yielded a ready obedience; and thus she was brought into a simplicity and neatness of apparel, consistent with her station of country where she resided, other women among her people had been similarly led into the exercise of the ministry; and that all these had found it required of them to adopt a plain and simple mode of dress.

Our Society regards its testimonies to the nature of a true call to the exercise of Gospel ministry, to the need of depending for ability to exercise it, on the fresh anointing and putting forth of the Head of the Church, and to Christian plainness and simplicity, as not designed to be confined to its members alone, but of far more general application. Let us be stimulated to faithfulness in the maintenance of them by the evidences presented, that others outside of our influence are similarly taught of the Lord. And may the faith of the faint-hearted be strengthened by the confidence that the same Divine Power which in all ages has operated on the heart of man, leading him to repentance and amendment of life, is still at work in the earth, that his word shall not return to Him void—but that He will cause his own glorious cause of truth and righteousness to spread and prosper.

An esteemed correspondent has called our attention to that part of the article on "Scripture Illustrations from Malagasy Customs," on the first page of No. 34 of "The Friend," which speaks of the ascription of divine honors to King Agrippa in the shout, "It is the voice of a God and not of a man." He suggests that the monarch alluded to was Herod, as is mentioned in Acts xii. 21 and 22. There were three Jewish rulers of the name of Herod—Herod the Great, who murdered the infants at Bethlehem at the time of the birth of our Saviour; Herod the Tetrarch of Galilee, to whom our Saviour was sent as a prisoner by Pilate, and Herod Agrippa, who was smitten to death for his pride, as related in Acts, ch. xii. The reference to the article on Malagasy Customs, by the author of the article on Malagasy Customs, is therefore not incorrect, as that is a part of his name—though it might have prevented misunderstanding to have given the name in full.

We have received the first number of the Oriental and Biblical Journal, an illustrated Quarterly Magazine, edited by Stephen D. Peet, of Clinton, Wisconsin, and published by Jameson & Morse, 164 Clark St., Chicago, Ill. The prospectus says it will embrace such subjects as "the manners and customs of all nations, their traditions, mythologies and religious notions." It is well gotten up and contains several interesting articles.

We have received a copy of Roberts Miscellany, edited by B. H. Roberts and E. S. Roberts, a twenty-four page, illustrated Magazine. The table of contents comprises Historical and Biographical Sketches, Descriptions of Foreign Lands, Scenery and Customs, Natural History and Scientific Notes. The design of the editors is to furnish a magazine devoted to useful information; and they believe they can demonstrate that it is not necessary to resort to fiction in order to provide entertainment for Christian families.

Price, $1.50 per year. Address The Publisher, B. H. Roberts, Rochester, N. Y.

UNITED STATES.—The average temperature of the Third month was 39.6 degrees—one degree less than the average of the past five years. The highest temperature was 75 degrees, on the 5th, and the lowest 20 degrees, on the 25th. Average barometer, 30.967 in. Total rainfall or melted snow, 2.53 in. There were 14 days on which rain or snow fell. The prevailing direction of wind was northeast.

The public debt statement issued on the 1st inst., shows a decrease during last month of $14,749,396.55; Cash in Treasury $291,106,983.03; gold certificates, $3,585,500; silver certificates, $11,289,920; certificates of export outstanding, $8,495,000; refunding certificates, $1,830,450; legal tenders outstanding, $346,681,016; fractional currency outstanding, $13,623,257.

The coinage of the United States mints, during last month, amounted to $7,475,694, of which $15,220 was in gold, mostly eagles and half eagles; 2,350,000 standard dollars, and 1,295,690 one cent pieces were made.

The total value of merchandise imported by the United States during the seven months ending 1st mo. 31st, 1880, was $341,789,320; and the exports for the same period 1,183,297,632.

On the 1st inst., a fire caused by sparks from a locomotive on the Pennsylvania railroad, burned over 2000 acres of woodland. Besides the timber, wood-choppers' houses, wagons and implements and maple sugar houses were consumed.

Typhoid fever is said to be epidemic in Pittsburg—particularly in that part on the south side of the Monongahela river. Between four and five hundred cases are now in the hands of the physicians.

Four of the Bribery Fugitives made their appearance in Harrisburg on the 5th, and Judge Pearson admitted them to bail in $2000, until the 20th inst., when the court will meet.

The Anglo-American Telegraph Cable of 1873, was broken on the 3rd inst., at a point 45 miles west of Valentin Bay, on the Irish coast. It is thought there will be no serious difficulty in repairing it, as the break is in only 93 fathoms of water.

The cyclone visited Ottawa and the neighborhood of Girard, Kansas, on the 2nd inst.; much property was destroyed, three persons were killed, and many others seriously injured.

During last month, 38 vessels belonging to or bound to or from American ports, were lost. Their total value, exclusive of cargoes, was $492,000.

The National Board of Health is advised that during the week ending 24 mo. 7th, there were 61 deaths from yellow fever in Rio Janeiro.

The mortality in this city the past week numbered 378, an increase of 92 over the same week last year. Of these 62 were from consumption, 20 convulsions, 27; debility, 1; disease of the heart, 13; typhoid fever, 8; inflammation of the lungs 35, and old age 15.

Markets.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 106½; 5's, registered, 102½; do. coupon, 103½; 4's, 1891, 104; 4's, 104, 107.

Cotton.—Sales of middlings are reported at 13 a 13½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and refined, 7½ cts. for export, and 7½ a 8 cts. per gallon for home use.

Wool is reported in good demand—western, No. 1, 59 a 60 cts.; No. 2, 55 a 56 cts.; common, 53 cts. per lb. Four counts of wool, but none unchanged—Minnesota, 54 cts.; extra, $5.75 a $6.50; western, do. at $6.25 a $6.87; and patent and other high grades, $7 a $8.

Grain.—The wheat market is dull and ungraded—Penna. red, $1.35; southern amber, $1.34. Corn is weaker with very little demand—mixed, 53 cts.; yellow, 54 cts.; white, 56 cts. Oats, mixed, 40 a 41 cts.; and white at 42 a 45 cts.

Seeds.—Clover is offered freely at 6 a 7 cts. per lb. Timothy and Flaxseed remain unchanged.

Hay and straw.—Prime timothy, $1.10 to $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, $9 a 95 cts. Straw, $1.30 a $1.40 per 100 lbs.

Beef cattle.—Extra, 5½ a 6 cts.; good, 5 a 5½ cts.; common, 4 a 4½ cts. per lb.

Milk cows were in fair demand at from $15 a $40 per head.

Hogs.—The market the past week has been dull.—Extra, 7½ cts.; good at 7 cts.; medium, 6½ cts.; common, 6 cts.

Sheep.—The market was active for the medium grades, while heavy sheep were ½c. lower. Prices for merino and extra fine for common to 7 a 7½ cts. per pound.

Lambs were scarce and in demand at 6 a 7½ cts. per pound.

FOREIGN.—News from the elections now progressing in Great Britain indicate that the next Parliament will have a majority of Liberal members. Up to the 3rd inst., the Liberals had secured 235 seats, the Conservatives 137, and the Home Eaters 16. The Queen is expected to return by the 22d, and it is rumored that the Cabinet has decided to resign immediately.

The subscriptions received by the French committee for the relief of Irish distress has risen to 125,000 francs, of which amount 100,000 francs has already been forwarded to Ireland.

At a meeting of Superiors of unauthorized religious fraternities in France, it has been decided neither to communicate their statutes to the Government nor demand authorization, but to stand upon their common law rights. The Jesuits have establishments in the United States, and Malagasy.—The decrees have therefore been extended to the colonies also.

In Germany the prospect of a Liberal victory in the Parliamentary elections in England, is said to be regarded with no small fear and trembling. The universal belief being, that the peace of Europe would be much more assured under a Tory than under a Whig government.

Belgium.—An explosion of fire-damp occurred on the 31st, in a colliery at Andalus. Eighty-five persons were in the pit at the time of the disaster, of whom forty-two were killed.

Italy.—A pestilence which the Italian Government report the attendance in the public school of 700 scholars between forty and fifty years old. Education has long been backward in the peninsula—now the desire to learn prevails among all classes and ages.

Spain.—The government of Cuba with $9,000,000 for suppressing insurrection.

China.—The late Chinese Minister to Russia, has been stripped of his honors and titles, and thrown into prison, on account of dissatisfaction with the treaty concluded at Kulu. The dissatisfaction he said that he had with the course he took, but that he did not pursue this course for enough. The Government is thought to be in a restless, uncertain condition.

South America.—A vessel loaded with supplies for the Peruvian Army at Lima, recently eluded the blockading vessels, and landed its cargo safely. The Chilean iron-clad Huascar is bombarding the town three hours daily. A part of the town is reported on fire.

For "The Friend"

testimonies testifying to Early Dedication and Faithfulness.

The following are some brief extracts from biographies of Friends, showing their early spousal and filial obedience to Christ, with their paternal guardianship and preserving care for them. They are herewith compiled that the hope that their personal may tend to the pure mind of our younger members especially, and invite to emulation in the faithful occupancy of the precious gifts and talents which a beneficent Saviour and High Priest has bestowed for the promotion of his kingdom, and the working out of the salvation of his never-dying souls. Truly "the fields are white unto harvest;" while, as is also written, "He that reapeth receiveth wages, and gathereth fruit unto life eternal," &c. that then both hinder from an unreserved dedication of ourselves, and a rallying to the standard of Him, the invincible Captain of our peace? who, having bought us with the price of his own cruel sufferings even unto death, is surely entitled to the government over us, with all we have and all we are—a sole burnt offering and living sacrifice upon a holy altar.

Rebecca Toovey, of London, was a dutiful pious child, a frequent reader, and a lover of the Holy Scriptures, and other religious books. Although young in years, it pleased the Lord to endow her with a large understanding in things natural and divine, and of an innocent and prudent demeanor, company and conversation were pleasing and instructive. She was virtuous in her actions, quick of apprehension, just and impartial in all she undertook, and was never known to tell a lie, or to speak an ill word. She loved to attend religious meetings, saying, "it was sweet to her." Some few weeks before her sickness she was at a meeting, in which a Friend exhorted the children present to make choice of the blessed truth for their portion, whilst in the enjoyment of health, that they might be prepared for their dying hour; to which she was very attentive, and she melted into tears; and after the meeting was over retired by herself to read, which was her usual practice.

Having lived in the fear of the Lord, which issues from evil, when taken with her last illness, though her body was in great pain, her heart was filled with the sweet incomes of the Lord's love and mercy, which caused her to utter many heavenly expressions. Thus, through divine mercy, having a well grounded hope of acceptance, through Jesus Christ our Lord, who was not afraid to die, but bade her relations and acquaintances farewell; and in a heavenly frame of mind departed this life, aged nine years.

Sarah Liddetter, of Brighton, England, was born the 3rd of Third month, 1822. From a very little child, she was fond of reading the Holy Scriptures, and showed a decided preference for works of a religious character. She was of a very unassuming, diffident disposition; yet her observations on subjects discussed in her hearing, evinced that her understanding was good, and that she was a child of quick perception and mature judgment. She much enjoyed meetings for divine worship, and mentioned the comfort and instruction she received from attending them, even when they were held in silence. Being fond of retirement and waiting upon the Lord, she early experienced the benefits and comfort of secret prayer, endeavoring to bear in mind her Heavenly Father, and must seek for the aid of His Spirit to reach her to pray aright.

It is recorded that, from the bed of sickness and of death, she exhorted one of her young relatives to watchfulness unto this great duty, saying: "I prayed to my Heavenly Father very earnestly, and kept on until I was forgiven," &c. Then to her little cousin, of about six years, she said: "If thou art good, thou wilt go to heaven and be happy; but thou must pray very much—thou art old enough to pray—thou knows how to ask mother for any nice thing, and so thou knows how to ask thy Heavenly Father to make thee good, and that is praying."

To her parents she was dutiful, obliging and affectionate—orderly in her behavior, and of but few words. She loved her brothers and sisters tenderly, watching over them for good; and when they had done amiss would plead with them in a very affectionate manner, often saying on such occasions, "thou wilt displease thy Heavenly Father;" evincing that her infant mind was supported and directed by Divine wisdom, and the love of her Heavenly Father shined abroad in her heart. This preserved her in such fear of offending the Lord, and such great tenderness of conscience, that if at any time she said or did any thing amiss, her sorrow and grief were very great.

Thus led and fed, preserved and blessed, this lovely, pious child, died on the day she was nine years and a half old.

Jonathan Buryeet was born in Dublin on the 4th of Eleventh month, 1686. It is to be regretted that so few particulars respecting his early visited, and altogether extraordinary youth remain to us. A remarkable exemplification of the scripture, "That they seek me early shall find me," is instructively shown in the following account, compiled from the annals of that experienced servant of Christ, James Dickenson, viz: "Early in 1699 James Dickenson again visited Scotland, having for his companion Jonathan Buryeet, a child not much more than twelve years old; he naturally felt much concern on behalf of his little friend who—he need scarcely have told us—had not travelled as a minister before. But Jonathan Buryeet seems to have been—in almost the literal sense of the word—one of the babes to whom the Lord of heaven and earth sees fit to reveal those things which are hidden from the wise and prudent; for James Dickenson says: 'My companion was deeply opened in the mysteries of God's kingdom, and grew in his gift so as to give counsel to young and old.' * * * The Lord was kind to us, and bore up our spirits in all our exercises. We had many precious meetings, and were deeply bowed under a sense of the Lord's favor to us." Five years later they again travelled together, "in sweet brotherly love." And before Jonathan Buryeet's early death he was again J. D.'s associate on a few short journeys.

Jonathan Buryeet died on the 5th of the Third month, 1709, in the twenty-third year

Sarah Lynes Grubb was born at Wapping, in London, in the year 1773. In an address to her children, she has left us the following remarkable testimony relating to the experiences of her early years, viz: "Our Heavenly Father visited me by his love when not more than five years old; so that I delighted then in the 'Divine songs' of Watts, which an amiable elder sister had made me acquainted with, at that early period of my life.

"At school I sought the Lord; feeling his power in my heart operating against the evil propensities of my nature; yet to these contrary inclinations I many, many times gave way; and for this I was brought under great condemnation, even as early as when nine years old; so that I bemoaned my condition, and have begged and prayed at that period, for a better state and a happier. When I grew to about thirteen years of age, I began to discover something about me, or in my mind, like the heavenly anointing for the ministry; for the Lord had revealed his Word in my heart, and had broken the rock in pieces in my living experience; and I was contrived under a sense of power and love; saying even vocally, when alone, 'Lord make me a chosen vessel unto Thee!'"

3rd of Sixth month, 1791, she writes: "Oh the deep distress and sore anguish of soul which I now feel! It is beyond expression; yet, out of the depth of my tribulation, have I been permitted this morning to cry unto the depths of his mercies, whose compassions fail not. Oh! there is something in me which perhaps is not of his pure Spirit; that wishes it might please Him to cut the thread of my life, or that I might go into some solitary place, where I might mourn and none know it. But I find another language, peradventure more profitable to attend to, 'Is this more profitable to attend to?' 'Is this keeping the word of my patience?'

"I was then eighteen years old; and had come forth as a minister, yet discovered great need of further refinement, both for my own acceptance with the Lord, and that I might be fit for the Lord's use. Truly I had to abide the fiery furnace.

Yielding to the service of the ministry, though but seventeen years old when first giving utterance publicly to a sentence or two, she says: "I had sweet consolation in coming into obedience; and after a while was surprised to find that although I stood up to meetings expecting only to utter a little matter, more passed through me, I scarcely knew how."

"Thus the gift grew, and much baptism and suffering was my portion from time to time: the great work of my salvation and sanctification going on, while I was occasionally induced to invite others to the needful acquaintance with Him who came to redeem us from all iniquity. I have never known an easier way to favor with the Lord of life and glory, than that of passive submission to all His holy will concerning me, even under dispensations most proving and mortifying to the fleshly mind."

Sarah Lynes Grubb could subsequently testify: "Without Thee, oh Thine fulness of strength, I am less than the worm of the dust. Be Thou only, and forever exalted in, by, and through thy poor child; and let nothing be able to pluck me out of thy hand. Amen." Again she writes: "I assuredly believe, that as I look to Him who is almighty, He will do all things worth together for good to those who love Him with the whole heart; for in my measure 'I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate' his dedicated children from his love 'in Christ Jesus our Lord'; who encouraged his disciples in the language of, 'Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world.'"

This dignified and faithful handmaiden of her Lord, died the 16th of Third month, 1812.

What Liquor Does.—It is matter, not of assertion, but of sternest demonstration, that the drink traffic cuts the most amazing waste of our national resources; that to it are due, mainly the worst phenomena of pauperism; that it causes seventy-five per cent. of those melancholy cases of domestic ruin which fill our police courts; that it contributes enormously, both directly and indirectly, to the hideous social evil; that, but for it, on the testimony of nearly every judge on the bench, crimes of violence would well nigh disappear; that it is the cause, both directly and indirectly, of a most terrible mortality; that it chokes our prisons, mad-houses, and penitentiaries; that it creates an hereditary taint which makes life a curse to a stunted population; that because of it thousands, ay, tens of thousands of miserable men, and yet more miserable women, and poor little children most miserable of all, lead lives of such squalor and anguish as only they who have witnessed can conceive.—Canon Farrar.

On Dancing.

For "The Friend"

The following remarks on dancing, by Dr. Adam Clark, I should like to see printed in "The Friend." Dr. C. was a Methodist, and the author of Clark's Commentaries. R.

Haddonfield, 3d mo. 10th, 1880.

Dancing was to me a perverting influence, an unmix'd moral evil; for, although, by the mercy of God, it led me not to depravity of manners, it greatly weakened the moral principle,—drowned the voice of a well-instructed conscience, and was the first cause of impelling me to seek my happiness in this life. Everything was absorbed by it. I have it justly in abhorrence for the injury it did me; and I can testify (as far as my observations have extended) I have known it to produce more or less of the same evils in others that it did in myself. I consider it, therefore, as a branch of that worldly education, which leads from things spiritual to things sensual, and from God to Satan; let them plead for it who will, I know it to be evil and that only. They who bring up their children in this way, or send them to schools where dancing is taught, are consecrating them to the service of Moloch, to bring forth the seeds of a fallen nature, with an additional rankness, deep-rooted iniquity, and inexhaustible fertility. "Nemo sobrius saltat." No man in his senses will dance, says Cicero, a heathen. Shame on those Christians who advocate a cause by which many sons have become profligates and many daughters have become ruined.

The Senecas and the Valley of the Genesee.

When the other commissioners refused to interfere, he reopened the negotiations and persuaded Farmer's brother to reopen the council, by reminding him that he had lighted the fire and he only had a right to cover it up; and that Red-Jacket had no warrant for declaring it extinguished. Negotiations with the sachems having failed, custom justified an attempt to secure the approval of the "warriors, who defended the lands, and the women who cultivated them," who were entitled to take the business into their own hands when dissatisfied with its management by the sachems. Accordingly in a few days Morris invited the chief women and some of the warriors to meet him, when he renewed to them his offer, promising to concede such reservations as would be required for actual occupancy, and showing how much the money would do toward relieving the women from drudgery. He also stated that he had brought some presents from Philadelphia, to be distributed, but only in the event of effecting a purchase of their lands; but as no cause of complaint existed against the women, their portion of the gifts would now be divided among them, and in a few hours silver brooches glittered, and glass beads sparkled upon hundreds of the dusky daughters of the forest, while all were more or less fantastically arrayed in shawls and printed calicoes. Some days were spent in rude festivities, alternated by serious consultations, and at length Cornplanter being the principal war-chief, opened the proceedings, and Red-Jacket no longer attending the meeting, remained intoxicated until the terms were agreed upon. Four or five days more were spent in fixing the limits of the reservations, the Indians demanding they should follow natural boundaries, such as the course of streams, and it was finally settled that certain quantities of land should be marked for them by square miles. The utmost jealousy was found to exist among the chiefs, and each sachem and warrior sought to increase his own bounds, and to lessen those of a rival, the contest raging highest between Cornplanter and Red-Jacket, the former wishing to have the principal reservation at Buffalo and the latter on the Allegheny river. At length it was agreed that the Indians should receive about 200,000 acres of land, of which 26 square miles were located at six of their village sites on the Genesee, 42 square miles at Allegheny river, 42 square miles at Cattaraugus, and 200 square miles at Buffalo and Tonawanda creeks.

A map of the district on which the reservations were laid down, had been prepared by Joseph Ellicott, who answered every inquiry of the eager chieftains. Joseph Ellicott* was a gentleman eminently qualified, professionally and otherwise, to superintend the work of survey, and David Rittenhouse, the eminent astronomer, had personally attended to the preparation of the compass and other instruments for use in the survey. To extinguish the Indian claims cost Robert Morris more than $118,000.

The Holland Land Company lost no time in developing the rich country which had come into their possession. Roads were constructed, mills erected, and encouragement offered to actual settlers by fair adjustment of terms of payment. These investments proved more fortunate for the settlers than for the company, for it is understood that when the affairs of the association were finally settled their investment had paid them a profit of more than five per cent.

To James Wadsworth belongs a large share of credit for his energy in the development of the Genesee country. James and his brother William located 2000 acres at Canandaigua in 1789, at the cost price of eight cents per acre. In the spring of 1790, they proceeded westward with ox-teams and "store goods" poling their boat up the Mohawk, and draw-

* Joseph Ellicott was a distinguished mathematician and surveyor, and was employed by the Holland Land Company to survey and divide their lands in Western New York. These lands covered several millions of acres now comprised in the counties of Niagara, Genesee, Erie, Cattaraugus, Chautauque, &c. Assisted by his younger brother Benjamin, he executed this work with great fidelity and success, and continued in the employ of the Land Company for twenty-five years. He founded the city of Buffalo and several other towns in this region; made his residence at Batavia, dying in 1826, left a large estate, the result of his judicious investments in the lands he had surveyed. Joseph and Benjamin were members of the Society of Friends, and continued united therewith to the day of his death in 1826 and 1828 respectively.

His elder brother Andrew was well known as a mathematician and surveyor, and was frequently in the employ of the United States and of the State of Pennsylvania. He laid out the City of Washington and the City of Erie, and was the Commissioner to settle the boundary between the United States and the Spanish possessions in Florida. He was appointed Surveyor General of Pennsylvania under Governor Mifflin, in which capacity he became the Professor of Mathematics at West Point, and died at that place in 1820. He had lost right of membership among Friends by marrying contrary to the Discipline.

Ellicott Mills, now Ellicott City, on the Patuxent R. R., in the midst of a region of remarkable beauty, was the result of the enterprise of Andrew and his brother John Ellicott.

ing their boat and goods by ox-teams over the portages. Much of the road was but an Indian path, and full of impediments to travel. They finally arrived at Canandaigua, where hearing that a fine body of unoccupied land lay upon the Genesee river near "Big Tree," they proceeded thither, and soon began to cut down trees and erect a cabin on the site of the present town of Genesee. Their cabin was the residence of the Treaty Commissioners, and around it 3,000 Indians gathered for twenty days, where Robert Morris, through his son Thomas, consummated the most noted treaty ever made by the Six Nations, and by which was extinguished their claim to nearly 1,000,000 acres, as already above described. William Wadsworth was lost in a swamp two miles north of the present town of Genesee, it was discovered and released by James, who had reached their destination as above stated. Soon the unwonted sound of axes roused them, and they saw a white man, who had preceded them, and who had erected a cabin and was herding cattle on the neighboring flats. Two months after the arrival of the Wadsworth brothers, 37 families had settled themselves in Ontario county, which then embraced the Genesee country, as appears by the census taken in 8th month of 1790. The summer of 1792 witnessed a large addition to the population of the Genesee country. The Indians were very friendly, attending solely to their domestic concerns, and were gradually acquiring civilized habits. The institutions of society came slowly on. In 1793, the first circuit Court was held in Geneva, and in 1794 Court of Common Pleas at Canandaigua. In the autumn of 1793, the Marquis de Lally, the famous French commander, is piloted through the wilds of the Genesee on an exile. Standing on a bluff near Morris, he said, after admiring for an hour a scenery spread out before him to the eastward, "It is the fairest landscape that human eye ever looked upon." It is probable that in the forest, the great oaks and sugar maple in the vast park, in their gorgeous autumn coloring, and for once spoke from honest conviction, having no diplomatic purpose to observe. Other noted European travellers visited this region, among whom may be named Louis Philippe, then Duke of Orleans afterwards King of the French, who tarried many days among the habitations of the early settlers. In 1795, the Duke de Liancourt, an eminent French nobleman, passed through the valley, spending several weeks with the Wadsworths and others. Of Canawaugus, near on, he says: "The inhabitants here are not so few, but among them is one of the best I have seen for some time past." He particularly notices the oak openings, or tracts entirely free from timber and showing signs of former cultivation, where 10,000 acres might be found in one body encumbered not even a bush, but covered with grass high that the largest bullock at thirty feet in the path, could be completely hidden in view." The first settlers supposed these were poor lands, and it was only when compelled to test their quality that to their great surprise, they found the soil of great excellence. These lands that could have been bought for a quarter of a dollar an acre, suddenly advanced in price to ten dollars. Another tribute to the beauty of the Genesee Valley is found in the language of Benjamin West, the great American painter, who while standing at the western door of the Wadsworth mansion at Genesee, is said to have remarked, "I have visited the storied regions of the Rhine, realms veined by the classic streams of Italy, and Arno's flowery vale, but never have I gazed upon a scene of more surpassing loveliness."

Memoir of Hannah Marsh.

BY HER DAUGHTER, PRISCILLA PITT.

Among the expressions and counsels uttered by this dear friend at various times, the following have been preserved, which manifest her watchful frame of spirit and her love for the Lord:

"I do not wish for any comfort at all, except from the Lord."

She earnestly desired me to bring up my son in the nurture and admonition of the Lord, not provoking him to wrath, but feel after divine help constantly and quietude of mind; it would, she believed, have a desirable influence over his spirit; and to be ever on the watch. She told me she had lain awake a good while last night. I inquired the cause. She said her thoughts had been on us, earnestly feeling after our help and preservation.

One evening, after reading, she expressed, that good desires are not of ourselves; that she was thankful to feel the continual desire in her heart to be conformable to the will of her Heavenly Father. She has often told me how she wears the day when she lies down at night, and seeks forgiveness for all she has offended in, and commends herself and all of said to some visitors, "I find it well to strive after or to keep in a watchful waiting state."

One evening when unwell, her son-in-law, George Pitt, went up to see her in bed. She said to him, "I am pleased to find you have had a favored meeting at Mitcham, and glad you would it up as you did by going to this meeting this afternoon." "Ye are not your own, ye are bought with a price," &c. She went on still talking gently to him: "I have a great deal of time for thinking, and I often feel low and discouraged, but then I look to the alone Source for help, and sometimes am unexpectedly favored with the lifting up of His countenance, and I am comforted and strengthened to hold on my way. I often think of dear father, how he felt the desire, 'Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord! My strength and my Redeemer.' Let us wait on the Witness." She seemed then in a sweet frame, quiet and calm.

She said to George one morning, when he went into her room. "Sometimes when I wake of a morning, a number of things are apt to crowd on the mind and disquiet it, but I find it won't do to give way to it, and so endeavor to stay my mind on the Lord. He takes it off me, but I can't not take it off myself." One day she spoke of this text, as though it was her own feeling: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." She said, on George going in to her before breakfast, "I always feel I must begin the morning by turning my mind profitably to things of highest moment." On taking leave of him one night, he said, "It is much warmer." She replied, "Yes, and its a favor we have got something to keep us warm inside." He answered, "There's nothing else worth living for: Thou hast the words of eternal life." "That's what I feel," said she, "It is a privilege to feel something within that unites us together."

One night when in bed I said to her, "Make haste and go to sleep." She replied, "There's always something to do before going to sleep—cast up our accounts." During her summer visit to us at Berkeley Cottage, Mitcham, she was very cheerful, calm, sweet, happy, loving and kind. One evening I was fearing she had been exposed to taking cold. She said, "Dear father was so desirous of our living each day as though it were our last, and I feel my time so uncertain, that my mind is often engaged in desire to be ready, that my mind is often not at all on little things that sometimes trouble thee." One day she said to me, "There are five words I have on my mind for thee, 'Dwell inwardly with the Lord.' Let your words be few and savory, that they may minister grace to the hearers. I have often thought thou talks too much. I want thee to have thy mind so staid on the Lord, that little outward matters and troubles may not take such hold on thy mind."

"I have had this prayer so much brought to my thoughts, 'Do with me what seemeth thee good, only take not thy Holy Spirit from me. Restore unto me the joys of thy salvation, and uphold me with thy free Spirit.' I have no desire to have any will of my own, but to leave everything to Him. My desire is to be entirely passive, and resigned to whatever may come; my prayer is to be resigned to whatever He appoints or permits, and if it is not as I would have had it, to submit. My our stations." This was said while riding over to Crofton Meeting. In meeting she spoke on the single eye—quoting the Saviour's words in Matthew. After meeting, T. A. was walking with us to the train, and telling her something interesting. I asked her if she was tired? She said, "Oh! my dear, my mind is so after things of higher interest, I take little heed of little things."

In 1876, referring to letters she had been looking through and tearing up, "I feel it unprofitable to me to go over them to read them, filling the mind with scenes long past. I feel it would interfere with allowing my mind to be directed as it ought, and that what I have now to do, is to attend to the present." At supper she said, "I think we have so much to do in our own hearts, it does not do to dwell too much on others." Not only her words, but her bearing that evening, implied to my mind that she did strive to "turn inward," as she has often said we have such need to do.

5th mo. 1877, she was speaking of enjoying Job Scott's writings "as a flask answering to face in a glass. Though we may enjoy books, it's the intercession of mind—the inward quiet—the feeling after—that is the true benefit."

I may here mention how often my father used to read Friends' books to us while we sat at work. Also on First-days he would read in the family, and daily in the Scriptures; and mother often would advise us on those occasions to turn our minds to the Spirit that gave them forth, to be enabled to understand and profit by them. In her latter years she often read Friends' books; also generally read the Bible to herself of a forenoon, and spent some time in retirement. She said one day she enjoyed having the New Testament read in the family after breakfast.

She remarked one day in 1876: "It is sweet to feel we are all under the care and notice of Him who cares for us, and strengthens and comforts us; oh! it is sweet!" How in accordance this remark with a pencilled memorandum I find dated, "Third-day, 2d mo. 2d, 1864. In bed all day—

My Heavenly Father knows best,
And in that belief I rest."

Also in the same little pocket book: "Fifth-day morning dear John and self left home for (sea-side) Folkestone; favored to leave it very comfortably with our valuable servant Mary, whom we consigned to the preserving care of Israel's Shepherd. Our precious children, with their dear little lambs, we also commended to the same gracious preserving power, with our own souls. For the many mercies hitherto vouchsafed to us and our's, may we be increasingly sensible, and also desirous of rendering unto the great and good Giver all that He may be pleased to call for at our hands." She noted unfrequently remarked when in bed at night, "I am so sensible of my many privileges. How I am cared for!"

SONNET.

TO THE SUPREME BEING.

The prayers I make will then be sweet indeed,
If Thon the spirit give by which I pray;
My masseter heart's barren clay,
That of its native self can nothing feed,
Of good and pains works Thon art the seed,
That quickens, only where Thon sayest it may;
Unless Thon show us Thy own true way,
We are as dead as Pharaoh's (Thou most lead).
By which such virtue may in me be bred,
That in Thy holy footsteps I may tread,
The fetters of my tongue do Thon unbind,
That I may have the power to sing of Thee,
And sound Thy praises everlastingly.

THE BROWN HOUSE.

I am sitting alone in the twilight,
Alone in my cosy room,
Where softly falls the freight
Athwart the deepening gloom.

And of all the pleasant memories
That to me thronging come,
This is the sweetest, fairest:
My dear, my childhood's home.

I've stood where crystal waters
Came from the mountain down,
But clearer, those that sparkled
Beside the house so brown.

I've heard the sweet, wild harp-notes,
And many a melting strain;
But sweeter far than music
Came down the pattering rain

Upon the roof that sheltered
From storm, and blast, and chill,
The friends I loved. Dear faces!
I seem to see them still.

Sometimes the cloud is lifted
That overhangs life's sea,
And though so far I've drifted,
The past comes back to me.

With all its old-time sweetness
My mother's voice I hear,
My baby sister's prattle,
My father's words of cheer.

Therefore of all the memories
The years are waiting down,
This is the sweetest, fairest,
The dear old house so brown.

THE SOUL'S INTERVIEW AT EVENTIDE.

Selected.

The night comes softly down, my soul,
The night comes gently down;
The quiet, thoughtful stars will hush
The murmur of the town.
Come, let us be alone, my soul,
In the still night alone;
And tell me truly, O my soul,
What thou this day hast done?

I had some shining gold to use,
I worked, nor worked in vain;
And where I scattered one at morn,
At eve I gathered twain.

Is this thy long day's work, my soul?
O foolish soul! Ere morn
Thou shouldest have thy treasure hoard,
And then be left forlorn.
Or, if the Lord should call, my soul,
This very night, oh, say,
Where were thy treasure then, my soul?
Was this thy work to-day?

I sought for knowledge, and have found;
I tracked great men's thoughts afar;
Searched out a riddle of the earth—
The secret of a star!

Is this thy long day's work, my soul?
O foolish soul! We know
That earthly wisdom counts for naught
Where thou and I must go—
May go this very night, my soul,
What of thy wisdom then?
Was this thy long day's work, my soul,
In the wide world of men?

I thought—and sent forth to the world—
A noble thought; I wait
For its sure coming need of praise,
When men shall call me great!

Is this thy long day's work, my soul?
O foolish soul! Thou knowest
How little earthly praise can reach
O'er the rainbow-bridge thou seest!
Thy crown shall be of hay,
Not woven by an earthly hand—
Was this thy work to-day?

While walking in a crowded street,
I met a weeping child;
I know not now what words I said,
But when I left it smiled.

That was a work of joy, my soul!
O happy soul! That deed
Will rank with giving water to
The thirsty one in need.
And when the angel of the book
Writeth of this, he'll say,
'Twas for the loving Master's sake
This work was done to-day!

I found a man who sought for rest,
But nothing his sufficed;
I led him to the cross's feet
—And showed him Jesus Christ!

This is thy good day's work, my soul!
O blessed soul! Thy crown
Has one more jewel! Now, my soul,
In peace we'll lay us down:
In peace and love, and faith and hope,
The long day's work is done;
New work, new strength the Master gives
With the new rising sun.

Frances Estwood.

In his journeyings, Bishop Janes kept his eyes solely on his work. Twelve times, I heard him say, he passed within the sound of the roar of Niagara before he saw it. And then, I doubt not, he was called there to preach. He rode clear by Yosemite, and did not stop to look at its gorge; went near the great trees, and never beheld them.

His visits to Europe were exclusively devoted to his official work. He went and came without turning aside or tarrying to look upon the famous sites of which he had often read, and which he would have been delighted to have visited. But it was not in his plan and so was not in his work.—Selected.

Scripture Illustrations from Malagasy Customs.

"Roads and Paths.—The poetical books of Holy Scripture are full of figures taken from roads and paths, for we constantly meet with such expressions as 'way,' 'goings,' 'leading such expressions,' 'slipping,' 'sliding,' 'guiding,' 'footsteps,' 'slipping,' 'sliding,' 'stumbling-block,' and many others. An such language is by no means infrequent even in the prose portions of the sacred writings, so that the figures have long ago passed over into our Western speech and become so naturalized that when we speak of taking a right or wrong path (as regards conduct), it hard seems a figurative expression at all. But further, on account of the perfection attained by our modern civilization, all these figure have become faint and weak in us compared with their force to those who live in the East. With our wonderful railway system covering the whole country, with our smooth roads and paved streets, travelling has been directed all its discomfort and of a large proportion its danger, and we must live in a country like Madagascar, which is without roads, to realize the vividness of such expressions as, 'Take me, O Lord, the way of Thy statutes,' 'Teach me thy way, and lead me in a plain path,' 'He set my feet upon a rock and established my goings,' &c. How often as I have picked my way up or down a rough rocky staircase rather than a road, or toiled painfully across a slippery clay slope, have I recalled words, 'Hold up my goings in Thy path that my footsteps slip not,' 'Ponder the path of thy feet, and let thy ways be established and at other times, either on foot, or borne on the shoulders of my stout bearers, or occasionally on horseback, when skirting the edge of a sheer precipice by a narrow pass have I realized the terrible force of some of the curses in the Bible, 'Let their way be dark and slippery,' 'Their footsteps shall slip in due time,' or with more cheerful feelings have rejoiced in the words, 'When my feet slipped, Thy mercy, O Lord, held me up.'

"And while the paths in Madagascar difficult enough in the day, they become positively dangerous by night. As we stumble into a deep hole, or our feet come in contact with a rough stone, we find no meaning in the words, 'Make straight paths for thy feet,' 'Take up the stumbling block out of the way of My people,' 'Thou shalt walk, and thy foot shall not stumble!'—Should we chance to be overtaken by darkness after the brief tropical twilight, how recall the prayer, 'Lighten my darkness, O Lord,' and welcome the approach of a lantern or lantern, and are reminded of text, 'Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path.'

"In such circumstances as these a class of words in the Bible have a fresh and reality which they never acquire in our own country.

"Symbolic Acts and Figurative Language.—When reading the Bible we frequently meet with examples of the use of symbolic acts to impress some important truth upon the senses of such actions. The prophets of Old Dispensation frequently received Divine commands to use such teaching; thus, Ezekiel mimic siege of a city upon which Jerusalem was portrayed (iv.), by the use of a chain (vii. 23), of a boiling pot (xxiv. 1-4), by the uniting of two sticks (xxvii. 15-17), and by many other symbolic actions; and false prophets also did the like, one of them making horns of iron to give vain confidence to an ungodly king (see 1 Kings xxii. 11).

"In Malagasy history there are some interesting examples of a similar employment of symbolic actions, especially before the general use of writing had made written letters common. Towards the close of the last century the King of Imerina, the central province of Madagascar, had reduced under his authority great part of the interior of the island, and confident in his own power, sent a messenger to the principal chief of the southern central province, Betsileo, telling him that he was his son (a common Malagasy expression, implying that one person is subordinate to another), and requiring him to come and acknowledge his father. The Betsileo chief, however, replied, that he was no son of the Hova king, but that they were brothers, each possessing his own territory. The Hova returned for answer, 'I have a large cloth (to cover me), but thou hast a small one; so that you are far from me you are cold; for I am an island to which all the little ones resort, therefore come to me, thy father, for thou art my son.' When the Betsileo chief received this message he measured a piece of wood between extended arms (the refy or standard measure of the Malagasy, between the tips of the fingers when arms are stretched apart to the most), and sent it to the king, with the words, 'This wood is my measure, bid Ananampoina (the Hova king) equal it; if he spans it, then I am his son and not his other.' Upon Ananampoina trying it was unable to reach it, for the Betsileo of was long in the arms. But the Hova king would not give up his point, and replied, 'My measurement of the wood is of no consequence, for kingship does not consist in length of arms; thou art little, therefore my father, I am great, therefore thy father.'

"Still the southern chief was unwilling to submit, and sent a particular kind of native cloth ornamented with beads, with a request that an ox should be cut up upon it, as a sign whether he was to acknowledge the Hova king as his superior or not. This it also turned out to his own advantage; at length Ananampoina would have no more of this trifling. He sent back the cloth with a piece cut off one end of it, and a spear hole through the middle, as a significant warning his intentions unless immediate submission was made. The lesson was not lost upon the Hova chief; he returned a humble answer, asking that he might not be killed, saying, 'hile it is to-day, all day let me eat of the bread (food) of the earth, for Ananampoina lord of the kingdom.'

"Something of a similar kind of symbolic is related of Queen Ranavalona I. When came to the throne in 1828 there was a boy not many months old at that time, the true seed royal, and descended from the line of the ancient kings. The Queen announced that she had made this boy adopted son, and that he should be her successor; even if she should have children of her own, his right to the throne should remain good. Afterwards she had a son of her own, whom she named Rakotoniradama; many thought that her own son would succeed her, but the declaration in favor of the other was never rescinded, and hence arose the much animosity between the two princes. When the queen became old and feeble, the subject of the succession came up, and she settled it in a singular way, substantially as follows:—She held a meeting of her officers, judges, and heads of the people with great solemnity within the palace, when she announced her intention of making a valuable present to each of the two princes. Two fine vases or covered vessels were placed on the table, and the two young men were called in; the elder was first directed to choose which he would have. He did so, and on opening the vase, it was found to contain some beautiful gems and valuable ornaments. The younger, her own son, then opened his vase, and the queen it contained only a handful of earth. The queen then addressed the assembly, saying that the elder prince was to be advanced to high honor and riches in the land; but, as prince, who had not been divided, the younger full of earth, should be her successor. (He Radama II., but only reigned about eighteen months.)

"When the assize came, John Audland, John Camm, and Thomas Camm were there, and some of the charges or indictments, and the substance of the charge or indictment drawn up against her, was, that she had said God did not live, because she had said concerning the priest at Banbury, that 'True words may be a lie in the mouth of some that speak them;' alleging, Jer. v. 2. 'And though they say the Lord liveth, (which nothing can be more true,) surely they swear falsely.' The judge of the Court was moderate, observing her sober and wise answers to his questions, and her unostentatious and comely personage, and seeing the uncertainty of the evidence against her, and that the matter of fact charged, did not amount to what was designed, gave the matter to the jury thus, viz., 'That she acknowledged the Lord her God and Redeemer to live, and that there were gods of the heathen and of the Philistines that were dead gods.' Some upon the bench perceiving their ends would not be answered, went off to influence the jury to bring in something against the prisoner, lest they should come off with discredit. One of the bench observing the injustice in that matter, stepped off also, telling them he would sit no longer with them, till more justice was amongst them, and was convinced of truth. Other officers in the Court threw away their staves, and bore testimony against their arbitrary proceedings.

"The jury returned into court, and being asked if they were agreed, they answered they were; and being asked what they found, they made answer, 'only misdemeanor.' A friend present told them it was illegal to indict her for one fact and bring her in guilty of another; for they ought to have found her either guilty or not guilty, upon the matter of fact charged in the indictment. The judge told Anne, if she would give bond for her good behavior, she might have her liberty: She refusing, they sent her to prison again; but the judge was heard to say, that the prisoner should have been discharged, but the judge had a mind somewhat to please the angry justices. Her adversaries were condemned, and slipped off the bench one after another, in disorder, without dismissing the court, so that truth was that day exalted, and the Lord's power magnified in frustrating the designs of wicked men. The prison where Anne was sent to, was a close nasty place, of several steps below ground, on the side whereof was a sort of common sewer, that received much of the mud in the town, that at times did stink sorely; besides frogs and toads did crawl into the room, and no place for fire, yet she was in great content because it was God's cause. Her fellow-prisoner was Jane Waugh, a laborer in the gospel, who came some months before to visit her, and was committed to prison with her; but God's presence and peace being with them, made their remaining stinking jail a palace, where she remained seven or eight months, and from her first commitment about a year and a half, and was at last discharged by the mayor and aldermen. The same day Richard Farnsworth was set at liberty, who, with other men Friends, were prisoners in another room; but Jane Waugh still continued a prisoner.

"Anne had frequent meetings in Banbury before she left it; and also went to the mayor to demand the liberty of her friend Jane Waugh, who was imprisoned for no other fact than for coming many miles in love to visit her in prison, and she was soon after set at liberty. Being clear of those parts, she travelled with her husband John Audland. John and Anne Audland continued in their service and labor in the ministry in several parts of this nation, south, west, and northward, until John Audland fell sick, and died in the latter end of the year 1663, having been married to his wife Anne about thirteen years, and left behind one daughter, since dead, and one son named John, born a few days after his father's death.

"The 30th of the Third mo., 1666, Thomas Camm married the said Anne Audland, and they lived together in true love, serving the Lord forty years wanting six months. She was one with her husband in all his services and sufferings, as at one imprisonment three years at Kendal, he not being permitted so much as to see his family; another time at Appleby, near six years, during the first part of which he was straitly confined, the latter through favor of the sheriff and jailor, he had much liberty. They travelled together in the work of the ministry into the southern parts of the nation, as London and Bristol, &c., especially at London. About twenty-six years ago, she had like to have died in that city, as also of later years at Bristol. The last time she was there, she was brought into the grave; at which time she expressed many heavenly sayings, that will not be easily forgotten by some, warning all to prize their time, and prepare for their latter end, as God had inclined her to do, so that she enjoyed unspeakable peace here, with full assurance of eternal rest and felicity in the world to come, which, said she, I have desired to enter into as gain, rather than to live, if God so please.

"It was her manner often to retire alone in her closet, or some private place, exercising herself in fervent prayer, and to set apart some time almost daily for reading the holy Scriptures, and other good books, and she was very diligent in frequenting meetings for the worship of God, &c. She was not forward to appear in preaching or prayer in public meetings, but when she did, it was fervent, weighty, and with the demonstration of the spirit, and with power, to the refreshment of the church, her doctrine dropping as dew, but with zeal to lay waste the mountain of Esau. She had wisdom to know the time and season of her service, in which she was a good example to herself, for without extraordinary impulse and concern, it was rare for her to preach in large meetings, where she knew there were brethren qualified for the service of such meetings. She was grieved when any, especially of her sex, were too hasty, forward, or unreasonable in their appearing in such meetings; and would give advice to such, not without good effect. She behaved herself as an humble servant of her Lord and Master, Christ Jesus, washing his disciples' feet, and helping and serving, as a nursing mother, the weakest and tenderest of the flock of Christ, and was an encourager of those who came forth in a testimony for God, though but of a stammering tongue.

"The last opportunity she had amongst Friends was the 2nd of the Ninth month, 1705, at a monthly-meeting at Kendal; and notwithstanding her great age and weakness of body, with the coldness of the season, she would not excuse herself from that day's service; and the Lord was with her in good counsel and advice to friends, pressing all to God, that they might receive their reward with those who had nearly served out their day. The next day her illness began. About the 16th of the said month, finding her husband under concern, because of her sickness, she said as followeth:

"My dear, if it be the Lord's good pleasure, who joined us together, and has blessed us hitherto, to separate us outwardly, I entreat thee be content therewith, and give me freely up to the Lord, for thou knowest we must part, and if I go first it is but what I have desired of the Lord many a time. I believe the consideration of the desolate condition I should be in, if left behind thee, will have that place with thee, that thou wilt the more freely commit me to the Lord, whose I am, and whom I loved, feared and served with an upright heart all my days. His unspeakable peace I enjoy, and his saving health is my portion for ever. I pray thee be content with what the Lord pleases to do with me; whether life or death, his holy will be done. Let us, my dear, leave all to the Lord. However it be, it will be well. I have loved thee with my soul, and God has blessed us, and will bless thee, and be with thee, and make up all thy losses. Death is gain to me, though it be thy loss, and for my gain's sake, I hope thou wilt bear with patience thy loss. I bless the Lord I am prepared for my change. I am full of assurance of eternal salvation, and a crown of glory, through my dear Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, whom God the Father has sent to bless me, with many more, by turning us from the evil of our ways into the just man's path, which shines more and more to the perfect day. If God now please to finish my course, and take me out of this earthly tabernacle, I am well content."

For "The Friend."

Samuel Belle.

Samuel Bettle, a minister and member of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting of Friends for the Western District, deceased at his home in Philadelphia on the 28th of First month 1880, aged 70 years.

It has been felt impossible in an obituary article, to set forth in all their fulness, the life and character and services of this minister of Jesus Christ; but it has seemed right, that some notice, however inadequate, should be taken of one, who, having in the prime of life submitted to the yoke of Christ, labored faithfully in the Lord's vineyard, in the world, seeking to turn men from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God. He was the son of Samuel and Jane Bettle—two eminent and valued Friends in their day and generation—whose fervent desire it was to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; and of whom it might be said, that they had no greater joy than to see their children walking in the truth. But, while thus favored with the instruction and training of pious parents, when grown to man's estate there came into his life all the temptations to worldliness, and all those allurements which are calculated to beget and nourish that love of the world and the things that are in the world, which meet men on their entrance into active life. It was after several years of devotion to secular pursuits, when fairly embarked in mercantile business, with every prospect of continued success, that he was seized with a fever (a thing at hand which it is deemed most costly to surrender, that the conviction was forced home upon him, that he could not serve two masters; that he had come to the place of decision; on the one side, the world and all its friendships; on the other, the self-denying religion of Jesus Christ and a life devoted to his service. It was to him a most costly sacrifice; a virtual abandonment of all schemes of worldly ambition; an absolute surrender of all that he had and all that he was, to the service and rule and government of Him who came into the world to save sinners; but yielding himself to the convicting, contriving and powerful visitations of the Holy Spirit, with which he was favored, he became willing to lay everything at the feet of Christ, and to know his will brought into subjection to the will of his Divine Lord and Master.

Samuel Bettle, although by birth and education a member of the Society of Friends, became a thorough Quaker from conviction. Having, through the operations of the Holy Spirit on his heart, become conscious of his fallen and unlovely condition without a Saviour, he was led to place his hope of salvation on his atoning blood, and on his regenerating power inwardly revealed, and to accept Him as his Mediator between God and himself and him offending. Having thus witnessed reconciliation with God, it was his engagement to seek to know his will concerning him; and thus he became willing, not only to testify what the Lord had done for his soul, but, feeling his mind drawn to the work of the ministry, he shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God, as ability and opportunity were afforded. His ministry was clear, eloquent, thoughtful, weighty and abounding, accompanied withunction. It was evidently his desire to speak under the fresh anointing of the Spirit, for which he waited humbly and prayerfully; judging from his solemn, deliberate and reverent manner, not only in the public assembly, but at all other times of waiting before the Lord. His conversation in private was interesting and instructive, not unfrequently rising to a nervous and commanding eloquence. Tenderly attached to Friends of his own Yearly Meeting he, under the apprehension of duty, passed several visits among the different Quarter Meetings at various times; and there a many witnesses to the power and life of the gospel ministry. Almost constantly laboring when health permitted, among Friends of his own particular meeting, he was often sent, the minister of consolation and of hope, to the bereaved and afflicted, the widow, the fatherless, and those who had no helper. Beside these labors he made visits to several Yearly Meetings in the United States, and among the Indians and Freedmen, also to the her of Government at Washington, and he at different times many appointed meetings throughout the country adjacent to Philadelphia. In all these services, sometimes undertaken when in broken health, he placed reliance upon the Great Head of the Church and experienced that "his bow abode strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob." Subject in later years to attacks of severe illness, his health, during the year of his life, seemed entirely restored. The fall of the year, obtaining a minute for his Monthly Meeting for religious service, he was engaged in the charge of this duty up to the time of the attack which terminated his life. The came suddenly; but the language seemed appropriate. "Blessed is that servant whom the Lord when He cometh shall find watching. He was enabled to testify that he saw nothing further for him to do. Lapsing into semi-conscious state, during the last two hours, the words "Holy, Holy Holy" were constantly uttered in a melodious voice that seemed attuned to the harmonies of Heaven. During an hour before sunrise without a struggle as a child falling asleep, it is reverently believed that his spirit entered into that which needeth not the light of the sun to lighten it; the city of the living God; to join those who are singing ceaseless praise to Him who hath washed and redeemed us with his own precious blood.

Death of an Idol.—The Times of India announces the death of one of the living idols in Siam. The oldest of the white elephants was born in 1780, died in its temple at Bangkok in 11th mo. last. Every one knows the famous white elephant, before whom a people bow the knee, is the emblem of the kingdom of Siam. It is honored with most beautiful presents, for the Indians, of the idea of metamorphosis, still believe so majestic an animal could only be anim by the spirit of a god or an emperor. I white elephant possesses its palaces, a vest gold, and a harness resplendent with jewels. Several mandarins are attached to its service and feed it with cakes and sugar-cane. The king of Siam is the only personage be-him it bows the knee, and a similar salutation is rendered it by the monarch. The deified idol has been accorded a magnificent funeral. A hundred Buddhist priests officiated at the ceremony. The three surviving white elephants, preceded by trumpets and followed by an immense concourse of people, accompanied the funeral car to the bank of the Nam, where the king and his noble lords received the mortal remains, which were transported to the opposite bank for burial. A procession of thirty vessels figured at that religious ceremony. All the floating houses, gilded in double file on the Nam to the number of over sixty thousand, were adorned with flags of all colors and symbolical attributes.—American Wesleyan.

Apostolical Succession.—The more I look to this question of Apostolical Succession, the more I am convinced of its error, yea, more of its blasphemy. Now, any one reading in the Epistle to the Galatians respecting Paul's early work in the church, called to "an Apostle not of men, neither by man;" "entire independence of the Apostolic Colleague (so-called); his success and the manner which the churches of Judea glorified God in, though unknown to them by face; his lot, to Jerusalem to compare notes with the apostles there; the attempt of some to make him subject to tradition, &c., to whom he gave place by subjection, no, not for an hour;" how they who made somewhat of a profession in conference would not add to his crime, &c., and how James, Cephas and Peter, on his right-hand of fellowship—how one I say, Mr. Editor, reading all this canation the unchanging dogma of Apostolical Succession as taught by the Protestant Episcopal, Romish and Greek churches, is more than I can understand.—T. W., in Epistolical Recorder.

St. Lona. a converted Chinese, when in Africa on a visit was deeply impressed with the little difference he saw between the styling of many professing Christians and the people of the world. Advertising to the effect on one occasion, he said, making at the same time a large sweep with his arm, then the disciples in my country come out to the world, they come clear out."

Father Curci, a Roman Catholic who some time since incurred the displeasure of the Pope, and is now living in retirement in Italy, has written a preface to a new Italian translation of the New Testament, in which he explores that the Scriptures are so little by Italian Catholics.

The Episcopal clergy in Ireland are rapidly decreasing in number. Since the dissolution the net loss has been 701. There are eighty-two Mormon churches in Ireland and Ireland.

A great spiritual awakening is reported at Terdam.

The Aye-Aye.—The different species of apes are found in great variety in the islands of Madagascar. Their loud wailing have a most startling effect when heard the first time. For a moment one supposes there is a company of people not far in deep distress; but these are doubtless other signs of the little creatures' enjoyment of their forest life than any expression of pain or fear. The Lemurs have all the agility of monkeys, but with none of their half-human expression, the head being more like that of a dog or a fox. The fur is thick and soft, and the tail often long and bushy. They are gentle and affectionate animals, easily tamed, and are frequently kept as pets for Malagascars. Their agility is marvellous, for they leap to considerable distances from branch to branch; so that a wood frequented by a company of them is all alive with their cries as they dart from tree to tree. The Aye-Aye is closely allied to the true Lemurs. Its food consists of a wood boring larva, which tunnels beneath the bark of certain hard-wooded trees. To obtain these, the animal is furnished with powerful chisel-shaped teeth, with which it cuts away the outer bark. As, however, the grub retreats to the end of its hole, one of the fingers of the Aye-Aye's forehands is slightly lengthened, but considerably diminished in thickness, and is furnished with a hook-like claw. This provided, the finger is used as a probe, inserted in the tunnel, and the dainty morsel drawn from its hiding place.

Tapioca Plant.—The Tapioca plant is a native of Central and South America, and much cultivated there. It is now also largely grown in Western Africa, where it is called Cassava. The plant grows in a bushy form, with stems usually from six to eight feet high. The roots are very large, from three to eight growing in a cluster, usually from a foot to two feet long. The starch in the roots is separated from the fibre, and from this starch the tapioca of commerce is made by heating it on hot plates and stirring with an iron rod; the starch grains burst, and the whole forms into small irregular masses, such as are seen in the market.

Finding Drowned People.—"An Old Folk-Lorist" writes: "The remarkable incident of the discovery of the body of a child drowned in the River Kennet, at Newbury, in 1767, by means of a two penny loaf with a quantity of quicksilver put into it, was quoted by one of your contemporaries some twenty years ago; and then elicited many curious proofs of the existence of similar practices with analogous successful results, and with—what is not always the case—a satisfactory explanation of the phenomenon. Sir James Alexander, in his account of Canada, after stating that the Indians believe that a drowned body may be discovered by floating a piece of cedar-wood, which will stop and turn round over the exact spot, mentions an instance which occurred within his own knowledge, where the body of a person who was drowned by the over-setting of his boat near Cedar Island 'could not be discovered until this experiment was resorted to.'

But something more remarkable was stated by an eminent clergyman, happily still living, who mentioned that, many years before, a boy who had lately come to Eton imprudently bathed in the Thames where it flows with great rapidity under 'the playing fields,' and was carried out of his depth and drowned. All efforts to recover the body failed until one of the masters threw a cricket-bat into the stream, which floated to a spot where it turned round in an eddy in a deep hole, under which the body was found. There were, I think, other instances, but these elicited from some intelligent correspondent the simple and natural explanation of the phenomenon.

There are in all running streams deep pools formed by eddies, in which drowned bodies are likely to be caught and retained. Any slight substance thrown into the stream would naturally be drawn to the surface of the river over the centre of the eddy-hole."—Full Mill Gazette.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 17, 1880.

Within the last two years there have appeared in our columns a number of communications from different friends in Canada, narrating and commenting on the circumstances connected with the division in one of our Monthly and Quarterly Meetings.

From the information then received, many Friends outside of that Yearly Meeting believed, that those members of Norwich Monthly Meeting who were ejected in such a wholesale manner, were brought into suffering for their adherence to the doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends, and for their resistance to measures calculated in their judgment to undermine and lay waste those doctrines and testimonies.

Some of those at a distance, who had been accustomed to think well of Canada Yearly Meeting, were disappointed to find that it had not strength to examine into the causes of the difficulty that existed, and apply a suitable remedy therefore; but that it allowed the contention to go on till an actual division occurred, and then sanctioned the cutting off of a body of sound and well-concerned members, without making an effort to heal the breach, or change and of departure from the principles had taken deeper root than we would gladly have believed was the case. If Canada Yearly Meeting had been in a healthy condition, we believe it would have had more sound judgment and discernment than to appoint for its Clerk, last year, a man who a few months after became the stated minister of a Congregational Society, and who, as he now acknowledges, had long held opinions which he knew to be at variance with the doctrines of our Society.

We have received from a Friend in Canada an extract from one of the local papers, published at St. Catharines, the town in which this person now officiates. After speaking of the curiosity that was felt to see what course he would take, when the usual time came for administering the Communion, as it is called,—the article referred to thus relates what occurred:—

"He said, the Society of Friends had firm faith in the baptism of the Holy Ghost, and in the spiritual eating of the Lord's Supper, but discarded water, bread and wine, as visible signs of these gifts and graces. He had long held the opinion, which had gradually ripened into conviction, that the Lord Jesus intended water baptism, [and] partaking of the bread and wine to be memorials of permanent obligation in his church. He had therefore great peace in partaking of these elements as a blessed memorial service, and in handing them to others who loved the Lord Jesus Christ."

We do not doubt that this occurrence is a humiliating and trying one to members of Canada Yearly Meeting, who retain their attachment to the principles of Friends, and we would rejoice if it should be a means of opening their eyes to the need of a more open and honest defence of our doctrines and practices, and of bearing a more decided testimony against error and change.

As time has passed on, we have often been made to remember the striking language of a valuable Friend, uttered in a Meeting for Discipline many years ago—that he saw very little difference between being unsound ourselves, and having no testimony to bear against unsoundness in others.

It is not the lapse from our spiritual views of Baptism and the Supper that gives us the most uneasiness. The difference between Friends and others in these matters is too obvious to be mistaken. We are more anxious to be the ultimate results of the far widespread departure from our doctrines in relation to the Holy Spirit and Ministry, which has been gradually progressing for many years—in some cases so gradually as not to excite much alarm. Plausible reasons or excuses could readily be suggested for every successive step in the progress of change, which has gone so far that now there exists in our Society a class of ministers, who follow no business for a livelihood but that of preaching, who are open to calls for service in different sections from meetings or individuals who will pay their expenses, and who in a general way expect to perform the services they are employed to do. These are so nearly on the same foundation as the ministers of other religious societies, that in some cases it involves no great strain on their principles to accept "calls" to pre-side over settled congregations, and perform the functions which are usually expected of such.

A few weeks since, we commenced sending "The Friend" gratuitously to some persons who had not been receiving it, with the desire to give notice to the effect was inserted in our Editorial column, so that those who received the paper might understand why it was sent to them. Since then, several letters have been received from various persons requesting the paper might be sent in the same way to persons in whom they were interested. This we design doing, but wish it understood that we have not funds applicable to a permanent gratuitous circulation.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The total tonnage of anthracite coal for the week ending the 31st inst., was 372,687 tons. The market for steel used for iron and steel purposes is said to be fairly active. The indications are, that for manufacturing purposes the demand will be largely increased over last year—for iron purposes alone it is estimated that at least one million additional tons will be required.

The first steel rails made in this country by the Bessemer process was in 1865. Now there are eleven import and establishments—five in Pennsylvania, three in Illinois, and one in each of the States of Ohio, New York and Mississippi. In 1873, the number of gross tons manufactured reached 919,297. The price has declined from $266, in currency, to $183.23 during the last year. The present producing capacity of Great Britain is said not to exceed 7,500,000 tons, and it is predicted that before the close of this year the United States will take first rank in this branch of manufactures.

The Western Iron Association have decided to reduce the card rate from $1 to $3.20. The price of pig iron has declined $10 per ton.

It is stated the railroad mileage of the United States exceeds that of the entire continent of Europe and Great Britain, and is more than half that of the entire world.

During the last year, an average of 13,000 letters per day was received at the Dead Letter Office, New England furnishing the large-st share proportionally. These letters contained $45,000 in currency, and $1,500,000 in drafts, 95 per cent. of which was returned to the proper owners.

Last month 21,558 immigrants arrived at the port of New York, against 5965 in the 3d month of 1873.

A steamer from Bremen recently landed at Baltimore 1332 immigrants, nearly all of whom were bound West.

The U. S. Consul at Cork, Ireland, reports under date of 3rd month 12th, that within the forty days preceding there were 1871 emigrants to America from that port—nearly six times the number of corresponding period last year.

Large emigration from the maritime provinces of Canada to the United States is also reported. The consumption of American cotton goods in China is on the increase. During last year Tientsin imported from this country 700,000 pieces.

Destructive fires are reported to have occurred in Wilmington, N. C., and Harrisburg, Pa. Forest fires also were reported near Milford, Pa., and Plymouth, Mass., which have destroyed large quantities of cord-wood, and devastated large areas of growing timber.

A violent gale raged in the Bay of the afternoon and night of the 10th. The water in the harbor overflowed the wharves, and almost submerged the island between the river and lake, compelling the inhabitants to leave. The wind was so strong at times that wagons were overturned, and a street car blown from the track.

The temperature throughout the Atlantic States has been unusually low for several days. The peach crop in the lower peninsula of Delaware is reported almost ruined by the frosts of the last few nights.

The mortality in this city last week numbered 352. Of this number 187 were adults and 165 children—77 being under one year of age.

Markets.—U. S. 8<sup>ths</sup>, 1881, 106; 5<sup>ths</sup>, registered, 107.34; do. coupon, 103; 4<sup>ths</sup>, 1891, 109; 4 per cents 107.73.

Sales of yellow, 53 cts. and mixed, 55 cts., and white, 55 1/2 cts. Oats quiet and steady. Mixed, 42-cets., and white at 44 a 46 cts.

Seeds.—Clover is dull. Sales at 6 a 6 1/2 cts.; timothy, 5 1/2 cts.; alfalfa, $1.80 a $1.85.

Hay and straw.—Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $3 a $1.15 per 100 pounds; mixed, 85 cts a $1; straw, $1.30 a $1.40 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle.—The market during the past week has been active, and prices 3c. per lb. higher—2,641 head arrived, and sold at 2 a 6 cts. per lb., as to quality.

Hogs were in good demand at last quotations; extra, 7 1/2 cts.; good at 7 cts.; medium, 6 1/2 cts., and common, 6 1/2 cts. per hundred.

Lambs were scarce and in demand at 6 a 7 1/2 cts. per pound.

Butter was in fair demand at prices ranging from 5 1/2 a 7 1/2 cts. per pound, as to condition.

Milk cows were active, and prices tending upward. Sales from $20 to $40 per head.

FOREIGN.—As the elections proceed, the Liberal Government in England has produced a profound impression, and at the Palace, almost a panic. The Greeks, Armenians, Bulgarians and Christians generally have regarded Lord Beaconsfield as their most powerful opponent and rejoice at his fall.

The famine in Armenia is said to be increasing. It is reported that over 200 people have died of starvation. The Russian authorities of Rostoff have forwarded 50,000 pounds of flour, for their relief.

The Chilean Legation at Washington has received a dispatch from Panama, reporting that Callao is to be blockaded, and that the Peruvian army of Toroto has been defeated.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INFIRM.

New Franklin, (Twenty-third Ward,) Philadelphia. Physician and Superintendent—JOHN C. HALL, M. D. Applications for admission to the Asylum may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, on 3d mo. 1st, 1880, at her residence in Philadelphia, HANNAH, widow of the late N. Kite, in the 63d year of her age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. Her removal was sudden, as she had at different time expressed that she believed would be the case. "I also ready, for at such an hour as ye think not, th of man cometh."

On the evening of the 16th of 3d month, at the residence of Lindley J. Hoyle, Lydia S. widow of the late John M. Smith, in the 58th year of her age, a member of Springville Monthly Meeting Friends, Iowa. On the morning of the day of her being asked if she knew she was very weak and she said, "Yes;" and to the further inquiry, if she comfortable in her mind, she replied, "I am in hands of a merciful Caretaker; no merits of my all of his mercy; I feel comfortable every way"—she repeated several times during the day—and 7 o'clock passed peacefully away, leaving to her husband and friends the consoling assurance that, redounding love and mercy, she has been admitted the mansions of eternal rest and peace.

At her residence in Haddonfield, N. J., 27th ult., HANNAH ELDRITCH, in the 81st year of age, an esteemed elder and overseer of Haddonfield Monthly Meeting. Although she was so old, believe she was found with her "lamp trimme burning," and prepared, through Divine mercy, to "into" the joy of her Lord.

—, in this city on the 3d instant, DANIEL TUCKER, formerly of the city of New York, in the 70th year of his age, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

For "The Friend,"

Friends' Meeting House and Lot in Charleston, South Carolina.

historical Sketch of the property, and the care thereof, with the Fund derived from it for assisting other Meetings in the erection of places of worship, under the charge of the Meeting for Sufferings of Friends in Philadelphia.

The following compilation respecting the above mentioned meeting property, from its origin to the year 1826, is abstracted from a statement prepared by Jonathan Evans, Clerk of the Meeting for Sufferings, dated 10th month 1826, and preserved among the records that meeting in Philadelphia. The residue of facts down to the present time are given from the Minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings, and those of the Trustees who were given special charge of "The Fund." They are offered for publication at this time in the hope that some misapprehensions respecting the connection of Friends of Philadelphia with this trust, may be corrected by a right understanding of the facts in the case, and also that they will be found interesting to many readers in the Society in an antiquarian point of view.

Soon after the settlement of South Carolina, the few families of Friends who were settled in and near Charleston, held meetings for the performance of Divine worship, and sometimes held meetings for the extension of care towards each other, as may be gathered in their Book of Minutes subsequently kept together. It is probable that those meetings were at first held in a private dwelling, soon afterwards in a building erected on some ground now occupied for that purpose, whence it obtained the name of the Quakers' Lot. Those members of our religious Society who were thus associated, and who felt the necessity of exercising a Christian care for each other's preservation, and the cause of truth might not suffer through inconsideration, considered themselves as entirely from under the jurisdiction or control of any meeting except the Yearly Meeting of Friends in London; hence they exercised the functions of a distinct independent body. The first Yearly Meeting at present appears is dated in 1718, and although they transacted such business as might be proper to a Yearly Meeting, or at least held their meetings monthly, yet they maintained an Epistolary correspondence with the Yearly Meetings of London and Pennsylvania.

"After having made use of this lot of ground for a considerable number of years without any regular title or fee in it, Friends in London applied to the King in council to have the property daly invested; in consequence of which an order from King George the Second was issued to Robert Johnson, Governor of South Carolina, directing him to make a grant of the said lot of ground to Thomas Kimberly, in which it is stated to be of the king's mere will and pleasure and in lieu of services rendered." The governor accordingly in the year 1731 grants the same under the seal of the Province to the said Friend, who was an acceptable minister in the Society, and calls for by the name it had long been known by, "the Quakers' Lot;" and with the express understanding and in the special trust and confidence, that a meeting house should be erected thereon for the Society of Friends in Charleston, and the ground to be forever reserved for this special and declared purpose. Thomas Kimberly, no doubt in virtue of the order in council and previous to the date of this grant by the governor, having the right of possession in those times in that Province; or had more full securing of titles, gave a lease to John Witter, Joseph Shute and Robert Fleming; and being an upright man, sensible of the responsibility devolved upon him, he soon after executed a deed conveying to the said persons the said lot of land, in which, in order that the uses and original design should never be defeated, but be completely perpetuated, he positively and unequivocally states 'that the said John Witter, Joseph Shute and Robert Fleming their heirs and assigns forever shall stand possessed of the said tract of land, together with the said grant thereof, to the use and benefit of all that set of people commonly called Quakers residing in Charleston, or in any other part of this Province, to the intent that the said tract of land shall be appropriated as a place or spot of ground whereon a meeting house shall be erected and built for the general use of all the said people called Quakers [as is before recited] and to and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever.' Also with the express covenant 'that all and every person or persons which now or shall at any time hereafter, stand seized of the said tract of land and premises, shall from time to time and at all times stand and be seized thereof, and of every part thereof, to the same use, intent, and purpose as the same premises are in and by these presents granted, limited and conveyed.' The said trustees covenant and agree 'that when any one of them shall die, the survivors or a majority of them shall nominate and appoint one other of the same sect, and no other, to supply his place in the said trust; and so on successively as often as by death or otherwise any vacancy shall happen.' In consequence of which several [trustees] were so appointed from time to time; but a regular nomination being afterwards neglected, and several of the Trustees dying, John Witter and Joseph Shute were the only survivors, and it being necessary for the security of the property that other trustees should be appointed, on being applied to by some Friends from Philadelphia, they did in the year 1754 nominate James Verree (formerly of Charleston afterwards of Burlington) Israel Pemberton and others (of Philadelphia) to act with them; and by indenture vested the said lot with the buildings thereon and all its appurtenances in the said trustees.

"During the life of Thomas Kimberly or soon afterwards, some of those early trustees took into their possession a lot of ground adjoining to the first mentioned lot, and were promised a patent for the same from the Government, but Joseph Shute having survived all the first named trustees and pretending to claim the said lot as his own estate, he kept possession of all the property, locked up the meeting house, assumed the whole as his own, and would suffer none to assemble therein for a considerable length of time. This, with the treatment he manifested toward the Friends in Philadelphia, and his refusal to write to Friends in Philadelphia, and spread the state of the meeting and the meeting-house before them. They immediately interceded, and by energetic measures succeeded in getting the meeting-house opened again, and that particular estate placed under direction of new trustees. As the conduct of Joseph Shute had on different accounts given Friends a great deal of concern and trouble, and his right of membership remaining in the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia, he became a subject of care and dealing in that meeting. After his decease it was judged expedient to purchase from his son and heir all his right and claim to this adjoining lot, and in conformity with this his heir, John Shute, was paid one hundred pounds,* who accordingly relinquished his claim and vested in Israel Pemberton and others all his right, &c., to the said lot.

"The property continuing so long in an unproductive state and the buildings greatly decayed, particularly the meeting-house, repairs were almost constantly needed, and hence frequent calls for money to defray those heavy expenses, that thus it became a subject of much concern and no small burden to Friends in Philadelphia; for as there were no funds to meet those exigencies, the Meeting for Sufferings in Pennsylvania not only advanced from time to time large sums of money, but also had to ship lumber to put the meeting-house into complete repair, almost equal to rebuilding it.

*This money was raised among Friends in Philadelphia, as appears by certain documents found among the papers of the Meeting for Sufferings.

"As the membership of several of the persons residing in Charleston, was held in different meetings and in distant States, the Meeting for Sufferings in Pennsylvania thought it would be most in order that they should be placed under the care of some meeting for discipline in South Carolina. They accordingly wrote to the Monthly Meeting at Bush River, requesting them to extend care towards the meeting, and also to the property in Charleston; but Friends at Bush River declining to take any care of the property while the trust remained in Pennsylvania, and Philadelphia Meeting for Sufferings having had painful experience of the inattention and deficiency of a due discharge of duty of several of the trustees that had resided in South Carolina, were backward in acceding to a measure of this kind; but judging that it might be better to have the meeting under the care and oversight of a meeting for discipline, and hoping that possibly the estate might be fully preserved for the use of Friends, they at last consented to transfer the trust to certain Friends in South Carolina. Accordingly a deed to that effect was executed to Nebo Gaunt and others, all residing in South Carolina, in the year 1796."

Susanna Lightfoot, a native of Ireland, was born in the year 1720. When she was young her father died in very low circumstances, and she was obliged to follow the humble occupation of a domestic servant. But though ~~she was born in the year 1720~~ she was born in the seventeenth year of her age dignified her with a gift in the ministry. In the same year she went on a religious visit to Friends in America, being, it is believed, the youngest minister in our religious Society, who crossed the Atlantic on a gospel mission. She was a living and powerful minister of the Word, careful not to break silence in meetings, until favored with a fresh anointing from the Holy One; whereby she was preserved clear in her openings, awful and weighty in prayer, her voice being solemn and awakening under the baptizing power of truth. Her expressions during a lingering illness which preceded her dissolution in 1781, were remarkably instructive and weighty, and an unclouded prospect of an entrance into the heavenly kingdom was vouchsafed to her. One evening, after a solemn silence, she broke forth in a sweet melody, saying, "I have had a prospect this evening, of joining the heavenly host, in singing praises to Zion's King: for which favor my soul, and all that is sensible within me, magnifies that arm which hath been with me from my infant days, and cast up a way where there was no way, both by sea and land."

Deborah Wynn, wife of John Wynn, had a sober and religious education, and was favored with the visitation of truth in her young years, and by giving up to the manifestation thereof, she came to experience the work of its power in her heart, and by being obedient thereto, attained to a degree of settlement in the truth when young. This prepared her to undergo those trials and exercises which early began to fall to her lot; for about the sixteenth year of her age, her father and mother were both taken up and carried prisoners to York for the testimony of a good conscience towards God. She being their only child, the management of their trade and business fell under her care; and during their imprisonment she travelled to York, twenty-two miles, on foot, twice in two weeks, to visit them, to carry them what money she had got for their support. Being sincere in heart to God, and through his grace faithful to the truth, she grew in experience, and about the eighteenth year of her age she was concerned to bear a public testimony in meetings, to the comfort and edification of Friends.

It is further recorded of her, that she was a woman of sound judgment, great sincerity and circumspection in the course of her conduct, tender and living in her public ministry; and by her godly and courteous conversation she gained the love and esteem of both Friends and others in the town and country where she lived.

She died the 14th of the Sixth month, 1727. She was about eighty-two years of age, and a minister about sixty-four years.

Deborah Bell, daughter of the before-mentioned John and Deborah Wynn, was born at Bradford in Yorkshire, and being carefully educated in the way of truth by her pious and faithful parents, she sought the way of the faithful Lord, and the knowledge of his blessed truth, when very young, and was mercifully favored to partake of that virtue and divine goodness which maketh fruitful towards God, as she frequently expressed herself. In her minority she often earnestly desired that the Lord should be pleased to enable her to come up in doing his will, and that in all things she might be ready to obey his will, and to be obedient and requiring; and be fully given up in heart in all sincerity, and by his grace devoted to serve and obey Him, according to the ability received. He in mercy and loving-kindness heard her humble petitions, and granted the early visitations of his love and goodness, in the pourings forth of his Holy Spirit, and gradually, by the work of his own divine power, so prepared and sanctified her heart, that she was made a vessel of honor.

About the nineteenth year of her age, the Lord saw meet in his wisdom to commit a dispensation of the everlasting gospel to her to preach, in which service, she being faithful, grew in the knowledge of God, and had great experience of his dealings, and like the wise scribe, who was well instructed to the kingdom, brought forth out of the good treasury of her heart, things both new and old; so that she became an able minister thereof, to the comfort and edification of the churches where she came.

Towards the latter part of her time, being often infirm, she frequently rejoiced in the Lord, and expressed the great comfort, peace, and satisfaction which she had in having devoted her youthful days to his service, and being freely given up faithfully to obey his calls and holy requirements, whilst a degree of health and strength was granted, and she was able to undergo such service, often saying an early devotion was very acceptable to God, and the strength of youth could never be so well and profitably employed, as in faithfully serving the Lord in humility and sincere obedience in whatever work He in his wisdom may be pleased to qualify them for, and call them into. For whosoever it happened that any such lived to be attended with the infirmities of old age, the comfort and peace they would enjoy, would be abundantly more to them than all the comforts of this life; for she could by living experience say, that nothing in this world was worthy to be compared with it.

She often earnestly desired the sense thereof might lay hold of our youth, that they might give up their minds to seek the Lord early, and devote the strength of their time to his service, that in the end they might be made partakers of the same comfort and peace which was her greatest joy and real cause of rejoicing, and became more and more so as she drew near her conclusion. This I publish (writes her biographer) for their perusal, that if by any means they might be prevailed upon, and stirred up to consider how necessary, and truly profitable it is to begin early in the great duty recommended by the wise man "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, have no pleasure in them."

When on the bed of death she said: "I would have none put off that great work of repentance till such a time as this; if I had that work to do, what a dreadful thing would be." At another time, divers young people being present, she said, "I would have our young people be willing to bear the cross in their youth, and despise the shame; for that is the way to have true peace in their selves." Another time she bore this testimony: "I was early convinced that unless was born again, I could not see the kingdom of God. I have witnessed it, and you know I have preached this doctrine to you; and you must know it for yourselves."

The 24 of Ninth month, 1738, she sweetly finished her course. She was aged about forty-nine years, and a minister upwards of thirty years.

George Whitehead was born about the year 1636. He was a native of the north of England, and educated in the Presbyterian mode of faith; in which, finding many things to his displeasure, and hearing of the newly-risen Society of the Quakers (so-called), he determined to attend one of their meetings, in which he was much affected by perceiving how greatly the spirits of most of those who were there assembled, seemed broken and contrite, more especially in the case of a young woman, on quitting the meeting, he observed her sit down upon the ground, with her face toward the earth, as if, he says, she regarded nobody present, but, moaning bitterly, cried out, Lord, make me clean! O Lord, make me clean! which he adds, did far more tenderly and deeply affect my heart than what I have heard spoken, and more than all the preaching that ever I had heard from man or man, and was a certain testimony to me, (the Spirit of the Lord evidencing to my spirit), that was a real work of his power upon her heart, which also operated upon the hearts of others, causing both troubling, sorrow, and contrition.

In consequence of his serious impression, G. Whitehead quitted the Presbyterians, and joined the Quakers, in the earliest days of the Society, and at a youthful period of his life. When about eighteen years of age, he felt himself called upon to go forth in the exercise of the ministry.

He testifies that profession and more to of religion and the church, did greatly about in those days, amongst many, as well as pride and self-conceit; which the Lord was about to stain and abase, as he manifestly did in a short time after; for those summer shows of religion would not endure a stormy winter. He speaks of the merciful support and consolations of God, in the comfortable enjoyment of His glorious, divine power and presence while in prison; causing himself, with others associated with him, to sing aloud in praise to the eternal name.

He departed this life in great peace and quiet the 8th of the First month, 1723, about the eighty-seventh year of his age, having been a minister about sixty-eight years.

James Parnell, was a young man who received the blessed Truth early. Being upon visit to George Fox, he was, at one of the times he preached, convinced. G. F. describes him as a "little lad of about sixteen years of age" and who, though so young, received deep convictions from the discourses of his Reformer, that he gave himself, from that time, entirely to the service of God. The discourse, and even the renunciation of his relations, would in no degree shake his determination to unite himself to this despised people, amongst whom he became, in his eighteenth year, a valiant minister of the gospel. Though, it is said, being turned to the Lord through his ministry.

Being shut up in a close prison, called the Hole in the Wall, and also persecuted by a cruel jailor, and his no less unfeeling wife, these complicated hardships soon caused the sickness unto death of this youthful disciple of his Saviour. When his end drew near, he fell into a sleep which lasted about an hour, and so breathed his last. The circumstance of his sleeping for an hour just before he died, was thought remarkable by those about him, because he had often been heard to say during his sickness, that one hour's sleep would cure him of all. He died in the year 1696; and about the nineteenth of his age.

James Dickinson was born in 1659. "When little child he felt at times a secret joy in gazing near to God with a broken and contrite heart. His father and mother, who had some Friends, rejoiced over these evidences the work of the Holy Spirit in the heart of their little son. Experiencing the blessedness of a holy life in themselves, they longed that their children should follow them in the paths of peace."

It is recorded that at the age of eighteen Dickinson first spoke in meetings. He had unwillingly to obey his Saviour's intimations on this subject, seeing, as he says, "the task to be very weighty, and looking out in a dark weakness;" but his loving Lord filled soul with all needful strength for this service, and afterwards his heart was humbled the abundance of peace which flowed into him. In the midst of his meditations one morning these words reached his spiritual ear: "Be bold and courageous for My name's sake; I will raise thee up." They were, he says, a fire in his bones."

That the Lord is large in his love, and of that kindness to them that are truly given to follow Him, J. Dickinson thus sets forth: "I had gifts ever; you have received, be careful that you are improving them to the honor of His giver, as those who know an account of the Divine mysteries of his kingdom to them who are kept humble and low before Him; who wait for counsel from the Lord every day, and to feel the assistance of his Spirit, and dare not move until the Lord go before and draw them forward."

For about sixty-five years he was engaged in the ministry. He died in 1741, when in his eighty-third year.

Memoir of Hannah Marsh.

BY HER DAUGHTER, PRISCILLA PITT.

In the autumn of 1876, she felt easy to leave Cropton and come to end her days with us. It was not that she cared for larger rooms or a garden, but to be with us, "feeling as I do," she said, "increasingly the need of a dear daughter." She was able to attend the dear old Meeting much of the winter, by riding in a close carriage, and went up to London to one sitting of the Yearly Meeting the year she died, and attended the first sitting of our (London) Quarterly Meeting two weeks before her end; near the close took her bonnet off, and spoke in a clear voice. The text she dwelt on was, "If I will that he tarry till I come," exhorting us to tarry for the Lord's putting forth, and not run out to labor in our own wills. On going down the railway stairs that morning she said, "Thee knows, my dear, it may be the last Quarterly Meeting I shall ever attend." The next morning she attended the 9 o'clock mid-week meeting at Cropton.

In our family at Miteham she often spoke at considerable length after the morning reading, and in our meetings, exhorting us very fervently and with much feeling and life, to wait on the Lord—to prove the advantage of turning our minds inward to the Lord, and wait thou only upon God, for my expectation is from Him, and from Him cometh my help. I feel of myself very poor and unworthy. I should not be as I am, my dears; you would not see me as I am, if it were not for the Lord. I know where my strength comes from." Often said a blessing waited "for the poor and needy—the little and lowly ones—those who were little in their own eyes." "We should go into meeting as a blank sheet of paper." She often told her friends she brought nothing into meeting to communicate, neither dared she take away what was given her to utter. "It's often very crucifying work to deliver what is given to express, but it would not do for me to bring it away with me; the reward of peace is more to me than all beside. There's no peace without obedience. There's such a shrinking in some. The fear of man is a great snare, but perfect love casts out fear." She frequently reminded friends "how high a profession it is we make—even to be led and guided by the Holy Spirit!" lamenting "how far short we as a people are in coming into a possession of the Truth. We have no personal end to answer—only to be endeavoring to come up to our duty, and live to the glory of our Heavenly Father. I don't want to set myself up to be anything." And when the subject of dress was alluded to, she would sometimes say, "If any think I arrogate to myself any merit, or that I pride myself on my plain appearance, they are greatly mistaken: 'Far from it!' She adopted it from a sense of duty, and it by keeping to one pattern, it cut off a great deal of unnecessary thought, and left the mind more free for things of highest moment."

And I here feel most easy to copy a short piece my mother was very much pleased with, which I believe does contain some solid truth. For while, in a certain point of light, these outward things are secondary and unimportant, especially where the attention of the mind has never been called to them; yet there is some connection between the inward and the outward. Also it is an easy thing to slip out of a watchful, careful walking, and to lose by little and little, the tender conscience, and to sell the hedge that has been planted around our vineyard—even the peculiar simplicity of dress and language, which has prevented many a time, rash youth from volunteering to mix in worldly assemblies and take company, and has many a time proved a barrier in the minds of worldly people against inviting our youth to join them. Let these things, therefore, have their due weight with us. The piece is, "Observation of an American Envoy."

After transacting some business with a Friend, he said: "I admire your Society. The principle contains all of Christianity I have any idea of; but I am sorry to see that some of you are losing your badge. I do not see how you can retain your principles, and self-denial, and difference from the world. You are lights. The world should come to gather them, but they will scatter you."

It is evident in our days, 1879, that alongside with the increased breaking down of the hedge among us, there is much going over to the world's ways, and rejection of the saving Light of Christ, and a losing possession of the fundamental principles of our profession: a vastation of the same.

In the summer of 1877, Hannah Marsh was in a very feeble condition of health, but so far rallied as to be able to get to meeting again and call on some invalid friends. The last few days of her life are thus described by her daughter:

On Seventh-day morning, 20th of 10th month, 1877, she came down to breakfast. She leaned over towards me and said she had had such a very nice comfortable night. This was so her way to say all she could to comfort me. A walk in the garden that day with me I shall never forget—she entreated me to give my heart fully to the Lord. She talked in the afternoon with Mary* upon the memorable anniversary, twenty years since she came to live with us in Park Lane. It was indeed a day spent as though it were the last. She read many pages of an autobiography, to herself, and in the evening, sitting with me and mother E. Pitt, she related to me many incidents she had been reading. Mother E. P. read to us part of Wm. Sweet's life. My mother remarked, "How woelet it is to notice the various trials the dear servants have had to pass through, and yet they are all led one way." Towards 10 o'clock she went up to bed, parting with us in great sweetness, unity and love. Indeed she had looked peculiarly lovely and well that evening. I noticed it once as she leaned forward to me as she sat in our easy chair.

The next day she came down to breakfast, but was soon obliged to return to bed. In the night bronchitis came on. She did not appear at all conscious of her declining state, nor did she seem to suffer much. On the morning of the 23d she fell into a deep sleep from which she never woke.

Thus brightly ended her earthly career like the bright glow of a clear sunset—her affectionate heart just spared the pang of parting. She was aged 87 years.

The Good Samaritan.—Oberlin, the well-known philanthropist of Steintal, was travelling on one occasion from Strasbourg. It was in the winter time. The grounds were deeply covered with snow and the roads were almost impassable. He had reached the middle of the journey and was among the mountains, but by that time was so exhausted that he could stand up no longer.

He was rapidly freezing to death. Sleep began to overcome him; all power to resist it left him. He commended himself to God and yielded to what he felt to be the sleep of death. He knew not how long he slept, but suddenly became conscious of some one rousing him and waking him up. Before him stood a wagon driver in his blue blouse and a wagon not far away. He gave him a little wine and food, and the spirit of life returned. He then helped him on the wagon and brought him to the next village. The rescued man was profuse in his thanks and offered money, which his benefactor refused.

"It is only a duty to help one another," said the wagoner, "and it is the next thing to an insult to offer a reward for such a service."

"Then," replied Oberlin, "at least tell me your name, that I may have you in thankful remembrance before God."

"Minister of the Gospel," please tell me the name of the Good Samaritan."

"That," said Oberlin, "I cannot do, for it was not put on record."

"Then," replied the wagoner, "until you can tell me his name, permit me to withhold mine."

Soon he had driven out of sight, and Oberlin never saw him again.

As regards family prayer, I desire that the restraining influence of the spirit of Truth, may keep away from us the strange fire, which wherever it is offered, occasions death."

THREE WORDS OF STRENGTH.

There are three lessons I would write—
Three words, as with a burning pen,
In tracings of eternal light,
Upon the hearts of men.

Have Hope! Though clouds'environ round,
And gladness hides her face in scorn,
Put thou the shadow from thy brow—
No night but hath its morn.

Have Faith! Where'er thy bark is driven—
The calm'st disport, the tempest's mirth—
Know this! God rules the hosts of heaven,
The inhabitants of earth.

Have Love! Not love alone for one;
But man, as man, thy brother call;
And scatter, like the circling sun,
Thy charities on all.

Thus grave these lessons on thy soul,
Hope, Faith and Love—and thou shalt find
Strength when life's surges rattle roll,
Light when thou else wert blind.

SNOW-FLAKES AT THE SOUTH.

BY WILLIAM H. HAYSE.

I see them through the crystal pane,
Descending fast on hill and plain—
Spirits of dead autumnal rain!

Soon their transforming touch is laid
On every forest, rock and glade,
The haunts of rustic man or maid.

They clothe each rugged vale and slope,
Shining like transient gleams of hope,
To souls that in doubt's darkness grope.

Trees, by time rendered tall and hale,
Now glimmer through the landscape pale,
Like giants clad in heavenly mail.

Where stretches yonder whitening lawn,
These tender spirits do not scorn
To sheathe the sharpness of the thorn.

All Nature's children, young or old,
These guardian angels of the cold,
In soft, celestial arms enfold.

Alas, how soon their course is run!
Beneath the ardor of the sun,
They vanish ere the day is done!

Thou art, O God! the light and life
Of all this wondrous world we see;
Its glow by day, its smile by night,
Are but reflections caught from thee.
Where'er we turn thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are thine.

When day with farewell beams delays,
Among the opening clouds of even,
And we can almost think to gaze
Through golden vistas into heaven;
Those hues that mark the sun's decline,
So soft, so radiant, Lord! are thine.

When night, with wings of starry gloom,
Overshadows all the earth and skies,
Is sparkling with unnumbered fires,
That sacred gloom, those fires divine,
So grand, so countless, Lord! are thine.

When youthful spring around us breathes,
Thy spirit warms her fragrant sighs,
And e'er yflower the summer wreathes,
Is born beneath that kindling eye,
Where'er we turn thy glories shine,
And all things fair and bright are thine.

—Sacred Melodies.

"ROCK OF AGES."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,"
Thoughtlessly the maiden sung.
Fell the words unconsciously
From her girlish, gleeful tongue;
Sang as little children sing;
Sang as sing the birds in June;
Fell the words like light leaves down
On the current of the tune—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Let me hide myself in Thee."
Felt her soul no need to hide;
Sweet the song as song could be—
And she had no thought beside.
All the words unheeding
Fell from lips untouched by care,
Dreaming not that each might be
On some other lips a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me."
'Twas a woman sung them now,
Pleadingly and prayerfully
Every word her heart did know.
Rose the song as storm-tossed bird
Beats with weary wing the air;
Every note with sorrow stirred,
Every syllable a prayer—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

Selected.

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,"
Trips grown aged sang the hymn
Trustingly and tenderly—
"Voice grown weak and eyes grown dim;
"Let me hide myself in Thee,"
Trembling through the voice and low,
Ran the sweet strain peacefully,
Like a river in its flow,
Sung as only they can sing
Who life's thorny paths have pressed,
Sung as only they can sing
Who beheld the promised rest—
"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee."

"Rock of Ages, cleft for me,"
Sung above a coffin-hid;
Underneath, all restfully,
All life's joys and sorrows hid.
Nevermore, O storm-tossed tide,
Nevermore from wind or roused,
Nevermore from billow's roll,
Will thou need thyself to hide.
Could the sighless, sunken eyes,
Closed beneath that soft gray hair,
Could the mute and stiffened lips
Move again in pleading prayer,
Still, aye, still, the words would be,
"Let me hide myself in Thee."

Account of Anne Cann, continued.

"Next day several Friends came to see to whom she gave good advice and counsel. 'To prize their time: and oh! I bless God,' said she, 'that I lie now in great peace and content of mind and soul, though my body be held with pain. Oh! that it may so with you all my dear friends.'

"When she was very weak, some Friends would ask her if she knew them; 'Yes,' she, 'I know you every one. I have seen you all, and I have seen for how she has been blessed. My peace is made by God through the Lord Jesus Christ. I have no disturbance in mind, therefore is my understanding and judgment so good and clear; it were sad to lie under affliction of body, mind, to feel pinching pangs of body, even death, and to want peace with God. Oh! that would be intolerable to bear. Oh! my soul praise the Lord for his peace-plenteous redemption.'

"Her son-in-law, John Moore, having in physic, administered somewhat to her, after which they thought she was better, he was gone towards Swarthmore. She grew worse again; upon which her husband would have sent for him back, and also her daughter, but she was unwilling, saying, 'Be not careful in the matter; the Lord God is near me, and I have thy company; it is enough, and all will be well. I'm lump of clay, in which I dwell, be dissolved. I have full assurance of an house and dwelling God is the maker of, that will never grow old, nor be dissolved. Oh! my soul, be thou the Lord, and be glad in his salvation for evermore.'

"Her illness increased upon her, and many friends came to visit her, to whom she said, 'Oh! the cross is the only way to the eternal immortal. Shun it not, therefore, lest you be short of the crown; and stand up nobly; your testimony to the truth in all things, particularly against the popish anti-christian yoke of tithes, for which many have not offered great spoil of goods, but imprisonment till death, and have received a crown of life. Oh! if all that have been called to this testimony, had stood firm and true to in, God would have wrought wonders more abundantly, but unbelief makes a long wilderness; it is well if some die not in it, and never see the promised land."

"About two days before she died, she gave good advice to her grand-children and servants, and said to her husband, 'My dear, serving truth and Friends; thy reward with God is sure. I never grudged thy absence in that good service; and if it be the time of our parting, as I think now it will, I pray thee quit thyself of the things of this world, as such as may be, that thou mayest with the sure freedom pursue that honorable service or truth to the end of thy days. I hope the Lord will give thee strength to travel into the northern parts again, and remember my love to all friends, and warn all, but especially thee, to keep low, and not be high-minded, or humility and holiness are the badge of our profession. God Almighty keep us all low and humble; it is a safe and blessed state.' And, my dear, one thing I beg of thee; give me freely to the Lord. The Lord joined us, and gave us to each other; let us bless his name, if He now take us from each other in the outward, that is all; for our joining in spirit stands and remains for ever. Oh! therefore let me go easy out of this world, where I have had a great share of trouble in many ways thou knowest, and get to that even of rest, that I have the full assurance sealed upon my spirit."

"A little before she died, some fainting fits being, she revived again, and said, 'I am glad, thinking I was going to my eternal rest without disturbance.' Again she said, 'I have both a sight and sense of eternal rest with God in the world to come; and therefore I labor hard to be swallowed up in immortal life, and to be made possessor of that that cannot be disturbed, where sorrow ceases, and be no more forever. Oh! my soul, this is thy glorious portion; therefore be thou the Lord, and wait patiently his appointed season.' Then she desired to be helped up in her bed; but her senses increased: she grew very weak and tired, and said, 'I think I grow weak and tired. My hands and feet are grown very dry, yet my heart is very strong before it fails. I must meet with sharper pangs than I have yet felt. My God has hitherto laid a gentle hand upon me.' She desired to lie down again, but could not stay, but being set up in bed again, she said, 'This pain is hard flesh and blood, but must be endured a little time; ease and eternal rest is at hand. I am glad I see death so near me. Oh! remember me to all my dear babes and grandchildren. I shall with these eyes behold them more. God Almighty bless them all, and keep them all his children, that I may enjoy in for ever in the heavens above. Neither will I see my sons and daughter. Ah! my darling son, what shall I do for him? I have prayed and longed for his return. The Lord may come, God grant it may, but I shall see it in my time. He is my son, the son of a godly father, and therefore I cannot but love him. Tell him it is his immortal soul's life being that I am concerned for; not so much his outward state here, for that, though very so miserable, will quickly end, but the very of the soul separated from God will never end. And, my dear, though our counsels have not had the desired end, yet I do endear thee, remain a father to him in repeated counsel. Leave him not to run on in the way of misery, but labor and pray for his return. Oh! thou hast been true to me in bearing with me many a heavy burden, and hast done abundance for him every way, and hast sake; with more to that purpose. 'My love to his wife; I desire she may mind heavenly things, and pray God bless their offspring, that they may walk in the steps of their grandfather, who is gone to his eternal rest; with well-wishes for her son and daughter Moore, and blessings upon their children.'

"The day she died, many friends came to see her, being their monthly-meeting day, to whom she gave good advice, and expressed her joy and comfort in the salvation of God, peace and perfect redemption. Seeing friends weep, she said, 'Be not concerned, for all is well; I have only death to encounter, and the sting of it is wholly taken away; the grave has no victory, and my soul is ascending above all sorrow and pain. So let me go freely to my heavenly mansion, disturb me not in my passage. My friends, go to the meeting, let me not hinder the Lord's business, but let it be chief, and by you all done faithfully, that at the end you may receive your reward, for mine is sure. I have not been negligent, my day's work is done.'

"Friends went to the meeting, and in a little time her pains increased, which she bore with patience, but sighed deeply, praying the Lord to help her through her agony of death. After some words, she said, 'Oh! my God, oh! my God, thou hast not forsaken me, Lord and Saviour who suffered, for me and man, in this my great day of salvation. My trust is in thee, my hope is only in thee, my dear Lord. Oh! come, come, dear Lord Jesus, come quickly, receive my soul. To thee I yield it up; help me now in my bitter pangs.' These indeed were very great, and her husband prayed by her, that the Lord would make her passage easy; and she had no more such pangs, but drew her breath shorter by degrees, and said very little more, but that it was good to leave all to the Lord; saying, 'Oh! pray, pray, pray; and so fell asleep in the Lord, in a good old age, being in her seventy-ninth year, as a shock of corn in season. She died the 30th of the Ninth month, 1705, and was honorably buried: many ancient Friends of about thirteen adjacent meetings accompanied her to the grave, the 3d of the Tenth month, 1705."

Food of Alligators.—Roaming along the coast of Texas, along the Red River, Sabine, Trinity and other streams full of alligators, and last year during a three months' stay in the marshlands of Vermilion Bay of Louisiana, I saw them swallow repeatedly, with the same appetite, fishes, fowls, pieces of raw and cooked meat, crabs, bivalves, gray water snakes, and the poisonous moccasin, &c. Further, E. F. Schmidt, in Houston, Texas, has an aquarium and vivarium in one of the show windows of his drug store, in which, besides fishes, turtles and horned frogs, were thriving a numerous and lively set of lizards and snakes of all descriptions. Last spring to this gentleman were sent some young alligators (about ten inches long), which also we set in the window, and, though regularly and abundantly fed with raw meat and minnows, after about two weeks had cleared out all the lizards and snakes, but never touched a turtle as long as it was alive. And as often as snakes of various kinds, poisonous and non-poisonous, afterwards were set in the window, the young alligators immediately commenced hunting after them, and generally half an hour afterwards one of them had swallowed the snake, head foremost, the tail hanging out of the alligator's mouth, wriggling still; and after about fifteen to twenty minutes the whole snake had disappeared.—Forest and Stream.

Bechuanaland

For "The Friend."

The following letter copied in the last number of the London Friend from the Nonconformist and Independent, was written by a missionary of the London Missionary Society. It furnishes another instance of the grasping, selfish character of unregenerated human nature, which is apt to be manifested where the strong come in contact with the weak. Of this, our own country furnishes many sad examples; and we can therefore sympathize with those of our English brethren who remember in reference to such occurrences the solemn language of Scripture, 'Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord.' Well might the tender-hearted Cowper exclaim—

"My ear is pained,
My soul is sick, with every day's report
Of wrong and outrage, with which earth is filled."

"Sir,—While general attention is being directed to South African affairs in the Transvaal and Zululand, there are other parts of the same country equally worthy of attention. The Bechuanas immediately succeed the Colonial frontier. First came the Kaffir war. That was followed by the war with the Griquas and Bechuanas in and around the newly-annexed territory of Griqualand West. The Zulu war, and especially the terrible slaughter of British troops and their native allies at Isandhlwana, seems to have more to do with forwarding these things upon public notice than anything else.

Soon after the discovery of diamonds on the banks of the Vaal River, a large tract of country was proclaimed British territory. A small part of this belonged to the Orange Free State, for which the Boers afterwards received £30,000. The rest of this tract of country was native territory. These natives consisted of two distinct peoples, each occupying their own portion. On the west coast were the Griquas, living under their chief, Waterboer. To the north were the Bechuanas, living under their Christian chief, Yanke. It may be safely affirmed that had the wishes of these people been consulted, it would have been found that they were as strongly averse to coming under British rule as are the Boers of the Transvaal to day.

But this need not have been an insurmountable difficulty in the way of progress had their welfare been justly cared for. A market for native labor and produce was open, near at hand, on the diamond fields, of which the natives were not slow to avail themselves. From far and near they brought cattle, fashers, skins, grain, firewood, &c. Others in large numbers came to work. In return they received English money, with which they bought English goods, but especially guns, powder, and lead. Thousands of guns were thus distributed amongst the natives all over the country, from the best breech-loading rifles down to the commonest muskets, each barrel bringing grist to the Government mill in the shape of ten shillings duty. Magistrates were appointed to various districts to represent British authority amongst the natives at a distance from Kimberley, which was the seat of government and the great centre of European population. Gaols were built and police enrolled. At the same time cantenets were licensed and opened in every available place for the sale of Cape brandy. Licensed hawkers, travelling in wagons, carried the same pernicious wares to all the native villages and hamlets, bringing disturbance and misery wherever they came. They would even cross the border, and, in defiance of the chiefs, carry on the sale in front of their very doors. And if a chief attempted to interfere, he would be threatened with the soldiers and police.

One of the saddest sights to be seen there any day was that of natives riding backwards and forwards to these places on horseback or oxback, infuriated by drink, or to see men and women rolling about or lying hopelessly intoxicated under the shadow of the staff bearing aloft the British flag. This was the licensed process of civilization, under the patronage of the British Government—the brandy shop, the magistrate's court, and the gaol. The effect of this state of things, especially in these outlying districts, was appalling, and many of the natives became more debased and impoverished than ever they had been as heathen. Up to this time the native chiefs had prohibited the sale of these drinks in their territories, and the boundaries they had broken down the feeble barriers, and flooded the country with ruin. At Griqua Town the chief became the prey of canteen keepers and others, and turned out a besotted imbecile; and many of his people are very little better.

In 1877, a number of the chief native inhabitants of Griqua Town drew up a petition addressed to her majesty Queen Victoria, imploring her to stop the ruin coming upon them, and stop the sale of drink. This petition reached the Colonial Office in November, 1877; but no notice was taken of it further than an acknowledgment to the forwarder. Had the wrongs of these poor people been inquired into at the time, it is probable that much misery and bloodshed might have been averted. But the cry of the helpless was disregarded.

The country called Griqualand was, as above noted, chiefly occupied by Griquas; but here and there were villages of Bechuanas, acknowledging the authority of the Griqua chief. Many of the Griquas had received titles to their farms from their chief. These they were now called upon to prove in an English Court, and Griqualand became proverbial for landjobbing. The Bechuana squatters, many of whom had been born in the country, who could show no title except that of occupancy and permission of the chief, had to go where they could to make room for English and Dutch farmers, and those in the villages lived in constant fear of being turned out. In Yank's country a great deal of the land was divided into farms and allotted to Europeans, and the natives compelled to turn

The yoke of English rule began to galling. The law was administered to natives through the medium of the English language. They were at the mercy of Civil Commissioners and agents; the avowed intention of many of whom was to get rid of the 'niggers' as soon as possible. The expenses connected with the processes of law were to natives ruinous, and to get justice was almost impossible, except, perhaps, at Kimberley. I myself happened on one occasion to go into one of these courts, presided over by a British magistrate. A number of natives were being tried for cattle stealing. What was said in English had to be translated through two different languages before the men could understand what was said to them. They were evidently terrified by the surroundings of the court. One was spoken to by the magistrate. He said something to the prisoner next him, and was told to be silent. Another one was spoken to, and he turning, according to native custom, to speak to another, a policeman was ordered to strike him over the head. They were condemned to twelve months' hard labor, 'Not,' said he of the law, turning to those in court, 'that there was any evidence to convict, but because he was morally certain that they were guilty.' The cattle of the natives were impounded, and the pound-master could take the best of the herd to pay himself and damages. Others were obliged to mortgage their wagons and their lands to pay debts into which they had been drawn by landjobbing store and canteen keepers, or to pay the charges of agents. Some in Griqualand were made drunk by these land-sharks, and while in that state signed away their lands on papers prepared for the occasion. To appeal to the natives, to say that they were the victims of the way in which things were managed.

In 1878 war broke out. The natives rose with the determination of destroying every European in the country; they were joined by many living in the country round Kuruman who had learned to hate the English. A few Europeans were murdered, the rest barely escaped. Desolation came upon the country, and had it not been for the personal kindness of Colonels Lanyon and Warren it would have been even worse. Hundreds of natives were killed, and their property to the value, it was said, of sixty or seventy thousand pounds fell into the hands of the volunteers. Numbers were taken to prison, where many of them died; their families were left to do the best they could in the deserts and mountains; their wives and daughters were the prey of a set of brutal Kaffirs and Zulus who attended the volunteers as allies and helpers. Some there were who deserved punishment, but they were few as compared with the many innocent who suffered.

And while the future of the Transvaal and Zululand is being discussed, Bechuana land deserves attention too. Is it to be proclaimed British territory? and, if so, what is to be done with the natives? Or are they to be left alone? Are they still to be pursued by drink-sellers and landjobbers? Or are they to receive something like just consideration at the hands of Christian England?

Hoping you will excuse my trespassing so far upon your space, I remain, &c.

Compound Sea-animals.—In latitude 30° N., we encountered an immense shoal of compound Salpæ, which were no less remarkable from their interesting and most singular forms and structures, than from their abundance and the vast area over which they spread. In the water they were perfectly transparent but for two pink linear bodies and a yellowish brown canal, which seemed to gain brilliancy of tint from being seen through some depth of blue sea. These Salpæ were united in sets of various numbers by a rectangular gelatinous pedicle, which sprung from the inner side of the body, and met a similar pedicle in another individual, and sometimes a single Salpæ floating, and sometimes two, three, four and so on to eleven or twelve, which were united together in such manner as to present the appearance of a carpel as an orange. They floated by immense numbers, usually in an oblique position but without any great apparent locomotive powers.

Upon withdrawing one of these clusters from the water, I found that the individuals were united by a knife-like edge at the extremity of each pedicle, which readily separated, so that the compound animal very easily becomes detached and independent. This counted for the various numbers in the group which I had observed. Each individual in every respect precisely like the other, each consisted of a tough bag of transparent jelly, open at each end, through which water freely flowed. The apertures were large and gaping, and opened alternately, admitting and expelling the water—the opening at the upper end of the animal, which admitted the water, being of a distinctly valvular character. In nearly every one of the animals I found a small crustacean (Hyperichthys) which swam freely about in the cavity of their body, and seemed perfectly at home there—not probably taken as a prey, but voluntary tenant, which could swim in and out of the Salpæ at pleasure. Few Salpæ were without one of these, which was distinctly visible through the transparent wall of the body—so transparent that when placed in a white dish the whole animal became visible, but for the three colored structures which they all contained.

For eleven days we passed through shoals of these compound Salpæ. During the eleven days we passed over eleven degrees latitude, or nearly 800 miles, during the greater part of which they were thickly abundant.

While watching these animals, I once saw two magnificent objects, which I took to be clusters of chain Salpæ, and which were truly wonders of the deep. One of these consisted of five or six large bodies, each of a brilliant and delicate green color, and with a rich ruby spot which shone in the water carbuncles. The other was a long convoluted and delicate chain, which might be compared to a necklace of diamonds set with brilliant rubies, the whole waving gracefully in the currents of the water.—Collingwood's Log of a Naturalist.

African Pitfalls.—It is not difficult to detect the pitfalls after one's attention has been called to them; but in places where they are careful to carry the earth off to a distance and a person is not thinking of such thin a sudden descent of nine feet is an experience not easily forgotten by the traveller. The sations of one thus instantaneously swallowed up by the earth are peculiar. A momentary suspension of consciousness is followed by a rustling sound of a shower of sand and dry grass, and the half-bewildered thought of where he is, and how he came into darkness, reason awakes to assure him that he must have come down through that small opening where a hippopotamus ought to have been, and that he is now in a descent of a hippopotamus pitfall is easy. Like that of Avernus, but to get out again into the upper air is a work of labor. The sides are smooth and treacherous, and the cross reefs which support the covering, break in the attempt to get out by clutching them. A cry from the depths is unheard by those around, and it is only by repeated and most desperate efforts that the buried alive can regain the world. At Tette we were told of a white hunter of unusually small stature, who had slipped into a pit while staking a gamecock on a tree. It was the labor of an entire afternoon to get out; and he was congratulating himself on his escape, and brushing off clay from his clothes, when down he went a second pit, which happened, as is often the case, to be close beside the first, and it was evening before he could work himself out.

Elephants and buffaloes seldom return to the river by the same path on two successive days, they become so apprehensive of danger from this human art. An old elephant will walk in advance of the herd, and uncover pits with his trunk, that the others may see the openings and tread on firm ground. All elephants are generally the victims; rarely is it the males, and very rarely do they carry in their trunks up, trying every day for fancied danger, which often, in the night, lies at his feet. The tusker, fearing to keep his trunk down, and warned in this by that exquisitely sensitive organ, takes to his ways.—D. Livingston.

St. Gothard Tunnel. The parties who were working on the two opposite sections of the great tunnel met on the 28th of 2nd mo.

The calculations of the engineers as to the depth of the galleries were found to be correct—the two sections meeting each other as expected—but the distance was about 200 feet less than was calculated.

The piercing of the longest tunnel in the world has thus been achieved in seven years and five months—a rapidity of execution quite unprecedented, for relatively to its length the Gothard has been bored in a fourth of the time occupied in the boring of the Haenstein tunnel, and in less than half the time taken by the Mont Cenis. This great advance in the tunnel-driving is due to the more exact application of machinery, and above all the efficiency of the air compressors invented by Professor Culladon, of Geneva. The perforators, actuated by these compressors, perform their work with marvellous swiftness, and in 24 hours one machine drills 26 holes 1.20 metres deep in a face of rock some two metres thick. The holes are then filled with dynamite, and fired, every explosion discharging some two and a half cubic metres of rock. The point of attack for the perforators is always the upper part of the finished tunnel, and the floor of the passage they are cutting being afterward blasted and wrought up by hand to the required level. The locomotives used in the tunnel are moved by compressed air, and ventilation is provided from the same source. Horses are also used for dragging the wagons, but, owing to the intense heat and closeness, the mortality is very great. Out of a stud of forty ten die on an average every month. The men working the labor is very trying, and they are compelled to take frequent holidays. Great circumspection has had to be exercised in the admission of outsiders to the galleries, as a walk of several miles in the stifling heat and in a tainted atmosphere might easily prove fatal to persons with weak hearts or a tendency to congestion of the brain, and even the healthy who venture in for the first time have often occasion to regret their temerity.

The scene in the interior of the tunnel is weird in the extreme; the pitchy darkness, relieved only by the glare of a few lamps, the shrieking of locomotives, the blowing of horns, the tramp of horses, the vibration of the perforators, the explosion of mines, the continual passing of heavily-laden wagons, the groups of naked men plying pick-axe, spade and shovel—all these mingled together create an impression never to be forgotten. The completion of the work, now that the two galleries are joined and a free circulation of air is established, will be comparatively easy. The winter, and the entire system of which it is engineering triumph of which the St. Gothard summation, though a peaceful, has not been a bloodless one. Between sixty and seventy men have been killed by the premature explosion of mines, and many more have been seriously injured.

I have but one wish respecting myself in time past, and but one for time forward; that I had been, and that I may be, singly observant of, and devoted to, the manifestations of the divine will, comprehends all my desires at present. As to all temporal enjoyments or sufferings, "thy will, O my great and gracious God I be done forever," is all I ask about them.—J. Scott.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 24, 1880.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

The approach of the period when the Church assembles to make its annual investigation into the condition of its branches, and to perform the other duties connected with the holding of a Yearly Meeting, brings to the minds of many of its members a sense of serious responsibility, a pressure of concern, and a desire that the Head of the Church Himself might bless the occasion to the promotion of his own cause, and endue the living members of the body with the Spirit of wisdom. The general prevalence of such an exercise is itself an evidence of Divine favor, and tends to prepare those who patiently abide under it for the right performance of the various services that may be required of them.

Though our meetings of latter time have often been favored seasons, yet a feeling has prevailed that there were too many among us who were captivated by worldly allurements, which did not fully come up to the standard of the heart-searching, cross-bearing, regenerating doctrine taught by our Saviour to his disciples when personally on earth; and which He still teaches to those who listen to and obey with earnest devotion his voice in their hearts. The prevalence of this feeling was indicated by the exercise that spread over the Meeting for Sufferings as shown by the minutes of the sitting just previous to the Yearly Meeting. It was manifested also in the communications of some of the ministers in the Select Yearly Meeting on Seventh-day (4th mo. 17th).

Soon after the opening minute of the Yearly Meeting was read on Second-day morning, the 19th inst., a Friend arose and expressed a concern for the younger members of our Yearly Meeting, that they might be awakened to greater earnestness and concern for their individual salvation, and that they might be brought nearer in feeling to their older Friends. He proposed holding a meeting for worship at 3 o'clock on Third-day afternoon, (20th inst.) for the younger and middle aged members. The concern was fully united with, and receiving also the cordial concurrence of the Women's Meeting, the meeting was accordingly appointed.

The minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were then read.

It appeared from these that a concern had arisen in that body on account of the evil effects of intemperance, which had resulted in the preparation of an "Address on Intoxicating Drinks," and setting forth the subject in a persons," and especially on the organized churches of the land, the duty of bearing a consistent testimony against the use of such drinks. The distribution of the document had been entrusted to a committee who had gone pretty thoroughly and systematically into the work, and had sent it to members of Legislatures, lawyers, editors, directors of charitable institutions, physicians, ministers of different religions denominations, teachers and other influential persons. Of the 26,000 copies printed, about 20,000 had thus been scattered over the land. They had also been published in full in a periodical which circulated largely among religious teachers, and which has about 46,000 subscribers. This committee are still prosecuting their labors.

Of the Book of Advice of the Yearly Meeting, 2,500 copies have been printed; nearly all of which had been distributed among our members by the different Monthly Meetings.

The Report of the Book Committee showed that much labor had been bestowed on the important service committed to its care, of keeping up a supply of the approved writings of our Society, and spreading them abroad so as to make known to others the spiritual views of Gospel truth which we hold. Donations of books had been made to various public libraries on this continent, and to one in the island of Japan—to the libraries of Monthly Meetings of Friends—to individuals for distribution in their respective neighborhoods, and to ministers of other denominations. The largest distribution in any one State, was probably that in North Carolina, where a recent visit of one of the members of the Book Committee had made known a want of Friends' books, and a desire to receive them, which called for a willing and liberal response. The field embraced in these labors was a wide one, including Canada, California, New Mexico, and many of the intervening States and territories, as well as some points beyond the ocean.

The total distribution reported, not including the 20,000 copies of "Address on Intoxicating Drinks," which was under the charge of a separate committee, was 5,212 books and 2,353 pamphlets. During the year the Memoirs of Daniel Wheeler had been stereotyped. In this the text of the original London edition was followed without change.

The outline made on account of books and stereotype plates during the year, after deducting the money received for books sold, was $5,523.42, and the estimated value of the stock on hand was $19,409.66. For the information of those not members of the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia, it may be stated that this does not include a distribution of 155,284 tracts and more than 20,000 books and pamphlets published by the Tract Association, nor of 3573 Bibles and Testaments issued by the Bible Association.

These associations of Friends do not make any report of their proceedings to the Yearly Meeting.

The material had been collected for a new edition of the Book of Discipline, by examining the Minutes of the Yearly Meeting since the date of the last edition, and extracting therefrom those regulations and advices which were proper to be introduced. One of the paragraphs so selected had been taken from an epistle of the Yearly Meeting, and not from a formal minute; and it was thought the Yearly meeting would make use of it. This had prevented the printing of the book.

During the year, assistance towards the erection or repair of three meeting-houses had been given out of the funds in the hands of the trustees of Charleston Estate; $250 in the limits of Ohio; $300 in Baltimore, and $500 in North Carolina Yearly Meeting.

The Meeting for Sufferings had at different times been brought under exercise on account of the weakened condition of our Society, as to a faithful upholding of those spiritual views of worship and ministry which were so prominent in the teaching of its early members. This lapsed state is manifested by the spread of what are called Missionary movements among us, and in other ways. It had also been felt, that there was a want of a more fervent individual concern among many, for their own salvation, and for the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom in the earth, first in their own families, and then among all with whom they were associated. This concern had extended also to the church in its collective capacity; and it desired that it might not hold back from the discharge of duty called for by its holy Head, and thus be preserved from that weakness and loss of the Divine favor, which are incurred by unfaithfulness.

The proceedings of the Meeting for Sufferings were very satisfactory to the Yearly Meeting, and they were encouraged to continued faithfulness. The labors of the Book Committee were referred to by several Friends, and our younger members were exhorted to render themselves familiar with the writings of the early members of the Society, particularly with Barclay's Apology. Several testimonies to its value and good influence were borne by some who could speak from experience of the effect it produced upon themselves.

A Committee was appointed to propose two Friends to represent the Yearly Meeting in the Meeting for Sufferings in the place of Charles Evans, and Charles Williams deceased. The Meeting for Sufferings was directed to insert in the Book of Discipline the paragraph on Love and Unity, noted in their minutes as having been taken from an epistle to another Yearly Meeting.

The revision of the regulations of the Discipline on the subject of Marriage, was referred to a large Committee, carefully to examine, and report their judgment to a future meeting.

The appointment of a Committee to settle the Treasurer's account, was the only other business transacted at this sitting. It was a comfortable season, in which the dignity of the Meeting was well preserved, and it was enabled to attend to what came before it with harmony, and under a proper feeling of the solemnity of the occasion.

We propose continuing the account of the proceedings of the Yearly Meeting in our next number.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The value of the refined petroleum exported from this country during last month was $1,977,968; and for the nine months ending at this time, $26,250,000.

An earthquake occurred in San Francisco on the 14th inst., said to have been the severest for many years. The motion was vertical, and buildings rocked visibly. The Nevada block apparently swung a foot from the perpendicular.

At the Pennsylvania Steel Works, near Harrisburg, an accident occurred on the 15th, by which two men were fatally, and five others seriously burned. The machinery containing a large machine of molten metal broke, and the retort was turned upside down.

In the pension office on the 1st inst., 3000 pension arrears cases remained unadjudicated. The total amount already disbursed on account of these pensions is $24,500,000, and the number of claims on file is 250,000.

A heavy rain, followed by high winds, occurred in southern and central Ohio on the 16th inst. Buildings were unroofed, steeples blown down, and vehicles on the streets and roads overturned. On the line of the Central Pacific Railroad, a severe snow storm has prevailed for several days. Trains are blocked near Englewood Gap, the snow sheds between that place and Cisco being broken down. In Wisconsin the severest storm of the season raged on the 16th. Several inches of snow fell in the northern part of the State.

There is great scarcity of hay and fodder in Nova Scotia, especially in the eastern counties, and in some places the cattle are dying for want of food.

The Chippewa delegation recently on a visit to Washington, have agreed to settle in severality on a portion of their reservation; the rest of it will be sold, and the proceeds held as a trust fund for them.

The Indian Agent, H. H. H. has concluded an agreement with the Lower Brule Sioux, by which the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad company is permitted to run a line through their reservation to the Black Hills.

Immigrants are flocking to this country much as they did before the panic of 1873, which temporarily closed up the avenues to employment. Three times as many arrived at New York the first quarter of this year, as did last. Most of the immigrants are said to be either skilled workmen or are going to western farms. A large number of them are from Great Britain.

Markets, &c.—U. S. bonds were dull; the only advance being in the 4<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub> Sixes, 1881, 105; 5's, registered, 102; do. coupon, 103; 4's, 100; 4's, 107. Trade is less active in some departments, and prices of many classes of goods are notably lower.

Wool.—The market dull, inactive, and trade is almost at a standstill. Ohio, fine, 55 a 57 cts.; comb a 60 a 62 cts.; do. coarse, 57<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub> cts. Purchases are reported of unshorn wool in some of the Western States, at 40 a 45 cts.

Flour.—The market is dull, and prices favor buyers. Minnesota extras, 55-57; do. best, 58; Penna. family, 57 a $6; do. western, $6 a $6.50, patent, 56.75 a $7. Rye flour is dull at $4.37<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub> a $4.50. Feed is firm—5 of six cars winter bran at $24 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat dull and prices lower. Sales 30,000 bushels at $1.31 for red, $1.32 for amber, 100 per gallon. Corn, 53 a 54 cts. per bushel. Rye, 87 cts. per bush for white, $1.55 per bush for mixed and yellow; white, 4 53 cts. Oats, 42 cts. for mixed, and 44 a 46 cts. a bushel for white.

Seeds.—Clover rather firmer. Sales at 6<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub> a 7 cts. per lb.; flaxseed, $1.75 a $1.80, and timothy, 93 a 7 cts. per bushel.

Straw.—Prime timothy, 90 a 95 cts. per 100 pounds; mixed, 80 a 85 cts.; straw, $1.15 a $1.20 100 pounds.

FOREIGN.—At a meeting of the Dublin Manufacturing Committee on the 15th, letters were read stating that the distillate in the mountains of Montana, which had been discovered, was not received, they would like to appeal to the Government for aid. Their request amount to £139,137; the amount expended to £104,169.

The ex-Empress Eugenie has arrived at Cape Town, South Africa.

The freedom of the City of Cork was given Paul on the 14th, in honor of his labors in America on behalf of the distressed Irishmen.

An inquiry by the Board of Trade into the circumstances of the disaster to the steamer Montana, which recently went on the rocks at Cook's Bay, Holyhead, resulted in the suspension of the captain for months, for neglecting to use the lead.

The Cardinal Archbishop of Paris, has protested against the decrees concerning unauthorized congregations. He says the decrees at present are only a means to avoid the evils which he is to be feared they lead to painful conflicts between law and conscience, and that France may enter upon a period of int troubles of which no man can see the end.

French Prospects.—The value of imports and exports for the first quarter of 1880, shows an increase of twelve million francs as compared with the corresponding months last year.

Germany.—The army bill has passed a third time in the Reichstag, by a vote of 156 to 128. The universal military conscription, exempting priests from serving the army reserve, was previously adopted.

The great international physics exhibition is opened this week.

Russia.—In reference to the famine in Orenburg, Colon learns that there are thousands of families who are perishing, and that it means to earn it, as is a security of work as well as food.

Russia is about to issue, through the Rothschild new railway loan of £15,000,000.

Turkey.—Another commission of five physicians has been appointed to finally decide upon the sanitary measures of the Russian officers. The Russian representative at Constantinople has sent a note to the demanding that the proceedings be at once brought to a conclusion consistent with justice, and declaring Russia will hold the Porte responsible, if he should escape or further outrages be committed.

Notes of Travel in Europe.

Florence, 11th month.—After several days of settlement, we have finally established ourselves at an American "Pension," where we had a very pleasant party, perhaps forty or fifty in number, almost all Americans, from Boston, New York and Washington. Our tent is from Boston, but has lived in Florence twenty-one years. Our house adjoins the Palace of the Prince Borghese, three rooms which are rented for the use of the boarders, a drawing room was intended for the mansion of the princess Pauline Borghese, the beautiful and favorite sister of Napoleon, but died six months after its completion, and is now occupied by it. It is a large, lofty room, with a frescoed ceiling representing Aurora the flying Hours. The walls are divided into landscape; the two windows at the rear looking on a terrace where orange trees, roses and flowers fill the air with fragrance. The room is also beautifully frescoed and ornamented, but we would cheerfully resign of its splendor for a little more comfort, a room though of moderate size, is very comfortable, and we find it impossible to make it more; the little corner fire place smokes, and wood, though placed on andirons adorned with most classic heads, will not burn. How the door opens on the saloon where our tent has provided an American sheet-iron bed, imported from Boston, so that on the whole, we are very comfortable. A number of Italian dishes greeted us at the table d'hôte; American breakfasts were in great favor, but we had been most interested during the intervals, between the courses at table, by our neighbors, the Baroness de Veitinghoff, her daughter, the Russian ladies from Odessa, the daughter, is a sweet young girl of sixteen, and amuses herself by pouring into our ear her opinion of the many nationalities as met with in the seven years she has been traveling for her education. Her English is really extraordinary; but she speaks almost too much precision. She did not know Russia, nor wish to talk about her native country, though I often asked her to describe me. "Oh! you know it is one vast plain in the South, with great fields of grain; I do like it, and never wish to see it again." She had a soft, low voice, and the wide Tartar eyes of her country.

Baroness de Veitinghoff is a direct descendant of John Sobieski, the best and greatest of the kings of Poland, and the long antagonism between Russia and Poland may be traced to the indifference the daughter of John Sobieski shows towards the former country. One day we spoke of Julienne Krudener, the Lady Guyon of Russia, and Marie told me she was a great aunt of her father's, her name previous to her marriage to Baron Von Krudener, having been Julienne de Veitinghoff. She was for a time an intimate friend of Madame de Staël, and lived amid a great deal of fashionable dissipation, but having adopted the views of the Pietists, she afterwards gave herself up to preaching the gospel, and prophesying. She had great influence over the mind of Alexander I. of Russia, her sovereign, who heard her preach in Paris in 1815, when it was occupied by the Allies. So great was his confidence in her integrity, that he confided his most important affairs to her religious judgment, but she had enemies who were jealous of her influence in this high quarter, and who finally brought about a complete estrangement.

I do not know whether I can quite say with the poet, that

"Of all the fairest cities of the earth,
None more my heart has ever loved,
Of purest ray, a treasure for a casket!"

But who that has seen Florence from Bella Guardia or Fiesole, can deny that one of the loveliest cities of the world lies at his feet! As viewed from those two points, the Arno is seen winding through the city, dividing it into distinct parts, and spanned by many bridges—some of which are famous in song and story. Then, too, this "gem of purest ray" has such an exquisite setting of amethyst and purple hills, stretching far as the eye can reach, the more distant flashing white in the sun, with a slight covering of snow—it is indeed a noble picture.

A drive to Fiesole has left with us many pleasant memories. The morning was very fine, a dreamy mist resting on the distant hills, but the air was too cold to remind us of our Indian summer. Taking the Protestant cemetery on our way, we stopped a few minutes to stand by the grave of Elizabeth Barrett Browning—a plain monument supported by four pillars, a profile of her face in relief has been cut upon the marble, which also bears the initials of her name. Fresh bouquets were lying upon the tomb, showing that her memory is precious to perhaps both English and American visitors, who look upon her grave. Theodore Parker and many others here rest, who have come in search of health and have found a grave.

This cemetery lies in the immediate environs of the city, and contains some beautiful monuments, but the lavish art of Italian burying places is less consonant with my feelings than are the grass, the flowers, the trees and the peaceful quiet of the German and Swiss cemeteries. The road to Fiesole was very good, passing among handsome villas and gardens bright with parterres of flowers. Old olive trees leaned over the stone walls on either side, cactus hid the rudeness of the rocks, and the views were at times magnificent over the Val d'Arno.

The old church building of San Domenico, at Fiesole, interested us as once the residence of Fra Angelico, whose Madonnas are noted for their celestial beauty. Fra Angelico is said to have had so high a regard for the sanctity of his work, that he never began a painting without previously making it the subject of many prayers. He is also said never to have dipped his brush into his paint, without a prayer for guidance! Books in his day were very rare, so that painting was a vehicle of instruction to the poorer classes, and as such was deemed by the religious friars to be a sacred work. Beggars here abound as in almost every Catholic country, and it was exasperating to find when we sat down to gaze from the summit of the hill overlooking one of the fairest scenes in Europe, that we must wave off troops of sturdy beggars, and chaffer with as many women dealers in their plaited straw baskets, whose wares we were forced to buy outlook doubtless, Milton had gazed upon the wondrous scene spread far and wide below, when in his youth he visited Galileo. Drawing from his rich stores of travelled memories he describes the shield of Satan as

"Like the moon whose orb
Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views
At evening, from the top of Fiesole,
Or in Valdarno, to descry new lands,
Rivers and mountains, in her spotty globe."

A visit to the Uffizi gallery of paintings and statuary was one teeming with interest. This gallery originated with the Medici, who owe their earliest distinction to success in commerce, and the liberal spirit with which they devoted their wealth to purposes of general utility. The Medici enjoyed almost regal power for several centuries, and obtained absolute rule over Tuscany in the 16th century. Cosmo was a most munificent patron and successful cultivator of art and literature; and did more than any sovereign in Europe to revive the study of the ancient classics, and to foster a taste for mental culture. He assembled around him the learned men of every nation, and by his foundation of an academy for the study of the philosophy of Plato, and a library of Greek, Latin and oriental manuscripts, he opened a new era in modern learning and art. His grandson, Lorenzo the Magnificent, succeeded to absolute power in the State, and founded academies for the study of classical learning, filled his gardens with collections of the remains of ancient art, while he broke down the forms of constitutional independence his predecessors had suffered to exist. To turn the tide of voluptuous refinement and stem the current of corruption by an asectic severity of morals, arose Savonarola and others, whose appeals to the people in favor of a popular and democratic form of government threatened for a time the overthrow of the Medici. Savonarola's martyrdom restored order and tranquillity to Florence, and left the Medici in possession of absolute power, but the republican aspirations of the people were crushed, and their morals at the same time still further degraded. So true it is, and still remains to be, that "art alone cannot render man more intellectual, since the calling of art is to render sensuous the spiritual, to embody pure thought in lines, colors and proportions," and it has been well said by the late Pope, "The Vatican Italian Pope, is an illustration of how little mere love of beauty can do for a people." "Excessive tendency to the cultivation of the beautiful contributes to the enervation and destruction of all strong character in a nation." "There is just now a great clamor and demand for culture, but it is not so much culture that is needed as discipline." "Our public amusements are a true index to the character of our people, and those popular among us indicate that America is being enervated and demoralized, as the gladiatorial shows indicated that Rome was being brutalized, and it is difficult to say which is worse, this modern softening of the brain or that ancient ossification of the heart." "Modern culture is in danger of following Grecian and Roman, by cultivating unduly the aesthetic nature to the neglect of the intellectual and moral. Literary and cultivated classes are always likely to shape themselves more by Beauty than by Truth, more by Art than by Philosophy and Religion." "The Religion than with its truth." "History teaches one plain and mournful lesson, that man cannot safely be left to his luxurious tendencies, be they of sense or soul. There must be austerity somewhere. There must be a strong head and a sound heart somewhere."

The Literary Essays of Prof. William Shedd, from which we have extracted the above, should be read by many who are in danger of being carried away by the modern manias for art-culture.

Memoir of Hannah Marsh.

BY HER DAUGHTER, PRISCILLA FITT.

Some extracts are here introduced from her letters, and from memoranda found among her papers.

The following letter has no memorandum attached to show to whom it was sent, nor is the date affixed.

"In feelings of dear and tender love I take up my pen to express, though it may be but feebly, somewhat of the desires which have often-times flowed in my heart towards thee, who am myself but a weak, frail and younger sister, and increasingly am made sensible of my entire helplessness and incapacity for any good word or work, often experiencing the language of the apostle, 'By the grace of God I am what I am.' Well, my endeared brother, seeing that it is by grace we are saved through faith and that not of ourselves, it is the gift of God, it is in this saving grace I wish particularly thy attention to be increasingly turned, and thy susceptible heart led; then I have often had to believe thou wouldst have to walk in a narrower path; and be made (may I not say if obedience kept pace with knowledge) an example to the believers in faith, in word, and in doctrine. What a great responsibility, I have often thought, does it involve such as thyself; blessed with amiable qualities and a good natural understanding, endowed with gifts and graces far above many! How have I often desired they might be employed to the use of the great and good Giver. Surely it is a fearful thing to possess the friendship and good opinion of one's friends, and yet on the other hand, what an opportunity does it afford, to let thy light so shine among men that others seeing thy good works may glorify their Father who is in Heaven. Then my dear brother, let me encourage thee to yield to every little manifestation of duty, and become increasingly willing to be, to do, or to suffer, the whole [will] of God concerning thee, thinking nothing too near or too dear to part with, either in dress or address, for the sake of Him who suffered so much for us, and left the bosom of his Father and became the obedient unto death, even the death of the cross; and let us remember for our encouragement, the language, 'Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life.'

Her affectionate solicitude for a beloved daughter is manifested in the letter which follows—dated 11th mo. 1st, 1840.

"11th mo. 1st, '40.

"My beloved Hannah,—I know not where the following sentence is to be met with, but it has dwelt so much on my memory the last week or two, and being in such accordance with my feelings, that my thoughts are frequently turned towards thee, that I am ready to think they may be suitably handed thee.

"'He lives who lives to God alone, and all are dead beside.' Too many, alas, may be said to be spiritually dead.

"Now in order to be happy here and hereafter, we must know what it is to live to God, for alas! too many live as without Him in the world, even though they make much profession as to what they believe and know of the truth; yet they are perhaps unconscious what strong hold self has upon them, seeking to indulge and gratify self in various ways, so that self may well be styled the many-headed monster, and whilst it is kept alive in us, we cannot live to our Maker nor promote his glory. But it is not only our duty, but our highest interest to live unto God; for those who do so, cannot fail at the same time to live to the good of others, and their un-speakable peace, because their mind is under such good regulation that it flows with love and good-will towards all, and therefore truly lives, because their own corrupt nature gradually dies away, which before has killed the pure life in them; and this, my precious Hannah, is what I want thee to come to experience, even that thou mayst know a death unto sin and a new birth unto righteousness. It is declared in Scripture, 'Ye must be born again; the old nature, which is corrupt, must be done away, the axe must be laid to the root of the corrupt tree; for if the tree be corrupt, the fruit will naturally be corrupt also; a good tree is known by its fruit.' Therefore so long as we carry about with us our corrupt, unregenerate nature, we can never be happy, because in that state we are not living unto God. Now, my dear Hannah, I seem as if I must again express my tender solicitude for thy growth in grace, that the little seed of the kingdom, which mercifully been sown in thy heart, may take deep root downwards; which will bring thee near many of thy former friends and acquaintances, I do sincerely desire thou mayst hold fast that thou hast received, that thou mayst take thy crown; but in order to this thou must be watchful. 'Be watchful at all times, that ye may not lose the things that remain, that ye may be ready to die.' If, when in their company, thou maintains thy confidence and art perfectly satisfied in the Lord, secretly putting up aspirations unto Him for preservation, I will not fail to help and strengthen thee; and if his pure fear is constantly before thee; if He will take the fear of man away from thee, how deeply instructive is it to observe, that one so highly favored of the Lord and eminently gifted and of large experience was the royal Psalmist, yet how very oft after recounting the wonderful dealings of Almighty to his soul, he had again and again to be brought down into the very depths of humiliation, and was given to see, that whilst he was constantly upon the way, he was liable to fall. 'Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips.' But that he had great need also to wait upon the Lord. 'My soul doth wait for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning; yea I say, more than they that watch for morning.' And we have abundant evidence that all those who rightly wait, do not yet in vain, but their spiritual strength is renewed every day. Therefore, my precious Hannah, there is abundant encouragement for thee to take hold of this offered help, which thou hast been again and again made sensible is in love and mercy extended to thee; and then I live on thy return home thou wilt find things which appear now like mountains, they will flow down at the presence of the Lord. Therefore my dear, let me again encourage thee to give up thy heart unto the Lord, and He will love thee, and teach thee to go. Yea, He will lead thee about, instruct thee. If thou wilt but open heart to let Him come in; leave room even for Him and not let it be too much occupied with other guests so that there is not room enough left for this heavenly visitor, who has long been waiting to take up his abode there, I believe thou wilt experience a portion of his blessed peace. 'Thou wilt keep his perfect peace whose mind is stayed on Thee, because he trusteth in Thee.' So wilt thou mercifully enabled to go on thy way rejoicing. 'Well dear H., if these things really in due place in thy mind, I believe it will be visible in thy countenance and deportment, so wilt thou be likely to cast a good savor around thee, even like a little salt, which is not lost in its savor; and like the little leaven which will have a leavening tendency on the round thee, and enable thee in life and conversation to hold forth the encouraging language, 'Come, taste, and see, how good the Lord is.' One observation more I can have forbear, and which claims thy serious consideration. It is chiefly grounded on the love and pure fear of Almighty God, which casts out all other fear, especially the fear man, which bringeth a snare; and without we live in the fear of the Lord we may rest assured of this truth: that we do not love Him above all; as it is written in the Scriptures, 'He that feareth is not made perfect in love; for perfect love casteth out fear, because fear hath torment.' And I have often believed that the fear of what others may think of thee if thou yields to the little, gentle, but clear intimations of truth in thy own mind, has been a great hindrance to thee in thy spiritual progress; but this may dear will not do, and I hope the past time may suffice, and that thou will be encouraged to take hold of the offered help and go on thy way rejoicing; as all must happily do who have but the one grand end in view, living to the glory of God and the salvation of their own souls. May the language spoken recently, in what I apprehend to be uttered in true Gospel authority, be brought instructively to thy remembrance. Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.

"With endeared love, I AM thy very affectionate mother, HANNAH MARSH."

For "The Friend."

Friends' Meeting House and Lot in Charleston, South Carolina.

"By letters from John Kirk, the agent formerly appointed by the Trustees in Pennsylvania, dated in 6th mo. 1805, they were formed that one of the Trustees in South Carolina had called on him in the same year, to the Deed and had not returned it; also that said Trustees extended no care towards a property, but had gotten from him all the money which was in his hands belonging to that estate. As the meetings of Friends in South Carolina had after this period, become generally dissolved, and the members mostly moved from the State, and Friends in Philadelphia being informed that the property in Charleston received little or no attention except from John Kirk, and that the Trustees acted so remote as to have scarcely any knowledge of its state; also that unless more attention and exertion were used, it might possibly quite lost to the Society; it was judged absolutely needful that those Trustees should convey to Friends in or near Philadelphia, at immediate measures might be taken to secure the estate. Accordingly a Deed reconveying the said estate was executed in the month, 1812, by Nebo Gaunt and others, Thomas Wistar and others residing in or near Philadelphia, and presented to the Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia in the 1st mo. 1813, — the said Trustees holding it for some use and benefit as originally specified; and indeed neither they nor any meeting could appropriate it to any other use than that for which it was at first obtained and intended.

"Friends in North Carolina say, in one of our letters dated 11th mo. 1817, that their early Meeting had appointed certain friends receive from our [Philadelphia] Trustees a conveyance of the property, and that the committee of their Yearly Meeting were directed to make sale of it. In the reply to them, under date of 5th mo. 1818, the Philadelphia Meeting mention that the estate was intended for the erection of a meeting-house, for the exclusive use and benefit of Friends in South Carolina, and that the Trustees hold precisely for the same purpose originally designated, and that no persons or meeting could change its appropriation. An examination of the deed of trust to Nebo Gaunt and others will fully evince the great fear and care which possessed the minds of Friends at the Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia, lest this property by any unforeseen occurrence should get entangled or be diverted from the express and special intention of Friends in England; for the limitations, restrictions and conditions set forth in this instrument, are such as had never before been made use of in any Deed or conveyance of this estate; and in order to guard the act as much as the Meeting for Sufferings well could, and to make the desire and care of Friends more likely to be fulfilled, the attention of the Yearly Meeting in Carolina is in this deed of trust called to this transaction, that so no improper or inconsiderate transfer should be made; but at the same time without the least hint or the most remote idea that the said Yearly Meeting would imagine that this appropriation it was deeding to them a right to appropriate any part of the property or its proceeds to their interest or enjoyment.

"The conveyance of Nebo Gaunt and others house lot, Ac., returns [the meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia] to the direction of the Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia; the same body, had a care over it for between seventy and eighty years past, [now in 1880, about 120 large sums of money and spent much time where the members of Society may assemble for the performance of Divine worship, and where any of our approved ministers who are sent on the regular Circuit may, without constraint, hold meetings for those under our name or for others more generally.

"The foregoing statement is made out from authentic documents on the files of the Meeting for Sufferings, held in Philadelphia, for Pennsylvania, New Jersey, &c., and is left for the information and right understanding of those that may come after us.

JONATHAN EVANS,

Clerk to the Meeting.

10th month, 1826."

In the year 1853, some Friends of North Carolina Yearly Meeting addressed a communication to the Trustees of the Charleston Meeting property in Philadelphia, requesting that the title to that estate should be again transferred to North Carolina Yearly Meeting for its use.

In their reply to this application, the Trustees rehearse the history of the property as hereinbefore set forth, and show that the Deed made in the year 1796, from the Philadelphia Trustees to those residing in South Carolina, providing that the latter should not convey the estate without the assent of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, was not by any means intended to divert the use of that property from its original purpose of accommodating members of the Society who might reside in Charleston as a place for religious meetings, nor to give North Carolina Yearly Meeting any pecuniary interest in it. That the subsequent Deed, dated in 1812, from the Trustees residing in South Carolina to new Trustees living in Philadelphia, re-transferring the estate to them, was executed under the authority of a Minute of North Carolina Yearly Meeting appointing the last mentioned Trustees, and solely to relieve the latter Yearly Meeting of a trust which they could not readily attend to because of its expense, and replace it in its former custodians, the Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia. The latter meeting at that time reimbursed North Carolina Friends the sum of $450, which they had expended in the care of the property.

The Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia received reports from time to time of the condition of the Meeting in Charleston, which was very small at all times. In 1837 a committee from Philadelphia visited it, and reported that the meeting was only held on First-days, and by but three persons, two of whom were not members. This being mentioned to the Yearly Meeting that year, it was concluded to discontinue it in future. Shortly after this an extensive conflagration took place in the city of Charleston, and in order to stop the spread of the fire the meeting-house was blown up by gunpowder. The dwelling and out buildings in the rear of the meeting-house were rented out for the sum of $100 per annum, and were not destroyed by the fire. These rents have been collected by the Trustees and put out to interest, after defraying the cost of repairs to the tenement and keeping the burial ground and premises in neat order. The gradual accumulation of this rent and interest has been the sole means of raising the fund now in hand.

In the year 1856 the Trustees sent a committee to inspect the property, and consult with the tenant and others concerning the propriety of building a new meeting-house. There were no members of the Society then residing in Charleston or near it at that time.

The only object of rebuilding the meeting-house was to prevent its being destroyed from excommunicating to the State of South Carolina. This course was advised by legal counsel taken there, and accordingly the Meeting for Sufferings, with the approbation of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, erected a brick meeting-house on the site of the former one in the year 1856, at a cost of $3751.46. This house was only opened once for a religious meeting, which was held by appointment of a person whom the tenant of the house supposed to be a travelling Friend. It was burnt in the general fire which occurred in the city in the year 1861, shortly after the breaking out of the rebellion. During the war of course no communication could be had between Friends of Philadelphia and the tenant of the dwelling, which still survived the conflagration and the bombardment. In 1865 correspondence was resumed between the Trustees and Jacob F. Schimer, the tenant. He stated that he had been obliged to leave the house during the war, and asked to be excused from the rent for that period, which was granted.

In the year 1875, two of the Trustees again visited the property, and conferred with Charles G. Meringer, a prominent member of the bar in Charleston, respecting the legal status of the estate. He advised an application to the Legislature for a law authorizing a sale of the property, and a proper disposition of the fund then in hand. These Friends also called at the capital of South Carolina, in Columbia, and had an interview with the Governor on the subject. Upon their return to Philadelphia, the Trustees concluded to petition the Legislature of South Carolina for the passage of an act which is subjoined. This effort was successful, and the bill became a law on the 24th of the 2nd month, 1876. It provides that the Trustees then holding the title to the said meeting house and lot in Charleston, and their successors in office, might sell the whole or any part of the same, and by and with the consent of the Meeting for Sufferings of Friends of Philadelphia should "appropriate the proceeds of such sale or sales, and all or any funds in the hands of said Trustees derived from the rents of the said estate, or any part of the same, or any income which has accrued or may hereafter accrue from the same, for building, furnishing or repairing meeting-houses and their appurtenances, belonging to the Society of Friends, wherever the same may be located in the United States; or for any other similar use or uses. And for this purpose the said Trustees and their successors, and the said Meeting for Sufferings, are hereby vested with a discretionary power of directing the application of the proceeds of the sale of said lot, or any part thereof, and the funds belonging to the said trust estate, in such manner and way as shall seem to said Trustees and said meeting to be best calculated to answer the beneficial purposes of this act." Under the authority of this law, the sum of $6725 has been disbursed by the Trustees, up to this date, for building or repairing fourteen meeting houses of Friends in different parts of the United States, viz: In North Carolina Yearly Meeting, $2125; Ohio, $2750; Philadelphia, $1250; Kan.-as, $300; Baltimore, $300. No part of the land or buildings in Charleston has yet been sold, owing to the depressed condition of real estate there.

The Trustees and the Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia have felt a concern in appropriating this fund, that it should be applied in accordance with the principles and views of the Society are maintained in regard to the modes of worship and simplicity of the buildings and their furniture. Hence some applications, where satisfaction could not be obtained in these respects, have been laid aside; and also in a few cases where divisions in a Yearly Meeting have involved questions of legality in regard to the meetings asking aid, which the Trustees have not felt themselves called upon to decide.

The Hidden Wisdom of God.—The mind of a pious workman, named Thierney, was much occupied with the ways of God, which appeared to him full of inscrutable mysteries. The two questions, "How?" and "Why?" were constantly in his thoughts—whether he considered his own life, or the dispensations of Providence in the government of the world.

One day, in visiting a ribbon manufactory, his attention was attracted by an extraordinary piece of machinery. Countless wheels and thousands of threads were twirling in all directions; he could understand nothing of its movements.

He was informed, however, that all this motion was connected with the centre, where there was a chest which was kept shut. Anxious to understand the principle of the machine, he asked permission to see the interior.

"The master has the key," was the reply. "The words were like a flash of light. Here was the answer to all the perplexed thoughts. Yes, the Master has the key. He governs and directs all. It is enough. What need I know more?" He hath also established them for ever and ever; he hath made a decree which shall not pass."

O, WHY SHOULD THE SPIRIT OF MORTAL BE PROUD?

[The following poem, written by a young Scotchman named William Knox, was a particular favorite with Abraham Lincoln. F. B. Carpenter, the artist, writes that while engaged in painting a picture, at the White House, he was alone one evening with the President in his room, when he said: "There is a poem which has been a great favorite with me for years, which was first shown me when a young man by a friend, and which I afterwards saw and cut from a newspaper and learned it by heart. I would," he continued, "give a great deal to know who wrote it, but have never been able to ascertain it.]

O, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a swift fleeting meteor, a fast flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
Man passes from life to his rest in the grave.

The leaves of the oak and the willow shall fade,
Be scattered around and together be laid,
And the young and the old, and the low and the high,
Shall moulder to dust and together shall die.

The infant, a mother attended and loved;
The mother, that infant's affection who proved;
The husband, that mother and infant who blessed;
Each, all, are away to their dwelling of rest.

The maid on whose cheek, on whose brow, in whose Shone beauty and pleasure—her triumphs are by;
And the memory of those who loved her and praised,
Are alike from the minds of the living erased.

The hand of the king that the sceptre hath borne;
The brow of the priest that the mitre hath worn;
The eye of the sage and the heart of the brave,
Are hid and lost in the depth of the grave,
The peasant whose lot was to sow and to reap,
The herdsman, who climbed with his goats up the steep;

The beggar, who wandered in search of his bread,
Have faded away like the grass that we tread.

The saint who enjoyed the communion of heaven,
The sinner who dared to remain unrepent,
The wise and the foolish, the guilty and just,
Have quietly mingled their bones in the dust.

So the multitude goes, like the flower and weed,
That wither away to let others succeed;
So the multitude comes, ere then those we behold,
To repeat every tale that hath often been told.

For we are the same that our fathers have been;
We see the same sights that our fathers have seen,
We drink the same stream, and we feel the same sun,
And run the same course that our fathers have run.

The thoughts we are thinking, our fathers would think;
From the death we are shrinking, our fathers would shrink;

That which we are clinging, they also would cling,
But it specks from us all like a bird on the wing.

They loved, but their story we cannot unfold;
They grieved, but the heart of the thoughtless is cold;
They grieved, but no wail from their slumbers will come;
They joyed, but the voice of their gladness is dumb.

They died—ay! they died; and we things that are now,
Who walk on the turf that lies over their brow,
Who make in their dwellings a transient abode,
Meet the changes they met on their pilgrimage road.

Yes hope and despondence, and pleasure and pain,
Are mingled together in sunshine and rain;
And the smile and the tear, the song and the dirge,
Still follow each other, like surge upon surge.

'Tis the wink of an eye, 'tis the draught of a breath,
From the bosom of death to the laughter of life,
From the gibbet aloft to the bier and the shroud—
O, why should the spirit of mortal be proud?

THE MIGNONETTE AND THE OAK.

I marked a child—a pretty child,
A gentle blue-eyed thing;
She sowed the scented mignonette
One sunny day in spring;
And while the tiny grains she sowed,
The stream of thought thus sweetly flowed.

"On this dear bed the dew shall fall,
And you bright sun shall shine;
'Twill spring, and grow and blossom then;
And it will all be mine!"
And the fair thing laughed in childish glee,
To think what a harvest her's should be.

I saw a man an acorn plant
Upon the hillside bare;
No spreading branch, no shading rock
Lent friendly shelter there;
And thus as o'er the spot he bow'd
I heard him, for he thought aloud:

"Frail thing! ere glossy leaf shall grace
Thy wide and sturdy bough,
I may be laid amid the dead
As low as thou art now;
Yet will thou rise in rugged strength
And crown this barren height at length."

Each had a hope: the childish heart
Looked to a summer's joy;
The manly thought, strong and mature,
Looks to eternity.

Each trusts to nature's gentle power;
He wants a forest, she a flower.

Who sows the seeds of heavenly truth,
And doubts Almsbury power?
Will years less surely bring the oak
Than months the summer flower?
Then sow, although no fruit you see,
God, "in due time" will raise the tree.

Going to Headquarters.

Before the Reformation in Scotland, a goodly gentlewoman, who had seen her betters, was reduced to the necessity of taking a small moorland farm under the Earl Huntly, ancestor of the Duke of Gordon. In this barren spot the widow and her two sons by their unwearied industry, contrived to glean a scanty subsistence. But, miserably as this dependence was, they were likely to be deprived of it by the practices of a greedy ruthless land servant, or factor, as he is nominated in Scotland. This unfeeling man strained every nerve to dispossess the widow and her orphan children, and adopted as a method to attain his object, raising the real amount beyond their means of paying.

In this emergency she applied to several persons who were said to possess the favor of the Earl; but all in vain. Seeing ruin inevitable, she summoned up resolution to wait his lordship herself. The Earl, who was man of bluff, open, and generous disposition, received her with great kindness, and, after some conversation, found her to be a person of superior sense and worth, and expressed much surprise that the poorest of his cot-far should be occupied by one who had most obviously moved in a higher sphere.

"But," quoth the worthy nobleman, "you must dine with me and my family to-day; I must let them see what sort of stuff is left of one of my tenants is made of."

The astonished widow was very reluctant to accept the invitation; but the Earl would not be denied. She had the good fortune to make herself equally acceptable to the countess and all the family. After dinner she was shown over the castle, and finally was conducted into the chapel, where there was a lack of images. But fearfully scandalous were the feelings of the good woman when, coming in front of the Virgin Mary, she saw her noble hostess and children sink down before it, as if a signal had been given for their immediate prostration. When they had ended their devotions, they were equally astonished at the unbending posture and horrified looks of their heretical guest.

The Earl, who had been absent, now made his appearance. Seeing how matters stood, he asked her how she could be so neglectful of her duty to the Holy Virgin. Where could he find such an all sufficient intercessor for sinful creatures as the blessed mother of our Lord?

"Please your honors," quoth she, "allow me to answer ye in a homely way, but—by your favor—not so far, I reckon, from the subject in hand. Ye well know, my lord, that I have a small farm under your lordship; and for some years hard we had striven, my two boys and myself, to make two ends meet, as our comforts have been, they have been seasoned with content, which is a pleasure, though uncommon, drop in the cup of adversity; but, now we are to be turned out of use and home by a factor who shuts his door to the widow's cry. I, too, have made applications to intercessors of well known power and favor with your honorable lordship. I have applied to little Sandy Gordon, and got neither solace nor satisfaction from him. In short, all has proved vanity and vexation of spirit. Before I and my bairns go forth, the sport of the winds of heaven I know do what I should have done at the out— I apply to the great Gordon himself."

"His judicious and touching appeal produced effect on the noble persons to whom it was made. The widow and her sons obtained a lease of an excellent farm, on a rent very nominal, and it is believed that her dependants enjoy it to this very day.

The common people in Aberdeenshire bemoan the conversion of the Gordon family from the Roman Catholic to the Protestant religion to be in no small degree owing to the above pithy address.—Southern Presbyterian.

Temper at Home—I have peeped into quiet parlors where the carpet is clean and not worn, and the furniture polished and bright; to "rooms" where the chairs are deal and the floor carpetless; into "kitchens" where family life, and the meals are cooked and eaten, and the boys and girls are as blithe as crows in the thatch overhead; and I see that it is not so much wealth, nor learning, nor clothing, nor servants, nor toil, nor idleness, nor tone, nor country, nor rank, nor religion—as town and temper that make life pleasant or miserable, that render home happy or wretched.—Selected.

In the course of a long and varied experience, largely devoted to study and observation, I have learned that there is one rule without exception. Whenever a man is going to make a speech in favor of having more shops, or against any restriction, especially if he is himself a distiller or a brewer, never fails to begin, "I am as ardent and sincere a friend of Temperance as anybody," and when a man begins by saying, "I am an ardent friend of this or that cause, or so and so, or what not," I say to myself, "Now this society is going to have a hard time of it," and I am never disappointed.—Selected.

The Silence of All Flesh.

The following is extracted from a letter written many years ago, and found among the papers of one who was reviewing the accumulated papers of a lifetime.

"I have met with some reflections of a young woman of seventeen, found among her papers after her decease; I think they are worth penning, and will no doubt interest those more than my own composition.

"About a twelve-month ago I remember feeling an inexpressible sweetness and resignation. I think I then knew what is meant by all flesh; a feeling very difficult to attain, but which I am convinced every Christian must strive for until it is attained. For many months past I have believed it my duty to do so—to endeavor to feel a mental stillness, or a total resignation of feeling and cessation of the influence, and in this state to wait for and Truth in the heart. When we attain this stillness, the Holy Spirit directs us what to do, what to pray for, and how to pray; and shows us what vocal supplication is required of us and when secret mental prayer is most acceptable to the Father of Spirits. I have often felt anxious to know what is real religion, and have entreated my heavenly guide to lead me into it, however painful a surrender of heart and life may be; for without that there is no lasting peace to be found; and no preparation for the enjoyment of the Divine Presence in a state of holiness hereafter. I have at different times been desirous to know whether that profession in which I have been educated is the right one for me to retain, and whether I could be any more acceptable to God for me; I never made use of vocal supplications on the subject but I believe my secret prayers were accepted by Him who knows the sincerity in which they were addressed. After waiting to be instructed my desires are at length fully answered, for inward revelation assures me that mine must be a religion of stillness, and total resignation of self; that whether the feeling of devotion excited be that of prayer, praise, gratitude or adoration, I must be immediately influenced by the Spirit of Christ before I can feel union and communion with my heavenly Father which (whether words are used or not) alone constitutes the essence of true worship. I feel convinced that whatever the outward form of worship may be, the only true and acceptable offering is a sacrifice of the heart, and the more I feel of devotional spirit the more I am led to be still, and not look for instrumental aid; for I feel that Christ, the inward teacher and Comforter, is all-sufficient, and that He is waiting to do me good. In these precious moments I should feel my ministry a burden that was not prompted by the immediate inspiration of the Holy Spirit; for any but such ministry must be a burden that inward stillness in which the Divine will is made known to us and heavenly consolation is administered. I often keep silence (mentally) that I may renew my strength, then I mount upward as on eagle's wings." Till within the last year I knew but little of any of this stillness, and my devotion consisted chiefly of supplication and praise, and sometimes of gratitude to the Supreme Being. Now on a bed of sickness, perhaps of death, (being in a very precarious state), I feel confirmed in the assurance that in mental silence only is to be felt that peace and joy and union with our Maker which is and ever will be the Christian's only hope and confidence in the solemn and certain hour of dissolution."

The Meeting at Firbank Chapel and its Results.

As has been already noticed in these sketches, it was not until Thomas Camm was shut up in prison for his testimony to the truth, that he found leisure from his many labors to prepare a memorial of his honored father John Camm, and of his endeared friend John Andland. To his imprisonments and labors some reference was made in the account of his wife Aune. The following outline of his course through life, and of the blessed end of his earthly pilgrimage, crowned with a glorious prospect of eternal felicity, is taken from Piety Promoted.

"Thomas Camm, late of Camskill, in the county of Westmoreland, was born in the year 1641, of honest, religious, and godly parents, was well educated, and from his childhood inclined to be religious, and sought after the best things. He delighted in the company of the best, or most religious sort of people; and in his tender years the Lord was pleased to visit him with the light of the day springing from on high, and thereby convinced him of his blessed and unchangeable truth; even in the morning of the day to these latter ages of the world; and after some time called him forth into the work of the ministry, for which the Lord fitted him. Being thus visited and called of God, he counted nothing too near or too far to follow the Lord, and with his whole strength and substance was given up to serve him, and faithfully to do the work he was called to. The Lord who had called him to such a great and glorious work, as preaching the everlasting gospel, did fitly qualify him for the same, pouring forth upon him of his holy spirit, and endued him with divine wisdom, whereby he was made an able preacher of the word of life to many, and could divide it aright, according to the states of the people.

"As he was thus called and qualified, so he was diligent and laborious in the work of the Lord in many parts of this nation, and was made instrumental to convince and establish many in the way of truth. His doctrine was sound, and his delivery powerful; and though his testimony was not with the enticing words of men's wisdom, yet it was in the demonstration of that divine power, which reached the witness of God in the hearts of the hearers.

"Great and many were the sufferings he met with, and he very patiently bore and went through them, of many sorts and kinds, as imprisonments, spilling of goods, mockings and scourgings from those without, and suffering among false brethren. In all which he stood firm and faithful in his testimony for Christ, approving himself a true follower of Jesus Christ, suffering joyfully for his name's sake, who had counted him worthy, not only to believe, but to suffer for Him. As he was a man wonderfully endued with heavenly and divine wisdom, so he was a man of great humility, very much laboring for love and unity amongst brethren, and where any thing appeared tending to a breach of it, he always used his utmost endeavors to put a stop thereto, approving himself to be a man of peace, and always labored for it, both in the church and also amongst all sorts of people.

"He was a man beloved of God, and by all good men who knew him. He was a nursing father to many, encouraging every thing that was good in the least child; but very zealous against every appearance of evil; especially against that which in any wise tended to the laying waste of that testimony which the Lord required his people to bear, being zealously concerned to keep his testimony clear in every branch of it. He was a man well qualified for discipline, and labored very much to promote it, for the encouragement of those who were weak, and to bring to judgment those that were loose, and would let their testimony fall. He was very zealous against that antichristian yoke of tithes, and though he suffered very much on that account, yet he stood faithful to the last, and rejoiced in his sufferings upon that and all other accounts for truth's sake.

"Though in the latter part of his time he was attended with much bodily weakness, which through his many hard labors, travels, and sufferings, was come upon him, yet such was his zeal for truth, and love for the friends of it, that he was willing to spend his time and strength for and in the service of truth, which he faithfully performed, to the comfort and edification of the churches of Christ.

"On the 17th of the 11th month, 1707, having been in the love of God to visit several meetings in the upper end of Lancashire, Westmoreland, and the west of Yorkshire, he returned to his son John Moore's, at Eldwirth, and that very day it pleased the Lord, by a gentle hand (as he phrased it) to bring his ~~dear son~~ <sup>dear son</sup> ~~to his home~~ <sup>to his home</sup> ~~after some few days~~ <sup>after some few days</sup> ~~to his home~~ <sup>to his home</sup> ~~with much patience,~~ <sup>with much patience,</sup> and continued in a weakly distempered state of body for five or six weeks, taking very little natural food, nor getting much sleep or rest at nights; yet could walk up and down his chamber, and was always pretty cheerful, and freely resigned to the will of God, often saying, 'I neither desire to live nor to die, but am well content, however it shall please the Lord to order it;' farther saying, 'If the Lord see meet, or have yet any farther service for me to do, it is easy with Him to raise me up again; but his will be done, I am very well content, I bless the Lord.'

"Near the conclusion of his days, he said 'I have great peace and satisfaction, in that I have done the will of God. I do not know that I have much more to do, the time of my departure seems to draw nigh; but I am well satisfied. I bless the Lord, I can say with the apostle, 'I have fought a good fight; I have finished my course; I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day, and not to me only, but to them also that love his appearing.'

"One day, he being alone in his chamber, his son John Moore came and sat down by him, and asked him how he did; he answered, 'I am but weakly of body, but strong in the inner man, blessed be the Lord, who hath been my support and strength hitherto.' He then further said, 'I have been pondering in my mind, and meditating of the wonderful and unspeakable mercies and loving kindness of God, to me extended all my life long, even to this very day; that I, such a poor, weak, feeble creature, should be enabled to hold out, and go through those many trials, travails, sufferings and exercises, both inward and outward, of various kinds, that have fallen to my lot. It has indeed been the Lord's doings, who is and has been all along my buckler and my shield, He shall have the praise and the glory of all, for He alone is worthy of it, for ever and for evermore.'

"His distemper continuing, and his bodily strength growing weaker, so that there was little likelihood of his recovery, he gave very plain and distinct directions concerning his burial, as one not much concerned at his approaching departure."

A Perfect Home.—The most perfect home I ever saw was a little house into the sweet incense of whose altar fires went no costly things. A thousand dollars served as a year's living of father, mother, and three children. But the mother was the creator of a home; her relations with her children were the most beautiful I have ever seen. Even the dull and commonplace man was lifted up and enabled to do good work for souls by the atmosphere which this woman created; every tone of her house involuntarily looked into her face for the keynote of the day, and it always rang clear. From the rose-bud or clover leaf, which, in spite of her hard housework, she always found time to put by our plates at breakfast, down to the story she had on hand to be read in the evening, there was no interruption of her influence. She has always been and always will be my ideal of a mother, wife, and a home-maker. If to her quick brain, loving heart, and exquisite face had been added the appliances of wealth and the enlargements of wide culture, hers would have been absolutely the ideal home. As it was, it was the best I had ever seen.—Helen Hunt, in Interior.

A Reliable Blind Leader.—During the prevalence of one of those dense fogs which have been so frequent lately in London, a gentleman was trying to find his way out of Hyde Park. He knew the road well in ordinary weather, but was unable to find it in the fog, which prevented his seeing a yard ahead. At length he met a man of whom he inquired his way. "Come with me," said the man; "I can show you the way; the fog does not affect me; I am blind." The man who could see surrendered himself to the guidance of the man who could not see, and was led safely to his destination. It is thus that men learned in philosophy and scientific knowledge have sometimes been led in the ways of God by men whose educational attainments and natural abilities are inferior to their own. (Luke 10: 21.)—Christian Mirror.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Time birds in China.—The Chinese are very fond of keeping tame birds; and it is a common sight to see a Chinaman, leisurely walking the streets with his bird-cage, usually round and arched, upon the open palm of his hand, the wrist being bent back and the palm upward. He loves thus to give his bird an airing, as well as to exhibit his treasure, which is not unfrequently of considerable value. The bird thus favored is, in nine cases out of ten, the Shantung Lark (Aerilotheres cristatillus), which is not however a true lark, but a starling—a pretty bird, nearly as large as a thrush, of a mottled brown color, with a light streak round the eyes, and an irregular black ring round the neck. The natural habits of this bird are characterized by familiarity; and they have received the name of Pako, or the eight brothers, from the Chinese, because they are usually seen in small parties together. The bird is lively, good-natured and easily tamed; but it is none of these qualities which specially endear it to the Chinese, though they all add to its attractions. It is its power of mimicry which render the Shantung Lark so popular. They have, it is said, a good natural song, not unlike that of a skylark which I should doubt; but they easily learn to imitate all manner of out-of-the-way sounds. They will bark like a dog, mew like a cat, crow like a cock, or cough and sneeze like a human being. Nor are powers of speech denied to them, for they learn to talk with much facility as a parrot. It is no wonder therefore, that well-educated birds command a good price. I have known one in a butter boat for which 25 dollars has been offered and refused; and I am credibly informed that good birds fetch 50 or even 100 dollars, the plumage being considered by good judges one of their important points.

Although this bird is the universal favorite in China, there are in the bird-shops many other interesting species. Among these may be particularized the fork-tailed Parus (Leithrix latens), a bird which, if it could be introduced to English bird-keepers, would undoubtedly prove very popular. It is a remarkably pretty bird, in form and habit strongly reminding one of the English Robin, which is equal in size, but has a stouter build. As an example of its beauty, I have seen these birds, including that of a good cage and abundance of seed, it is not wonderful that several were purchased in the hope of bringing the safely through the homeward voyage to England. Being an insectivorous bird, however I always had strong misgivings of the result and eventually they all died before reaching the Cape, except this which survived a few days later, and this notwithstanding they were fed with some half-dozen living flies nearly every day.

But the most remarkable feature in the Leithrix was a curious habit they had of turning somersaults on their perch. Throwing the head far back they would turn over to the top mentally the bars of the cage, passing, and alight on their feet, either on the floor of the cage or on their perch, repeating the operation rapidly and constantly, and unfrequently turning over in little more than their own length. When I first noticed this freak in a bird-shop, I set it down as a matter of education; but I have since found that every individual has the same habit, although some tumble better than others.

Canaries are also plenty in the bird-shop but Japan seems to be the paradise of the canary bird. The "Scylla," home-wared bouquets like an aviary, on a sunny afternoon have counted 50 or 60 cages on deck, few containing less than two, and some as many as seven or eight birds, all singing in chorus. The attraction was that in Japan good singing canaries could be purchased at the rate of an ounce or about one shilling and six pence each; and the sailors, therefore, had made their hay where they found the sun shining.

The Grackle (Gracula religiosa), called in these parts the Mina, is a favorite bird, much admired in Singapore and Borneo. It is as large as a jack-daw, black, with long feet, and two yellow wattles on each side of the head. It is a member of the starling family. The powers of imitation of the human voice possessed by this bird are truly remarkable. The Governor of Labuan possessed one which was a good specimen of its class. At my first visit to Government House, just as I reached the door, I heard a loud and perfectly distinct voice shout out, "Orderly, call the boy?" and then, "What do you want him for?" and very nearly enunciated; and this was immediately succeeded by a loud laugh and a sonorous whistle. I looked in vain for the source of this seemingly exhibition; and when, presently, the same sounds proceeding from the verandah, went out to see what they meant, the innocent-looking black bird hopping about deviously in a wicker cage would never have been suspected, had he not burst into a hoarse laugh the moment my back was turned. They imitate a child crying in a most painfully natural manner; and their mimicry of the human voice is far superior to that of a parrot. Bullington's Naturalist in China.

African Bee-hives.—In these forests we encountered the artificial bee hives so commonly met with all the way from this to Angola. They consist of about five feet of the bark of one fifteen or eighteen inches in diameter. The incisions are made right round the tree, at five feet apart, then one longitudinal joint of one of these to the other; the work next lifts up the bark on each side of this joint, and detaches it from the trunk, taking care not to break it until the whole comes from the tree. The elasticity of the bark is such as to assume the form it had before; and the hives are pegged up with wooden pins, made of coiled grass-ropes are used, one of which has a hole for the ingress of bees in the centre, and the hive is complete. The hives are placed in a horizontal position on high trees in different parts of the forest, and in this way all the wax exported from Benguela and Loanda is collected. It is the produce of free-labor. A "piece of pine" is tied round the trunk of the tree and proves sufficient protection against the natives seldom rob each other. Lipinstone.

that will it avail thee, O soul, when thou standest before the great and final tribunal, to such a man professed great sanctity, but a hypocrite; therefore, I was tempted to the service of the living God, and serve him? This will never justify thee at times of heaven, nor procure thee admittance therein.—J. Scott.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 1, 1880.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

After the opening of the meeting on Friday morning, a Friend expressed the hope he had long felt as to the situation of the Society; and the desire, that we might avail of all the services required of us. He made the appointment of a committee to prepare a document afresh holding up to view the spiritual doctrines of the gospel as held by our early members; and that this be sent to all the bodies of Friends. This opened the way for some expression of views by different Friends. Some united with the proposition as brought forward; others thought, if such an essay were prepared, it would be safer to address it to Friends generally; and others, that the time had not yet come for taking that step of the kind. The belief was expressed that ere long, the stepping stones would be visible and the meeting be enabled to move forward.

Nothing occurred to unsettle the meeting, or disturb its harmony; and after sufficient time had been spent on this subject, the Queries and Answers were taken up. These were read and considered as far as the sixth, inclusive. The deficiencies reported were similar to those of former years in number and character. We were fervently exhorted to the observance of the first commandment, inhauling us with the love of the brethren, and leading us to the avoidance of all things which are wrong. The duty of endeavoring to help those who were negligent as to the performance of their religious duties was pressed upon those affected by drowsiness in meetings, and set apart for Divine worship.

The meeting was a comfortable one.

In the afternoon a very large meeting of the younger and middle-aged members was held by appointment, in which much counsel and labor were expended to stir them up to greater faithfulness and earnestness. Yet the best duty accomplished—partly on account of several communications from others, which occupied time and prevented those on whose concern the meeting had been appointed from obtaining full relief.

On Fourth-day the remaining Queries and answers were read and considered. Much advice was given in reference to moderation in business; and Friends were cautioned against the tendency to continually enlarge their business with the accumulation of profits. They were reminded of the former custom that prevailed among business men in Philadelphia to retire from active labor in proper season, and thus to make an opening for others to find the means of supporting their families. The danger of becoming imbued with a worldly spirit was brought into view, and earnest exhortations were given to seek first the kingdom of heaven and the righteousness thereof, in the faith that there would be added thereto all things that were necessary for us.

The solemnizing, melting power of the Lord was preciously extended over the assembly, and many hearts were made to rejoice in this evidence of Divine favor.

The reports on education showed 881 children of school age. It was felt to be important that these should be trained in a manner consistent with our religious profession, and the subject was again referred to the care of subordinate meetings.

The reports on spirituous liquors stated that 40 of our members during the past year handed them to others for a drink or had shown the advance that had been made on this subject, a Friend stated that when an inquiry was instituted in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting fifty or sixty years ago, it was found that there were fourteen of our members who sold distilleries, and about one hundred who sold liquors. Now there are none of either of these classes, and but few left who drank them at all. As the meeting had approved of the issuing by the Meeting for Sufferings of the Address on Intoxicating Drinks, it was thought to be more consistent to make the annual inquiry on this subject include the use of any intoxicating liquor, instead of confining it as heretofore to the use of distilled spirituous liquors. This enlargement of the field of inquiry and labor was therefore directed.

On Fifth-day morning a meeting for worship was held as usual in three of the city

In the afternoon, after making a slight alteration in the minute on intoxicating liquors, the report of the committee in charge of Westtown Boarding School was read. This was interesting and satisfactory. The health and good order of the family had been well maintained. A regulation had been adopted requiring the girls to spend a portion of each day (except in stormy weather) in the open air, and a system of physical exercises had been practised by them under the care of one of the teachers. The religious interests of the pupils had been watched over by the committee; and the financial exhibit of the year's operations showed a small balance in favor of the school. This was due to the appropriation of $2000 made by the Yearly Meeting to its funds, which was again directed to be made. The income of a fund of $15,000, left to the school by our late friend Rich Anna Cope, had been set apart to pay for the education of the Yearly Meetings. During the year, the Committee had received notice that the residuary part of the estate of our late friend Charles Evans, had been left by his will to this school, in whose prosperity he had long felt a deep interest. A Friend who had been connected with the school, both as a pupil and as a member of the Committee, bore strong testimony to its value, and especially pressed on the attention of parents the importance of those restraints as to attire which it laid upon the girls, and the value to them of the training which they received at this institution, and of the protection which it afforded from the unsettling effects on their minds of too much mingling in society in their young years.

The report of the Indian Committee was also interesting and encouraging. The Boarding School at Tanassassa had been kept filled with pupils, and had been doing well. Many had applied for admittance, and the 30 which there was room to accommodate. The Committee had advised with the Indians in reference to the leases which they had given for lots in the town of Salamanca. The report was very satisfactory, and $1000 was appropriated to assist in carrying on the concern.

The special committee on that subject had assisted in the education under the care of the Society of 98 children during the past year. The Committee was continued, with an appropriation of $1200 for their use.

The Committee on the Treasurer's Report proposed raising $4000 for the coming year, which with the two appropriations last mentioned, made the amount of the quotas of the Quarterly Meetings $6200.

The trustees of the Shrewsbury Meeting-house were authorized to apply to the Legislature of New Jersey for power to sell the property.

The lively and interesting memorial of our late Friend John P. Balderston, of Nottingham, Maryland, brought feelings of solemnity upon the meeting, with a sense of the blessedness of such a glorious prospect of futurity as he was favored with as the end of life drew near. Its reading was sweetly compared by one Friend to ointment poured forth. Another Friend referred to the total change of character and life which followed the remarkable visitation of Divine Grace with which he was favored in his early manhood without instrumental means, and pressed on his hearers the necessity of knowing the work of the Spirit to be thoroughly performed, so that they might be brought into a true knowledge of God and fellowship with Him.

Like all the sessions which have preceded it, that held this afternoon was a solid and comfortable season.

The final meeting was on Sixth-day. A misunderstanding of the real meaning or effect of the paragraph on Love and Unity adopted earlier in the week led to its being again read. After some remarks on the subject, the decision to place it in the Book of Discipline was reaffirmed.

The Committee to bring forward the names of Friends to fill the vacancies in the Meeting for Sufferings caused by the death of Charles Evans and Charles Williams, proposed the appointment of William Evans and William P. Townsend, which was united with.

The minute of the state of Society prepared by the Committee for that purpose was satisfactory at the meeting.

The Address on Intoxicating Liquors was read, and was acceptable apparently to all, though a few verbal criticisms were made by one or two, who united with the document as a whole.

During the latter part of the meeting a solemn covering was mercifully spread over us, and vocal thanksgiving was offered for that extension of Divine favor which had enabled the meeting to transact its business with dignity and harmony to the honor of its holy head. Some short and lively exhortations and acknowledgments of the Divine goodness were made by different Friends—and the concluding minute was read.

A feeling of comfort and of thankfulness we believe was generally prevalent among those present.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 19th ult., the town of Marshall, Mo., was almost entirely destroyed by a cyclone, which was also the cause of much loss of life and property in the vicinity. In the town above mentioned, only twenty houses out of two hundred were standing, and most of these more or less damaged. Upwards of eighty persons were killed, and many more seriously injured. Professor Tier, who examined the phenomena of the tornado, reports that there is evidence every where along the track of the storm, that a wave of water flowed in the rear of the "cloud spouts." Persons who encountered the storm, say the water was very cold.

On the 24th, 2342 immigrants landed at Castle Garden—making a total for the week of 16,265, and for the month, to date, of 53,852. The steamship Strasburg, which arrived at Baltimore on the 24th, brought 1901 immigrants from Germany, Austria and Scandinavia. It is said this is the largest number brought across the Atlantic by one ship in a single voyage. They are all for the Western States.

The exports of domestic breadstuffs from the United States during last month were valued at $19,974,719; and for the last nine months, $182,638,226.

The number of different kinds of postage stamps which have been hitherto issued all over the world, is estimated at 6000. The collection preserved in the Museum of the Berlin post-offices, included, on 7th mo. 1st, 1879, 4498 specimens. Of these 2462 were from Europe, 441 from Asia, 251 from Africa, 1143 from America, and 201 from Australia.

Six men perished by the capsizing of a life-boat near Huron City, Michigan, on the 23rd ult.

The forest fires in New Jersey and Virginia, have been extinguished by the people, aided by showers of rain.

Six regular steamers cleared at New York, for transatlantic ports on the 24th ult., all with heavy cargoes of domestic products, including 2000 head of cattle, 1700 sheep, 200 hogs, 7500 quarters fresh beef, 2500 carcasses of sheep, and 500 dressed hogs.

A fire in the town of Hull, opposite Ottawa, Ont., on the 21st, destroyed over 700 houses, and rendered over 4000 people homeless. The loss is estimated at $2,500,000. Four persons perished.

A serious disaster occurred on the night of the 21st, at the Madison Square Garden, in New York, where a fair was being held for the benefit of one of the hospitals. Part of the front wall gave way, and the roof fell in. The persons were killed and several wounded.

The Treasury Department has directed the transfer of $5,500,000 in gold bullion from New York to the Philadelphia Mint, to be coined into eagles and half eagles.

Thirty-four of the forty-one life-saving stations along the New Jersey coast, have been closed this week.

The number of deaths in this city during the past week was 350. Of this number 189 were adults and 161 children—28 being under one year of age.

Markets, &c.—U. S. sixes, 181, 160; do. 5's, registered, 102½; coupon, 103½; 4½'s, 109; 4's, 107; 1/2's, 107. The market was very light and somewhat quiet. Favor buyers. Sales of middlings at 12½ 12½ cts. per pound.

Wool—Penna. and Ohio, x and above, 54 a 56 cts.; x, 52 a 55 cts.; ½ blood, 60 a 65 cts.; ¼ blood, 55 a 60 cts. Fine unwashed, 33 a 42 cts.; medium do., 43 a 45 cts. Washed and dyed, 52 cts. and over. Medium, 45 a 50 cts. New York, Michigan and Wisconsin, 45 a 50 cts. Pennsylvania and Illinois, 45 a 50 cts. Minnesota, 44 a 50 cts. less.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and refined 7 cts. for export, and 7½ a 8 cts. per gallon for home use. Linseed oil, American, 80 a 81 cts. Lard, 61 a 63 cts.; sperm, winter, $1.90 a $1.95 per gallon.

Flour is in better demand but prices unchanged.—Midwestern—washed and dyed, 36; Penna. family, 55.50 a 56; western do., 55.75 a 56.25; Ohio, high grade, 56.75 a 57, and patents, 56.50 a 57.50. Rye-flour $4.25 a $4.37½ per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat irregular and lower. Sales of 15,000 bushels, including red at $1.31, and amber $1.32. Rye, 33 a 34 cts. ditto and over. Sales of mixed at 52 cts.; yellow, 53 a 53½ cts.; white, 55 cts. Oats—inactive but firm. White, 44 a 47½ cts.

Needs.—Clover, 6 a 7 cts. per lb.; flaxseed, $1.80; timothy, $2.20 a $2.25.

Hay and straw.—Prime timothy, $1 a $1.15 per 100 pounds; mixed, 90 cts. a $1; straw, $1.35 a $1.50 per 100 pounds.

The receipts of cattle at the various Philadelphia yards for the past week were: Beeves 2550 head; sheep and lambs 6000 head; hogs 5500 head; fresh cows 180 head.

Beeves.—Market dull and prices 1 cts. per lb. lower on all grades. Sales at 3 a 5½ cts. per lb., as to quality. Fresh cows moderately active at $20 a $50 per head. Sheep.—Market firmer, 5½ a 7½ cts. per pound. Lambs in demand at 6 a 11 cts. per pound. Latter part of spring.

Hogs were in demand, but prices lower, 6½ a 7 cts. was paid according to quality.

FOREIGN.—Great Britain.—The Queen has accepted the resignation of Lord Beaconsfield as Prime Minister, and sent for Lord Hartington to the castle. Hurlingham, the Queen to summon Gladstone to form a cabinet, which was accordingly done. Her Majesty's appointments have been definitely made: Earl Grantley, Secretary of State for Foreign Department; the Marquis of Hartington, Secretary of State for India; H. C. E. Childers, Secretary of State for War; Lord Salisbury, High Chancellor; Wm. F. Forster, Chief Secretary for Ireland; Lord Northbrook, First Lord of the Admiralty.

Arrangements have been made for discharging the American relief ship Constellation and distributing cargo at different stations on the south and west of Ireland.

The inquiry before the Board of Trade into the Tay Bridge disaster, the civil engineer, who had care of the work during its construction, said the supports of the bridge were insufficient. Another said, he did not think the bridge was brought down by wind pressure; there must have been some weak points in the structure. Nineteen fishermen were drowned on the Scotch coast during a gale on the 21st ult.

During the past week thirteen large steamships left the Mersey for North American ports, with number of passengers, and considerable general cargo. Most of them are bound for the United States. It is believed to be unprecedentedly large. Great Britain of iron steel to all countries, for 3d mo. 1880, was $37,305. The United States, which received only 109 tons of way iron in the first three months of 1878, and 11,187½, had increased its imports to 43,367 tons a close of the first three months of the present year, exceeding England's best customer.

Paris.—In the Chamber of Deputies a proposal at least a year's military service be obligatory for priests who shall hereafter be ordained, was urgent, and was referred to a select committee.

Berlin.—The value of the fifty tons of Russian manilla, valued at £10,000, has already arrived in America, and been placed in the International Exhibition.

South America.—The Chilians have occupied Quequa, Cuenca, de Los Angeles, and Torato, and named the roads leading to Arequipa.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

The SUMMER SESSION of the School will close on Second-day, the 3d of Fifth month.

As the passage, including the extra fare from the depot by the cars from Philadelphia, can obtain tickets at the depot of the West Chester and Philadelphia Railroad, corner of Thirty-first and Chestnut streets, by J. J. Ryan, in their names to the Ticket-agent there, who is furnished with a list of the pupils for that purpose. In such cases the passage, including the extra fare from the depot, will be charged at the School, to be paid with the other incidental charges at the close term. Tickets can also be obtained of the Treasurer, Arch Street. Conveyances will be at the School Station, on the 2d of Fifth month, and the 3d of the month, to meet the trains that leave Philadelphia at 7:45 and 10 A. M., 12:30 and 2:30 P. M.

Baggage may be left either at Thirty-first and Nut streets, or at Eighteenth and Market. If left latter place, it must be put under the care of H. Alexander & Son, who will convey it thence to Thirty-first and Chestnut at a charge of 10 cents per trunk, paid to them. Those who prefer can have their baggage sent for to any place in the built-up part of the City, by sending word on the day previous (through post-office or otherwise) to H. Alexander & Son, 109 North 13th, and the charge is made on the day for taking baggage to Thirty-first and Chestnut streets, will be 25 cents per trunk. For the same day they will also collect baggage from the other deposits, if the checks are left at their office corner of Arch and Market Sts. Baggage put under their care, is properly marked, will not require receipts from the owners, either at the West Philadelphia depot, or the Street Road Station, but will be forwarded to the School. It may not always go on the same train, but it will go on the same day, provided notice to H. Alexander & Son reaches them in the evening. The Students, passengers for the School, to be met at the Street Road Station, on the arrival of the first train from the City, every day except First and small packages for the pupils, if left at Foot Book Store, No. 394 Arch street, will be forwarded to the depot at 12 o'clock.

For "The Friend,"

The Meeting at Firbank Chapel and its Results.

"Being grown so weak he could not well go along, without some little support, one evening as he was walking over his chamber door, leaning upon his son J. Moore's arm, his legs trembled under him, which he observing, said, 'Dear John, when the pillars of the house begin to tremble, there is feeble work. But you, blessed are they who, when this earthly tabernacle is ready to be dissolved, do assuredly know that they have a habitation eternal in the heavens, whose builder and maker the Lord is; of which, for my part, I bless the Lord I am well satisfied.'

"About a week before he died, several of his Moore's children being in the room with him, he said to them, 'Now I think I must say a little longer, I might have been of service to you in counsel and advice; but the Lord, the great and wise counsellor, as you have your eye to Him above all things, will be wanting to you in counsel. I love you dearly, and the blessing of the Almighty rest on you, if it be his will.'

"He several times spoke concerning Esau; a time he said, 'Esau's mount was in part assumed and consuming, yet there were anchors still remained;' and said, 'The Lord it waste more and more.'

"Another time he said, 'Faith and patience, love and charity, are excellent virtues; therefore, if it be his will, endue his children and people more and more therewith.'

"When he was grown so very weak that getting his clothes on and off was somewhat difficult and troublesome, he one time said to those about him, 'Dear children, you see a great deal of trouble and exercise about the Lord be your reward; but you shall a little time will put an end to all these troubles, and a happy end it will be for me, I bid it not at all.'

"Another time, being some days before he died, John Moore's eldest daughter standing by him, he took her by the hand, and said, 'Dear Anna, the Lord will reward thee for care and pains about me.' Seeing her affected with sorrow, as well she might be for approaching loss of so near and dear a friend, he further added, 'Death will not be any; but it will be well with me, the enemy cannot touch me. The Lord who hath been with me, and hath borne up my spirit through and over all the various exercises and trials of my time; He will be with me to the end; there is no doubt of it.'

"One time lying upon his bed, in a sweet and heavenly frame of mind and spirit, he said, 'I have served the Lord in sincerity, with all my heart, and with all my soul, and with all my strength; hallelujah, hallelujah, magnifying the Lord, and the melting and tendering the hearts of all present. Afterwards he said to John Moore, and some others who were with him, 'Bear me record, I die as firm and true as ever in our Lord Jesus Christ, the author of our salvation.'

"When grown so very weak, being asked how he did, he would say, 'Weak of body, but strong in the Lord;' saying also, 'In Abraham's bosom there is sweet repose.' He divers times spoke of the efficacy and virtue of the wine of the kingdom; and about two days before he died, he seemed to be faint, and J. Moore gave him a little wine to sup, thinking it might refresh him, but his stomach could could not bear it. Then looking pretty cheerfully at J. Moore, he said, 'Dear John, thou seeest these things will not do; but one cup of new wine in the heavenly kingdom, with my dear and blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, will make up all.'

"His strength decaying very fast, he for the most part lay very still and quiet, as one waiting for his dissolution, not saying much, unless when spoken to, and then would answer very sensibly to what he was asked.

"On the day he died, he was desirous to be helped out of his bed, but seeing how very weak he was, he was put off for some time; but he still urged it. J. Moore told him, he doubted he was so weak he could scarcely bear it without fainting; but those with him told him, they were willing to help him the best they could. To which he replied very cheerfully, 'That is enough: I hope the Lord, that has been my help in many straits and difficulties, will also now help me.' So his clothes were got ready, and by degrees got most of them on; but before they had quite done, he was likely to faint: so they sat him down on the bed-side, and supported him a little. After a while he somewhat revived, and looking about him, he saw J. Moore's youngest child, betwixt two and three years old, standing before him a little way off, and he beckoned with his hand, that she might come to him, and with a little help he set her upon his knees, and affectionately kissing and embracing her, he said, 'God Almighty bless thee. The God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, bless thee, and make thee happy, if it be his will.' Then after a little time they got his clothes something better on, and set him in his chair, where he sat a pretty while; then growing weary, he desired to lie down upon his bed, which he did, and after a little time, he was perceived to weaken very fast. He lay still and quiet, not saying any thing that could be heard or perceived; but drawing his breath sometimes quicker and sometimes slower, yet without the least disturbance, or stoppage of phlegm. He continued so for the space of about six hours; then stretching himself forth upon his bed, he departed this life without sign or groan, as one falling into a deep sleep, on the 13th day of the First month, 1707, betwixt the hours of eleven and twelve in the night, being aged sixty-six years, nine months, and ten days.

"Thus, having fought the good fight, and finished his course well, he laid down his head in peace with the Lord, and is freed from all his sufferings, sorrows, and afflictions here, and entered no doubt into the kingdom of eternal glory, for ever to live, and magnify, and praise the great God, world without end. On the 15th of the same month, his body was removed from Eldworth in Yorkshire, where he died, to his late dwelling house at Camsgill, in Westmoreland, and on the 16th of the same month was carried in a solemn manner to Friends' burying place at Park-end, in Preston-Patrik, being about half a mile from Camsgill. It was accompanied by several hundreds of people, both of the neighborhood, and also many friends out of divers of the adjacent counties, and was there interred in a decent, Christian manner, there being a general appearance of sorrow in those present for the loss of so good and serviceable a man.

"The corpse being interred, all, or most that were there, drew into the meeting house, and had a precious edifying season together, the powerful living presence of the Lord, in an eminent manner, overshadowing the assembly, to the tendering and affecting many hearts. Divers testimonies were then borne, to the sufficiency of that universal principle of divine light and grace, which is given to be a teacher and a leader to all mankind, and is become the teacher and the leader of all those who are willing to be taught and led by it. But it is, and will be, the condemnation of all those who are disobedient to, and rebel against it, whilst they continue in that state. Also divers testimonies were borne, concerning this our dear friend, deceased, as to his faithfulness, care, and labor of love in serving God's heritage; as also with respect to the many trials, travels, and deep exercises that he had faithfully gone through in his day and time, upon truth's account; all which he was enabled to perform and go through by the power and assistance of that divine grace, and Holy Spirit of God, which he still accounted his buckler, and his shield, his bow and his battle-axe, and by and through which, he was what he was, and to which alone, and not to him as man, the praise and glory of all was attributed.

"So friends having cleared themselves of what was upon their minds, the meeting broke up, and friends parted with hearts deeply affected, and filled with the love and goodness of God, which had been plentifully shed abroad amongst them that day; praises, honor, and glory over all, be given unto God, and to the Lamb, who sits with him upon the throne, who is worthy for ever, and for evermore.—Amen."

Notes of Travel in Europe.

A Visit to Certosa.—On a balmy day in the Eleventh month we took an open carriage and drove to the Certosa, a Carthusian convent, a few miles from Florence towards the south. Passing through the Porta Romana, our way lay along the road to the eternal city. Villas surrounded by high walls, straggling houses, and all the suburban adjuncts of a great city, followed us almost to our destination. We however caught glimpses of the country occasionally, and a yoke of milk white oxen plowing in a vineyard, recalled most vividly "the old days of Rome." Entering an ancient gateway we were within the precincts of the monastery. Many acres were planted with vegetables and fruit trees, and a few clusters of grapes hung upon the old walls. A great pile of buildings surmounted the hill, and presented a very imposing aspect, viewed from below, and we found that in addition to being plunged into the middle of the middle ages, we were to have a very fine view from the walls.

We were received by a venerable brother of the order, who seemed much pleased to see us in the interior. His dress was of white cloth, with a hood removable at pleasure, a loose easy dress, no doubt, but too feminine for my taste. Of course the "church" was considered by him most worthy of our attention; but it was so much like the ordinary "churches" of Florence, that I looked at it as did Hawthorne at something of similar character, with the "immediate intention of forgetting it." However this one has a really beautiful pavement of marble, and some fine paintings and frescoes, and we could not say with the same austere writer what he remarked of many pictures in other places over which so many silly people think it proper to rhapsodize, that he could wish "they could be taken out and reverently burnt." This may seem high treason to high art, but I find many people have thought the same thought, though they have failed to express it as vividly and pertinently.

The crypts beneath interested me more. Several Cardinals with placid faces lay there extended, their marble effigies startling by their resemblance to their cold forms ere they were committed to the tomb. But when we emerged from these gloomy precincts into a great square, a vaulted corridor supported by pillars entirely surrounding it, and walked among the sweet herbs growing on every side—rosmary, lavender, thyme—and leaned over an old well in the centre room, and deep with time-worn steps of stone, we seemed introduced to a dim past, when monk and priest were all powerful in the land, and princes kissed the dust beneath their feet. Beneath these corridors looking upon the garden, were the apartments of the monks—almost all empty now—for there were but about twenty inmates in all this vast pile of buildings. Each division seemed to contain three rooms—a central one, perhaps ten feet square, with two adjoining ones much smaller. In the outer room were four chairs, a small plain table, a few drawers and some rude pictures of saints and martyrs. The next room in point of size held one chair, and a small desk, with rude designs upon the walls. The smallest room was almost empty, and the floors of all were of brick. A little window in the second room opened on the corridor, and here the good father informed us that the food was passed through to the penitent inside when his duties imposed by himself or his superiors obliged him to remain within his cell. Some of the interior doors opened upon short covered walks, from which the country around could be seen in all its beauty. One of these windows offered a fine frame to the picture, and the attendant brother drew our attention to this, showing that this source of consolation at least was open to them.

The refectory was long and lofty, paved with brick also, and very gloomy. A few tables prepared for dinner stood about. Here all were obliged to keep silence when at meals, and from a pulpit upon the wall one of the brothers read for the edification of the rest. It was a cheerless room, and I was glad to go down into the pharmacaria. Here quite a busy scene presented—the only life in the place seemed centred here. Bottles of many kinds, filled with perfumery, cordials and essences, awaited customers. Soap, in the shape of beautiful lady-apples, pears and pickles, was quite tempting, and a young man was engaged in making candy!

Having had a kind of medieval feeling that I was living some five hundred years ago, I was greatly surprised to find behind the glass case a pile of photographs, and among them one of the old well in the great square, and another in which our kind guide, a venerable good man, judging from his refined face and gentle manners, and known as Fra Innocent, was pictured. Upon this the gentle brother declined to write his name, but whether from inability, which we could not believe, or from a vow, or from modesty, we could not know. On leaving the pile I could not but reflect how many sad mistakes were made in those olden times, when talents, worth and active energy, which might have blessed the world in another sphere, were all buried behind these old monastic walls. The flowers in the old monk's garden, the soft sweet air of autumn, the quiet, the peace that reigned there, these I shall never forget, nor the lavender which Fra Innocent gave us, nor the rosmary, "for this remembrance."

The afternoon found us at San Marco and the monastery adjoining it. This, too, is a very ancient establishment, but its chief interest lay in the library which had been enriched by the spoil of many ancient libraries gathered from the suppressed religious houses. Many of the books were very richly illuminated, and the variety seemed endless. Sometimes the first page was adorned with a nativity or a madonna and child, beautifully executed in water-colors, or a few birds were admirably depicted, and on one a deer was drawn and painted to the life.

I said the library was the chief object of interest—it was but one of them—for the room of Savonarola was more to me than all the rest. To lean on the little window overlooking the Arno, out of which he had so often gazed, to see his hair shirt and breviary, and his penmanship, to sit in his veritable chair and contemplate his picture; and sadder still to look upon the picture of his death by fire in the Piazza della Signoria, which hung on the wall, brought those terrible times before me, when Florence gave up her bravest and best, to an ignoble fate, and still more ignominious priesthood. Very rarely did I cross that beautiful Piazza, with its grand statues—Neptune looking down upon his tritons, a water nymphs,—Hercules upright in his giant strength—the graceful Loggia dei Lanzi where assembled Florence legislators and leaders—the appeals of their magistrates and leaders—the Pallazo Vecchio with its lofty tower—seldom did I behold all this in our daily wandering without a thought of the brave monk who died for the Truth.

For "The Friend."

While fully agreeing with a short article in this Journal (Vol. LIII), which speaks of "well preserved old person"—would it not be well for us all, and especially those of us who have not yet long "borne the burden of life to endeavor to guard against encouraging "wrinkles and deep-set lines" on our face, and the faces of those around us, by being too anxious about things over which we have no control; or by allowing occurrences which we must meet with in our every-day life to unnecessarily worry us. How refreshing to see those faces which bear conspicuous traces, their trusting, restful lines—faces which plainly show they are not "serving a hard Master, and although on many of these we see so dear "deep set lines," for which we feel much love and reverence—yet they show they have learned on whom to "cast their care believing "He will not suffer them to be tempted above that they are able to bear."

BY HER DAUGHTER, FRISCELLA PITT.

"27th of 10th mo. 1836. This day had interesting letter lent me to read, giving account of the decease of our beloved friend and brother in the truth, Edward E. Alexander, of Limerick in Ireland. He was highly gifted of the Lord, having walked in humble obedience to the manifestations of the Holy Spirit, and was therefore enabled to hold forth the encouraging language unto others, follow me as I have endeavored to follow Christ. I think the language of the apostle not inappropriate to this dedicated servant, 'I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me,' &c. He was favored with unclouded clearness of glorious immortality; he was tenderly beloved by very many both in and out of our Society, and he told some of his friends before he died he believed he was taken because they missed so much of him. Ah what a lesson for us, we must not rob God of his honor; He will not give his glory to another, neither will he praise to graven images, but all the honor must be ascribed unto Him to whom it everlastingly belongs; and with his last words was our dear friend uttering his praise, 'Icribing all unto Him. Having read this letter I felt inclined to go and read it in two Friends families, which was gratefully acknowledged by them. But oh it was my kind heavenly parent who influenced my heart thereto; my it tend to keep down every thing that is of the creature, and make me more humble and watchful. I called at the school; — were of very kind and affectionate towards me; who seemed as if my heart secretly rejoice in that also some of the wages which He condescends to give to his willing obedient children who do not serve him for naught. Be thankful, O my soul, for mercies past, and humbly hope for more.

"28th. Just before beginning to read Scriptures as usual after breakfast, I was made sensible of a touch of the Heavenly Father's love, as in a moment tendering my heart; under a feeling which it seemed right for me to address our young woman. As times and seasons are not at our command, safety seems for me to move in the Master's time, not in my own, how humbling soever these private acts of duty may be; I believe, and it may be well to record the belief, that little acts of obedience in the early part of the day are frequently succeeded by a sense of Divine restoration even in our outward movements. A remainder of the day, Between 11 and 12, I went to call on M. Steel and daughter, which they seemed to take very kind; fromence to call on Ann Story, who is an invalid, she expressed herself very kindly at my call, and was pleased to see me, saying she could be pleased to see me at any time; this could not but put down to my credit; my Heavenly Father, in opening the hearts of my friends towards me, who am so very unworthy. Oh, He has condescended this day to attract me to feel after his life-giving presence; many are the calls and the knockings at the door of my heart, but too great an unwillingness in general to open unto Him. My dinner called on poor S. Vaux, thought more declining than when I last saw her; first sitting with her my mind was excitedly brought into solicitude on her account; and I expressed a little matter to her, which she received very pleasantly; alas! makes the poor mind partake of the weakness of the infirm body, and renders it in some degree almost incapable of mental exercise. O merciful Father he pleased to look down with an eye of pity, who knoweth our hearts and remembereth that we are dust. — a. 30th.

Seventh-day night, 12th mo. 31st, 1836, close of another year I am permitted to write up to this time, 10 P. M., for how uncertain is the present moment only is ours. The state of my heart is, that if permitted to write another, it may be spent more to the glory of my God and Saviour; that I may be devoted in body, soul and spirit, that I may come experimentally to know Him, who is the way, the truth and the life.

1st mo. 1st, 1837.—First-day. Richard met, who is visiting the families of this Monthly Meeting, paid us our visit this evening after taking tea with us. In our morning meeting dear Lydia Barclay was accepted and engaged. How awakening is the reflection that another year is opening upon me; how little seems to have been effected to bring me to any good purpose. Oh! that this same year may be spent more in a preparation for a better and lasting inheritance; but alas how the fleeting things of time continue to occupy the mind, and lead it from that inward and needful for the renewal of our spiritual life.

2nd. Visited a distressed family.

3rd. In company with a friend visited two Friends on the receipt of their certificate, in which a quiet covering was felt to be over us; and I was enabled to hand a word of encouragement and caution. In the afternoon again visited the poor distressed family.

6th. Our valued friend and father in the truth, Wm. Gundry, of Calne, took tea with us; we very much enjoyed his company. In the evening a precious covering of quiet came over us, in which he was led to address my dear J. P. M. and self; may the recollections of this and similar refreshments as from the presence of the Lord, tend to animate in low seasons; and increase the little grain of faith which often is very low.

"7th. A week nearly expired of another year; and although no memorandum has previously been made since its commencement, yet hath my heart been many times turned towards my Heavenly Father with desires that I may be enabled to live more and more to his praise. My mind has been as it often is very low and depressed, and I often go mournfully on my way in a sorrowful condition, so that I am frequently led to self-examination, and sincere are my desires that He who knoweth the hearts of his children would be pleased to show me the cause of my desolate state, and enable me not only to know what is the great partition-wall that robs me of my peace, but that I may have strength afforded from the alone Source of help, to break it down. But alas! in order for this, I must live a life of greater self-denial; more devoted to my God and Saviour. Oh! that a sense of this may lead me into more humility and dependence. Again called on the poor family, who I found in an increasingly pitiable state, being nearly all of them very unwell. Such scenes are calculated to awaken feelings of gratitude unto the Giver of every good and perfect gift, from whom I have no right to expect any thing; and the language is at times raised in my remembrance; not more than others I deserve, yet God hath given me more.

"8th. First-day attended meeting twice, in considerable bodily weakness; dear Wm. Gundry acceptably engaged in forenoon meeting; my own state very poor. I desire to be resigned to the wintry season which has so long been my portion, but at times it is very trying to the patience.

"9th. Our dear daughter Hannah returned home after an absence of nearly three weeks. How very near and dear do our precious children feel to us; and He who knoweth the hearts of his children knows the deep solicitude which we feel for their eternal well-being; and that they may now, in the morning of their day, devote their youth to God, agreeable to those beautiful lines:

"When we devote our youth to God, 'tis pleasant in his eyes,
A flower when offered in the bud, is no vain sacrifice."

"10th. A day not to be forgotten; inasmuch as the recollection of the low depressed state of my mind may tend to awaken the enquiry, what has been the cause. Bodily weakness rather increased, and felt very disqualified from attending to my usual occupations; many little things of a domestic nature were trying, and I suffered them to take unprofitable hold of my poor mind; can I not attribute this disquietude to want of watchfulness in the early part of the day? Oh! my soul, thou hast great occasion to keep near to thy great and good Shepherd, that so thou mayest experimentally know that He maketh thee to lie down in green pastures, and leadeth thee beside the still waters of life. Oh, then, for a closer walk with God: Be pleased, righteous Father, to forgive the transgressions of this day, and strengthen me to live more watchful and humble for the future."

Blas' Furnace Slag.

"Scattered throughout the iron-making districts of Great Britain are many millions of tons of scoria or refuse from the blast furnaces, which is technically known as slag. This slag goes on accumulating at the rate of nearly eight millions of tons per annum, its bulk being it has been separated. It forms a heavy incumbrance to ironmasters, demanding the purchase of large tracts of land whereon to deposit it, the investment being, of course, wholly unremunerative. There are one or two exceptions to this rule, as at the Barrow Hematite Iron Works, where the slag is tipped into the sea and serves to form land for the works. But as a rule, the labor and capital expended upon this unproductive substance tell heavily upon profits.

"No wonder, then, that from the first, persistent efforts have been made either to utilize it or to get rid of it altogether. In early times slag was broken up by hand and used for road making, and it so continues to be used where it can be had without a heavy cost for transport; but there is only a limited demand for it for this purpose. On the contrary, where it is used for the most prominent part in road-making, as in Silesia and other similarly situated districts. Another direction in which attempts have been made to utilize slag, both at home and abroad, is to adapt it for constructive purposes, and various schemes have been devised for transforming the highly refractory slag into bricks, sand, and other materials for building. Some of these schemes have proved successful within certain limits; but the peculiar nature of the slag has more generally led to failure, owing either to the difficulty of dealing with it or to the attendant expenses."

Recently works have been constructed in connection with one of the English iron-furnaces, in which the slag as it flows from the blast furnace is received into a hollow revolving wheel containing water. This reduces it to the state of sand. Ten parts of this mixed with one part of lime in powder are thoroughly incorporated in a brick machine and moulded into bricks. These do not require burning, but gradually harden, through a chemical action between the materials, into a tough and valuable article.

"In another department the manufacture of artificial stone is carried on, the stone being moulded into chimney-pieces, window-heads, balustrading, and outside ornamental builders' work generally. The stone is composed of two-and-a-half parts of finely pulverized slag and two-and-a-half parts of ground brick to one part of Portland cement. The mixture is run into moulds and sets quickly, the articles being ready for the market in four or five days. Besides bricks and stone articles, the slag is used for making mortar, cement, and concrete."

One of the most beautiful products of the slag, is slag-wool, or silicate cotton as it is called, owing to its resemblance to cotton-wool. "A jet of steam is made to strike against the stream of viscous molten slag as it runs off from the blast furnace. This jet scatters the molten slag into a stream of shot, which is projected forward near the mouth of a large tube, in which a couple of steam jets cause an induced current of air. This tube opens into a receiving chamber, composed chiefly of wire gauze, and measuring about 33 ft. long by 15 ft. wide, and 12 ft. high. As each shot leaves the stream of slag it carries a fine thread or tail with it. The shot, being heavy, falls to the ground, while the fine wool fibre is sucked through the tube and deposited in the chamber. The appearance of this chamber after a charge has been blown into it is singularly beautiful. Not an inch of floor, sides, or roof but is covered with a thick layer of the downy silicate cotton, bringing forcibly to mind the familiar words of the 147th Psalm—

'Large flakes of snow like fleecy wool.'

After each blowing, the wool is removed by forks, and packed in bags for consignment to a London firm—Daniel Dade and Co.—who make it into mattresses which are used for covering steam boilers, and for other purposes where it is desired to prevent the radiation of heat. For this purpose slag wool is eminently adapted, as it is a very bad conductor of heat, and is, moreover, perfectly incombustible. The make of slag wool at the Tees Works is about three tons per week, and as during the running of a 4-ton slag ball about 1½ cwt. of slag wool is made, it follows that for producing these three tons nearly 200 lbs. of slag have to be operated upon.

"Another useful purpose for which blast-furnace slag has been successfully utilized is that of glass manufacture. The vitreous character of slag indicates a resemblance to glass in its composition. It does, in fact, contain the principal components of glass, but not in proper proportions, and those in which it is deficient have therefore to be added, with others which are not present. The glass produced is said to be stronger than ordinary glass, and the color can be varied as required, the natural tint being green. Its working qualities are said to be of the highest order, as it comes from the furnace in the best possible condition for the worker. Some bottles made at Finedon were sent to the Paris Exhibition of 1868, where they obtained honorable mention, a testimony at once to their character."

Raising Tobacco.—The real question at issue is, Is tobacco a good thing or a bad one in the community? If it is a good thing, then the raising of it is commendable. If it is a bad thing, then the raising of it is a poor business—no matter how many honest people it keeps employed. It is never right to do a wrong thing for the purpose of helping others to live. If they can't live in a good business, they have no business to live. So far as tobacco is concerned, we count it bad, thoroughly bad. We think that the use of tobacco is a filthy habit; a stupefying, brain-deadening habit; a habit injurious to one's own health and character, and a nuisance to one's family, and to all who come in contact with him. But here is where we differ with a great many of our readers. If they are right in approving tobacco raising and tobacco-using, we hope that our efforts on the other side will prove of no avail, but that all the rising generation will come to see how good a thing tobacco is, and what a blessing it is in the community. But if our view is the correct one, we trust it will prevail sooner or later—and we have confidence that it will.—S. S. Times.

THE LOWEST PLACE.

"Give me the lowest place,"

"Dear Lord! I cried,
My eager eyes alight
With joy and pride.
Give me the lowest place,
That I may be
Known both to far and near,
As serving thee.

"Give me the lowest place!"

At thy rich feast,
Let all the guests behold
Me last and least;
Along the laden board,
At thy dear face,
To gaze in silence, from
The lowest place.

"Give me the lowest place,"

Lord, thou didst know
The pride that filled my heart,
In praying so;
And, sharp and keenly kind,
The answer came,
To bow my soul in dust,
With sudden shame.

"Give me the lowest place!"

Ah! childish heart,
So brave with ne'er a taste
Of sorrow's amert,
With hands heaped high with flowers,
And snitlil soul—
Wert thou so ready then,
To yield the whole?

"Give me the lowest place!"

O Love, most true,
O tender heart, that all
My weakness knew,
Only a choulder dimmed
My golden day;
One rose of all my sweets
Was snatched away.

"Give me the lowest place!"

Eager my prayer—
"My heart is strong," I said,
"To do and bear."
Yet when the message came
One joy to leave,
I fled the banquet room,
To mourn and grieve.

"Give me the lowest place!"

O pitying Lord,
Whose ear was open to
My foolish word,
Choose thou my place for me,
Or low, or high;
Give me but grace to trust
Thee till I die.

A STAR.

The sky is full of cloud and rain,
And very dark the night;
But far above the frowning clouds
The stars are shining bright.

So life is oft-times filled with storm,
The night seems long and drear,
But throughout all the darkest hours
The star of faith shines clear.

Faith in our God, and in his Son,
His love so full, so free—
And so we are content to walk
A path we cannot see.

And some day, in the years to come,
When our feet shall see the best,
The clouds will lift, the sun will shine,
And life be full of rest.

—Zion's Advocate.

THE SPRING—THE MORNING OF LIFE

Sweet is the time of Spring,
When Nature's charms appear;
The birds with ceaseless pleasure sing,
And hail the opening year.

But sweeter far the spring
Of wisdom and of grace,
When children bless and praise their King,
Who loves the youthful race.

Sweet is the dawn of day,
When light just streaks the sky;
When shades and darkness pass away,
And morning's beams are nigh:

But sweeter far the dawn
Of piety and youth;
When doubt and darkness are withdrawn,
Before the light of Truth.

Sweet is the early dew
Which gilds the mountains' tops,
And decks each plant and flower we view,
With pearls glittering drops:

But sweeter far the scene
On Zion's holy hill;
When there the dew of youth is seen,
Its freshness to distil.

Sweet is the opening flower
Which just begins to bloom,
Which every day and every hour
Fresh beauties will assume:

But sweeter that young heart,
When faith, and love, and peace,
Blossom and bloom in every part
With sweet and varied grace.

Oh may life's early spring
And morning, ere they flee,
Youth's dew, and its fair blossoming,
Be given, my God, to thee.

Sir Walter Trevelyan's Wine-cellar.

At the death of Sir Walter Trevelyan, year in England, so long and honorably identified with the temperance movement in Great Britain, he left the contents of his wine-cellar to Dr. B. W. Richardson, "to be applied scientific purposes." This wine is of choicest brands, and came into the possession of Sir Walter on the death of his father 1846, and has remained buried in the dust; cobwebs of its resting place in the magnificent cellar ever since. Dr. Richardson finds himself in a delicate position, and has written an article for Macmillan's Magazine recently which he says:

"To the last question that is so often asked of me—what I shall do with my trust—I am little able to answer as any one can answer for me. I am instructed to apply for scientific purposes, and how to meet necessity is the difficulty. The difficulty moreover, is not in the least lessened by a multiplicity of suggestions that have been sent me as to method of disposal. I have been offered six, and even eight, times the actual monetary value of the bequest on certain conditions of application, which to some minds might seem quite right and honorable; but which to me do not partake of that character to the extent of leaving my conscience at all to accept the offers. Sir Walter himself, most of the difficulties that I feel. He did not like to destroy the wine, because he held it to be of considerable value from its history, and from the curiosity all lovers and students of antiquities feel for the smallest specimens of the past which mark the history of the past. That feeling I share entirely. I do not think from what I have learned, that he attached much value to the wine intrinsically, as would who like wine for its own sake, and but feeling I share entirely. It certainly was never his wish or intention that the wine should be so applied as to exalt the wine and lead to the encouragement of wine drinking even for the sake of the curious in drinking; and that feeling I also share.

"An enthusiastic and devoted disciple of temperance to the bit would like to "Point a moral and adorn a tale,"

by carrying the wine on a Thames steamer opposite the two Houses of Parliament, while some houses are sitting, and discharging the whole cargo into the Thames, bottle by bottle, the tuncful measure of a minute-gallon. The number of unfortunate widows and other dissolute and afflicted persons who have applied for one or two bottles of the old port it could be difficult to name; in fact, long as I have practiced the healing art, and teacher as I have been of therapeutical science, I could never until now learned to what a number of curative uses old port can be applied in the treatment of disease. It might, if human credence could be accepted as accumulative evidence derived from individual experience and backed by individual authority; be the first, or never yet discovered Elixir Vitæ itself.

"Seriously, the disposal of this gift is a sublime duty. Possibly Sir Walter thought that I could take the wine, and, by a magic scientific spell, transform it into some agent which might be useful to mankind. I lead to no harmful result in return. Or, possibly, he might have supposed that a wand would occur for enabling me to dispose of the wine for an entirely innocuous use. I apply the proceeds to some scientific research in which I might be usefully engaged. These two courses remain open for consideration, and if I could see my way to the last, I should be a happier or less barthened man.

"Meanwhile I have removed the treasure from its old resting-place, and have replaced it in a similar vault, with all due ceremony and care, and with scarcely an accident removed. By this method it is preserved safe, and the antiquaries who are curious at wine may rest in peace until some ingenious suggestion of a practical kind breaks the charm, by showing how one total abstinence can make use of wine which another abstainer has left him, in trust, for the purposes of science."—Exchange.

For "The Friend."

The Ground of Salvation and of Faith.

The British Friend of 3rd month publishes a paper which is preserved in manuscript in the Meeting-house, London, and written by George Keith in 1664, while he was yet in youth with Friends. It is addressed—"To the Simple Hearted, who seek no occasion of stumbling, but desire to learn the Truth as it is in Jesus, and to be informed of our Principles and Practices (who are called Quakers), why we deny the National Church and Ministry."

From it the following instructive passages taken.

Whereas we have been erroneously accused we deny Jesus Christ, and the work and use of his death and sufferings: Be it known that we, confess, and believe in the same Jesus Christ, and not another, as our Saviour, who crucified, and suffered at Jerusalem, and ended up Himself a sacrifice to God, for the whole world, to make way for their reconciliation with Him. But we maintain that a mere historical knowledge of Christ after the flesh is not sufficient for salvation; but that all that would be saved, must come to know the same Jesus Christ revealed in their hearts and souls, else they can have no true hope; for Christ WITHIN is the only hope of glory, as the apostle says (Col. i. 27). And the same apostle, (2 Cor. xiii. 5), calls them reprobates who know not Christ within them. And the same apostle witnessed Him revealed in himself, and said that Christ lived in him (Gal. ii. 20.) And this Jesus Christ promised to all his disciples and followers, that though He went from them as to his bodily appearance, He would come again in Spirit, and be with them in his spiritual appearance for ever; and if any would keep his commandments He would come with his Father and dwell with them (John xiv. 23); which, after Christ was risen and ascended to the Father, the disciples witnessed fulfilled, for He appeared in Spirit unto them, and poured forth upon them a measure of the Spirit, and Life which was in Himself (Acts ii. 1, 4).

"And this is the anointing (1 John ii. 27), and the Name of Jesus, which is as ointment poured forth. And there is no other Name given under heaven whereby one can be saved, but this (Acts iv. 12); which is not the outward name or sound of Jesus, as it may be pronounced, or written, but the Power, the Life, the Light, and Spirit of Jesus, which is eternal, and was in the beginning, and which Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and all the saints in all ages knew, and lived in. And in this Name they met together, and spake the mysteries of the wisdom of God; and they worshipped in this Name, and prayed and praised God in it, and wrought miracles therein. And only the children of God know truly and distinctly this Name of Jesus; it is a mystery to all others.

"Concerning our faith: IT IS IN THIS NAME, VIZ: IN THE POWER OF GOD. Herein it stands even in the Name of Jesus Christ, who is the Wisdom and Power of God, and was with the Father before the world began. And the only true belief and faith of a Christian is that which is the gift of God, and is received by immediate inspiration and revelation of God; and no truth can be sufficiently believed, but as it is revealed immediately by Jesus Christ in man and woman's heart.

"And there is no true knowledge of God but by the Son, which is his own testimony.—'No man knows the Father save the Son, and he to whom the Son reveals Him' (Matt. x. 27). So that all knowledge of God and Christ, and faith and belief in Him, is not the true knowledge of faith, [if we] have not come to know, feel, and possess Christ within us, and witness Him the Fountain of living waters in our hearts and souls, feeding us with his flesh and blood, which is his heavenly virtue and power, whereby men are regenerated and made partakers of the Divine nature, wherein they live, move, and have their being, and are God's off-spring, and grow as branches out of Him who is their Root; and they are members of his body, and his Life and Spirit possesses and dwells in them, is their life, strength, and salvation, their corn, wine, and oil, the manna from heaven, which came down to give life unto the world. For when mankind by transgression fell from God, God sent his Son unto them, who might bring back lost men to God again, and put him into the enjoyment of God his Maker, which is man's chief end and blessedness. And till man come to the enjoyment of God again, and live and dwell in his Maker and Creator, death reigns over him: he is blind, deaf, and without feeling of God, notwithstanding all his acquired literal, traditional knowledge of God and Christ.

"And the things of God's kingdom are a mystery to him, for they can only be learned in the Light of Christ, which shineth in man's heart in the darkness—which the darkness cannot comprehend. But there is that in man which is capable of being quickened and enlightened by the Light of Christ,—the immortal part in everyone, which, though sin, is hidden in spiritual death, bondage, and captivity, till it be raised up and quickened by the virtue and power of the Light of Christ, and the effectual sound of his voice which quickens the dead. And by the hearing of this voice and Word alone comes the true faith. And when men departed from this, the apostasy came in, and thick darkness covered the earth, and men lost the true knowledge of God by his Spirit, and grew strong in the literal knowledge; and whenever anything of the teaching of God's Spirit appeared in any all along this dark night of apostasy (as the Lord had ever witnesses for his Truth, more or less), they persecuted and derided such as held the testimony of Jesus, which is the spirit of prophecy. All immediate revelation and inspiration of God were cried down, and then the inventions got up, and the form was retained without the life and power. This was the beginning of Babylon's kingdom, and the rise of the apostasy.

"Our main principle is: That Jesus Christ has enlightened every man that comes into the world, with such a measure of Light, which, if believed in, should save and redeem all. And this grace is as abundant as sin.

"For as by one man's offence judgment came on all to condemnation, so by the righteousness of One, the Free Gift came upon all to justification of life (Rom. v. 18). And that which every man in some season [called in Scripture the day of visitation] experiences in himself to reprove him when he thinks, speaks, or does evil, and strives with him, and draws him to that which is good, even to soberness, righteousness, and godliness, is the very Light of Christ, which is the condemnation of all who believe not in it, and shall make all without excuse before God; for it is the talent given freely of God to every man to profit withal, and to the careless and slothful servant becomes judgment, but to all that believe in it becomes salvation.

"And though at first it be as to its manifestation, but AS A LITTLE SEED, yet as it is diligently waited upon, and dealt tenderly with, and not choked or smothered, it grows up into a tree, and is the Tree of Life, and many are brought to sit under the shadow of this Tree, and to eat of the fruit thereof with great delight. And it is pleasant to our taste, being full of God's heavenly virtue and power, whereby our souls live, and shall live for ever, as we keep faithful to the end.

"And so we hold forth this to others (and our doctrine is according to Scripture), that A DOOR IS SET OPEN TO ALL in a day [or season], (which whose sights is rejected, and none else), and SALVATION in a day IS POSSIBLE TO ALL. AND THE ONLY WAY THERETO, IS BY BE-

LIVING IN CHRIST THE LIGHT, AND OBEDIENCE THERETO."

"And whereas we are charged with making our own works and righteousness the ground and cause of our justification. This is another mistake. For we are saved by grace, and that not of ourselves; and we look for the remission and pardon of our sins freely for Christ's sake. And our own righteousness after the law, we see to be but dross and loss, and renounce it, that we may be found in Christ, clothed with his righteousness, knowing Him to be the Fountain and principle of all our actions and works being wrought in God. And only such works God accepts, and such only are justifiable in his sight, because they are wrought in Him, where impurity and imperfection can have no place.

"And we deny that sin is any further pardoned than its filthiness is cleansed away. And a person is no more justified than he is sanctified. And though sanctification may be distinguished, yet it is not divided, from justification, for they are always together, and of an equal extent and latitude: and though we may be said to be justified by works wrought in God, and proceeding from a living faith, as James speaks (James ii. 17, 26), yet the prime justification is by the Worker, Jesus Christ himself; He in us, and we in Him, made one Spirit with Him through faith; and such an say, He is near that justifieth, who can condemn?"

Madagascar.

For "The Friend."

Trübner & Co., of London, have recently published a book on this great island, written by James Sibree, Jr., who for years was employed as a missionary among its inhabitants. It is exceeded in size by only two islands in the world, being 975 miles in length from north to south, and about 250 miles in average width—in the widest part reaching 350 miles—and has an area of nearly four times that of England and Wales. It consists of two great divisions—an elevated interior region from 3000 to 5000 feet above the ocean, and a comparatively level country surrounding it of 400 or 500 feet of elevation. A large part of the interior is covered with bright-red clay, from which granitic and basaltic rocks protrude—the highest mountain peaks being about 9000 feet above sea level. A good deal of this portion of Madagascar is bare and somewhat dreary-looking country. The long rolling hills are covered with a coarse grass, which becomes very brown and dry towards the end of the seven months' rainless season; but the hollows and river valleys are often filled with a luxuriant tropical vegetation, and, wherever there is population, with the bright green of the rice fields.

Among the interesting physical features of the northern part of the island, is a remarkable rock fortress of the tribe inhabiting that region, who are called by a native name, meaning "the people of the rocks." It is an enormous, lofty and precipitous rock, having an elevation of nearly 1000 feet, and covering an area of about eight square miles. Its sides are so precipitous that they cannot be climbed unless artificial means are used, and it is thickly wooded wherever trees can possibly grow. The only entrance into the interior of the rock, which is full of caves, is by means of a subterranean passage, a portion of which is extremely narrow, allowing only a single person to pass along it at a time, and has on each side of it deep water.

Another feature of Madagascar is the existence of an almost continuous belt of virgin forest all round the island, and generally following the coast-line. This forest divides into two belts on the eastern side of the country, leaving a narrow valley about 250 miles long between the two lines. North of this valley the two lines unite, and here is the widest portion of the forest, it being about forty miles across. The total length of this forest line is about 2300 miles.

There is abundant evidences of former volcanic action in different parts of the more elevated regions of Madagascar, which Dr. Mullens, who traveled over the central districts of the island, thus describes: "When we ascended the lofty hill overhanging the western end of the lake (Itasy), crater after crater met our astonished gaze. Some were of enormous size, some were small; some were cones, others were hollow, or were horseshoe in shape, and had long ridges of lava running out from the open side. There were forty craters in all, of which we were sure; we think there were others beyond to the north." "Fifty miles further south we came on the volcanoes again. We climbed a lofty rounded hill called Ivoko, and then found that we were on the crater wall. The inner hollow was a quarter of a mile wide, the height of the wall above the level country outside was 1000 feet. Two lava streams went out towards the south and west; three small craters were at the foot, and others large and conspicuous, were around us on every side. Close by, another huge crater, Iatsitra, had its opening towards the north, and the lava that had issued from it was fresh, black and sharp, as if broken yesterday. But stranger still, at its eastern side was a plain a mile square, covered with heaps of lava, like stone cottages, fortresses, ruined palaces. I counted thirty gates; it was clear noted numberless smaller ones; it was clear that at one time the entire plain had been on fire, that a hundred jets of fire and flame and molten lava had spouted from its surface. The heaps were now old and moss-grown, but we were informed of a vague tradition among the people that their ancestors had seen these flames bursting forth."

To the same volcanic agency must be ascribed the existence of a remarkable valley called Mandritsara, unknown to Europeans till visited by J. A. Houllier, in 1876. It is a great basin, or rather, a mighty elongated pit, sunk deep down among the surrounding heights. It is about 30 miles long, and about 2000 feet below the level of the country. There had evidently been a great commotion going on there in the ages gone by, for all the long valley is dotted with rounded hills, giving it the look of a boiling water or bubbling pitch, which by some strange process had suddenly become congealed.

The inhabitants of Madagascar evidently belong to the Malay race, and it is a remarkable fact, that though only a comparatively narrow strip of 230 miles of water separates it from Africa, yet the animals which it contains are in a general way much more closely allied to the South Asian species, and to those which inhabit the islands of the Indian Ocean than to those of the adjacent continent. These facts give a degree of probability to the theory which has been adopted by some naturalists, that Madagascar, the Mascarene Islands and other groups are the remnants of a continent which in former ages occupied the space now covered by the Indian Ocean and which has in great part sunk beneath the waters in the process of that gradual change in the earth's surface, of which there is abundant evidence in almost every part of the globe which is accessible for examination. Many of the islands in that ocean have circling coral reefs, which indicates that the islands are still sinking, as is shown by Darwin's researches on the formation of coral.

Among the peculiarities of its native fauna must be noted the absence of the larger feline there being no lions, tigers or leopards; nor of the hoofed tribes but a single species—river-hog, sole relative of the hippopotamus, rhinoceros and buffalo; and there is no zebu giraffe, or any of the numerous families—antelopes which scour the African plain. There is no elephant browsing in its woods and no apes or monkeys living in its trees. It is the headquarters of the Lemuridae, a family somewhat allied to the monkeys, their arboreal habits, and yet quite distinct. Of the known species, much the larger portion belong to Madagascar. Of the insect eating mammalia, there are nine species, small animals allied to the European hedge-hogs, some of them having a covering of strong spines. They are found in the wood and especially in the low, scattered scrub wood and fern-overgrown land in the vicinity of the forests from which the trees have been removed. Our author says of them: "During our usual yearly holiday at our sanatorium on the outskirts of the inner line of forest, frequently met with three or four varieties these harmless creatures while rambling the outskirts of the woods. Our dog chased them, but she generally came by with her mouth and nostrils stuck as full prickles as a pincushion is of pins." They do not roll themselves into a ball like hedge-hogs, but place the head between fore-paws, and their spines and prickly hair probably serve them equally well as a protection from their enemies.

Birds are abundant. The most remarkable is the now extinct species of a land bird of the ostrich family of gigantic size called Eppornis maximus, whose eggs are the largest known. A few of these eggs have been found in the southern portion of the island and they have the capacity of six or seven ostrich eggs, or of one hundred and forty-odd eggs of the common fowl.

Among reptiles it is a remarkable fact, that with two or three exceptions, the serpents of Madagascar are harmless. The crocodiles are very abundant, swarming in every river and lake. Sibree says that in a journey down the Betisboka river, "we saw as many as a hundred in a day, a dozen together often seen basking in the sun on a sand bank. They are so dangerous in some places that every village on the banks of the river is carefully fenced off with strong stakes that the women and girls can draw we without the risk of being seized by the jaws or swept off by the tail of those voracious creatures. The eggs of the crocodile are about the size of three of a turkey, and collected and sold for food in the market. Owing to the superstitious dread with which they are regarded, the natives never kill crocodile except in retaliation for one of their friends or neighbors who has been destroyed by them. They believe that the wanton destruction of these reptiles will be followed by the loss of human life, in accordance with the principle of lex talionis. The inhabitants living in the neighborhood of Lake Itasy, are accused of the central province, are accusers of crocodiles, warning them that they shall receive the death of some of their friends by killing as many of them in return, and warning the well-disposed crocodiles to keep out of the way, as they have no quarrel with them, but only with their evil-minded relatives who have taken human life.

Religious Items, &c.

Mennonite View of Baptism.—The Herald quotes from Menno, the following passages, to show that he did not attribute any saving efficacy to water baptism. "We must be born from above, must be changed and renewed in our hearts, transplanted from an unrighteous and evil nature of Adam, unto a true and good nature of Christ, or we can never be saved by any means."

"The new birth consists, verily, not in uttering words; but it is the heavenly, living and quickening power of God in our hearts."

"Not, my beloved, that we believe in the mission of sins through baptism; by no means; because by baptism we cannot obtain life and repentance."

Interesting, if true.—We find in an exchange of following items. Not trusting the authority on which it rests, its truth seems doubtful.

"El. Kery, a native of Samaria, educated England, and a returned missionary physician, discovered a Synagogue Record, kept ancient Sychar, that reaches back hundreds years before Christ. He learned that the first in Christ's time was named Shaffar, searching the Record for some possible of Jesus' visit, he found instead the following important testimony to his crucifixion: the 19th century of my priesthood, and the 1st year of the world, Jesus of Nazareth, the of Mary, was crucified at Jerusalem."

"Tendency of Priestcraft."—M. Finity, writing the Christian Advocate, thus speaks on this ect:

"I state what I know to be true from years experience in this Church, that the mass of man Catholics allow the priests to do their thing for them. They commit the keeping their immortal souls to the care of the priests, and settle down into a state of apathy and religious indifference. The priests claim monopoly in spiritual matters, and thus they have the minds of their people, preventing independent thought which is so essential to the development of a manly and Christian character. The faithful Catholic is required to see with the eye, hear with the ear, and think with the mind of the priest, for to be independent and think for oneself is deemed heresy. His mind is fettered by doctrines of and decrees of councils requiring assent, whether reasonable or unreasonable, scriptural or unscriptural, and he is given to understand he has no right to hold an opinion contrary to that of the Church.

"When I began to investigate religious questions for myself, and ask the reason for certain doctrines of my Church; when I wanted to know the reason for praying to the Virgin Mary and bowing the knee to images, and other doctrines of this nature, then my Catholic brethren thought they saw in me the bud of Protestantism, and were not slow to tell me so. Their answers to my honest inquiries were: 'Why, the boy is becoming a Protestant!' To ask questions, they thought, was a sure sign of coming apostasy.

"For ages the Romish Church has been making encroachments upon the liberty of man, especially that inward liberty of thought which our everlasting Father designed for the training and development of the hidden forces of our nature. These encroachments have been going on and developing, while freedom of thought has been harassed and denounced by a bigoted and enthusiastic priesthood, until nothing remains in the Church of Rome to-day but one giddy height of despotism and one dead level of religious subserviency. The devoted Roman Catholic is mentally and morally a slave. He dares not think except as his Church permits him to think; and it is true, as Mr. Gladstone says: 'No one can now become her convert without renouncing his moral and mental freedom, and placing his civil loyalty and duty at the mercy of another.'"

Natural History, Science, &c.

Making a Queen Bee.—J. Hunter, in a paper read to the Quaker Microscopical Club, states that if the Queen Bee is removed from a hive, after a few hours' commotion the bees select certain of the worker-eggs, or even young larvae two or three days old. The cell is enlarged to five or six times its ordinary capacity; a superabundance of totally different food is supplied; and the result is, that in five days less than would have been required for a worker, a queen is hatched.

Meteorite Dust.—Meteorite dust has been collected on the summits of snow-covered mountains. In the snows of Scandinavia and Finland, or those lying far within the Arctic circle, hundreds of miles from any human habitation, particles of meteoric iron have been found. Nay, in matter raised from the bottom of deep oceans, magnetic particles have been detected, which must have come that air from inter-planetary space. We know in other ways, that meteoric matter is constantly falling upon the earth. There is a constant interest in the actual recognition of this cosmic dust. As Humboldt says of the larger meteoric masses which have visibly fallen on the earth: "Accustomed to know non-telluric bodies solely by measurement, and by the inferences of our touch, weigh, and submit to chemical analysis metallic and earthy masses appertaining to the world without."

Communication among Ants.—A gift analogous to that of language has not been withheld from ants; if part of their building is destroyed, an official is seen coming out to examine the damage; and, after a careful survey of the ruins, he chirps a few clear and distinct notes, and a crowd of workers begin at once to repair the breach. When the work is completed, another order is given, and the workmen retire, as will appear on removing the soft freshly-built portion. We tried to sleep one rainy night in a native hut, but could not, because of the attacks by the fighting battalions of a very small species of formica [ant], not more than one-sixteenth of an inch in length. It soon became obvious that they were under regular discipline, and even attempting to carry out the skillful plans and stratagems of some eminent leader. Our hands and necks were the first objects of attack. Large bodies of these little pests were massed in silence round the point to be assailed. We could hear the sharp shrill word of command two or three times repeated, though, till then we had not believed in the vocal power of an ant; the instant after we felt the storming hosts range over head and neck, biting the tender skin, clinging with a death-grip to the hair, and parting with their jaws rather than quit their hold. On our being driven off in the hope of their having and all still, till the manoeuvre was repeated. Clear and audible orders were issued, and the assault renewed. It was as hard to sleep in that hut as in the trenches before Sebastopol. —D. Livingstone.

Religion must be at a low ebb when Christian ministers and their people plead the cause of the theatre as a good thing. Christian friend, whoever you may be, if you thus plead, you must be living far below your privileges as one in Christ. What pleasure can be equal to such as are found in Him? What joy like the joy of the Christian, whose peace is that which passeth all understanding? Who has a right to be as joyous and happy? None other.

He can afford to give up the frivolities of life for his higher pleasures, which elevate him, so as to turn with disgust from representations of the depravities of human nature, beholding them with sorrow continually around him.—The Ep. Recorder.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 8, 1880.

We have received a communication from a distant correspondent, who expresses his concern because many of those who ought to watch over the spiritual interests of the flock are too much absorbed in their outward business. That this is the case with some, we do not doubt; yet we think the remarks of our friend are too broadly expressed to render it safe to publish his article in the form in which it reached us. We have no doubt that there are still preserved in our borders many upright members, whose chief concern is to lay up treasures in Heaven; and the main bent of whose desires is, to be found serving the Lord and his people according to the Divine will. It has been our experience to mingle with such, and we have not generally found them disposed to "converse eagerly after meetings of their worldly affairs."

In this state of existence, we must necessarily exert ourselves both mentally and physically to provide for the outward wants of ourselves and families. It is both natural and right, that we should feel a proper interest in that which claims so large a share of time and effort; and that parents should train their children in those habits of economy, industry and thrift, and in that knowledge of business which will fit them for the active duties of life. John Parker, a valuable minister of Chester Co., Pennsylvania, who died perhaps fifty years ago, at one time paid a religious visit in a section of country where the people were so negligent of their farms and business. After his return home, he said that in his religious labors he had usually felt called to turn the people's thoughts away from the earth, but in this instance he had to advise them to look more carefully after their outward business. No doubt he believed that negligence and slothfulness are no signs of godliness. For slothfulness is generally founded on selfishness—an unwillingness to lay aside our own personal ease and perform those labors which rightly devolve upon us.

Yet there is much danger of a worldly spirit gradually growing and gaining an ascendancy in the heart, leaving an outward form of religion, while the life and virtue of it has decayed. Those in this condition are not obeying the Saviour's command, to seek first the kingdom of Heaven and the righteousness thereof. We fear that it is to the prevalence of this worldly spirit we must ascribe the false estimate placed upon men, to which our correspondent alludes, which unduly values those who have the faculty of accumulating property, and underestimates the worth and ability of those who know not how to add field to field, or investment to investment, or even to retain unimpaired the inheritance which may have descended to them.

We often receive communications and suggestions from valued correspondents, which commend themselves to our judgment—and which we lay aside for use in the columns of our paper. But the need of giving proper space to each of the different classes of subjects which are presented to our readers, and the accumulation of material beyond the capacity of our Journal to publish, frequently cause some delay in the appearance of such articles. We hope our correspondents will make due allowances for this delay, and not hastily conclude that their labor has been in vain.

From Eldredge & Brother, No. 17 North Seventh St., Philadelphia, comes a small book on the Cultivation of the Senses, being one of a series of volumes designed for the use of teachers especially. They are a reprint of an English series. A cursory examination of the work has made a favorable impression, which is strengthened by the testimony of a teacher to whom it was submitted. As every one is in some sense a teacher as well as a learner, the usefulness of such treatises may extend far beyond the class for whose instruction they were primarily issued.

We have received from the author, Charles Northend, through the publishers, D. Appleton & Co., of New York, a memorial volume, containing a sketch of the life and labors of Elitha Burritt.

It gives an interesting account of his early life, of his zealous efforts to educate himself, of his earnest and almost life-long labors in the cause of peace and universal brotherhood, and of his tour through the famine-stricken districts of Ireland at the time of the distress caused by the potato-rot in 1846—7. It contains also several extracts from his numerous works, and from his journal.

Mailed to any address for $2.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The average temperature for 4th month, at Philadelphia, was 52.9 degrees—one degree higher than the average for the past five years. Highest temperature 81 deg. on the 14th and 15th. Lowest 29 deg. on the 12th. Total rainfall 2.43 inches. Prevailing direction of wind south-west—maximum velocity 43 miles per hour. Total number of days on which rain or snow fell 10. Frosts occurred on the 8th, 11th and 12th.

The annual report of the Chief Engineer of the Water Department places last year's receipts from all sources at $1,419,179.07, an increase of $424,047.02 over the previous year. The total capacity of the Department's pumping machinery is said to be 127,000,000 gallons daily, of which 86,000,000 are raised by water-power. Additional steam pumpage power is asked for, so as to be prepared for contingencies, and permit of a maximum supply being pumped daily if necessary. The report closes with recommendations for laying larger pipes and mains throughout the entire city.

The public debt statement for last month shows a reduction of $12,078,070.50.

There are now under regular training in the Indian School at Carlisle, Pa., ten boys as carpenters, six as millwrights, six as tinners, six as saddlers, one as printer, and the others who are old enough for agricultural instruction.

During last week 134 petitions from iron and steel manufacturers throughout the country have been presented to the U. S. Senate, asking the passage of a bill authorizing a commission to review the tariff. The petitions contain a copy of a recent letter by the President of the American Iron and Steel Association, setting forth reasons for favoring the passage of the Eaton bill.

The first barrel of Georgia flour of this season was shipped to Macon. The wheat was cut in Kentucky on the 10th ult., four and a half months after it was sown.

The State Board of Pardons, at a special meeting held in Harrisburg, recommended that the sentence of imprisonment on the five men convicted of bribery, under the Bribe Bill, be set aside, before the bill is re-committed, and the remainder of the sentence, imposing fines and disqualification to hold office of trust or profit, be executed. In accordance with this request, the parties were released from jail upon payment of fines and costs.

The arrival of immigrants at New York is said to be daily increasing. During last month there arrived 45,274—which is the largest number that ever arrived in one month.

The crops throughout Alabama are reported to be several weeks behind those of last year, and the weather continues unfavorable. On the 30th ult., snow fell in parts of Pennsylvania, and ice formed in some places a quarter of an inch thick.

The number of deaths in this city for the week ending on the 1st, was 311. Of this number 183 were adults, and 128 children. Some of the principal causes of death were consumption, 87; diphtheria, 52; cholera, 11; scarlet fever, 7; typhoid fever, 9; inflammation of lungs, 27; paralysis, 11; old age, 20.

Markets, &c.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 106½; do, 5½, 105; 4½; registered, 108; coupon, 109½; 4½, 107½.

Cotton.—There was very little movement, and prices fairly steady at 12½ to 12½ cts. per pound.

Wool.—The market inactive, and there is scarcely any demand from either manufacturers or dealers. Sales of Ohio fine at 52 cts.; combing Ohio, 1, 55 cts.; unwashed, 44 cts.; unwashed Virginia, 47½ cts.

Petroleum.—Grade 7½ cts. in barrels, and refined 7½ cts. for export, and 7½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Linseed oil, 80 cts. Lard oil, 47 58 cts.; neat's foot, 55 75 cts.

Flour.—The demand is better, and prices have an upward tendency. Minnesota extras, $5.25 a $6.25; Pennsylvania, extra family, at $5.50 a $6; western, $5.75 a $6.15. Rye-flour $4.25 a $4.37½ per barrel.

Grain.—The wheat market unsettled and higher. Sales of red at $1.26, and amber $1.28 per bushel. Rye, 85 cts. Corn is in fair demand and firm—mixed, 50 cts.; yellow, 52 a 52½ cts. Oats are firm. Sales of mixed at 42 1/2 cts. in cts. and white at 42 a 45 cts.

Stocks.—Chicago, 67 a 71 cts. per lb.; timothy is dull at $3.95 a $3; dressed, $1.50 a $1.60 per bushel.

Hay and straw.—Average price during the week—Prime timothy, $1 a $1.10 per 100 pounds; mixed, 95 cts. a $1.05; straw, 1 1/25 a $1.50 per 100 pounds.

Butcher's meats in fair demand at former rates.—200 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5½ cts. per lb., as to quality.

Sheep were in demand and rather firm—6000 head sold at the different yards at 5 a 7½ cts. per lb., lambs at 6 a 9 cts. per lb., the latter for springers.

Hogs were a fraction higher—6500 head sold at a 7½ cts. per lb., as to condition.

Cows were unchanged—180 head sold at $20 a $25 per head.

FOREIGN.—The changes in the British Parliament and Cabinet, are said to have brought an element of uncertainty into European politics, which gives scope to imagination. The sending of Austrian and German military detachments to St. Petersburg to congratulate the Czar on his birthday, is interpreted as a new reconstitution of the alliance of the three emperors. The union of three advanced Liberal leaders in the Italian Chamber of Deputies for the overthrow of the Cairoli Ministry, is also attributed to the changes in England.

In reference to the new Ministry, the Spectator says: "We believe the new Ministry will prove a very strong reforming Government, with very potent securities against any rash or violent change."

The appointment of Earl Cowper as Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, it is hoped will give general satisfaction. The distress among the Irish peasantry is thought to be their interest, has pointed out will not be ready to use before the first of Seventh month, and fresh applications are made for additional contributions for their relief either in provisions or clothing.

The dispatch boat Salamis, which accompanied Channel squadron to the Azores in search of the trading ship Albatross, which was wrecked off the Irish coast, brings no news of the missing vessel. It is now believed that the vessel was lost in one of the terrific gales known to have prevailed soon after she left Bermuda.

had on board over 300 young seamen and 11 officers. St. Petersburg.—The plague is said to have appeared in the Volok district in the Government of Saratoff, famine also prevails, and a number of peasants died of starvation. In the Don district the grana are said to be empty, and there is an absolute dearth of money. The newspapers announce, that with the turn of spring the usual outbreak of rice is reported from various parts of the country.

Rome.—The King has signed a decree dissolving the Chamber of Deputies. Elections will be held on 16th, and the new Chamber will meet on the 25th.

Paris.—A committee of nineteen members has formed to raise a fund for the defence of religious liberty. The society have also formed a Finance Committee, and appointed delegates to come to an understanding with their colleagues in the provinces, regard to a general Socialistic revolutionary program, which will form the basis of action at all future times.

Madrid.—An official dispatch has been received announcing that the submarine telegraph cable, to Singapore to the Philippine Islands, has been completely laid.

WANTED

A Friend and his wife, to take charge of the Fair Tunesness, and to have the general superintendency of the school and family at that place.

Application may be made to Samuel Morris, Olney P. O., Philadelphia. Joseph L. Bailey, Pine Iron Works, Berks Co. Joseph S. Elkinton, 325 Pine St., Philadelphia.

For "The Friend."

Soren Olsen.

In the 24th volume of "The Friend," there has been published an interesting account of the sufferings endured by two young men in Norway, who had become so fully convinced of the unlawfulness of war for Christians, that they were willing to suffer imprisonment rather than serve on board of the king's ships at war. The narrative says:

"One of them named Soren Olsen was taken on board a ship at Stavanger, where he was severely treated, but not being able to make his con- tance, he was ordered to be imprisoned at Fredericksvern. Friends obtained a par- tial opportunity with him, which was a slender thing. He was about 22 years of age, and had received scarcely any school- ing, but the Lord had for some time been working in his heart by the operations of his Holy Spirit, opening his understanding to the mys- teries of salvation, and the true nature of the Christian dispensation. During his imprisonment he wrote the following letter to one of the Friends at Stavanger, :

"Fredericksvern, Sixth mo. 20th, 1848.

"In a tender and living love, I think of you, friends, and always remember you. We parted at Korten on the 14th inst.; and when for conscience sake, refused to work in any thing pertaining to war, I was put in prison being subjected to many examinations, and expected to have been beaten. On the 15th, I was removed to this place, and have been again examined, and am expecting some further punishment. I will therefore be patient, though I often feel something that is passing in my mind, and am scarcely able to be as watchful as I ought. I have nothing to glory in but weakness and infirmities; the Lord is my confidence and my comfort in tribulation."

"Seventh month 2nd. He writes that he is still confined in the same prison, and has been sentenced to be whipped three days, which is considered capital punishment; but that the Lord was about to be laid before Oscar, the King, in the hope that it will be mitigated. I often feel that impatience is ready to break in upon me; but the Lord be praised, who, up to this time, has preserved me, and I do feel an excellent thing, when the distress of my heart is made to burst forth before the Lord. I salute you all, dear Friends, in love, &c., SOREN OLSEN."

"On the 19th of Eleventh month, 1848, Soren Olsen was discharged, and permitted to return to his family, after twenty weeks' imprisonment, during the last ten days of which he was kept on bread and water only. His prison was a very uncomfortable one, and his diet at all times scanty and poor; but he bore up with cheerful resignation, and on his return looked both healthy and happy, evincing the serenity and quietude of a peaceful mind."

Soren was born at Stavanger on 24 mo. 23, 1827, and came to this country in 1851; settling originally in Wisconsin, and from thence moving into Iowa. Many years after, in conversing with a friend, he said, that during this imprisonment in the old country, he was allowed but a very small portion of the bread and water on which he subsisted—the design being to add to his sufferings by hunger. He spoke also of how weak he felt at the time of his release from prison. He was then about 300 miles from home, and had but little money, so that he supposed he must go to work to earn enough to pay his passage. But the post-master of the place told him of a vessel that was going direct to Stavanger. He went immediately to see the captain, who agreed to take him, and risk getting his pay on his arrival at home. He had barely time to get the little baggage he had out of shore before the vessel sailed.

He joined the Society of Friends, through conviction of the truth of its principles; and his attachment to its doctrines remained firm to the end of life. It was therefore with great sorrow that he observed the introduction into its borders of many things which he regarded as inconsistent with its original principles. This is clearly shown in many of the letters written during the last five or six years of his life, which, in simple but pathetic language, express his mournful emotions.

In the early part of the year 1874, one of the ministers of Ohio Yearly Meeting visited the part of Iowa in which he resided. This opened the way for further intercourse with members of that Yearly Meeting, residing in Iowa, to whom he found himself increasingly united in feeling, and with whom, after several years' deliberation, he joined in membership in 1878.

Under date of 4th mo. 20th, 1874, he thus writes to the minister whose visit is above referred to.

"It is a great comfort to know that we have friends that can feel and sympathize with us when we are tried and proved. It has been and still is my lot to be tried and proved on account of the still increasing decline or dilapidation in our Society. This is a great sorrow to me, so much so that I believe my natural strength is wearing away with it. * * * The great majority seem inclined to go back to that which our early Friends came out of, and which they faithfully testified against and suffered for. * * * In viewing our part of the Society, I am ready to exclaim: The testimonies of the Lord are trodden down, and the ark of the covenant; and how shall we regain it, and who is sufficient for these things?

"I did not know anything about the doctrine and practice of the Society of Friends before I was convinced, which was about the age of 18 years; and as the doctrine and testimonies of Friends were dear and precious to me then, so they have ever been; and therefore it goes hard with me to see them violated and disregarded; and it is my earnest desire to support them; although I am quite sensible it is under many weaknesses and frailties of the flesh."

About the same time he addressed a letter to S. W. S., a Friend residing in Linn Co., Iowa, from which the following passages are taken:

"I received thy acceptable letter yesterday; thereby understanding that thou art concerned for my preservation in the Truth; and directing me to 'the alone true Teacher.' This is very kind, for it seems to me, that when we feel a concern for one another, and are brought to sympathize with each other, and baptized into suffering one with another, it is evident that we are members one of another, and brethren and sisters of the household of love. As our members are separated, members rejoice with it, and as one member suffers all the members suffer with it."

"Trials are increasing here. One step after another is taken in bringing in of innovations and wrong things; many go so far as to put a wrong construction on the doctrines and practices of our early Friends in order to defend modernized Quakerism. So, I have been ready to exclaim in secret, 'Oh, the twisting, twining serpent, how he can beguile poor man! Unsoundness, and a lack of understanding, and a clear discernment in regard to our early Friends' doctrine and practice, causes wrong things to grow amongst us."

"The Church tries to deck and to cover herself with a covering that is not of the Lord's making; but it seems to me plain that she will never shine forth in her true beauty under that covering; she will never come forth under great pretensions and display of religion, but she must come forth under sufferings and deep baptisms; her children must be such that have come out of great tribulations, &c. I am deeply tried with things, and my poor heart is almost bended down under it; but it is a blessed comfort that we have one sure Rock of defence to flee to in time of trouble, the Captain of our salvation, by whom alone we will be able to conquer."

In a letter to the same Friend, dated Le Grand, Iowa, 5th mo. 14th, 1874, after speaking of the distribution of some books and tracts which had been left in his charge, and of the "delight" which he took in spreading a knowledge of "the doctrines, views and practices of Friends in earlier days," he adds: "It seems to me the Society is in a very declining state; and it seems to me that as far as it departs from the life and the power, and the sense and savor of it, so far it becomes identified with Antichrist, the false Church, which always makes great pretension to this and that, yet she is full of profession and pretension. But as for my part, I have to look well to my own steppings. I hope I am not unmindful of my own danger. May the Lord protect his people however poor, scattered and few they may be; and it is for them to learn to be content under every dispensation that is meted out to them."

Having received a letter from a Friend in Philadelphia in reference to the distribution of religious books, he replies, under date of 31st Mo. 10th, 1814, that he is "more than willing to assist" in carrying out the concern. He then refers to the condition of our Society in the parts which came under his observation, and adds, "Yet here are not a few tried ones amongst us. I have a little testified against the wrong proceedings, for which I have to suffer and bear the reproach. Oh how I long to see the day, that Friends could all be united in the truth, and rally round the old standard! Surely the doctrines and testimonies of our predecessors are too precious to fall to the ground; and the longer I live, the more I feel this.

"Although thou art a stranger to me (as to the outward), yet I feel a love to cover my mind while I am penning these few lines; and my love is to all the true and faithful Friends everywhere."

Another letter to the same Friend in reference to some books which had been received, contains this brief reference to the trials consequent on faithful adherence to the "old standard":—"We are a few of us left here that cannot go with the strong current that seems to sweep everything with it as it goes; and therefore we are despised, reproached and called by nicknames. May the portion of the true Israel be preserved wherever scattered."

In a letter to his Philadelphia correspondent, written 3rd mo. 6th, 1875, he again refers to the same subject, as follows:

"I received thy welcome letter last evening; and I was truly glad to get another letter from thee, for it is a comfort to me to receive such evidences of the notice of my friends, as it seems to be a day of deep proving, and rather increasingly so, as there is more and more of a departure from the primitive standard, and a bold and open [repudiation] of the doctrines and testimonies of our early Friends; which is a sorrowful fact. I never in my life saw such a confusion as I witnessed just now in a revival or protracted meeting (as they call them) held and conducted by such that go under the name of Friends, here at Le Grand. The meeting held several hours, where there was hardly a moment's silence; and then the lower gallery benches were cleared and occupied for 'mourners' benches'; and quite a number went to work all over the house to persuade and even compel people to come forward to 'confess,' and to receive a 'blessing'; and some were praying, and some talking, and some singing; and this kind of meeting has held now for nearly a week, day and night; and I do not know how much longer it will hold. It is a wonder to me how people can be so grossly deluded. This is a very short hint, but it will give thee and others an idea of things hereaway. And because I can take no part or unito with such innovations, and rather testified against it, I am treated with a great deal of contempt, and looked upon with an eye of suspicion. But there is no other way than to be willing to suffer and to bear what may come upon us, and to have confidence in the Lord.

Madagascar.

Among the insects of Madagascar are many species of locusts. Some of the smaller kinds are used for food by the people. Divested of wings and limbs, they are dried and exposed for sale in great heaps in the markets. They are generally fried in fat, and are not unpleasant in taste.

Many of the spiders are very large and brilliantly colored. The legs of some of the largest spread over a circle of six or seven inches in diameter. They spin immense geometric webs, which span the beds of considerable streams or wide paths; and these are anchored to the surrounding vegetation by such strong silken cords that it requires an effort to break them. Our author says: "Some years ago I spent a long afternoon on a hill to the south of the capital with two friends, catching spiders. We obtained a great number, including from thirty to forty different species; some of these were like small crabs rather than spiders. Only recently, however, did I meet with one of the venomous spiders of the island. This insect is about the size of a small marble, almost perfectly globular in shape, of a shining glossy black, and with black legs, but it has a small red spot on the abdomen. Its bite is said by the natives to be fatal and it probably is so unless speedy measures are taken to cauterize the wound."

Small scorpions are not uncommon in the warmer parts of the island, and centipedes are numerous. These latter have an unpleasant habit of getting into any small hole or crevice in the wood work of houses, often choosing the hollows for the bolts of shutters and windows. Their bite is extremely painful, resembling the touch of a red-hot iron, but it is not very dangerous if some simple remedies are applied. Besides the venomous centipedes there are in the forest great numbers of a perfectly harmless millipede, a series of shining black rings, eight or nine inches long, with numerous legs which move like successive waves. Another variety, called by the natives "Star-droppings," is completely covered with a wonderfully beautiful coat of mail. The segments are so shaped that when the creature is alarmed it rolls itself into a ball, every plate fitting into the other, and forming an almost perfect sphere, from which no force, save that of tearing it asunder, can induce it to uncoil. It is about six inches long and one and a half inches wide, and is of a beautifully grained bronze like Russia leather.

Among the vegetable productions of Madagascar is the tangena, a tree producing a poisonous nut, in which a kind of divine influence was supposed to reside, and which was therefore used as an ordeal for the detection of certain crimes. In small quantity it acts as an emetic, but in a larger dose as a violent poison. The chief use of this ordeal was for the discovery of witchcraft, by which the African races understand the use of poisonous drugs for evil purposes. As the ancient Greeks and Romans used the same word to denote a physician, a sorcerer or a poisoner, so in many African languages the same peculiarity obtains. This arises from the fact that among primitive races the medicinal or poisonous is ascribed to some magical power, either inherent in the substance itself, or imparted to it by sorcery. Medicines are thus employed charms both for causing and curing disease.

The tangena ordeal was administered, giving a portion of two nuts rubbed down with water or in the juice of a banana, the culprit having previously eaten a little rice and swallowed three small square pieces of a fowl-skin. Tepid water was after a few minutes administered to cause vomiting, and the proof of innocence was the rejection of these three pieces uninjured. Even if the ordeal was fairly administered there was some risk of poisoning; and as it was frequently used against the obnoxious prisoners, by a little management it could easily be made to yield unfavorable result. One of the most remarkable things in connection with this ordeal was the implicit faith of the people general in its supernatural power, so that they would often demand of the authorities that it should be administered to them to clear them of all possible suspicion.

Sibree says: "I have been told by native friends who had been obliged to take the ordeal during the persecution of Christianity that they were not freed from suspicion even after the pieces of skin had been rejected, but that for a day or two afterwards they were closely watched, and dared not even sip a drop of the bitter taste caused by the poison that case they would have been put to death all the same. Happily, this absurd and cruel custom is now at an end in those parts of the island to which the Hova authorities extend; for by the Anglo-Malagasy treaty of 1815, the use of the tangena ordeal was abolished forever in Madagascar."

Among the species of palm-trees, the avoung grows to the height of one hundred feet. Its bark is so tough that the natives use it, tying together planks, and thus construct boats thirty feet in length, and capable of seating fifty people. No nail or iron of any kind used about these boats.

In the forests, the trees are bound together in all directions by countless creepers and lianas, which cross and intertwine in an intricate tangle, like the disordered corlaze of a hundred ships. Some of these stretch from the topmost boughs to the ground like the backstays of a lofty ship's mast, and others cross at every conceivable angle. The sea-lantern form without any preparation a very strong tough corlaze, and in carrying goods from the coast to the interior they are largely used for securing all kinds of packages.

The bangon is one of the most beautiful useful plants here as in other tropical countries. Extensive tracts are almost covered with the long graceful stems, curving over the paths like enormous whips. One species has a climbing habit, and covers the stunted trees with a dense mantle of green draperies. In this the tree is almost as small as a quail with a circle of fine small leaves around the joints, which are not more than five or six inches apart. These long slender canes hang pendulous from the branches of the trees, stretch in graceful curves from tree to tree along the sides of the road. On the eastern coast long pieces of bamboo form the on-water pots of the people. The soil is not suitable for making earthen vessels, and accordingly in every house half a dozen bamboos and in one corner, from which the water for domestic use is obtained. All but one of the apragmas at the joints are broken through, and the upper end is stopped by a handful of grass.

Although the central provinces of Madagascar are very bare of wood, there are a great number of grasses, some of which are very beautiful, and many others are of value in the useful arts. In some marshy districts masses of crimson grass are found, giving quite a peculiar appearance to the landscape. In the low districts the grass grows to the height of seven or eight feet, so that travellers are often hidden from view in the dense jungle. In many places, prickly grass is found, presenting the bare-footed bearers from straying an inch beyond the narrow footpaths; and in some a curiously barbed and pointed grass called "wild-hog's spear," is also a great annoyance to travellers, being strong enough to pierce the skin. It has the appearance of a handful of grass tied in a bundle by two or three of the long wiry blades. In some of the warmer districts of Madagascar, certain grasses have a very distinct and powerful fragrance; and I have often felt that the scents, not less than the sights and sounds, among the surest signs of one's being in a peculiar country.

The grasses of Madagascar are very important to the people, as affording an exhaustless supply of material for their household requirements. Fine straw mats, often beautifully woven in patterns, are part of the furniture of every Malagasy house. These cover the floor, and often line the walls, and on the entrance of a visitor a clean one is always taken from the rolled up mats overhead and laid for him to sit down upon. This straw is plaited into very neat hats and caps, which vary in shape and pattern in different parts of the country, and into a great variety of useful and durable baskets. In the Betsileo province, the clothing of the lower classes consists solely of a straw mat; and on the south-eastern coast, similar mats, but made of no rush, are sewn into a kind of sack, and worn by the coast tribes. Small squares of mats are also used in these regions instead of plates and dishes; and a variety of brushes are also made from grass stalks. Several kinds of grass are used in many parts of the country for thatching the native houses, the long and tough stalks forming an excellent roofing. Still another purpose is served by grass in Madagascar. Owing to the scarcity of wood in the central provinces, grass forms the only fuel of the majority of the people. During the rainy season it grows long and thick from the abundant moisture, and then it is brown and dry during the six rainless months of the cold weather. It is the work of the old slave women to go out and collect bundles of this fuel; and what is left is generally set fire to towards the approach of the dry season, when the sky is lighted up at intervals with the glare of burning grass in all directions.

For "The Friend"

Memoir of Hannah Marsh,
BY HER DAUGHTER, FRISCELLA FITT.

"9th mo. 8th, 1837. I seem constrained to notice in this way, the love and goodness of my Heavenly Father vouchsafed to me who am but a very feeble one, if one at all, of the flock of the fold of the great and good Shepherd, who carries the lambs in his arms, and gently leads those who are with young. The language sweetly saluted my mind, return unto thy rest, Oh my soul, for the Lord hath dealt bountifully with thee—soon after waking this morning—and I was favored with a precious little time of quiet—in my chamber; and helped, I trust, in some degree to draw nigh unto the Father of Mercies, craving help and preservation. Oh how sweet to be enabled to draw nigh. Surely when the heart is wholly given up, the language can experimentally be adopted. There are no joys like unto the joys of God's salvation; no peace like that which He gives, and which at times flows into the mind of his humble, faithful followers. On reading the Scriptures as usual after breakfast, felt a renewed desire that it might be accompanied with inward waiting and dependence upon that Spirit which gave them forth; without which no instrumental means would be availing. Felt drawn to address our servant, who had requested permission to go to her place of worship, to undergo the ceremony of confirmation, desiring her dependence might be singly upon Him who can alone bless and render effectual any outward performances; reviving the language, That God is no respecter of persons, but that in every age those that fear Him and work righteousness are accepted of Him, encouraging her to a continued walking in his fear. Having a comfortable hope that she is desirous of acting uprightly and walking acceptably before Him, peace was permitted to attend this little act of dedication. Oh my soul! how slow thou art to believe, and backward in performing, what at times may present as a requiring; and is there not a cause? Do not things of a temporal nature occupy too much time and attention, even the things which are seen, and those things which are not seen and which are eternal, too little thought of."

"9th mo. 10th. Preparative Meeting. The first meeting was held in silence; very many of our members absent, not one my friend to sit by me, and dear L. A. B. also absent, that it felt to me a responsible situation I had to fill; yet to have my dependence upon Him alone who can supply all our need; and feel my entire inability of myself to satisfy the expectation of the creature—which is often much after words; and felt thankful to be preserved in quietness, though in some absence of spirit; yet no condemnation attending. In the meeting for discipline addressed a few words to the children; but life often appears at a very low ebb amongst us, that 'tis often hard work to dig deep enough to get to the well-spring in ourselves, that so capacity may at times be experienced to administer to others.

"9th mo. 12th. Very unwell, and kept my bed with my old complaint, the headache. Surely it is of great importance that we make use of the time when health is afforded, for when pain and sickness assail us, the mind is quite incapable of reflection.

"9th mo. 13th. Made an attempt to sit up to-day, and hoped to be well enough to attend our week-day meeting, but was quite unfit; more is not expected from any of us than ability is given to perform; got increasingly more poorly and obliged to go again to bed, and felt a desire that this might have the desired effect: being made sensible I was in the hands of Him who dealth with us after the counsel of his own will; and that instead of repining at what He saw meet to dispense, I ought to feel thankful I was spared from greater suffering; for surely we know not what we stand in need of to keep us humble.

9th mo. 14th. Was favored to wake this morning from a dream of pain and being favored with ability, was glad to avail myself of a kind offer from a friend to take me to Wandsworth to attend our Select Monthly Meeting, which I had not expected to have been well enough to have done; but had greatly desired to be resigned however it might be; but it pleased my Heavenly Father to remove my indisposition and enable me to go, in the ability He was pleased to aff'rd. And oh! can my soul say, when his sustaining presence is permitted to attend us, and go along with us, what preservation is experienced; what entire dependence is felt to be on his all-supporting arm; and I can with humility and thankfulness acknowledge He was pleased to be near to support me and enable me to express something of the exercise which attended my mind in our meeting for worship; commencing with the mournful language of the prophet Jeremiah, 'Oh! that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, &c., and that my mind had been sad; that a lamentation would now be taken up for the desolation which had been uttered, 'The ways of Zion mourn because so few come up to her solemn feasts.' That if we felt sensible of this it might lead to an examination how far we were contributing to widen the breaches amongst us, or repairing them. And that my heart had been enabled to salute the lowly, humble children of our Heavenly father; believing the language sweetly went forth to such, 'Fear not, little flock,' &c., encouraging all to live more in the true fear which does away all slavish fear; that the fear of man is a snare, and to live in that love which casteth out fear; believing that the love of the world and the love of forbidden things had taken such possession of the mind, as to prevent it from having the eye singly directed into our holy head, so as to see what it was our duty to do or to leave undone; that if it was kept single I believed some would see themselves called upon to walk in a narrower path; discouraging them from looking out too much at what some might say or another might think; and I think concluded again with the language, fear not, &c. I trust if what I offered did no good, it might be preserved from doing harm. Dear Lydia Chalk, some little time after, felt down; and in her supplication, which I felt to be very precious, and sweetly alluded to the foregoing testimony: which was permitted to prove as a balm and comfort to my poor mind, and I was enabled to receive it as a token for good; for which, and every other blessing, I desire to be made increasingly sensible, and to ascribe the praise and the glory to Him to whom alone it is due; not only now, but forever and for evermore, saith my soul, and to desire for renewed ability to love Him more and more, and serve Him better. Amen."

Tender Advice to the Newly Convicted.

Francis Howgill, in the year 1655, wrote a general epistle to various classes among the members of the church in his day, which contains the following:

"O ye that are convinced of the truth of our God, wait in that which doth convince, and keep your minds to it, and love it, and follow it whither it leads you, and it will lead you to know the gift of God, which leads to repentance from dead works. To serve the living God, who dwells in the immortal light. And take heed of looking back at the pleasures of sin you have formerly lived in, but wait upon the pure light of Christ Jesus in patience, that so you may see the enmity which is against God, and it slain in you daily; that so you may see Him that is the Saviour of the soul. And take heed of rebelling against the Lord, who hath given you a measure of his true Light, to lead you from sin, if you love it, unto righteousness from whence it comes, even from the righteous judge of all the world, who judgeth every man out of the book of his conscience; and so prize the everlasting love of God to your souls, that you may see Him who lives forever."

To the fathers and elders and honorable women, who know the manna by which all the children of the Lord are fed out of the everlasting treasure-house of the Father, he thus recommends the care of the young and weak of the flock:

"Watch over the flock of Christ Jesus in the Lord hath set you, and govern them in all wisdom and righteousness, that the gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ may be adorned; and take care of them willingly, knowing this the Lord requires of you, and hath called you unto; and to nourish the plants, and the young ones and the babes; and that every one may know their place, and watch and instruct in all wisdom, and correct and reprove in the name and power of our Lord Jesus, that no rebellious nor slothful may grow up, nor be harbored among you; but all in diligence may be kept in the fear of the Lord in their places, that the gospel of Christ Jesus be not evil spoken of nor the heathen blaspheme."

The Brahmin and the Microscope.—One day a Brahmin in India, whose religion strictly prohibits him from eating any animal food, or from taking away the life of any living creature for that end, was shown by means of a microscope that the vegetable food he was eating was full of minute little insects, so that he craved whole swarms of them at every mouthful. The microscope made this too plain for even a Brahmin to doubt or argue against; what, then, could he do? Alarmed at his position, and finding no other way left by which he could escape from the evidence of his very senses—evidence that went to prove him defiled by the horrid sin of taking animal life every time he took food, in spite of all his religion—he flung from him the microscope and broke it into a hundred pieces, and now he could eat on in quiet.

Young people, have you ever broken the microscope? When sin has been pointed out to you, have you not risen up and thrust the disagreeable conviction away by rushing off to some amusement? Was not this breaking the microscope? When reproved for a burst of temper, or an act of wilfulness, have you not tried to escape from the painful humiliation of confessing your fault by changing the subject or accusing another? Was not this breaking the microscope?—Religious Herald.

Think, wilt thou let it

Out of eternity
This new day is born;

AT SCHOOL.

I sat in the school of sorrow;
The Master was teaching there;
And my eyes were dim with weeping,
And my heart was full of care.

Instead of looking upward,
And seeing His face divine,
So full of tenderest pity
For weary hearts like mine,

I only thought of the burden,
The cross that before me lay;
So hard and heavy to carry,
That it darkened the light of day.

So I could not learn my lesson,
And say, "I will do some;"
And the Master came not near me
As the weary hours went on.

At last, in my heavy sorrow,
I looked from the cross above;
And I saw the Master watching,
With a glance of tender love.

So I stoop'd to that weary sorrow,
One look at that face divine
Had given me power to trust Him,
And say, "Thy will, not mine."

And thus I learnt my lesson,
Taught by the Master alone,
He only knows the tears I shed;
For He has wept his own.

And from them came a brightness,
Straight from the Home above,
Where the school-life will be ended,
And the cross will show the love.

TO A SKY-LARK.

Ethereal minstrel! Pilgrim of the sky!
Dost thou despise the earth where cars abound?
Or, while thy wings are up, are heart and eye
Both with thy nest upon the dewy ground?
Thy nest which thou canst drop into at will,
Those quivering vigils compose, that music still!

Selected.

To the last point of vision, and beyond,
Mount, daring warbler! that love-prompted strain,
("Twixt thee and thine a never failing bond.)
Thrills not the less the bosom of the plain;
Yet might'st thou seem, proud privilege! to sing
All independent of the leafy spring.

Leave to the Nightingale her shady wood;
A privacy of glorious light is thine;
Whence thou dost pour upon the world a flood
Of harmony, with instinct more divine;
Type of the wise, who soar, but never roam,
True to the kindred points of Heaven, and Home.

The Results of Prohibition.—The following item is taken from the Lebanon (Pa.) Daily Times, and published without comment, as is sufficient comment of itself:

Editorial Times:—About ten days ago I noticed in a newspaper the following:

What is to be done with Potter County? An exchange says: At a recent term of the Quarter Sessions Court of Potter County, Pennsylvania, the District Attorney informed the Court that he had no indictments or bills to present to the Grand Jury; the sheriff also stated that he had no criminals in the prison; the directors of the poor reported that they had no one to keep at the county's charge—expense. Potter county has had no tavern license for ten years, and this is given as a reason for the lack of court business.

Being curious to know whether or not the statement was in accordance with the facts of the case, I clipped it out of the paper and closed it in a letter addressed to the Prothonotary of Potter county, requesting him to inform me of the facts in the case. In due time received the following:

Condersport, Pa., March 12, 1880

I. L. Kephart: Dear Sir,—Yours of the 10th received, I reply with pleasure. At the December term of court we had no jury, we had nothing for them to do. We have poor house in the county, for we have no poor. Potter County has had no license to sell whiskey for nearly thirty years. The fore our jail is empty about ten months in the year. Respectfully yours,

O. H. CROSBY, Prothonotary

Below the Surface.—Whenever you see a thing above ground that is worth admiration, and that has any true stability or hope of permanence, you may be sure that there is a great deal below the surface just there, as a foundation of that which makes so good a show before your eyes.

Whether it is in the world of nature, or art, or of intellectual attainment, or of personal character, or of spiritual life, it is all on the surface, not all in plain sight. It is a graceful elm or a wide spreading oak, you may be sure it has roots running down and reaching out into the earth below, to get strength and security to its sturdy trunk and its swaying boughs. If it is a majestic mountain rising in grandeur to the clouds, it rests on no quicksands, but has a basis broad, firm, and deep as the globe's centre. If it is a towering monument or a massive pile of buildings, or a bridge spanning river or marsh with vast and lofty arches, there must have been a preliminary sinking of shafts and laying of strong foundations, and strengthening of subterranean walls, before the mighty structure which now commands attention began its upward stretch above the surface. If it is the finished work of a scholar in history or science; if it is a marvel of gracefulness and beauty in the sphere of literature—poetry or prose; if it is a triumph of power at the bar, or the tribunal, or in the realm of applied science or of professional skill,—all that is shown and seen indicates the existence of much that is out of sight; the success which is attained above the surface cannot be accounted for but by the fact that a great deal of preparation below this was made below the surface. If indeed it be a noble character or a saintly life, a character of strength and beauty, of her-ourage and of sublime endurance, or a life of oiliness and of radiating sweetness and purity—it did not come by chance, nor was it reached at a single bound; it was a matter of growth as well as of grace; and the best and the most of that which is noted of good in the conduct or the countenance of the one admired and revered, was wrought silently and slowly out of sight and below the surface.—S. ### The Meeting at Firbank Chapel and its Results.

Francis Howgill was about thirty-four years of age when he attended the meeting at Firbank Chapel. He had met with George Fox a few days before at Sedburg, and bore testimony to the authority with which he spoke on that occasion. So that he was somewhat prepared to receive his Gospel message on that memorable day, when so general a convocation took place.

A few years after, he wrote some account of his experience in his search after the living knowledge of God. In this he says, that from the age of twelve years he set his heart to know the Lord, followed the strictest form of worship in the part of the country where he lived, and spent much time alone in reading and meditation. He was often indulged in himself for indulgence in sports and pastimes which he saw were but vanity; and when he yielded to the restraint thus laid upon him, felt a reward of peace. He says:—"Then I began to oppose my fellows, when I had walked in wantonness; and then they began to revile me, and hate me, and scorn me; yet notwithstanding I uttered words, often three or four times a day. I knew not where God was, but in my imagination imagined a God at a distance, and so went on. And I began to grow in knowledge without (which is sensual), and when I was puffed up, for the world admired me; but still I was condemned for vain words and actions, and the root of iniquity grew in me. And then I followed a more strict course, and often went five or six miles to some more excellent means (as they called it), and so did get more words, but still I was the same, yet worse, for knowledge did not fill me up. Then along to about fifteen years of age, I posted up and down after the best excellent sermons, and so became acquainted with all the eminent Christians (as they called) in the region where I lived; and I was despised of my parents, and of the world, and a wonder, and great reproach came upon me; but still I saw they knew nought, and it was no matter. And so much sorrow did upon me for four or five years, and when it was turned within, I was judged for all my iniquity formerly, and still my heart was sewed unto me, that it was corrupt; but as I crept within to the light in my conscience, I was restrained from many actions which I had a will to do; and in the instant, when I have been doing any unrighteousness in words or actions, in many things I was often stopped; and when I saw that I did it not a great joy arose in me; and when I had done anything forwardly and rashly I was judged, by the teachers said was a natural conscience that kept from sin and did restrain it. And thus I hearkened to their imagination, and so I sought the Light as too low a thing; that was but common grace that did preserve out of gross evils, but the saints had a peculiar faith and grace. And so I hearkened to them, and still I was convinced of sin; and they told how the saints did believe in Christ, and so sin was not imputed, but his righteousness was accounted to them, and his righteousness in the means, as prayer and receiving the sacrament (as they called it), and they judged me a worthy communicant; and they judged me I was lest I should eat unworthily, and none could direct me what the body of Christ was, inasmuch that one time I read all the Scriptures that spoke of Christ's suffering. And they said, *I must believe He suffered for me; and I believed all that they call faith, and yet I could not see how He had died for me, and had taken away my sin, for the witness in my conscience told me I was a sinner of sin whilst I committed it; and they told me, I must not omit that ordinance, for thereby faith was confirmed and strength added. Inasmuch, on the one hand they pressing it as a duty, and on the other hand I saw that the scripture said he that eats unworthily, eats damnation to himself, I was in fear, notwithstanding none could excuse me without; yet then afterward a great fear fell upon me, and I thought I had sinned against the Holy Ghost, and great trouble fell upon me. Then they said, I had not come prepared, and yet I had all the preparation that they had spoken of; but still they were physicians of no value."*

"At last there was somewhat revealed in me, that the Lord would teach his people himself; and so I waited, and many things opened in me of a time at hand. And sometimes I would have heard a priest; but when I heard him I was moved by the Lord and a fire it burned in me, and a trembling fell upon me, yet I feared reproach, and so denied the Lord's motion. And it was revealed in me to wait, and I should know his counsel; and the word of the Lord was in me.—the time was at hand when the dead should hear the voice of the Son of God; and it burned in me as a fire, that the day was near when it should not be, but here, nor there, but all his people should be taught of the Lord."

The effect upon him of the ministry of George Fox, is thus declared:—"And immediately, as soon as I heard one declare that the light of Christ in man was the way to Christ, I believed in the eternal Word of Truth, and that of God in my conscience sealed to it; and so not only I, but many hundreds more (who thirsted after the Lord, but were betrayed by the wisdom of the serpent), were all seen to be off the foundation, and all mouths were stopped in the dust; and so we stood all as condemned in ourselves, and all saw our nakedness, and were all ashamed, though our glory was great in the world's eye; but all was vanity. But notwithstanding I was ignorant what the first principle of true religion was, yet as I turned my mind within to the light of Jesus Christ, wherewith I was enlightened, which formerly had reproved me for all vanity, and also as I did own it, it led me into righteousness, and when I turned to it I saw it was the true and faithful witness of Christ Jesus; and then my eyes were opened, and all things were brought to remembrance that ever I had done. And the dreadful power of the Lord fell upon me—with fear and terror—for the sights that I saw with my eyes, and that which I heard with my ears; sorrow and pain. And in the morning I wished it had been evening, and in the evening I wished it had been morning; and I had no rest, but trouble on every side. And all that ever I had done was judged at and condemned."

The effect upon him of this "ministration of condemnation," he relates as follows:—"As I bore the indignation of the Lord, something rejoiced; the serpent's head began to be bruised. And as I did give up to all his judgments, the captive came forth out of prison and rejoiced, and my heart was filled with joy, and I came to see Him whom I had pierced and my heart was broken. And then I saw the cross of Christ, as seemed to me, and knew the enemy slain upon it, and the new man was made, and so peace came to be made, and so eternal life was brought in through death and judgment. And then the perfect gift I received, which was given from God, and the holy law of God was revealed unto me, and was written in my heart, and his fear and his word, which did kill, now makes alive. And so it pleased the Father to reveal his Son in me through death; and so I came to witness cleansing by his blood, which is eternal; Glory unto him for ever! and am made a minister of that Word of eternal life which endures for ever; Glory unto his name for ever! and have rest and peace in doing the will of God; and am entered into the true rest, and lie down in the fold with the lambs of God, where the sons rejoice together, and the saints keep holy days; Glory unto him for ever!"

"Oh, my beloved ones, although I am the lowest and weakest among many of my brethren, yet the eternal power of God is in my shield forever. The Lord of Hosts is with us. There is a crown which none can take away, to all who have denied all; yet it is on our heads; the dread of God is with us. And truly, dear brethren, we cannot say that we fish-d and catched nothing; for many vessels are full; nor we have not travailed and labored and brought forth wind, as the false prophets do; for we have the seals of our ministry, which shall be witnesses for the Lord in generations to come. Not unto us, O Lord, but to thy name, be glory for ever, who hath done and doth all for us and in us, who is our strength, our glory, our crown of rejoicing all the day long."

The disastrous results following the constant reading of bad books, of sensational story papers, are generally acknowledged. But the evil consequences of perusing the full reports of crimes which many of the best daily papers publish are not commonly recognized. These consequences are in their working widely spread. The average circulation of the seven daily newspapers of Boston approaches two hundred thousand copies; and of the fifty of New England, four hundred thousand. Each of these papers is read by at least three persons. In New England alone, therefore, not less than a million readers peruse the story of every murder, suicide, and assault committed within her limits. Another consequence of these full reports is corruption of the thoughts. The harrowing details of the scene are constantly before the mental eye. The reporter's pen points the details with a vividness as horrible as it is real. In the mind minutely cognizant of the reports of crime, pure thinking is not possible. A further consequence is the harrowing of the feelings. These reports produce an unnatural excitement. They arouse the lower appetites and desires, without strengthening the higher. An additional effect is the deadening of the conscience. The reading of these accounts dulls its sensitiveness.—S. S. Times.

"Wait on the Lord."—We sometimes get suggestions of great spiritual truths in the most common incidents of daily life. I went into a restaurant for dinner. As soon as I sat down at one of the tables, a man came and asked me to wait. He waited patiently until I had looked over the bill of fare and told him what I wanted. Then he hastened to the cooks with the order. Having given it, he stood like a statue until the dishes that I had ordered were prepared. Then taking them he hurried back to me and placed them on the table before me. He looked to see if all the condiments were there, and then again stood still to see if I would order anything more. He was a waiter, but he was not an idler. He only stood until he knew what he was to do, and then he did it promptly.

When our Saviour met Saul on the way to Damascus, the blinded and convicted Pharisee said, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" He was told to go into the city and wait there. He obeyed. As he groped his way onward he was waiting on the Lord—waiting obediently and in faith all the way. So we are to wait. We are not to rush about hither and thither, undertaking this thing or the other thing according to our whims and caprices. We are to wait on the Lord—patiently and obediently in order to hear His will. We are to ask Him for special indications of that will by His providence and His Spirit. And as soon as we know what He would have us do we are to go at once and do it. He may not tell us much at a time. He only told Saul to go on into Damascus. But if we do that promptly He will tell us more, and guide us in all our ways. Waiting and working belong together. A faithful servant waits to be doing something for his master all the time. As soon as he has finished one task, he comes asking: "What next?" If all the Lord's servants had this spirit—if they all waited on Him so, a great change would come over our churches. They would be the hives of workers instead of the lounging places of idlers and drones. We want a revival of the Christian idea of individual responsibility.—Nat. Farmer.

Infanticide and Tight Shoes.—There are districts of China where infanticide prevails to an incredible extent—a murder of female children mainly. The higher estimate of women is the product of Christian teaching; and though women in China are comparatively free from seclusion, and have been regents of the empire, and eminent for literary accomplishments, and although a son pays profound regard to his mother, even the emperor kneeling before her, yet the woman is despised, and female life is cheap. Notwithstanding that the traveling vaccinator charges a shilling to vaccinate a boy, and only sixpence for a girl, parents will rather let their girls run the risk than pay the lower fee. Women will confess to the number they have destroyed. There are districts where only seven-tenths of the female children are kept alive. Of course, a sin like this ceases in a Christian congregation, but the reformation is not stayed there, for in many neighborhoods there is a growing repugnance for the practice. There is another practice far more universal, but which some suppose connected with infanticide—the barbarous fashion of binding the feet, so as to render them not only useless, but diseased; for girls thus treated are, of course, a useless burden to their parents if not married. The Chinese themselves have tried to deal with this habit. It is a huge tyranny of fashion, and cannot even be pleaded royalty in its favor, the present dynasty not binding the feet of their women; while one of the emperors even issued an ineffectual edict against it, and would have issued another against it, with heavy penalties, but that his throne would have been overturned. The native churches are now taking the matter in hand, and are here and there forming "Anti-Foot-Binding Societies," and sometimes the matter is discussed in the Church Synod. "Mr. Z. can easily speak against it," said a native pastor, "for he has no daughters; but I cannot prevent it;" and that really touches the root of the matter. It is for the native Christian mothers to take action as they are doing, and select wives for our sons, if the girl is intelligent and in other respects suitable, should we reject her because she has large feet?" and the custom of a thousand years—a custom stronger than the throne—is already in some Christian centers yielding to the influence of Christian principle.—Good Words.

Triumphant Death-Beds—The Crown follows the Cross.

In the year 1658, died that devoted and eminent servant of Christ, and patient sufferer for his cause, William Dewsbury. He was among those who were released from long confinement, by the intervention of King James, when he issued his warrant for the discharge of Friends, and the suspension of the penal laws against them, on their first application to him. He had been arrested as a Jesuit, at the time of the great excitement respecting the "Popish plot;" and though it was shown there was no ground for the accusation made against him, the vindictive malice of his persecutors, and the unjust and illegal action of the magistrates, induced and enabled them to keep him a prisoner during all the time that elapsed from the outbreak of the terrible popular excitement mentioned, to the first year of the short reign of King James. Though greatly debilitated, and his health permanently impaired, by his long confinement in noisome jails, and other cruelties inflicted on him, so that it was difficult and painful for him to walk, he, nevertheless, after his release, visited Friends at some of their meetings. But finding himself too feeble to travel much, he addressed an epistle to Friends generally, which, he says was "given forth in the moving of the peaceable spirit and word of reconciliation in the Lord Jesus Christ: to whom are my prayers, that all who are convinced may wait to be made of the number of the slain of the Lord and conformable to Christ in his death. That they may witness his quickening power to raise them up in the resurrection of life, to enter into the gates of Zion, and dwell in the city of New Jerusalem; a peace is within his gates, and quietness among all that have their habitation therein, having salvation through walls and bulwarks; and they are blessed of the Lord, and preserved by Him, to the hono- of his name forever, Amen."

He went up to London, to attend the Yearly Meeting, in 1688. While there he preached a remarkable sermon, which has been handed down in print. It is said the congregation he addressed was over two thousand. Being taken ill, he was unable to attend the Yearly Meeting, but sent a short letter to it, informing of the reason of his absence. He was favored to reach his home by short journeys, and lived but about two weeks after. A few days before his death several Friends being present in his chamber, though very weak, he addressed them fervently, testifying to the power of the religion Friends professed, and the goodness of God as manifested to them. "Therefore said he, 'Friends, be faithful, and trust the Lord your God: for this I can say never, since (his conviction) played it cowardly; but joyfully entered prisons and palaces; telling my enemies to hold me as long as they could. And in the prisons, houses I sang praises to my God, and esteem the bolts and locks put upon me as jewels and in the name of the eternal God, I always got the victory. For they could keep me longer than the determined time of my Government. My departure draws nigh. Bless be my God, I am prepared. I have nothing to do but to die, and put off this corrupt mortal tabernacle, this flesh that has so many infirmities. But the life that dwells in me, as soon as I shall all, out of the reach of death and the grave; and immortality an eternal life are my crown forever and ever. Thus triumphantly departed this aged, deep experienced and suffering follower of the Lord Jesus, to enter on the unceasing enjoyment of those heavenly felicities which I laid up for all those who love Him and appear in their hearts.

In 1668, Josiah Cole was gathered from works to rewards. He joined the Society 1654, and became a faithful laborer in the Lord's vineyard, as has been noticed in account of his services and sufferings which in America. William Penn, in his testimony concerning him, says: "His declarations the ungodly world were like an axe or sword, sharp and piercing, being mostly attended with an eminent appearance of the dreadful power of the Lord; but to the faithful and diligent, O! the soft and pleasurable streams of life immortal that have run through him, to the refreshing of the Lord's heritage." As he felt the chill of death creeping over him, George Fox and Stephen Crisp, being with him, he uttered many weighty expressions; among the last of which were: "For my part, I have walked in faithfulness to the Lord, and I have thus far finished my testimony, and have peace with the Lord. His majesty is with me, and his crown is in my upon me. So mind my love to all Friends." Then addressing S. Crisp, he said, "Dear heart! keep low in the holy seed of God, and that will be thy crown forever. A minister of Christ must walk as He walked." He died in the arms of the two Friends above named.

It was also in this year (1668), that Francis Howgill died in jail, as has been mentioned no account of his trial and imprisonment. Thomas Lee, another eminent servant and minister of Christ, who in the course of his service in the Church, had been instrumental in turning many to righteousness, was called away from the church militant to enter upon his reward in the Church triumphant. When on his death-bed, he said to William Penn, who, with other Friends, was waiting on him, "Bear thy cross and stand faithful to God; then He will give thee an everlasting crown of glory, that shall not be taken from thee. There is no other way which shall speak in us, than that the holy men of old time, who God hath brought immortality to, and life immortal is felt. Glory thyself to Him, for He is worthy of it. His love overcomes my heart, nay, my cup runs over; glory be to his Name forever." To good to me; this day He covered me with mercy; and as life was leaving his body, he said, "Glory, glory to Thee forever!" and then sank to sleep in Jesus.—From "Friends in 17th Century."

Wife.—What do you think the beautiful "wife" comes from? It is the word in both the English and Latin language covered the French and Greek. I hope the French will some day get a word for it instead of that dreadful word femme. But what do you think it comes from? The great value of the word is that they mean something. It means "Weaver." You must either be a weaver or housewife; remember that. The deep sense, you must either weave your fortunes or embroider them or feed and bring them to decay. Wherever a wife comes, home is always around her. Stars may be over her head, the glow-worm in the night-cold grass may be the fire in her foot; but home is where she is; and a noble woman it stretches far around her, rather than houses ceiled with cedar, and carpeted with vermilion, shedding its quietude far from those who else are homeless. I believe to be the woman's true place of power.—Rus'in.

Religious Items, &c.

of the mission of the American Board in eastern Turkey, writing of the state of affairs in Kars, describes a sect of Christians called Malagans, who are settling in Kars in great numbers. The history of their origin, they give it, is that between fifty and sixty years ago their fathers were taken as captives in Germany, where they received some ideas of Protestantism. They speak the Russian language and come from north of the Caucasus. They have been much persecuted, and dress somewhat like Quakers; they abstain from wine-drinking and the use of tobacco, and wear long beards. They will not work and also eschew some kind of herbs, have a fervent desire to go to Jerusalem, and are diligent readers of the Bible, which they prize very highly, and will have no other books. Though they believe in the New as well as the Old Testament, they do not celebrate baptism nor the Lord's Supper.

in the Fiji Islands, which are now a district of the Australian Wesleyan Methodist Church, have 841 chapels and 291 other preaching places, 10 missionaries, 48 native mission stations and 23,274 members, exclusive of 39,000 non-members. There are besides 5,431 candidates for membership.

Bishop Copleston's ritualistic tendencies have made trouble in the Anglican Church of Ceylon, and the Archbishop of Canterbury will soon be asked to recall him. The native Christians declare that they will no longer pay allegiance to the bishop, and in an appeal shortly to be sent to the Archbishop of Canterbury say:

"We beg to remind your Grace that we are inhabitants of a country still to a great extent heathen; that many of us were brought up as worshippers of idols; and that therefore the placing in churches of things which appear to be intended as objects of maternal worship is more offensive to us than it might be did we not see those around us bowing down to wood and stone. We would also inform your Grace that in heathen worship flowers and lights take a prominent place, and that their intimate connection with devil worship renders them, in our view, a most undesirable adjunct in the service of the church."

It is announced from St. Petersburg that the Old Believers are preparing a petition for presentation to the emperor, begging the release of the three prelates who are at present lying immured in the dungeons of the fortress of Souzdal. One of them has been in his cell 17 years, another 22 years, and the third, Archbishop Arkadi Slavsky, more than a quarter of a century. For exposing their imprisonment, and declaring in a leading article that their "only crime was their entertaining of harmless religious convictions," the Golos was recently punished by being deprived of the right to publish advertisements for a month.

An amusing anecdote is told by an American authoress in a work on Hindostan, which, though it refers to the pagan Hindus, might find its counterpart among ourselves. "At Ulwar the British agent wished to plant an avenue of trees on either side of the road in front of the shops, for the purpose of giving welcome shade. He accordingly made choice of peepul trees, as they are considered sacred by the Hindus. But so soon as the Bannayahs, or native shopkeepers, heard of his selection, they one and all declared that if these were done they would not occupy the shops; and, when asked for a reason, replied, it was because they could not tell untruths or swear falsely under their shade; adding, 'and how can we carry on business otherwise?'"

The Virginia Bible Society is about to begin a canvass of the entire State, with a view of supplying every family with the Bible. Nearly fifty active Christians will be employed in the work at a salary of $25 a month and expenses.

The Scent of Man Frightful to Wild Animals.—The scent of man is excessively terrible to game of all kinds, much more so, probably, than the sight of him. A herd of antelopes, a hundred yards off, gazed at us as we moved along the winding path, and timidly stood their ground until half our line had passed, but darted off the instant they "got the wind," or caught the flavor of those who had gone by. The sport is all up with the hunter who gets to the windward of the African beast, as it cannot stand even the distant aroma of the human race, so much dreaded by all wild animals. Is this the fear and the dread of man, which the Almighty said was to be upon every beast of the field? A lion may, while lying in wait for his prey, leap on a human being as he would on any other animal, save a rhinoceros or an elephant, that happened to pass; or a lioness, when she has cubs, might attack a man, who, passing "up the wind of her," had unconsciously, by his scent, alarmed her for the safety of her whelps; or buffaloes and other animals might rush at a line of travellers on apprehension of being surrounded by them, but neither beast nor snake will, as a general rule, turn on man except when wounded, or by mistake.—D. Livingstone.

An Unhealthy Atmosphere.—Some recent medical observations seem to show that the continued breathing of an atmosphere charged with vapor of wood spirit, or methylic alcohol, has a tendency to produce fatty degeneration of the liver and heart, and congestion of the brain.

Sassaparilla as a Lubricant.—For this purpose it is reduced to a very fine powder, washed to remove all gritty particles, then steeped in dilute muriatic acid to dissolve any particles of iron it may contain. After being again washed and dried it is mixed with oils or fats for the lubrication of heavy machinery.

Durability of Steel.—The hardest steel is not always the most durable. On examining some steel rails that had laid side by side on the Great Northern Railway, it was found in one instance that a half rail had been worn away one-sixteenth of an inch by traffic amounting to 5,251,000 tons; while a soft rail for the same amount of wear had withstood 8,402,000 tons. In another case the wear of the soft rail was double that of the hard. Steel rails last about nine times as long as those of iron.

Forests of Victoria.—Legislative measures have been passed to prevent the reckless destruction of timber in the forests of that colony. Efforts have been made to recover some of the stripped mountain-sides. It is found that many of the European and American timber trees thrive better than the native, and grow more rapidly than in their original habitat.

Keeping Potatoes.—In the spring of the year, the potato commences to germinate, and the starch it contains is converted into nutriment for the growing shoots, rendering the tuber watery and comparatively worthless. To prevent this change taking place, it is said the Parisian hotel keepers dip them for a few seconds in boiling water, which destroys the vitality of the eyes or germs. Potatoes so treated, and properly cared for, are said to lose all tendency to germinate, and will remain sound and well-flavored throughout the season.

Dr. E. Reichardt has been examining the earth of a graveyard in which there has been no interments for at least thirty years. It gave off animal oil, notwithstanding its long disuse for burial purposes, when submitted to destructive distillation.

Be Truthful.—We should be careful to make no promise that we cannot expect to fulfill. If a man owes me money and I go to see him about it, I would much rather he would tell me he did not know when he could pay it than, to say he would have the money in two weeks, and at the same time, not have the least idea of being able to meet his promise at the expiration of the time.

Brethren, our word should be at par value all the time, with each other and the world.

If I owe a man money, due at a certain time, and I see before the time expires, that I cannot meet my obligation, it is my duty to go to him before it becomes due and tell him the fact, and he will be much more likely to give me time, than if I wait until it is due and disappoint him. It pays best to be truthful.—Prim. Christian.

For "The Friend"

I will just remind Friends that there are some poor Friends in the West, who are in need of clothing; and if they think best, I would like to save them the care of all clothing not needed for next winter and this summer. Sn-h, if sent to 912 Wallace St. at any time, will be packed and forwarded to needy persons asking for such help.

All kinds of clothing, shoes, stockings, shawls, &c., may be sent.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 15, 1880.

In a record which has been preserved of the last expressions of William Taylor, of Manchester, England, a valuable minister, who died about 140 years ago, there is the following passage: "I have often considered the great advantage that those have had, who have been religiously educated in our Society; and happy will it be for such who make a right use of it. Many and great favors we receive by the ministry of those whom Divine Providence hath qualified to labor amongst us; and in a particular manner, we in this meeting have been eminently favored of late. There were 104 deaths in our congregation, attended with hearing and professing, and with having the name of religion, and appearing orderly amongst men, and yet be strangers to the life and virtue thereof in their own hearts; they will find themselves miserably disappointed at last."

We believe these remarks are applicable to us of this present day—our meetings of late have many times been favored by the presence of our holy Head, solemnizing the hearts of those assembled, and enabling them to approach Him in silent adoration; and ministers also have been freshly anointed and prepared to invite the people to draw near to the Fountain of life. But if the preaching of the gospel is to us only as a pleasant song, which interests us for the time but leaves no permanent fruits, it will be of little advantage—and those who are not brought under living concern for their salvation, and made to yield themselves fully to the Divine disposal, but remain "strangers to the life and virtue [of religion] in their own hearts, will find themselves miserably disappointed at last." Oh that there may appear among us such fruits as will show that the love and mercy of God have not been reached forth to any among us in vain!

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The bill transferring the Indian Bureau to the War Department, was reported to the House and placed on the calendar.

Secretary Schurz has been advised from Wichita, Kansas, under date of the 7th inst., of the truth of the report of the invasion of the Indian Territory, by a number of white settlers under Captain Payne. The War Department issued orders to the officers commanding troops in the vicinity, to drive out the trespassers.

The bill just reported to the House of Representatives, and recommittees, appropriates $38,700,000 for expenses of the Post-office Department. Ninety years ago the total expenditure for that department was $32,140. At that time the population was about four millions. It has now increased eleven fold, while the postal receipts have so expanded as to require an increase of more than a thousand fold. Last year the Post-office Department earned $30,041,983.

During the Fourth month the total coinage at all the United States mints amounted to 60,000 double eagles, 317,310 eagles, 493,520 half-eagles, 2,300,000 three dollar pieces, and 1,200,000 one dollar coins—an aggregate of 5,206,830 pieces—valued at $1,911,900.

A careful review of the coffee-trade of all countries, by the managers of the Java Bank (Batavia), shows the total crop of the world for 1855 to have been 276,365,000 pounds, and that the average for the three years 1874-75 was 275,848,000 pounds. Guatemala is said to produce some of the best coffee grown in any country.

On the afternoon of the 9th, a fire originating from an explosion of gas in a stove in a private dwelling in Roxford, 11 miles south-east of Bradford, Pa., burned fifty buildings, including the principal hotels and stores, and the railroad depot. Forty derricks, the pump-stations of the United Pipe Lines, and two tanks containing 30,000 gallons of oil were burned. On the same evening a devastating fire occurred at Allegheny City, Pa. The loss on property being estimated at $125,000.

Seven regular steamers left New York on the 8th inst., for Europe, with full cargoes, there being unusual activity in the export trade just now. Among the shipments are 500 head of cattle, 600 sheep, 4000 quarters fresh beef, 1000 carcasses sheep, and 400 dressed hogs. The Spain, for Liverpool, took 48,000 bushels wheat, 1023 bales bacon, and 1000 bales canned goods. There were shipped to Glasgow, 3000 bales of cheese and 3000 packages of butter. The Belgenland, for Antwerp, took 72,000 bushels of wheat.

There were 104 deaths in New York city during last week. In Philadelphia the number was 334, an increase of 25 over the previous week. Of this number, 152 were males, and 192 females—239 were natives of the United States.

Markets, &c.—The following were quotations on the 8th inst.: 11 3/8 sixes, 183, 100's; 9 1/2, 103; 4 1/2, registered, 108; do, coupon, 109; 4's, 107 1/2.

Cotton.—There was no material change to notice in price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported at 12 1/2 cts. for upland, and 14 1/2 cts. for Egyptian.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7 1/2 cts. in barrels, and standard white, 7 1/2 cts. for export, and 7 1/4 cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—Prices remain about the same as last quoted, but the demand is limited. Sales of 1200 bush, including Minnesota extras, low and fancy, at $8 a $6.25; Penna. family at $5.50 a $5.75; western do., at $4.75 a $5.25; and patents and other grades at $6.75 a $7.75. Eye-flour is quiet at $4.25. Corn meal, $3 per barrel.

Corn.—Wheat is in fair demand and a fraction higher. Sales of 12,000 bushels, including red at $1.20 a $1.31, and amber at $1.31 a $1.52. Eye is scarce and steady at 85 a 86 cts. per bushel. Corn is quiet and firm. Sales, 16,000 bushels, including reelected and steamer at 50 cts.; mixed, 51 1/2 a 52 cts.; yellow at 52 a 52 1/2 cts. Oats are inactive. Sales of 5000 bush, including mixed at 35 a 40 cts., and white at 40 a 45 cts. The receipts to-day were as follows: 750 bush. flour, 14,000 bush. wheat, 35,200 bush. corn, 3600 bush. oats.

Hay and straw market, for week ending 5th mo. 8th, &c.—Loads of hay, 301; straw, 44. Average price during the week: Prime timothy, $1 a $1.10 per ton; mixed, 95 cts. a $1.05; saw, $1.35 a $1.50.

Wool.—The past week has been one of unusual quietude in the wool trade, and prices of most grades have ruled weak—in some instances a decline of 2 to 3 cts. per lb. has been accepted. Among the sales were 6000 lbs. Ohio medium, at 45 a 47 1/2; 1,000 lbs. combing, Ohio, 58 cts.; 3,000 lbs. west. coarse, 52 cts.; 10,000 lbs. unwashed Virginia med., 48 cts.; 1,000 lbs. unwashed southern 1, 45 cts.; 1,500 lbs. secured California, 80 cts.

Oils.—Prime No. 1, 57 cts.; Linseed, 76 a 77 cts.; Neats foot, ex. 70 a 75 cts.; Winter sperm, $1.20 a $1.23.

Seeds.—Cloverseed very dull—Sales of 400 bushels in lots at 61 a 71 cts. per bush. As to quality. Timothy, 23 a 29 cts. per bushel. Flaxseed, $1.50. Orchard grass, $1.75.

Beef cattle.—The market was moderately active, and prices were well maintained—2,700 head sold at 2 a 2 1/2 cts. per pound, as to quality.

Fresh cows were dull, and prices ranged from $20 to $50.

Hogs were inactive and prices lower. Sales at 67 cts.

Sheep.—The market slow, and prices unchanged, at 7 1/2 cts. as to quality. Lamb, 7 to 9 cts. per lb.

FOREIGN.—At a meeting of the Mansion House Relief Committee, held on the 6th inst., it was announced that there were only $33,926 on hand. A deputation was appointed to wait upon Forster, Chief Secretary for Ireland, and make representation of the condition of the country. The general feeling of the committee was that the crisis was never more alarming, as subscriptions are falling off while the distress is increasing.

The Meeting at Furbank Chapel and its Results.

The affectionate testimonies left by his hands to the worth and services of Francis Howgill, give a brief outline of his life and labors. In dwelling on the memory of this servant of the Lord, the heart is affected with a sense of the love of God which was abundantly manifested to him, and which is abroad in the hearts of all who are willing to receive Him in the way of his coming, to submit to those purifying baptisms which produced such blessed fruits in his life. George Fox says respecting him:— "Now concerning Francis Howgill, who is one of the Lord's worthies, that preached everlasting word of life, from about the year 1652 until the year 1668.

He was convinced of God's eternal Truth, received his gospel in the year 1652, the day that he had been preaching in the meeting in Furbank Chapel, in the afternoon was convinced by a messenger of the Lord, several others that had been teachers were convinced by him, as John Audland and others.

He had a great acquaintance with the best sort of priests, and after he did receive the Lord's power and the word of life, he was wont to them, and he did confess to some of the priests, that the knowledge of God and Truth he knew no more of whilst he was amongst them, as to the inward enjoyment of God a child of five years old.

And he and John Audland, that had received some money for preaching at a parish called Colton, in Furness Fell in Lancashire, when they had received the gospel freely, and the word of Life from Christ, they were commanded of the Lord to go and return that they had again to the parish and people in whom they had received it, which they did and this made the priests more to rage at the professors.

So as the Son of God came to be revealed in him, he began to know his command, and perfectly and freely to preach Him and his word of life; this did he and John Audland the days of their life after their conviction, preached Christ Jesus freely, as they received him, and turned many unto God. And no sooner was his mouth opened, but priests, magistrates and professors began to rage against him, and began to be offended at the word of God and the gospel, and sometimes after cast him into Appleby goal, in a nasty stinking prison in the county of Westmorland, and there they kept him for a time in the latter end of the year 1652; but the Lord God delivered him out of the mouths of those lords, whom God abhorreth, of such priests, magistrates and professors.

"And so after he was set at liberty, he grew valiant and bold for the name of the Lord, and travelled up and down on foot, preaching the everlasting gospel, and went to many steeple houses, to warn both priests and people of the day of the Lord that was coming upon them, and directing of them to Christ Jesus, their Teacher and Saviour, and travelled a foot through the countries to London, and was moved of the Lord, he and John Camm, to go and admonish O. Cromwel, after he was newly made Protector, and went to some of the steeple-houses in London, and other meetings, declaring to them the day of the Lord and the word of life, and where they might find it.

"And after this he travelled through the countries to Bristol, preaching the word of life; and after went into Ireland with Edward Burroughs, and preached the word of life there to both magistrates, priests and people, under great sufferings; and many were brought to the Lord Jesus, their Saviour and Teacher—there was truth and life by them.

"And after, Henry Cromwel, the deputy of Ireland, banished him and Edward Burrough out of Ireland, through the instigation of the priests and other magistrates; but the Lord overturned them his adversaries also.

"And so continuing in the labor of the Lord till the year 1661, he was imprisoned at London (when the monarchy people rose), with many others though clear and innocent from that bloody act; for his and their weapons were spiritual, and they sought another kingdom. And after he and they were set at liberty, he still continued in the work of the Lord, travelling up and down the nations; and coming into the north, at Kendal the magistrates sent for him out of the market, and tendered him the oath of allegiance and supremacy, and because for conscience sake he could not swear, in obedience to the command of Christ his Saviour, they committed him to Appleby goal in the year 1664, and there they kept him from sessions to the assizes in a smoky hole, and at last they premeditated him; and his body being almost spent in the service of the Lord, being a weak man, there did he offer up his life as a sacrifice of his faith for the Lord Jesus Christ's truth, and died a prisoner for the name of Jesus, in the latter end of the year 1668, and so laid down his life as a testimony against the persecutors and breakers of the command of Christ; and his blood doth cry for vengeance, though he could say, 'The Lord forgive all his persecutors,' who having the mind of Christ, desired the good of all, yea, the worst of his enemies, and in that desire of the good of all did he labor and travel, seeking their good and their eternal welfare in the inheritance of life, that fades not away, of which he was an heir, and is entered into rest, and the possession of the same.

"From this time professors, magistrates and magistrates have gotten their desire, to shut up in prison this servant of the Lord to death, for obeying the command of Christ; but how they will answer it before the King of kings and Lord of lords, the great Judge at his tribunal day, which hastens apace, let them consider with themselves, for if they went into everlasting punishment that did not visit Christ in prison, what will become of such as cast him into prison in his members.

"And so they made his wife a widow, and his children fatherless, who have none to cry unto but the Lord, who will relieve the widow, and help the fatherless.

"The place of his outward habitation was in Greying, in Westmorland; a man known to be of good report before he received the gospel freely from Jesus, which he declared freely; and great sufferings, and trials, and reproaches, and scorns, and hard labors in the work and service of the Lord he went through, and many vain disputes, priests and professors of all sects rose up against him, but the Lord in his power gave him dominion over them all.

"Who ended his days in peace in the truth of God, and the Lord's service and testimony, for his name, and for the keeping of, and obeying the command of Christ, his Lord and Saviour.

"And therefore all friends and brethren that are begotten by Him through the word of life, and others live in the same word, that live, abide, and endure forever, that is a banner and a fire, and as a sword to all that is contrary to that which is holy and pure; so that in the truth, power and word of life, the Lord God may be glorified in you all the days of your life.

"And blessed are all they that die in the Lord, they rest from their labors, and their works will follow them."—G. Fox.

A testimony prefixed to his collected works by Richard Pinder, says:

"As concerning our dear brother in the Lord, Francis Howgill, the author of these ensuing writings, he was a man so well known through the churches of Christ in his day, that much need not be writ concerning him, as by way of testimony to those that knew him, and his spirit and manner of life and conversation, yet I having had a full knowledge of him, especially in the time of his long and tedious imprisonment in the town of Appleby, in Westmorland, where for his testimony sake he ended his days, and laid down his life as a testimony for that Truth that he had testified of so largely, both in preaching the gospel, and in these ensuing books, which he wrote at several times, according as the Lord put it into his heart, and as there was occasion to answer Truth's opposers; and after many years travels and labors in the work of God, he through the envy of some great persons in that country was made prisoner at the foresaid town of Appley, they having nothing justly to lay to his charge, yet knowing that it was his principle not to swear at all (Christ having forbidden it) they put the oath of supremacy and allegiance unto him, and only for refusing to swear he was pre-munured, they in the least laying nothing of misdemeanor to his charge; and when the judge pronounced the sentence of pre-munuring against him, he only replied, 'It is a hard sentence, being only for the exercise of my conscience, and for the duty we owe, and prayed the Lord might forgive them all that had any hand in it; and so after the said sentence, being committed prisoner, he continued a prisoner several years, in which time I was very conversant with him; and I must give this testimony for him, that I never heard him in the least murmur or repine in all the time of his imprisonment, but always appeared as a man wholly given up into the will of God; and when at any time we had been speaking of his long imprisonment, constantly he would have said, 'The will of the Lord be done,' and such was his godly behaviour and conversation in the time of his confinement, that he greatly gained the hearts and love of the gaoler's whole family, and all others of the town that knew him, and had any acquaintance with him; and even to this day, when his name is mentioned, they are all ready to say, he was a man that truly feared God, so that he left an exceeding good savor behind him in that place; and as for the course of his time and days in this world, I have this to say, he was born of honest parents, and brought up to some learning, according to the usual custom of the country, and in his youth and tender years was one that sincerely thirsted after the knowledge of God, and the Lord was good unto him, and gave him discoveries of divine things, unto his soul's great comfort; and he was an early owner of the people of God called Quakers, and walked with them, and was always ready to suffer with them, as at any time called by the Lord thereunto; he was one greatly delighted in concord and unity, and greatly delighted in the company of such whom he knew truly feared the Lord; and nothing did rejoice his heart more than to hear the truth prospered, and that the churches did increase in the blessed fellowship of the gospel of Christ Jesus. And when his days were near spent, that sickness and bodily weakness came upon him, he endured it with very great patience unto the latter end; and his dear wife and some other friends being with him, he spoke forth heavenly things, as one that had obtained the full assurance of an heavenly crown, and as one whose heart and soul was fully fixed upon the Lord, who was mightily seen to be with him to his very last end, his soul magnifying of Him for his infinite goodness unto him all his life long; and so he laid down his head in peace, being he had faithfully served the Lord in his generation. And this is my testimony for that faithful servant of God, who to the hour of his dissolution bore testimony unto the truth; and my soul's desire is, his blood in the day of the Lord may not be laid to the charge of some, who had a great hand both in causing him at first to be made prisoner, and also in the continuing of him so to the very last; but we leave things with the Lord, as knowing vengeance belongs to Him, and that He will give a reward to every one according to their works."

Madagascar.

The Traveller's Tree is immediately recognized by its graceful crown of broad and light-green banana-like leaves, arranged, not as in almost every other tree and plant, around the stem, but at the top of the trunk, in the shape of a fan. The leaves are from twenty to thirty in number, and form <sup>about</sup> <sup>the</sup> <sup>total</sup> <sup>length</sup> <sup>of</sup> <sup>the</sup> <sup>tree</sup> <sup>by</sup> <sup>long</sup> <sup>by</sup> <sup>a</sup> <sup>foot</sup> <sup>and</sup> <sup>a</sup> <sup>half</sup> <sup>breadth</sup>. They very closely resemble those of the banana, and when unbroken by the wind have a very striking and beautiful appearance. On the coast plains its average height is from fifteen to twenty feet to the base of the leaf-stalks; but in the forest, where it has a crowd of rivals in obtaining light and air, it shoots up to heights of eighty or ninety feet.

In proceeding along the coast, says our author, "we had an opportunity of testing the accuracy of the accounts given of the water procurable from the Traveller's tree, about which I had always felt rather skeptical, as somewhat of a 'traveller's tale.' In fact I had never before seen the tree where plenty of good water was not procurable; but here there was none for several miles except the stagnant water of the lagoons. We found that on piercing with a spear or pointed stick the lower part of one of the leaf-stalks, where they all clasp one over the other, a small stream of water spouted out, from which one could drink to the full of good cool sweet water. If one of the leaf-stalks was forcibly drawn down, a quantity of water gushed out, so that we afterwards readily filled a large cup with as much as we needed. On examining a section of one of the stalks, a hollow channel about a quarter of an inch in diameter is seen running all down the inner side of the stalk from the base of the leaf. This appears to collect the water condensed from the atmosphere by the large cool surface of the leaf, and conducts it downward. The leaf-stalks are all full of cells like those of the banana. After three hours' walking along the shore in the heavy sand, with a hot sun overhead, we were glad to draw from these numberless vegetable springs, and thanked the Giver of these living fountains in that thirsty land. We afterwards found that in some villages the people supply themselves constantly from this source."

The Laceleaf plant is peculiar to Madagascar, and is called by Sir W. J. Hooker "one of the most curious of nature's productions." It has an edible root, and grows under water a foot or more deep; from this spring a number of graceful leaves, which spread out just under the surface. These leaves are nine or ten inches long and a couple of inches wide, and their structure is most remarkable, for the whole leaf is like a living fibrous skeleton rather than an ordinary leaf. The portions of the leaf between the veining are not filled up, as in every other plant, but are open, so that the whole is composed of fine tendrils in a regular pattern, so as to resemble a piece of bright green lace or open needle work. Ellis says, "It is scarcely possible to imagine any object of the kind more attractive and beautiful than a full-grown specimen of this plant with its dark green leaves forming the limit of a circle two or three feet in diameter, and in the transparent water within that circle presenting leaves of every stage of development, both as to color and size.

The population of Madagascar is estimated at about 4,000,000—divided among various tribes. Of these the Hovas are the most influential. They inhabit the central parts of the island, and their authority extends over several of the other races, though in the remote districts it is scarcely acknowledged. It is among these that Christianity has made the most progress. About sixty years ago Protestant missionaries first set foot on the island. They labored for about sixteen years reducing the language to writing, and giving the Malagasy their own tongue in a written form; they founded a school system through which many thousands of the natives receive the elements of a good education; they introduced many of the arts of civilized life they translated and printed the Bible in the native language, and gathered several congregations. Then came a period of persecution under Queen Ranavalona I., lasting fifty-two years. Two hundred of the Christian converts were put to death. But Tertullian said, their blood was "the red rain which made the harvest grow," and the fury of the persecuting Queen only extended and deepened the influence of Christianity. After her death persecution ceased, and in 1867 the reigning queen made public profession of the new religion and caused the royal idols to be burned. Her example was followed by multitudes of her subjects, who were accustomed to move in crowds and to follow implicitly whatever is favored by their rulers.

Among the strange customs of these people is one common to all the Polynesian languages of considering the words forming the names of their chiefs as fady or tabooed for common use. Proper names consist largely of names of common objects—animals, birds, insects, plant trees, &c. But if any of these happen to be for the name or part of the name of the chief of the tribe, it becomes sacred, and must no longer be used for the name of that animal, bird, or tree, &c. To this latter another name is given. Thus the late queen on her accession to the throne in 1863 took the name of Rasoheryna. Now Soheryna was the word used for the silk-worm moth, but as soon it was assumed as the name of the Sovereign it could no longer be applied to the insect which since then has been called Zona-dana—"offspring of the silk." It is just as if England they were forbidden to use all words in which the syllables of the names Victoria, William or George occurred, and could not say "victory," "victim," "vixen," or "will," "willing," "wilful," or "geology," "geometry," "geography," &c. What an endless annoyance should we not consider it; y this is precisely the case in many parts of the Malaya-Polynesian countries and islands. It is easy to see how very great an influence such a curious and inconvenient custom may have in altering the speech of different parts of Madagascar.

The contact of the people in past ages with the Arabs, and in the last 200 years with the French and English races has enriched their language by numerous words derived from these sources. The influence of the English is strikingly shown by the adoption of words relating to government—such as Prime Minister, Commander-in-Chief, &c.;—to building—as bricks, square, rule;—to education and literature—school, class, lesson, pen, copy-book, slate, book, press, print, grammar, &c.; and to religious beliefs—baptism, bible, testament, psalm, angel, martyr, and many more. On the other hand, the changes which are taking place in the customs and sentiments of the people are rendering obsolete many words connected with former superstitious practices, such as faith of divination and the worship of idols. The dictionary of the first missionaries will thus be to succeeding generations a kind of museum, where alone they will find relics of the superstitions of their fathers; just as the people of many Polynesian groups can now find in European museums the idols which their ancestors worshipped.

Many of the complimentary and figurative terms used in the native language of Madagascar throw much light on the usages and ideas of the people. It is not unusual to address the people as mainly molaly, "the black lot," the idea being taken from the long strings of soot which hang from inside the high-pitched roofs of the old-fashioned brava houses. These were never cleared away, for they were considered as a proof of old and long established family having inhabited that house, a kind of patent of respectability; and thus the word has become equivalent to what is ancient and venerable in ages.

The native word for hypocrisy means literally "the becoming good by spreading a mat." The meaning of this, at first sight obscure, is seen by remembering that the clay floors of the ordinary Hova houses are covered with the strong and neat mats made by the men. But as the Malagasy are, when unchained by Christianity, not a very cleanly people, when a mat becomes dirty it is not usually removed, but merely covered over by a cleaner one; and so the process goes on till there is often a layer of four or five matting on the floor, each one being dirtier than the one next above it. When a stranger enters a house fresh mats are spread for him to sit upon, and all looks nice and clean, but, no one look underneath, for all sorts of filth may be hidden below! The house has really become clean "by spreading a mat." And so the custom has suggested an ethical use of the phrase for conduct which is all clean and proper outside, but is merely a mask for evil and impurity beneath.

Another expressive word, throwing light on the way in which buying and selling is carried out in Madagascar, is that for barab, adivaratra, literally, "a fought-out sale;" as in the East generally, a bargain is a long and tedious business, the seller beginning by asking many times the sum he is really willing to take, and the buyer offering little in proportion, until, after an immense amount of haggling and talk, an approximation is gradually made and the purchase effected.

Many persons fancy themselves friendly, when they are only officious. They counsel so much that we would become wise as to how they should be recognized as teachers of wisdom.

Memoir of Hannah Marsh.

By HER DAUGHTER, PRISCILLA FITZ.

"7th day 22d of 11th mo. 1873. I wish to record a very memorable event—the loss of my precious husband, who departed this life on the 3rd day 7th of 10th mo. in sweet peace and in the blessed hope of a glorious immortality. We had returned about a week or two from Margate, whither, with our dear children and dear little grandson John Pitt Marsh, we had been favored greatly to enjoy each others society for five weeks with a little intermission of our dear George occasionally for a day or two, and reached our own comfortable home with grateful feelings for the favors bestowed, and in cheerful anticipation of realizing the advantage of our recent sea-side sojourn. But how wisely is the future hidden from us, and uncertainty seems indelibly marked on all terrestrial things. In less than two weeks my precious and very valuable husband became indisposed with congestion of the liver, which increased upon him, and his bodily strength gradually gave way; but with bodily gratitude I can commemorate the loving kindness of our Heavenly Father. He was preserved in a calm, clear and heavenly state of mind, so that it was a comfort to do anything for him. He was spared from bodily suffering, except intense prostration of strength, which the poor enfeebled frame at times had to pass through; but he was mercifully enabled to feel the Everlasting Arms very near for his support; and his trust from time to time was renewed in Him who had been his morning light; and he could thankfully acknowledge,

"29th of 11th mo. In thus taking my pen again I am ready to say, who can fully enter into my bereaved feelings but those who have been similarly bereaved? But my mind has been enabled to look unto the Rock that is higher than I, therefore sweet support has been mercifully extended from time to time by Him who knoweth the depth of my sorrow. But I have a very dear and loving daughter, a true sharer in my griefs and sorrows, and who was a kind and loving companion to her precious father the last two weeks of his earthly pilgrimage, to his great comfort and her own peace. And as for myself, I considered it an especial favor to be enabled to be with him day after day and to witness the peaceful state of his mind on the confines (as it were) of an unseen world, the preparation for which, his dear mind had ardently sought. His transit was so calm and peaceful that it was difficult to know when he ceased to breathe. The language arises in my mind, 'Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my latter end be like unto theirs;' and I am also reminded of the following: 'Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace.' It was indeed a great favor thus to witness the close of his lengthened life. 'Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, yea saith the spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.'

"12th of 3rd mo. 1874. Since the foregoing was written we have again and again realized our very great loss, and my dear Priscilla has been sweetly helped and strengthened to prosecute a little debt of love which seemed called for at her hands, to publish a little memoir of her beloved revered father. It has been gratuitously and very widely circulated in this land and in Ireland.

30th. Near the end of another month since I wrote last, but my mind has been constantly reminded of my great loss; yet remembering with gratitude my great loss proves his great gain, and desires are often raised in my heart to follow him as he endeavored to follow his Divine Master. His memory is indeed sweet, and I can truly say 'he being dead, yet speaketh'; and that I believe is a testimony which very many can adopt, as evidenced by their grateful remarks in acknowledging the receipt of the memoir, many of the letters requesting, if convenient, to have additional copies, which we are very pleased to supply.

"7th of 4th mo. Ah! this feels a very memorable day to me. Just six months since my very precious husband was, I reverently believe, taken from works to rewards. My mind has been this morning very sweetly contemplating his watchful, inward life, with increased desire that I may be more watchful and more faithful, that I may be favored as he was with that blessed hope which is as an anchor to the soul, both sure and steadfast, &c., that when I am called upon 'to give up my accounts I may be able to do it with joy and not with grief,' that so a blessed reunion may be permitted where there is no more parting.

"I have been reading to my great comfort this morning many pages in the sweet and instructive memoir [of my husband,] which has been very widely circulated and gratefully received. It feels to me it may prove like 'bread cast upon the waters, return after many days,' so that I do feel very thankful that the Scripture language seems to be verified, 'Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost.'

"These sweet lines just occur to me,

"Oh! for a closer walk with God,
A calm and Heavenly frame,
A light to shine upon the road,
That leads me to the Lamb.

"How does my dear husband's spirit sweetly comfort, strengthen and instruct me, that by so walking I may be enabled to follow him as he endeavored to follow Christ.

"This day proves to be the day of our London Quarterly Meeting; seasons in which my dear husband and myself were so enabled to mingle with our Friends; but time to us all is very uncertain, hence the great need of 'working while it is called day, before the night cometh, wherein no man can work.'

"Although not equal to be personally with our Friends at the Quarterly Meeting, I have been with them in spirit and in desire, that their meeting be owned by Him who is the Sanctuary of ministers, the "Minister of the sanctuary and true tabernacle, which the Lord hath pitched and not man." Oh! that such seasons may be availed of for dwelling very deep in the spirit of the mind, and getting to the place of true waiting, and feeling after the Lord in prayer if haply they may find Him, for He is not far from every one of us.

"14th of 5th mo. The desire still lives in my heart for a closer walk with God; to keep very near to Him in spirit, and although my mind is often brought very low, yet as the watch is mercifully abode under, I am preserved from sinking too low.

"27th of 10th mo. Several months have elapsed since I made any [allusion] to my sore bereavement, but my thoughts have been very sensibly realizing my great loss; yet my tender, compassionate Heavenly Father has been felt to be near to bear up my drooping mind, raising frequent desires to look unto Him, and unto Him only, for relief and support, often feeling very sensible that in Him are all my fresh springs.

"On the 27th of 6th mo. my dear son George Pitt came, according to previous arrangement, to accompany me to Berkeley Cottage to pay my dear ones there a visit. This sweet intercourse with them was particularly salutary to both body and mind, and I may say, was felt to be mutually so. I went in a middling state of health, and for a long time required and received very kind and close attention from my precious beloved daughter Priscilla, whom my Heavenly Father has kindly spared to me, and a very great comfort I feel her to be. As time passed on, week after week a little renewal of bodily strength was granted me, and I was able to enjoy some pleasant walks with her to my advantage, and having the company of my darling little grandson, whom I very tenderly love, a hope often attends my mind that it may please our Heavenly Father this dear child may be spared to his fond parents, and by attention to the pure witness for God in the secret of his heart, he may prove a blessing to them as they advance in years, and realize the blessing of the Lord to descend sweetly upon him.

"On the 10th of 10th mo. my beloved Priscilla and her darling boy accompanied me to my deserted home and spent the day with me, which proved a great comfort and consolation, being afresh made sensible of the loss I had sustained in the absence of him whose presence formerly used to cheer and animate me on my return to this comfortable home; but I feel I have very much to be thankful for, and the desire of my heart increasingly is, to walk more worthy of the many blessings I receive."

THE WHEAT AND THE TARES.

Growing together, wheat and tares, clustering thick and green,
Fanned by the gentle summer airs under one sky serene;

Over them both the sunlight falls, over them both the rain,
Till the angels come when the Master calls to gather the golden grain.

Growing together, side by side, both shall the reaper meet—
Tares aloft in their scornful pride, bowing heads of wheat;

Swift and sure o'er the waving plain the sickle sharp shall fly,
And the precious wheat, the abundant grain, shall be harvested in the sky.

But for the tares—for them the word of a terrible doom is cast;
Bind and burn, said our blessed Lord, they shall leave the w'heat at last:

Never again the summer rain, never the sunshine sweet,
That were lavished freely all in vain on the tares among the wheat!

Where shall the reapers look for us, when that day of days shall come?
Solemn the thought, with grandeur fraught, of that wondrous Harvest Home!

None but the wheat shall be gathered in by the Master's own command—
For the tares alone—the doom of sin, and the flame in the Judge's hand!

Jesus, oh, grant when thine angels come to reap the fields for thee,
We may be safely gathered home, where thy precious wheat shall be!

ALLUS WELL.
The clouds, which rise with thunder, slake
Our thirsty souls with rain;
The blow 'most dreaded falls to break
From off our limbs a chain;
And wrongs of man to man but make
The love of God more plain.
As through the shadowy lens of even
The eye looks farthest into heaven
On gleams of star and depths of blue,
The glaring sunshine never knew.

More like thee the Christian; in seasons of night,
On the rude thorns of this world, his breast he might lean,
But still he can lean with a hymn of delight,
And his song is most sweet when the thorns are most keen."

LITTLE STREAMS.

BY MARY HOWITT.

Little streams, in light and shadow
Flowing through the pasture meadow;
Flowing by the green wayside;
Through the forest dim and wide;
Through the hamlet still and small;
By the cottage; by the hall;
By the ruined abbey still;
Turning, here and there, a mill;
Bearing tribute to the river;
Little streams, I love you ever!

Summer music is their flowing;
Flowering plants in them are growing;
Happy life is in them all;
Creatures innocent and small;
Little birds come down to drink
Fearless on their leafy brink;
Noble trees beside them grow,
Gloomed then with branches low,
And between, the sunshine glancing,
In their little waves is dancing.

Little streams have flowers a many,
Beautiful and fair as they;
Tyring strong, with green bar-reed;
Willow-herb with cotton seed;
Arrow-head with eye of jet,
And the water-violet;
There the flowering rush you meet,
And the plamy meadow-sweet;
And in places deep and still,
Marble-like, the water-lily.

Little streams, their voices cheery
Sound forth welcome to the weary,
Flowing on from day to day,
Without stint and without stay.
Here, upon their flowery bank,
In the old times pilgrims drank:
Here, have seen, as now, pass by Kingfisher and dragon-fly;
Those bright things that have by their dwelling
Where the little streams are welling.

Down in valleys green and lowly,
Murmuring not and gliding slowly;
Up in mountain-hollows wild,
Fretting like a peevish child;
Through the hamlet, where all day
In their waves the children play,—
Running west, or running east,
Doing good to man and beast,
Always giving, never never,
Little streams, I love you ever!

THE NIGHTINGALE.

[Founded on the popular tradition that this bird, in the absence of its mate, chooses a thorn for its resting-place, and leans its breast upon the prickly point.]

As I lingered last night near the hazelwood seat,
To be lost on the music of Philomel's song,
Methought that the strain was unusually sweet,
And, though tender as ever, unusually strong.

I approached her, but much did I marvel to view,
That on a rude thorn-bush she pillowed her breast,
And that sweeter and stronger her melody grew,
As near and more near to its sharp point she pressed.

Like thee is the worldling, I said, with a sigh:
There is mirth on his lips, but there's grief in his heart;
And often when pleasure beams bright in his eye,
There lurks in his soul a thorn's festering smart.

As time passed on, Soren Olsen's convictions of the hurtful tendency of the change which were taking place in the body of Friends with whom he was connected (the Yearly Meeting of Iowa), did not diminish, and in a letter dated 10th mo. 2nd, 1877, he remarked: "In regard to this superficial religion that the large body has adopted and run into, I would not say that infidelity, &c., is the immediate, but the ultimate result; for when people find there is no real comfort, peace and support to the soul, they will be apt to conclude there is no reality in religion—a dangerous stratagem of the enemy! I have seen the effects of it already. We hear many boast of all the converts they make, but they say nothing about the infidels they make. And just as surely as Hicksism landed many of its authors in virtual infidelity, so will this."

Under date of 4th mo. 11th, 1878, he writes: "The state of Society is most deplorable. I am very sore deeply mourns over it incessantly; the reports as well as personal observations are very discouraging. The great lack of information is astonishing, and almost every kind of doctrine is preached and held up; all is gone all will do, if it is only a superficial faith in Christ; a literal knowledge of the Scriptures, &c., and all every kind is good enough except the doctrine of the inward and saving light, such that defend and advocate such doctrines are branded as heretics, Hicksites, &c. I have lately had a long argument with some of the innovators. I have often thought, oh, that men would humble themselves and retire unwarily in true waiting of spirit before the Lord, then such things would not exist amongst us as a people."

Dwelling, as our friend appears to have done, so much under a concern about the departures from the original principles of Friends, which he observed among his fellow-members in religious profession, it is not surprising that he greatly enjoyed the friendship of those whose views on these subjects coincided with his own, and with whom he could feel true unity. Such friends he found among the members of Ohio Yearly Meeting, with whom he became acquainted about the year 1874; and the warmth of his feelings is shown in the correspondence which was subsequently maintained. In the summer of that year he visited some of these residing in Linn county, Iowa, and after his return home wrote as follows to one of them: "I often think of the good little visit I enjoyed amongst you. I shall long have to remember thy great kindness in taking me round and spending so much time with me, a poor unworthy Zion traveller, hardly worth taking notice of by any body. Friends, remember me in your prayers, that I might be enabled to hold out under the increasing trials that are coming heavily upon me; for as many as are going off on the land they are keenly watching my downfall on the other hand. I feel as a mournful and discomforted lonely traveller in the wilderness, ready to exclaim, 'Who can stand with me?'" the combined powers of the enemy are put to motion for our overthrow.'

"I want thee to give my love to the Friends that we visited. I feel them near to my heart, and in this love I can salute them as fellow-travellers to a better land."

Under date of 9th mo. 17th of same year (1874), he writes to the same friend: "I was glad to get a letter from thee again, and it was as truly acceptable and refreshing to my mind. A word in season to a weary traveller, how good it is! Although I often feel poor and destitute in my mind, not rich in words to respond to my friends, yet I hope I appreciate such greetings of love and sympathy from my dear friends. I feel a love to flow a silent, running stream in my heart, to all my endeared friends, and I feel I can salute them in the fellowship of the gospel, as we are walking together in the tribulated path." 2nd mo. 11th, 1876, he writes to the same loved friend: "I often feel my heart drawn forth in love to thee and Friends there; and I feel a desire in my heart to be amongst you, and mingle with you in the sweet fellowship of the gospel; and my desires are that we might all be kept and preserved from the wiles of the snares of the enemy, and that we be united in watchfulness unto prayer. The Society here [belonging to Iowa Yearly Meeting] seems pretty much gone with the spirit of rantism. It is amazing to what pitch or man can swerve, when he has lost the love and power of religion, and turns again to a weak and beggarly elements." It goes on with me to see the old landmarks so entirely removed, and to witness the doctrines, testimonies and practices of our early Friends entirely rejected, set at naught or despised, and that shall I do, except to endeavor to show where my proper place is, and to seek unity to the Lord for strength and ability and assistance to endure."

The cautious desire, "to endeavor to know where my proper place is," which is manifested in the above extract, was very apparent to our dear friend and it prevented any hasty rash movement on his part, so that he did not finally become a member of Ohio Yearly Meeting till a few months before his death, though he had for years been bound to its members by the ties of gospel fellowship, as those who were endeavoring to maintain the original principles of our Society, to which he was so firmly attached. His own lonely feelings and humble watchfulness of spirit during this intervening period, are touchingly shown in a letter written to a friend in Lincoln county, Va. whom he had some acquaintance. It is dated 3rd mo. 22d, 1877.

"Often falls it to my lot to feel solitary and tired, as I cannot enjoy any religious fellowship with the large body that have run so excessively into rantism and distraction; neither have I had for sometime past, which have plainly and publicly told them. And therefore I know in a measure what it is to retire into a wilderness state, and I think it must be the experience of not a few of the Lord's children in this day of trial and commotion. May we be willing to be sifted, so that that which cannot be shaken may remain, for we all be kept by the power of God, for we are able to keep and preserve all them whose mind is stayed on Him. Very much I long to see the Society of Friends reunited into one body. I mean the orthodox members of the several distinct and particular organizations, so that it should no longer be 'we,' and 'you,' and 'they'; but that 'we' should all be 'one,' as it was in the beginning when they were all of one mind, all minding the same thing. But the time for this seems to be far distant yet; but the Lord's time is the right time. Times and seasons are in his hands; He alone can remove every obstacle in the way. May we always be in submission to his will and dispensations; always giving heed to the voice that speaks in the secret of our own hearts: ready to suffer, ready to stay, or to go forth at his bidding, as He goes before and prepares the way."

The following extract from a letter written 11th mo. 28th, 1877, shows the care which he exercised to avoid running into any extreme. "I have plainly seen the danger there is for us on both sides; for while we should have no fellowship with such that have departed from the true faith, or with such that have caused wide and grievous departures in the Society; and on the other hand be equally concerned not to reject a little message that the Lord may see fit to send to our door, if ever it should bear the true stamp; if not, it will show itself. The Lord may send by whom He will."

The same lesson is taught in another epistle bearing date 3d mo. 22d, 1878, and addressed to S. W. S., of Springville, Iowa. "I love and respect all true Friends, that hold and advocate sound doctrine; and all less essential strife and controversy; I endeavor as much as I can to steer clear of, as I have had no hand or part in it from the beginning. I am quite sensible that there are and must be certain limits to charity, long-suffering and forbearance, but after all no partiality; no hard feelings."

"Times are yet very trying as to the Society matter. Our meetings for worship are frequently scenes of disorder and confusion. It often falls to my lot to warn, to admonish, to reprove; but it seems to no purpose; and so I am still struggling along, often under much weakness and fear. I often think of your quiet and orderly meetings."

This letter contains the following affectionate message to a friend, Tilman Patterson, whose recent sudden death, while on a visit to relatives in Philadelphia, was so startling to those who knew him. "Most affectionately do I want to be remembered to the Pattersons. They are indeed very dear to my heart. I often think of my dear friend Tilman, as he is far advanced in years and cannot get out or about much. I have been led to sympathize with him, thinking perhaps the time seems long to him, but I know he has that within him that is able to support him under all. I feel like I could wish to drop a word of encouragement to him. The warm grasp of his loving hand has done me much good."

In the summer of 1875, he paid a visit of a few months to his native land, which he found looking "more mountainous, rocky and stony than it ever did before, so that I have to wonder how people can live here in this poor country."

Though desirous to avoid swelling these extracts to an unreasonable length, the writer feels unwilling to omit the following testimony of our dear friend: "I am well satisfied that the doctrine promulgated and carried out of our early Friends, is the only true, fundamental and genuine doctrine of the Christian religion. It was the doctrine that our Saviour and his apostles taught; it was the doctrine of the primitive Christians; and William Penn, in unfolding and explaining the doctrine of this people (the Friends), calls it most properly, 'Primitive Christianity revived.' But now-a-days, modernized Quakerism is built on a different fabric from that."

The last of his letters from which it is proposed here to insert an extract, was written 4th mo. 11th, 1878, and addressed to R. E. P. of Iowa. In this he apologizes for delay in writing by saying, "Although I am often sensible of the love, the sweet unity and fellowship which I at times am permitted to enjoy and to feel towards my friends, yet these are not always to be clothed in words; that is, the Fountain is not at all times so opened as to allow of verbal expression."

"I often remember my dear friends with tender solicitude, although I have to feel myself very much alone, somewhat similar to the mournful expressions of the royal Psalmist: Like a pelican of the wilderness; and an owl of the desert; and as a sparrow alone upon the house-top. But, my friends, it is for us to learn to be reconciled to our different allotted dispensations; only so that we have a sense and an evidence granted us, that we stand in acceptance with our Lord and Master. But when this fails us, when the soul feels that it sinks from [loss] a feeling sense of the streams of the Divine life, and with a sense of its own inability to extricate itself, then it is low and proving seasons; time for us then to be aroused to our condition, and to seek Him whom our souls love, for we have the promise that if we seek we shall find; and whom shall we go to in such times of great need, except to Him that has the words of eternal life."

After lamenting the confusion that prevailed in our beloved Society, he adds: "I have very much desired that each one of us may do our whole duty, earnestly seeking to the Lord [to know] what is for us to do. May none of us dwell in our 'ceiled houses,' remembering our early Friends, how they carried the Gospel message to almost every part of the habitable globe. May we, like them, bear a faithful testimony to the true and undefiled religion."

In the spring of 1879, the writer of this narrative was entertained in the hospitable home of Sorin Olsen, whose whole conduct gave the impression of a humble-minded, innocent, watchful Christian. In the meeting at Stavanger, it was interesting to notice the reverent and weighty manner in which the vocal exercises of a Friend present were rendered into Norse for the benefit of the older persons present of his own race, who could not readily understand one who spoke in the English language. When, some months after, the intelligence was received that his course on earth had ended, the mind was prepared to believe that the Lord who notices every tear of his humble followers, and every struggle of the exercised soul, had called him to join that innumerable throng who had come out of great tribulation, had washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb, and are now partaking of the joys of Heaven.

His death occurred on the 5th of 11th month 1879. He was taken unwell with an attack of fever, and lingered about seven weeks before his end came. A near neighbor, whom he loved and valued, writes, that "his state of mind during his sickness was not marked with any great things, as some have evinced on a dying bed. But he was kept in a humble, resigned state, whether to live or die; and spoke of the Lord's love and mercy to his soul, enough to satisfy [us] of his hope of a blessed eternity. The Lord calls them blessed that don't see and yet believe. He also spoke of the great love he felt to all mankind, such as he had never evinced before. I often sat at his bedside during his sickness, and great peace was to be felt there. So I think we are not deceiving ourselves in having a sure hope that he has entered into that rest which is prepared for the children of God."

Very similar is the testimony of one of his family, who in giving information of his decease says: "As he was nearing his last, he was entirely given up to the will of the One that ruleth over all. Towards the last his heart was filled with love to all men. He would often exclaim, 'Oh the love I have to the whole human family, without distinction whatever?' The last few days of his life, he would occasionally say something to this effect: 'Oh the joys that I am to enter!' We know that our sad bereavement is nothing counted with his gain."

May we not adopt the language—"Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints." "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors."

How Handle Medicine.

On a bright pleasant summer morning, a young man with a silk muffler around his throat, and a woe-begone look in his pale face, plied the big knocker upon the doctor's dwelling. A lady answered the summons, and informed the applicant that the doctor was in the garden at work. To the garden the young man went, where he found the man of medicine engaged in hoeing his sweet corn.

"Well, sir, and what is the matter?" the doctor asked, when the applicant had stated that he had come for medical advice and assistance.

"Well, doctor," with a lugubrious face, and whining, moaning tone, "I feel poorly all through. My head has spells of aching; my appetite is poor; my food does not set well; and I am very weak. Really, I need help."

"Yes, I see. Let me look at your tongue. Ah! Yes. Now—your pulse."

The pulse was felt, and, after due deliberation, said the doctor:

"Look you, young man, you do certainly need help. Now see; I must attend an important case at 10 o'clock, and I must have this corn hoed before I go. So while I am gone, you take my hoe, and go on with my work here. You know how to use a hoe?"

"Yes, my father was a farmer; but I haven't worked on a farm since he died."

"And you haven't worked much anywhere else, I take it"—the doctor threw in pleasantly.

"No, I am not obliged to."

"Very well. I'll warrant you the work here won't hurt you; so go on with it until I come back."

With that the doctor trudged off, and the young man went at the work of hoeing. He hoed to the end of the row, and there removed the light muffler from his neck. Then he went at it again. Half way down the second row he stopped and looked up, but no doctor was in sight. At the end of that row, as the absent one had not yet appeared, he pulled off his coat.

The third row he hoed more slowly, stopping several times before the end was reached; but he finished it, and after a good rest, attacked the fourth row. There was but one more row after this, and the fancy seized him to have it done before the old fellow got back. It would be a surprise to him. It quickened his pulses and gave him renewed vim. He had just completed the last hill of the last row when the doctor came back.

"Well, well, my young friend, how are you feeling now?"

The patient really had to consider. He had been looking to see what the physician had brought with him of medicine; but he had brought nothing. His hands were empty. "The work hasn't hurt you, has it?"

"Oh, no," his face glowing with the exercise.

"I thought not. Let me feel your pulse again." He held the young man's wrist for a brief space, and then—

"It has worked to a charm. Now do you go home, and repeat the dose twice a day, every morning and afternoon; do it faithfully, and be honest with your diet; don't use tobacco; and if that doesn't work a cure, come and let me know. My fee is one dollar."

"One—dollar?" gasped the astonished youth.

"That is all I charge when patients call at my door."

"But in mercy's name! what is it for? Where is your prescription? What have I taken of yours?"

"My prescription, my dear young friend, I gave you before I left you here with my hoe; the medicine you have been taking in my place—a health-portion which I should have enjoyed had I not given it up to you. And now I will tell you frankly, you are rusting out, literally tumbling to pieces for want of exercise of both body and mind. That is all. You can follow my prescription and be cured, or you can take your own way."

The young man paid the dollar, and went his way. Not then could he be cheerful; but afterwards, when he had allowed reason fair play, and had come to prove the life-saving and the new life-giving virtues of the doctor's prescription he came and thanked him.—Banner.

Illustrations of the Life of the Christian.—Some Indian shawls are made of hundreds of pieces, some so small as to be only an eighth of an inch square, others of various sizes, none larger than a square half-yard. Each piece, even the smallest, forms a complete bit of the pattern, and the right side, being the under one on the frame on which it is woven, is not seen by the weaver until the piece is finished. The pieces are all so beautifully joined together that it is impossible to find the joining.

How often are we "discouraged because of the way," because we can only see the wrong side of the pattern our daily life is weaving. We forget that "the Lord knoweth them that are his," and that "all things work together for good to them that love God." And should we not try to remember also, that, though our place in the work may be a very small one, the great fabric, the Church of God, would be incomplete if that place were not filled.

There is another point of similarity; each thread is bleached perfectly white before being re-dyed for the shawl; so we also, before becoming a part of the Church, must be washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb: "that He might present it to himself, a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, any such thing;" but that it should be ho and without blemish.

I know the hand that is guiding me through the shadow to the light;

And I know that all beheading me is meted out aright I know that the thorny path I tread is ruled by golden line;

And I know that the darker life's tangled thread, richer the deep design.

British Evangelist.

For "The Friend"

In presenting some extracts from the writings of that excellent Christian, Thomas Upham, it is with the desire they may read and pondered by all who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity, and are seeking after holiness of heart, and have realized in some degree, the object of their search. These we understand their import and make a proper application of them. M. B.

"Seek holiness rather than consolation. Not that consolation is to be despised, thought lightly of; but solid and permanent consolation is the result rather than the forerunner of holiness; therefore, he who seeks consolation as a distinct and independent object, will miss it. Seek and possess holiness and consolation will follow, as assuredly warmth follows the dispensation of the rays of the sun, not perhaps often in the form of ecstatic and rapturous joys, but rather of solid and delightful peace. He who is holy, must be happy."

"In whatever you are called upon to endeavor to maintain a calm, collected, a prayerful state of mind. Self-recollection of great importance. 'It is good for me to wait quietly for the salvation of the Lord. He who is in what may be called a spirit of hurry, or rather who runs without having evidence of being spiritually sent, makes has to no purpose.'—T. C. U."

Religious Items, &c.

Mennonite Discipline.—From the proceedings of a Mennonite Conference in Lancaster Co., Pa., held 3rd mo. last, we gather the following items: "Marrying out of the church subjects the person so doing, to a suspension from the church privileges until reconciliation is made. The brethren are prohibited from serving in any civil office, further than supervisor or road-master, overseer of the school, school director and postmaster. Births or surprise parties, are not permitted among the brotherhood. It is not intended to disallow the gathering home of the children of household in Christian order, but the disorder and follies practised by the world in the things should be avoided."

The signing of tavern licenses is regarded as unbecoming to those who profess to follow Christ. We should show meekness and humility in all our walk and conversation. Mothers should not array their children in fashionable and vain apparel, and we should seek, in all things, to live a consecrated, Christian life, in all meekness and in the fear of God.

Parents should be earnestly admonished to bring up their children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Each member has duty to perform in the church, and each could feel the necessity of performing it. The extravagance at funerals, especially regard to the undress and unnecessary profusion of food, resembling more a feast than a funeral, was earnestly reprov'd and condemn'd. What is needful to supply the wants of the body is proper; but extravagance and show should not be indulged in.

Practical Godliness.—A writer in the Eternist makes these sensible remarks:—“Irrish, relies for her success upon any thing deep, vital and practical godliness, she inevitably fail in accomplishing her great mission. Numbers, wealth, learning, position, popularity, can never supply the place of it. This is indispensable, and it must be felt, last, and always.”

“There is a want of men who fearlessly lay the great law of God, and the law of love, to all the vices of the age, and the prevailing, worldly tendencies of the church. How many professed Christians participate in the ungodly in vain amusements? How many follow, and even lead in extravagant dress and worldly follies? How many do profess on principles which will not bear the test of Bible morality? ‘Love thy neighbor as thyself.’”

“To come to the fountain-head of these sins, how many are entire strangers to communion with God?”

Natural History, Science, &c.

Reservative Power of Cassava Juice.—One of Cassava (Jatropha mollissima), is known to be in its raw state, poisonous, but by boiling it in two waters, which must be changed, the poison is extracted, and the juice rendered fit for food. The poisonous quality is easily known by raising a bit of the root to the spot, and putting the tongue to it; it then tastes showy poison, but it is probable that the sweet kind contains an injurious dose. The sap, which, like that of our potatoes, is injurious as an article of food, is in the “Pepper-pot” of the West Indies, or the name of “Cassereep,” as a perfect irritative of meat. This juice, put into an earthen vessel with a little water and Chili pepper, is said to keep meat that is immersed in it for a great length of time, even for a year. No iron or steel must touch the mixture or it will become sour. This “Pepper-pot” which we first heard from the late Bishop Whately, is a most economical and safe in a hot climate; any beef, mutton, or fowl, that may be left at dinner, if put into the mixture and a little fresh “Cassereep” added, keeps perfectly, though other articles, in the heat of the climate or flies would ruin it.—D. Livingstone.

Amber.—At a meeting of the British Archaological Association, to statements made these articles were of recent date, evincing it to be known to the Romans. The earliest appearance to have been in England and North America to have been of leather, one of the material being shown. It was in use in York or Cork so late as 1820. A large number of samples of brass, dating from 1500, were also shown. They were mostly found in London, and some of the seventeenth century have in them.—From Athenaeum.

Ancient Odor of Spices.—An interesting geological observation has been made quite accidentally. It is well known that the urns found on Roman burial grounds, and containing the bone remains of cremated bodies are often covered with clay cups or dishes. The object of these dishes was supposed to have been to contain spices, which sent forth agreeable odors during the progress of the cremation. Herr Dahlem, a well-known German archaeologist, was able to verify this view in the following manner: He had obtained a dish of this kind which was broken, and after cementing it, had placed it upon a stove for the purpose of drying the cement. Shortly afterward he noticed a strong and by no means unpleasant odor proceeding from the heated dish. It seems, therefore, that the ingredients burned in the dish some fifteen centuries ago had left traces behind, which announced their presence upon becoming heated. Herr Dahlem remarks that the odor was not unlike that of storax.—From Nature.

Longevity of Fishes.—Some days ago I had occasion to make some inquiry into the age of fishes, and was surprised to find that they lived so long. Thinking that there are others who know as little about the subject as I did, I append a letter I received from Professor Spencer W. Baird, United States Fish Commissioner, who is the best authority in the world on fish. He writes:—“There is, I believe, authentic evidence to show that carp have attained an age of two hundred years. There is a tradition that within the last fifty years a pike was living in Russia whose age dated back to the fifteenth century. The fish is said to have been eighteen feet long. This, however, is not considered, very reliable. But there is nothing to prevent a fish from living almost indefinitely, as it has no period of maturity, but grows with each year of life. In species like mammals and birds, where there is a limit, a definite term of years is generally the rule.” There are now some gold-fish here, in the aquariums of the United States botanical garden, that are fifty years old. A gold-fish dealer in Baltimore showed me some gold-fish that he had kept in his aquarium for thirty years.—Hartford Times.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 22, 1880.

The early members of our Society were led to give up all dependence on their own unassisted powers either to work the works of God, or to acquire any true knowledge of Divine things. Before their conviction, many of them had long been zealous in religious profession; and by meditation, the study of Scriptures, and listening to the teachings of other men, had built up for themselves a doctrinal edifice which was beautiful in their eyes and highly valued; but when, through the convicting power of the spirit of Christ, they came to sit down as humble scholars under his teaching, they found all their former attainments to be of no value, and that until these had passed through the fire of God's altar, they could not be used in the erection of a true spiritual building. Isaac Pennington says of himself, the Lord “brought me to a full sense of my want of his spirit and power, and dashed all my religion in pieces; that I was just like Babylon, for in one hour judgment and desolation came upon me; and I knew not what to do without the Lord, nor which way to draw nigh to Him; but then was the Lord preparing for me that day of mercy, which since, in his tender goodness, is broken in upon me. And now the eye which He hath opened in me, seeth that the Gospel is a manifestation of the spirit and power of the Lord Jesus Christ; and that he who would be his disciple indeed, must be turned to his spirit, and receive the immediate light and shinings of his Spirit into his vessel; and must feel the law of life, the holy laws of the new covenant, not comprehended outwardly in his mind, but written inwardly in his heart by the finger of God's Spirit.”

The distinction which I. Pennington here draws between that knowledge of Divine things which is derived from the immediate light and shinings of the Spirit of Christ in the heart, and that notion about them which the mind forms by the exercise of its own natural powers, is one of fundamental importance, and lies at the root of the difference between a true Gospel ministry, and one which stands in the wisdom and will of man. The Society of Friends has ever believed that the true minister must be divinely called into the service, that he must learn to wait upon the Lord in the silence of all the natural workings of his mind, and be taught how to distinguish between those motions to active labor which come with Divine authority, and those which are merely the promptings of his own restless spirit, or natural affection and desire to please his audience. The way to grow in the ministry and to become strong in the Lord and in his service, is to be diligent in the performance of every duty that is required, with an eye fixed on the Lord, trusting in Him alone for light and for strength; and to be constantly receiving fresh supplies of wisdom and ability from the inexhaustible Fountain of all good, which He dispenses as He sees meet to those who patiently and earnestly wait upon Him. Those who are thus taught of the Lord in the school of real religious experience, will all speak the same language; and herein consists the true unity of the church. It was because our early Friends were thus instructed in the School of Christ, and had the same Heavenly Teacher, that it could be truly said of them—“From whatever part of the world Friends come, they all speak the same language.”

It is sorrowfully true that this cannot now be said of the members or even of the ministers of our Society, to the same extent as formerly. And we believe this is largely due to the almost exclusive dependence which is now placed on Scripture study for a knowledge of the principles of religion. Some of our members have too much lost sight of the truth that the natural man knoweth not the things of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned. Hence they apply themselves to the study of the Bible, and to a comparison of doctrines and texts, with little reference to the necessity of “the immediate light and shinings of the Spirit,” without which the true force and meaning of much of the Scripture cannot be known. The man of acute intellect, and of large understanding, may acquire much, just in the same way that he may make himself a proficient in philosophical or scientific knowledge. But unless he has received the humble and teachable spirit of a child, and has learned to look to the Lord as his teacher, he will be one of those from whom our Saviour thanked his Father that He had hidden the things pertaining to his Kingdom, while He had revealed them unto babes. When the doctrinal belief of a people grows out of the exercise of their unassisted intellectual faculties, there must be great diversity among them—the inevitable result of different mental characters and surroundings, and the bias of education.

The relation which John Barclay gives of his own experience on this subject is so instructive, that it may fittingly be introduced here:—

"When it pleased an unutterably merciful Power to pluck my feet out of the midst of almost all mire and filth, and clearly to show me what I was, and what I should be, then there sprang living desires to know the way to become all that I ought to be, even the way to the Kingdom; and then it was that the enemy, as a transformed angel, took me into the wilderness of notional religion, and set me to examine different systems of religious belief in my own will, and judging of them by my own wisdom; and I compared doctrine with doctrine, text with text, and became, by religious study, wise in notions (though truths in themselves), and the enemy made me strong in argument and potent in Scripture. But how shall I speak of his goodness, that broke the net in which I was entangled, and delivered me from the snare, and introduced me in measure into the saving knowledge of Himself, even that which is revealed, as "in the cool of the day," by the "still small voice." Oh! how plainly did I then see, that all that I had ever learned, read, received, held, and believed, in my own will, way, and time, was to be given up,—how clearly did I see that all knowledge, faith, and obedience, but that which the Father was pleased to beget and raise in me in his own season, was good for nothing and must be cast out as "salt that hath no savor," as manna not fit for the present use! And to this day, though I have read many books which treat of and support our principles, believing that they are very comfortable and confirming to him that hath come to the Fountain head, whilst his mind is turned inward in reading them, and all-overflowing in satisfying the simple-hearted inquirer, whose simplicity the Lord regards,—and of service in stopping the mouths of gain-sayers;—I say, to this very day, I dare not sit down and study Friends' opinions and principles as a science, but find myself constrained to wait upon the Lord day by day; that so, as much strength, as much knowledge, as much satisfaction in regard to religious matters, as is best for me in my present condition, may be handed to me. And I trust this is the surest way to acquire my very best, from daily intercourse; for things have never been cleared up to my certain satisfaction in such a wonderful manner, as since I have been under this discipline of the cross to all selfish wisdom."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The greater portion of the town of Milton, in Northumberland Co., Pa., was destroyed by fire on the 14th inst. The flames originated in cars parked at the northern part of the town, and burned south till the open country on the south was reached. 666 buildings were destroyed, and only two places of business remain. Nearly 3,000 people were rendered homeless—many of whom lost all they possessed. One man was burned to death while attempting to save property. Relief has been promptly forwarded to the sufferers from the neighboring country and towns. The loss on property is estimated at $2,000,000. Several other disastrous fires have occurred during the past week.

On the 13th, the larger part of the village of Stuyvesant, eleven miles north of Hudson, N. Y., and nearly half of West Liberty, Ohio, were destroyed. A destructive fire has occurred near Bradford, Pa. The forest fires in New Jersey have continued, but in some sections have abated, owing to change of wind, which shows the flames back over the burned districts.

The tonnage of anthracite coal, for the week ending on the 15th, amounted to 397,885 tons. Although this is 200,000 tons less than for the corresponding period last year, those engaged in the coal traffic pronounce last year, though mining has been somewhat restricted, and it is thought there will be a demand for all that is now being produced.

The President has signed the Diplomatic appropriation bill and the bill for the relief of settlers on the public lands.

The House on the 15th, adopted the concurrent resolution to adjourn the session on the 31st inst.

At a meeting of the Western Nail Association, held at Pittsburg on the 12th, it was decided to reduce the card rates to $3.25, and also to suspend operations for two weeks, on the next three. The window-glass produced at the same city have decided to suspend production for the next three months.

It is reported from Leadville, Colorado, that a company of seventeen white men, who were prospecting on the Ute reservation, have all been massacred by the Indians.

The Secretary of the Treasury informs that the daily receipts of the Government, during the present month, have averaged over one million dollars.

The weather was very cold along the Hudson river and in the vicinity of the Catskills on the night of the 14th. Snow fell in quantities along the river, and ice was formed in various localities along the coast. It is reported from storing Indian supplies at Rosebud Landing, Dakota, were destroyed by a tornado on the 12th inst.

The Crow, Bannock and Shoshone Indians have agreed to sell to the Government large tracts of reservations, on condition of an annual payment of certain sums of money for a limited number of years. A bill was presented to the Senate on the 17th, ratifying the agreement; also one providing for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Peorias and Miamis, in the Indian Territory.

The Council at Atlantic City has accepted a proposition from a man in Rhode Island, to furnish the city with an abundant supply of pure, wholesome water, to be brought from the mainland across the meadows.

The mortality in Philadelphia for the week ending on the 15th inst. was 330. This number includes 63 died of consumption, and 32 of inflammation of the lungs.

Markets.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 106½; do. 5's, 103½; registered, 108½; do. coupon, 109; do. 5's, 107½.

Cotton remains about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings at 11½ a 12 cts. per pound for uplands and N. Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 7½ a 7½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is in limited request, but notably unchanged. Sales of 5,000 bushels, including red extras at $5.25 and amber at $1.33; S. 1.34. Rye is steady at $8.25; S. 8.50; Penna. family at $5.25 a $5.75; western do. at $5.75 a $6.25; and patent at $6.50 a $7.25. Rye-flour is quiet at $4.25 per barrel.

Grain.—Wheat was in demand, but prices were rather easier. Sales of 90,000 bushels, including red at $1.31, and amber at $1.33; S. 1.34. Rye is steady at $8.25; S. 8.50; Penna. family at $5.25 a $5.75; western do. at $5.75 a $6.25; and patent at $6.50 a $7.25. Rye-flour is quiet at $4.25 per barrel.

Hay and straw market, for week ending 5th mo. 15th. 1880.—Loads of h. y. 340; straw, $1. Average price during the week: Prime timothy, $1 a $1.15 per 100 pounds; mixed, 45 cts. a 1.05; straw, 1.25 a $2.00. The cattle market has been dull during the past week and prices were a fraction lower—3200 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5½ cts. per lb. as to condition.

Sheep were dull and lower, 6000 head sold at the different yards at 5½ a 7½ cts. per lb., as to condition and lambs at 6 a 9 cts. per lb.

Hogs were dull, but prices were unchanged—55 head sold at 6¼ a 7 cts. per lb.

Cows were unchanged—190 head sold at $20 a $25 per head, according to condition.

Wool.—The market continues in a very inactive & unsatisfactory condition, the stock of domestic fleeces being nearly exhausted, while the supply of foreign considerably in excess of the demand. Prices are low and entirely nominal. Among the sales were, O medium at 40 cts.; do. fine at 52½ cts.; Colorado card unwashed Virginia 3½ cts.; do. medium, 3½ cts.; do. low, 40.

Oils.—Lard, prime, 56 cts.; do. No. 1, 51 cts.; No. 2, 45 cts. Lin-seed, 76 a 77 cts. Nuts foot, 75 cts. Sperm, crude, 49 a 52 cts.; bleached white $1.20 a $1.25.

Flour.—Clover, 6½ a 7½ cts. per pound. Timot $2.90 a $3 per bushel. Flaxseed, $1.45. Orish grain, $1.75.

FOREIGN.—The Times, speaking of the British management of the Indian Opium, says: "A notorious system seems to have prevailed for years, which the Government of India was compelled to the highest possible price for everything. Few of tasks of the Marquis of Hartington, Secretary of State for India, promise to be more difficult than that of forming the Indian Opium."—The Times, speaking of the increasing rapidly. According to the advices of steamship companies, the volume of emigration from Europe this month will excel that of last.

On the 15th inst., a boiler explosion occurred in Bucheli's Hill Iron works, which killed twenty-five men, and injured about sixty more, and about sixty injured, some of whom were reported in a dying condition.

Three of the five missing boats of the mail steamer American, which foundered on the passage from Cape of Good Hope to Southampton, were picked up the 24th and 25th of last month by an American brig, and instantly transferred to a British steamer.

A Vienna dispatch says: The strained relations between Roumania and Bulgaria have now come to a complete rupture. The recall of the Roumanian representatives has been followed by that of the Bulgarian agents.

Information has been received from Alexandria that there has been a great revival of the slave trade on the Red Sea.

A telegram from Nagasaki states, that Japan has rejected the proposal of China to enter into an alliance against Russia.

DIED. at her residence in Flushing, Belmont co. Ohio, on the 20th of 3d month, 1880, MARY AN HOLLOWAY, wife of Wm. H. Holloway, and daughter of Aaron F. France, in the 38th year of her age. She was a member of Flushing Monthly Meeting of Friends, and although a frequent attendant of meetings, and a thoughtful relative to her soul's best interest, ever "resolves and re-resolves" to live a more devoted nor delay a preparation for death to a dying hour; as she was heard to express near her close, "The has now come, and I fear but little doubt, and we note that I know not how to beget and raise in me in his own season, was good for nothing and must be cast out as "salt that hath no savor," as manna not fit for the present use! ## The Sea-Islands of South Carolina.

The net-work of islands which form the coast of South Carolina from Charles-on, southward, has long been noted as the place for the production of the fine, long stapled cotton, known as "Sea-Island cotton." In former times the soil, and the inhabitants, were maintained by a few wealthy planters. Their later position left the slaves peculiarly at the mercy of their masters—for there were very few visitors who penetrated into that region; and but little opportunity for the force of public opinion to keep in check unreasonable or cruel men.

During the civil war, the white planters were mostly driven from their possessions; when that dreadful contest was ended and peace restored, those who returned to their former homes were in a general way financially impoverished. Having visited these islands some years since, under circumstances which gave me some opportunities to learn the situation and progress of the colored people, who form the great mass of the population, I have been much interested in an excellent account of their present state, as prepared by a reporter of the Charleston News-Courier, the leading newspaper of that State. The account appears to be the result of much inquiry and personal examination, and is probably trustworthy in its general features. From it the following information is extracted:

Every one who is acquainted with the sub-tropics knows that the landed proprietors of the Sea-Islands were, in years gone by, the wealthiest men in the State; that they lived like kings, surrounded by their vassals, upon large estates, and by their wealth and social position, wielded no small influence in the political affairs of the Commonwealth. It is fully well known that upon them fell heaviest the evil results of the war, leaving them almost destitute of all that disastrous struggle, shorn of their lands and houses. To many even the shelter of a home remained, and the soil of their ancestors was in the possession of their former slaves. In 1866, through the intervention of the Federal commanders, rightful owners were restored to the possession of their estates, but they were not in position to resume with any chances of success their planting interests. They had no capital, and the negroes were bitterly opposed to them.

For several years but little progress was made, but gradually a new system of cultivation was introduced, under which the planting of large tracts of land with little labor was discontinued, and thorough drainage, high cultivation and the use of fertilizers substituted.

UNDER DRAINAGE.

Cotton needs a dry soil which does not hold a superabundance of water, and consequently a rainy winter and spring generally meant ruin to the long cotton crop, and bankruptcy to the planters or their factors. The main object of under-drainage is to carry off the superfluous moisture and leave the soil dry. It is estimated that the cost of thoroughly accomplishing this is about $50 an acre. In connection with this, the use of fertilizers has steadily increased, and the corresponding increase of the cotton crop has been truly remarkable. On St. James Island, where the yield has been most thorough, the maximum for a whole plantation has advanced from 102 lbs. per acre, in 1872, to 400 lbs. in 1879. Great advances have also been made on the other islands.

As a consequence of this, the price of land has greatly advanced, and the planters are buoyant in spirits, though somewhat anxious about the future of their labor supply, because many of the colored people have become owners of small tracts themselves, and cannot therefore be always relied on. One of the most popular methods of hiring help, is to give to the laborer a house, firewood, and from five to eight acres of land, in return for which he agrees to do two day's work in the week for his landlord. All labor beyond the two days is paid for at the rate of 50 cents per day.

COLORED PEOPLE.

Good feeling is said to exist between the colored people and the whites. The latter are comparatively few in number. Edisto Island contains 300 whites to 3800 blacks; Wadmalaw, 165 to 2000; John's Island, 200 to 5000, and similar ratios prevail in the other members of the group.

A very important part of the inquiry was as to the condition and progress of the colored people, who form so large a majority of the population. In these respects the reporter states—that the improvement has been "truly wonderful," considering the circumstances. In Edisto island, "the colored people to-day own 4,000 acres of land, and it is estimated that they raise two-thirds of the cotton produced on the island. Their holdings range from 10 to 25 acres, and in some few instances they own as much as fifty and sixty acres. Nearly every head of a family owns a neat little house, with a cow and horse, or mule, and the majority of them have acquired buggies and carts and improved agricultural implements. During the past year the colored people of Edisto Island alone purchased over 500 horses and mules, 300 carts and 100 buggies. Many of them have so managed their affairs as to be almost independent of aid from capitalists, and there are some few instances where they advance heavily to their own race. Their mode of cultivation, while it is not so perfect as that of the white planters, is very similar, and as the whites improve the negroes improve with them. It is a fact that cannot be disputed that the leading colored planters on Edisto Island to-day carry to a higher degree of perfection the cultivation of their lands than their masters did before the war. The average yield of lint cotton per acre made by the colored planters is about 75 pounds, which is about the average yield of the white planters in ante-bellum days. There are of course some instances where the yield has been considerably greater, and in one instance the yield has been as high as 225 pounds to the acre.

"The most prominent colored planter on the island is John Thorne, and the success which he has met with will give an idea of what a steady, industrious and thrifty colored man can accomplish in this section. I had a long conversation with Thorne and found him a very intelligent man. He went down to the island in 1872, as the agent of a company of colored men, for the purpose of purchasing for them a tract of 750 acres, formerly known as the Baynard Seaside tract. There were thirty-five men in the company, and the place was purchased for $6,000. Each member of the company held so many shares, and the land was apportioned out among them according to the shares they held. The holdings ranged in size from 10 to 25 acres. Thorne himself secured 160 acres of this tract, and owns altogether on the island 250 acres of land. He is the proprietor of an extensive store and storehouse, and owns a comfortable residence. He also runs a gin-house with six gins, and last year ginned out upwards of 400 bags of cotton of 300 pounds each, for which work he received four cents per pound. He advances largely to several colored planters, and is worth from $15,000 to $20,000. In speaking of the material condition of the colored people, Thorne said: 'In 1866 very few of the colored people owned any personal property, and at present there is hardly a colored man who does not own a horse or mule, a cart, and a cow, as well as household goods and agricultural implements.'

Similar advances have been made on the other islands.

THE CATERPILLAR OR COTTON WORM.

"The caterpillar which a few years ago was regarded as a plague which could not be averted, no longer has any terrors for the planters. I consulted nearly every planter of prominence on the island, and there was not a single one who expressed the slightest concern whether the caterpillar came this year or not. The Paris green, mixed with flour and rosin and spread over the plants, is certain death to the worms before they can effect any damage. The cost of applying this preventive is about $3 an acre, and the appearance of the caterpillar is not considered as entailing any loss beyond the cost of preparing for their reception. The islands, it should be remembered, have not had a general visitation of caterpillars since 1867, and it may be possible that the means which have proved so successful in destroying small bodies of the worms, may prove to be inadequate to stop the ravages of an army of them as large as that which passed over the islands thirteen years ago. It is to be hoped, however, that the sense of security now enjoyed by the planters may not be rudely destroyed by the fulfilment of any such prophecy.

The reporter adds: "Before leaving this branch of the subject, I would like to mention a peculiar superstition which is said to exist among the negroes. The advent of the cotton worm to them means complete destruction of their crops, as they consistently refuse to use any of the means adopted by the white planters for their destruction. In conversation with one or two colored men upon this point, I was informed that the caterpillar was sent by God as a visitation upon them, and they considered it sinful to attempt to destroy them. Whether this superstition is universal I am unable to say, but it is a fact that they use neither Paris Green nor any of the preventives which have been found so efficacious."

Excerpts from the Diary of the late Samuel R. Fisher.

On reading the diary of our friend S. R. Fisher, kept during his last visit to England, in 1784, I was particularly interested in the account of the application of women's friends to London Yearly Meeting for the privilege of holding a "Yearly Meeting for business and for corresponding with the several Quarterly Meetings in the nation."

With the belief that it will prove interesting to some of the readers of Friends' Intelligencer, I have obtained liberty to make an extract. To me it is an interesting fact that we should have the opportunity of taking this incident from the manuscript notes of an eye-witness nearly ninety-six years after its occurrence.

Several of the names of the Friends mentioned are pleasantly associated with the history of the Society, and are familiar to a number of Friends whose parents had a personal knowledge of them.

Esther Take, Christiana Hustler, Elizabeth Gibson, Alice Rigg, Margaret Routh, Hannah Wigham, Mary Prond, Mehetable Jenkins, Patience Bray and Rebecca Jones are mentioned as having attended the men's meeting on the morning of the 5th of the Sixth month, 1784.

Rebecca Wright was prevented from being present by indisposition.

Our friend S. R. F. says, "It seems the women have never been allowed to hold a yearly meeting for business in this isle since the first establishment of Friends. The matter was opened and spoken to by the women with great solemnity, beauty and submission. Nearly all the twelve women spoke, and it really was one of the most, if not the most, solemn meeting I ever attended. Many of the men were much tendered. A few of them spoke before the women withdrew. Afterward their request met with some opposition, so that although many and most wished it then to be granted, it was postponed to the afternoon sitting. Soon after the opening of that meeting the matter of the women's yearly meeting came again under consideration, and Alice Rigg and Margaret Routh attended with the minute of the request from the women. After delivering it they were asked many questions. Margaret Routh answered mostly, in a decent and beautiful manner. They withdrew with the request that the women's meeting might wait on the men and not adjourn till they received an answer.

"A few more further time it was satisfactorily concluded by men to grant the women's request to hold a Yearly Meeting to correspond with the several Quarterly Meetings and not make any rule of discipline without the concurrence of the men. It was to me a comfortable and satisfactory treaty; rather more so than when, yesterday, mention was made of the steps which had been taken by Friends with the Government and each Member of Parliament, Ministers, &c., concerning the Slave Trade, which brought that matter very seriously before the meeting, more particularly so because some members of our Society in England held West India estates and slaves working such lands.

"To this matter Nicholas Wain spoke pointedly, to show that the stock of slaves was kept up on said lands by fresh purchases, and in consequence that some Friends were concerned in holding and purchasing such slaves. Although no steps were at this time positively taken in the matter, yet it brought the subject to view and showed that Friends could not consistently act in behalf of the negroes till their duty was fully discharged touching their own members in this case.

"The occasion of my taking notice again of what passed yesterday relative to the slaves is because I thought the Yearly Meeting much more favored in the consideration of it, and of granting the women's request, than through the course of all the other business which came before it.

"After the granting of the request of the women some men Friends were appointed to present them with a copy of the minute of men's meeting; the epistles to the seven Yearly Meetings and the general epistle were read by John Gough, of Ireland, who, I conclude, had a principal share in preparing them. He is one of the most solid and weighty members, when he is considered as a man of letters and his qualifications as a minister of the Gospel—they but rarely meet without learning eclipsing the better part."

"At this time a number of Friends from America were engaged in religious visits to Great Britain. Among them were Nicholas Wain, George Dillwyn and wife, Samuel Emlen and the women Friends already mentioned as having been with the women's committee who presented the request to the Yearly Meeting for a yearly meeting for business.

Previously to attending the annual meeting, S. R. Fisher had accompanied Nicholas Wain in his visits, not only to the meetings in the city of London but to many in the adjacent country. A number of these were very small, sometimes not more than twenty or thirty persons present, and the majority of those not members of the Society, and yet they appear to have been seasons of Divine favor. N. Wain generally had vocal service, but was silent in several meetings in succession, which was a disappointment to the people with whom he was a favorite. The social comminglings were remarkable. Many gatherings at the houses of Friends, where travellers were entertained with great hospitality.

In their journeyings they passed through Little Dunmore, a place famed for giving flitch of bacon to such couples as had lived year and a day in strict love and harmony. The Friend at whose house they lodged that he had seen it presented in the prescribed amity a great concourse of people; this ceremony, being very expensive to the parish, was now granted only once in five years. He had known the flitch to be claimed and to be refused.

In reference to his engagement with N. our friend S. R. Fisher was led by his mistrust and humility to fear that he might have departed from his internal Guide. He left home on business, but was encouraged by his friends, both in America and London, to devote a part of his time to this service, and it is worthy of note that while thus engaged he felt no liberty to make any inquiries in regard to business, even when passing through districts where fabrics were manufactured which he was interested as a merchant. He writes: "My mind being weak and low, I feared I had attempted a matter for which I was not properly qualified," and he was led to conclude that herein he had erred. His friends thought differently. When about to return, the meeting held at Grace Church street granted him a certificate which Sam thought acceded him with more than deserved, and remonstrated, but it was decided to be just, and was signed by the meeting generally.—Friends' Intelligencer.

Women Vote Out Saloons.—The women Keithsburg, Ill., have just been yielded right to vote on this issue of licensing prohibiting saloons within its corporate limits. Now, Keithsburg is one of those "rioters" of perpetual ill-repute, a village about 1,000 inhabitants, on the Mississippi where saloons have thriven for forty years and many of its people have been correspondingly poor. One would hardly look to their superior general goodness and intellect. Yet, on April 5, 165 women (nearly every one in the village) voted at a popular election on the above issue, and so far as all-day servers could learn not one woman voted favor of granting licenses to sell liquors, or with the price put at $500. Coupled with the respectable male wing of the community this womanly vote redeemed the town banishing saloons, and so influencing the vote of men that village trustees were elected who will see that the popular voice is respected. Christian Advocate.

How to Train the Memory.—Your memory is bad, perhaps, but I can tell you two secret things that will cure the worst memory. One is to read a subject when interested; the other is not only to read, but think. When you have read a paragraph or a page, set aside the book, and try to remember the idea on the page, and not only call them vague to mind, but put them in words and spell them out. Faithfully follow these rules and you have the golden keys of knowledge. Besides inattentive reading, there are other things injurious to the memory. One is habit of skimming over newspapers, items of news, smart remarks, bits of information, political reflections, fashion notes, so that all was a confused jumble, never to be thought of as gain, thus diligently cultivating a habit of careless reading hard to break. Another is the reading of trashy novels.—E...

"2nd of 11th month, 1874. 'Day unto day tereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge; there is no speech nor language here their voice is not heard.' How does remembrance of the above lines tend to show the necessity of keeping the mind very quiet, and the inward ear open, that we may receive instruction thereby.

'Oh! for a closer walk with God,
A calm and Heavenly frame,
A light to shine upon the road,
That leads me to the Lamb.'

Oh! grateful for a very comfortable night's rest; and for the desire which arose in my heart to be enabled to spend this day acceptably in the Divine sight. The dear Saviour's words revive very freshly before me: 'Watch and pray, lest ye enter into temptation.' Ah! I am again and again reminded there is no safety for us but by being on the watch.

"2nd of 4th month, 1875. [The above] remark, my dearly loved husband often said, is our only place of safety. Ah! he is sweetly brought to my remembrance, and how greatly do I desire I may walk worthy the vocation wherewith I am called; that may be, as I believe he was, ready to cast my accounts with joy and not with grief. It was sweet to witness his happy, tranquil countenance, as his strength was gradually giving way, plainly evidencing that as outward man grew weaker, the inward man grew stronger; and what a blessed thing was that his dear mind was preserved so clear through all. Oh! the words arise in my mind as I write: 'Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my latter end be like to theirs.' I am again and again made very sensible of my great loss; but how precious is enabled to believe that my loss proves his at our eternal gain. Great gratitude is due to our Heavenly Father for sparing us to his other fifty-four years, in that sweet and precious unity so sweetly described by the Psalmist 'as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended from the mountains of Zion; for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for evermore.' This morning my mind has been seriously impressed with the necessity of casting all my care upon my Heavenly Father, having no care or concern about any thing; and then assuredly He will be my poor mind (which is often brought very low) of many of the little hindering things which the great enemy often tries to fill me with. I am at times made sweetly feel how very precious it is to have no wish left but my own—keep very inward, then, the pure gift that is in thee.

17th of 5th month. To-day commenced my Select Meeting. My precious departed much brought to my mind. Oh! how difficult to what it used to be, when those seasons were permitted; when my dear departed and myself, being sweetly united in spirit, were enabled to assemble with our dear friends, and share each other's burdens; and although I am not equal to attend them now, at my advanced age 84½ years, yet being dipped into the present lax state of our poor Society, I have to bear my burden alone, and am deeply made sensible of my great bereavement; while at the same time my heart is made thankful that he is preciously experiencing the fulfillment of the gracious language, 'Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from henceforth: yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them.'

"31st of 7th month. Just near the close of another month, in again taking my pen, I am reminded of the poet's words, viz:

'And now another day is gone,
I'll sing my Maker's praise;
My comforts every hour make known
His Providence and Grace.'

How very swiftly the time passes; it ought to engage us to "double our diligence and make our calling and election sure, before we go hence and are seen of men no more." It is one thing to write this, but another to perform it. Do we really act upon it? Do not the things of time too much occupy our minds, and leave but little time for things of higher moment to have due place in our hearts, and give them a disrelish for things of the highest importance, viz, the salvation of our never-dying souls.

"16th of 10th month. I returned from Mitcham, having been favored to spend fifteen weeks happily in the enjoyment of the company of dear ones there—for which I felt gratitude to my Heavenly Father for conferring this great favor, and in possession of mental and bodily powers. Ah! the language had need be raised, 'What shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits towards me?'

"13th of 12th month. Nearly two months since I made any addition to this memorandum, but my thoughts have not been silent, for my poor mind has been brought very low under a sense of the absence of my Beloved; who has seen meet to hide his face from me, time after time, and I have felt the great need of patiently waiting and quietly hoping for the return of his life-giving presence to solace and cheer me, and for ability to hold on my way; for I am indeed a very poor creature, and not able to keep myself from falling; therefore is there great need to attend to the command of our blessed Saviour, 'to watch and pray lest we fall into temptation.' And I am again reminded of what my dear departed used often to say, that there is no safety but when we are upon the watch. Ah! I may say of him, that 'he being dead yet speaketh' I may add that I feel grateful to my Heavenly Father for having my precious and only daughter, Priscilla, spared to me, and sweetly consoling me under my great loss.

"31st of 12th month. Just near the close of the present year the query arises, 'Am I any nearer than when I first believed?' The close of another year seems solemn to contemplate; but the desire is raised in my heart to keep very inward in my spirit, and seek daily for a renewal of strength to walk acceptably before my Heavenly Father, that I may through holy help, be enabled to answer the end for which I had a being, viz, to live to his glory; but oh! I am but a very poor creature, and feel my great inability and dwarfishness. Oh! the great need for dwelling in the Vine (15th of John): 'I am the true Vine, and my Father is the Husbandman.' Oh methinks if there had been with us, as a people, a more strictly abiding in the Vine, we should see different fruits brought forth: instead of the language which seems applicable to be revived, as spoken by the prophet Isaiah for not having been faithful by abiding in the vine: 'What could have been done more to my vineyard that I have not done in it? wherefore, when I looked that it should bring forth grapes, brought it forth wild grapes? What great need there is for individual faithfulness—I feel it very much as regards myself; and though very sensible of my own nothingness and great weakness, yet I am very thankful that good desires are very prevalent with me for an increase of good, and to have no wish nor will of my own contrary to the will of my Heavenly Father, but that I may be as clay in the hands of the great Potter. On the 29th of this month, my beloved sister Mary Ann Fowden, aged eighty-two, departed this life in a heavenly frame of mind, in a precious hope, through the merits of her dear Redeemer, that she would be gathered into one of the many mansions which he foretold He should go and prepare a place for his immediate followers. Oh glorious prospect! so we could not mourn, but rejoice at her happy departure. Oh, saith my soul, may my latter end be like her's, by being favored as she was to lay up a good foundation for the time to come.

"6th of First month, 1876.

'Oh! for a closer walk with God,
A calm and Heavenly frame,
A light to shine upon the road,
That leads me to the Lamb.'

For this great favor, great stillness must be made in, that our will must remain unshaken, and strength sought after that we may be enabled to obey it. Very poor and weak have I been for a long time, yet the desire has been mercifully continued for a growth in grace, and in the saving knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. Good and upright is the Lord, therefore will He teach sinners in the way; the meek will He guide in judgment, and the meek will He teach his way. Oh that I might be one of his meek ones.

"15th of 2nd month.

Oh that my spirit might, through Grace,
Become so still and clean,
Clear as a spring, on whose fair face
The light of Heaven is seen.

"4th of 3rd month. My precious husband's 87th natal day; my loss of him is very much felt still, but I would not wish him back.

"15th of 8th month. Favored to realize the return of another year added to those hitherto granted me, which makes me attain eighty-six. A serious question arises, 'Am I any nearer the kingdom than when I first believed?' I may acknowledge my sense of poverty, for which I feel thankful. 'Except the Lord had been my help, my soul had almost dwelt in silence.' I may acknowledge, with the Psalmist: I was brought low and He helped me. Poor and weak though I feel, yet very many mercies are still vouchsafed unto me.

"20th of 12th month. A very rainy morning; but being so very comfortably provided with a closed carriage, I was enabled to go to Croydon to our Monthly Meeting, with my dear son and daughter, their dear boy, John Marsh Pitt, and his grandmother E. Pitt. We having all entered Manor House Mitcham, on 16th of 10th month, 1876, to reside together, being favored to feel it has been under right direction, which we had previously sincerely desired we might obtain, and very comfortable we are for this happy union.

"22d of 12th month. A lovely morning. This residence seems greatly to favor my health, yet I daily feel the need of an increase of spiritual health and strength; but I consider it a great favor to be made sensible of my wants. Oh! the great need I feel of keeping very close to my good Guide.

"5th of 1st mo. 1877.—Sixth-day. Feel great cause for thankfulness to my Heavenly Father, that He still condescends to raise living desires in my heart for holiness, and to witness an increase of pure love to Him from whom all my blessings flow. 'Be careful for nothing; but in every thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God. And the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus.

"On the 29th of 1st mo. 1877, our esteemed friend and brother in the truth, George Cornish, departed this life; we reverently believe an inheritance with the just of all generations is mercifully granted him.

"17th of 2d month. Let me die the death of the righteous; and let my latter end be like unto theirs.

"23d of 2d month. Poor and low, yet the Lord looketh upon me. Oh, may I be kept low and humble.

"2nd of 3rd month. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.

"23rd. O Lord! thou knowest my down sitting and mine arising. Thou knowest I feel very poor; enable me, I pray thee, to look unto thee for strength, to wait humbly and faithfully; for without thee I can do nothing to advance myself in the way of holiness. 'Search me, O God, and know my heart, try me and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way overlasting.' Commit thy ways unto the Lord; trust also in Him, and He will bring it to pass. Oh! I feel thankful I am often reminded of the necessity of this, and of the ability granted me to do it. Low in mind and mournful in spirit on account of the lax state of our poor Society, many, it is to be feared, have lost their first love; hence the faithful testimonies given to this people to bear, are not upheld; consequently leanness and dwarfishness are sadly apparent, because so few are able to come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. There are heavy burdens to be borne, but the true burden-bearers are very few.

"13th of 4th month. I can still say the true burden-bearers are very few; but can thankfully acknowledge I do desire to be preserved as one of them.

"24th. Poor and weak; yet the Lord looketh upon me; desires and fresh engagement of heart to renew my covenant with a covenant keeping God; although I feel myself very unworthy.

"28th. Wait on the Lord, be of good courage and He shall strengthen thine heart. Wait, I say, on the Lord. Ah! I very often feel poor and needy; may I be increasingly engaged to wait upon my gracious, merciful caretaker for a renewal of my spiritual strength; for truly, without his aid we can do nothing to promote his glory, or obtain that precious peace, which He alone can give, who told his disciples, 'My peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth,' &c.

HEAVEN.

[This comes from an esteemed correspondent whose judgment we respect. Yet we desire to caution our readers against admitting its poetical fancies, as actual facts. In this state of existence, where the spirit and mind are associated with bodies of flesh and blood in intimate union, it is impossible for us to appreciate the nature of that life which the spirit will enjoy when it has laid aside the dusty garments of mortality. Now, we can scarcely think of a future existence, except as a modified form of that which we are at present partaking of. Therefore it is natural in thinking of heaven, to speak of "vernal fields," "balmy air," "fair flowers," &c. Yet these must be regarded as merely figures of speech, designed to typify, to the best of our limited powers, the beatitudes of a Heavenly home—in respect to which the Scriptures state: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive, the things which God hath prepared."—Ed.]

For "The Friend."

The following beautiful little poem was found by a New York merchant in a drawer of his desk—in manuscript—and signed as below. Being much pleased with it, he had quite a number of copies printed on slips for circulation. Who the author is, is not known.

S. W.

"Beyond these chilling winds and gloomy skies,
Beyond death's cloudy portal,
There is a land where beauty never dies,
And love becomes immortal."

A land whose light is never dimmed by shade,
Whose fields are ever vernal;
Where nothing beautiful can ever fade,
But blooms for aye—Eternal.

We may not know how sweet its balmy air,
How bright and fair its flowers;
We may not hear the songs that echo there,
Through those enchanted bowers.

The city's shining towers we may not see
With our dim earthly vision,
For death, the silent warden, keeps the key
That opens those gates Elysian.

But sometimes—when adown the shining sky,
The fiery sunset lingers,
Its golden gates swing inward noiselessly,
Unlocked by unseen fingers;

And while they stand a moment half ajar,
Gleams from the inner glory
Streams brightly, through the azure vault afar,
And half reveal the story.

O land of Love! O land of Light Divine!
Father, All-wise—Eternal!
Guide me, O guide these suffering feet of mine,
Into those gates supernal."

Nancy A. W. Priest.

HUMILITY.

The bird that sings on highest wing
Builds on the ground her lowly nest,
And she that doth most sweetly sing,
Sings in the shade when all things rest!
In lark and nightingale we see
What honor hath humility.

The saint that wears heaven's brightest crown,
In deepest adoration bends,—
The weight of glory bends him down
The most when high his soul ascends;
Nearest the throne, itself must be
The footstool of humility.

IN THE FIELD.

Fighting the battle of life!
With a weary heart and head,
For in the midst of the strife,
The banners of joy are fled.

Fled and gone out of sight,
When I thought I were so near;
And the music of Hope this night
Is dying away on my ear.

Fighting the whole day long,
With only a strong hand—
With only my armor strong—
The shelter in which I stand.

There is nothing left of me—
With my strength gone, as shown,
So small the amount would be
Its presence could scarce be known.

Fighting alone to-night,
With not even a stander by,
To cheer me on in the fight,
Or to hear me when I cry.

Only the Lord can hear,
When the Lord can hear—
The struggle within how dark and drear,
Tho' quiet the outside be.

Fighting alone to-night,
With what a still, sad heart,—
Lord Jesus in the fight,
O! stand not Thou apart!

Body and mind have tried
To rise to the level of their own,
But when the Lord is on my side,
He doth the work alone.

And when He hideth his face,
Only the battle-clouds prevail,
It is only through his grace
If I do not utterly fail.

The word of old was true,
And its truth shall never cease,—
The Lord shall fight for you,
And you shall hold your peace.

Lord I would fain be still
And quiet behind my shield;
But make me to know Thy will
For fear I should ever yield.

For when, to destroy my foes,
Thouallest them strike at me,
And fillst my heart with woes,
That joy may the purer be.

Nothing but perfect trust
And love for Thy perfect will,
Can raise me out of the dust,
And bid my fear lie still.

Even as now my hands
So doth my folded will,
Lie waiting Thy commands,
Without one anxious thrill.

But as with sudden pain,
My hands unfold and clasp,—
So doth my will start up again,
And taketh its old firm grasp.

Lord fix my eyes upon Thee,
And fill my heart with Thy love,
And keep my soul till the shadows flee
And the light breaks forth above.

The Lord's sheep are not confined to a one outward fold; but though they all kneel and are gathered into the one fold of inwardness, yet outwardly they walk, and are scattered among various denominations. This firmly believe; and wherever they are I love them brethren; I own them in the covenant and fellowship of celestial affinity; in the bonds and endearments of a spiritual relationship.—J. Scott.

In this world it is not what we take up but what we give up that makes us rich.

The Jew as a Citizen in the Time of Christ.

The Jews' principal business was trade, retailing, peddling, and especially the smaller money transactions (the larger were carried on by the Roman knights, the bankers of that age), were almost wholly in their hands, and they prosecuted this traffic with such characteristic industry and shrewdness that the cities of Asia Minor complained to the Emperor that they were completely drained by the Jews. The wholesale trade, also, was in any places entirely under their control. In Alexandria they almost monopolized the corn-trade, and carried on an extensive traffic with the more distant East. Wherever money was to be made, there the Jew, especially if he was a scholar, poet, actor, and even a general. "The Jews sell everything," says Seneca.

Though in the writings of the Roman poet named, and of others, the Jews appear as a beggarly race,—the father buying old glass and other rubbish, the children peddling stiches,—many of them obtained great wealth; and this wealth, together with their cunning in improving every favorable opportunity to put themselves unconditionally in the service of whatever government was power, though at heart unfriendly to the re-constitution of the state, and indifferent to its weal and woe, had procured for them important privileges. They were exempt from military duty, and from the payment of certain taxes, and could not be summoned on Sabbath before a court. So far was this consideration for them carried, that the municipalities were obliged to pay them money for corn and oil, which were regarded by them as impure. Indeed, when the deficiency of these supplies fell on a Sabbath, the Jew was required to be made another day. Above all, they had perfect freedom in their religious observances. Wherever they dwelt together in sufficient numbers they had a synagogue, or at least a place of prayer (a Prosynagoga, Acts xv. 13), and a distinct communion under chosen ministers, and exercised a large autonomy, in consequence of their religious and social isolation from the heathen among whom they lived, embraced not merely that of religion, but much besides.

All these Jewish congregations were most intimately connected with each other, and the centre of Judaism, Jerusalem. Every Jew, however far away he dwelt, regarded himself as a member of the chosen people, strove to keep the bonds of union fresh and strong. He paid yearly his temple tax, offerings and gifts to Jerusalem, and, at least, in his life went up to visit the city and to keep the feast. The supreme council in Jerusalem sent annually the celebration of festivals to the congregations of the dispersion, communicated to them important news, and took care that they received intimation of all events which concerned the Jewish people. Since the Jews as merchants and great travellers, brethren often coming from news of other congregations, and guests were gladly permitted to speak in the synagogues. In brief, whether one of the congregations was located on the banks of the Danube, or on the margin of the Libyan Sea, it was a part of a universal society. The Jews well understood how to use this position for the promotion of their own interests. If a Jewish congregation received any injury, all alike broke out into sedition, and this skill in exciting alarm had not a little to do in securing for them, notwithstanding the universal hate and contempt which they had to endure, the greatest respect from every Roman official up even to the proconsul.

Apart from this, hatred and contempt were their usual lot. To the heathen their whole appearance was strange and utterly unintelligible, so entirely different were they in all respects from the other nations. If we would be convinced how unique this people was in history, if we would obtain an immediate impression of this, we need only recall the judgments of the heathen upon them. What marvellous tales concerning them were in circulation! Now they were said to have sprung from Mount Ida in Crete; now from lepers who had been expelled from Egypt. In the desert, when there was a great scarcity of water, an ass showed them a fountain; therefore they worshipped the head of an ass as God. Tacitus thinks that Moses, in order to make sure of the people, gave them new customs contradictory to all the usages of mankind. "They deem profane what we hold sacred, and permit what we abominate." To the Romans the commandments about food and fasting appeared ridiculous in the extreme. The prohibition of swine's flesh was an inexhaustible theme for their wit. The Sabbath rest they could explain only by laziness. Juvenal thus ridicules an idler:

"His sire's the fault, who every seventh day Neglected work, and idled time away."

and Tacitus relates with entire seriousness: "Afterwards when inactivity became agreeable the seventh year (Sabbatical) was also given up to idleness." Particularly offensive was their worship without images, and their entire faith was to the heathen the acme of superstition and credulity. "Credat Julevus Apelles," "A Jew may believe that," says Horace, in order to characterize something wholly incredible.

This wide-spread hatred of the Jews—to which countless bloody sacrifices were offered, especially during the Jewish war—was doubtless, to some extent, a consequence of their hatred of the heathen. They were treated with contempt because they themselves despised the unclean Gentiles. The Jew had a large self-consciousness. He looked upon himself as a member of the elect people, who possessed, in contrast with the blind heathen, a divine revelation. This self-consciousness was intensified by his Messianic hopes. He was destined, he believed, soon to receive the dominion of the world, and he made no reserve of this expectation even when face to face with the heathen. The less its depressed and enslaved present harmonized with this hope for the future, the more absurd must it have seemed to the proud Roman that this filthy race of beggars should dream of such things. We need only glance at the writers of the Empire to meet every where witticisms about the circumsised Jews. Wherever the Jew went or stood he was encompassed by the pagan ridicule. In the theatre, he was the object of coarse sallies, which were sure to call forth laughter; on the street he had frequently to endure brutal abuse.

Hatred and contempt might well be increased by the fact that the heathen could not be insensible to the wide and profound influence which the Jews were exerting. Seneca says of them, "the vanquished have given laws to the victors." At a time when the old gods no longer satisfied the heathen, when so many longing spirits, anxious for happiness, were seeking peace by foreign gods, and secret doctrines and expiations, how attractive must Judaism have been? Here Monotheism, which wise men taught as an esoteric religion for the cultivated, appeared as a religion infinitely superior to the wild, and often immoral, heathen cults; here was a revealed word of God; here were offerings and expiations.—From Uphorn's Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism.

Be silent when blamed and reproached unjustly, and under such circumstances that the reproachful and injurious person will be likely, under the influence of his own reflections, to discover his error and wrong speedily. Instead of replying, receive the injurious treatment with humility and calmness; and He, in whose name you thus suffer, will reward you with inward consolation, while he sends the sharp arrow of conviction into the heart of your adversary.

Be not disheartened because the eye of the world is constantly and earnestly fixed upon you, to detect your errors, and to rejoice in your halting. But rather regard this state of things, trying though it may be, as one of the safe-guards which a kind Father has placed around you, to keep alive, in your bosom, an antagonist spirit of watchfulness, and to prevent those very mistakes and transgressions, which your enemies eagerly anticipate.

Do not think it strange when troubles and persecutions come upon you. Rather receive them quietly and thankfully, as coming from a Father's hand. Ye happy are ye, if, in the exercise of faith, you can look above the earthly instrumentality, above the selfishness and malice of men, to him who has permitted them for your good. Thus persecuted they the Saviour and the prophets.—T. C. Upham.

The N. Y. Herald gives the particulars of a great ice-floe tragedy off St. Johns, Newfoundland. The floe was of immense size, covered with thousands of seals, and anchored close to shore. The men by hundreds went to secure the booty, and labored successfully for four days. Then the wind changed, the fog hid the coast, and the floe went to sea carrying a hundred or more of the men with her. The greater number, however, were afterwards rescued, but many lives were lost. Notwithstanding the painful loss of life, the coming of the ice floe was a blessing in other ways. Of its timeliness the Herald's correspondent says:

One hundred thousand seals were captured in the several little harbors and bays along our eastern and southern coast, which in the local market were worth in cash about $250,000. After a winter unusually protracted and of great rigor, this harvest from the sea was a magnificent Godsend to the glenners. On our southern coast, destitution was more fierce and widespread than for any time during the past half century. For so long a time, too, no visitation of the seal-ice had been experienced. Its coming at so very opportune a time may hardly be regarded as other than a notable and characteristic bounty of Providence.

The Bible.

For "The Friend."

The following remarks by N. C. Brooks, are offered for insertion in "The Friend."

R.

"Such are a few of the beauties of the bible; and, if its grand truths be found to rob poetry and mythology of some of their ethereal fancies, it substitutes nobler truths, and sentiments equally chaste. If it has displaced cloud compelling Jove from Olympus, it has placed the heavens under the care of Him who 'weigheth them in his balance,' and 'directeth his thunder under the whole heavens, and his lightning to the ends of the earth.' If Aurora no longer opens the doors of the east, her office is performed by Him 'who causeth the day-spring to know his place.' If the sun be no longer under the care of Apollo, it is guided by Him 'who hath set a tabernacle for the sun.' If Diana has forgotten to lead her cirelet in the heavens, it revolves at the bidding of Him 'who hath appointed the moon her seasons.' If the sceptre of Eolus is broken, the winds are under the direction of Him 'who guides the whirlwind and propels the storm;' 'who maketh the clouds his chariot, and who walketh upon the wings of the wind.' If the trident of Neptune no longer sways the sea, its billows heave beneath the eye of Him who hath said to the deep 'thus far shalt thou come, but no farther, and here shall thy proud waves be stayed.' If Ceres has deserted the fields, they are under the care of Him who has promised thus: 'Seed-time and harvest shall succeed each other to the end of time.' If the vintage has ceased to ripen for Bacchus, it abounds for Him who 'causeth wine to make glad the heart of man.' If Nemesis no longer bears the balances of the earth, they are transferred to Him, 'the habitation of whose throne is justice and judgment.' If the Dryads have forsaken the groves, and the Naiads the streams, the voice of Deity is speaking to the heart in the whisper of every tree, and the murmur of every fountain. If Iris has ceased to be the messenger of the wrath of Juno, it has become the covenant of the mercy of Jehovah. If Pluto has resigned the guardianship of Hades, it is to Him who holds the keys of hell and death; and if the Lares and Penates have abandoned the threshold and hearthstone, their place is supplied by Him who hath promised to make the habitation of the righteous his abode, and to dwell in the heart of the humble."

Encouragement under Trials Incident to Bearing the Cross of Christ.

Who is able to undergo the crosses and afflictions, either inward or outward, which befall those whom God draws out of the spirit of this world and path of destruction, into the way of eternal rest and peace? Yet the Lord is able to uphold that which feels its weakness, and daily waits on Him for support.

I know, dear heart, thy outward trials cannot be sharp and bitter; and I know also that the Lord is able to sustain thee under them, and cause thee to stand thy ground; that thou give not advantage to that spirit, which hereby would draw from the Lord, and from the way of life and happiness. Oh that thou couldst dwell in the knowledge and sense of this! even that the Lord beholds thy sufferings with an eye of pity, and is able, not only to uphold thee under them, but also to do thee good by them, and to bring forth that life and wisdom in thee by means thereof, to which He will give dominion over that spirit which grieves and afflicts thee, in his due season. Therefore grieve not at thy lot, be not discontented, look not out at the hardness of thy condition; but when the storm and matter of vexation are sharp, look up to Him who can give meekness and patience, can lift up the head over all, and cause thy life to grow, and be a gainer by all.

If the Lord God did not help us by his mighty arm, how often should we fall and perish! And if the Lord God help thee proportionally to thy condition of affliction and distress, thou wilt have no cause to complain, but to bless his name. He is exceedingly good, and gracious, and tender hearted, and doth not despise the afflictions of the afflicted, for his name's sake, in any kind.

This in tender love towards thee, with breathings to my Father, that his pleasant pain may not be crushed in thee by the foot of pride and violence, but may overgrow it, and flourish the more because of it.

From thy truly loving friend in the Truth, and for the Truth's sake.

The Prayer-Cylinder of Tibet.

"The prayer-cylinder, or prayer-wheel, as it is often most inappropriately called, is usually about three or four inches in diameter and length; the mystical invocation, 'Om Mani Pe-mi Hom,' is written on the outside, whilst a small weight at the end of a short string, keeps the affair in rotation; and all day long, not only the Lamas, but the people may be seen muttering the universal prayer, and twisting their cylinders, invariably in the same direction with the hands of a clock. One or more great cylinders, inscribed with the sentence, stand at the entrance to every house in Tibet, and a member of the household, or a guest who passes, is always expected to give the cylinder a twist for the welfare of the establishment. At almost every rivulet the eye is arrested by a little building, that is at first mistaken for a water mill, but which on close inspection is found to contain a cylinder, turning by the force of the stream, and ceaselessly sending up pious ejaculations to Heaven, for every turn of a cylinder on which the prayer is written is supposed to convey an invocation to the Deity. Sometimes enormous barns are filled with these cylinders gorgeously painted, and with the prayer repeated on them many times; and at every turn and every step in Tibet this sentence is forced on the traveller's notice in some form or another.

"A string, called a Mani string, is often stretched between the two sides of a tiny valley, and hundreds of little bits of rag are tied to it with the prayer written on all. At the top of every mountain there is a cairn made of stones cast there by the pious, thankful to have escaped the dangers of the mountain roads, and on each stone the prayer appears. Many sticks are planted in the cairn, with a piece of rag or cloth at the upper end, on which of course the prayer is written; and by the roadsides are heaps of flat stones, with the inscription roughly cut on them. Sometimes the road passes between walls of flat stones, on every one of which the sentence may be read by the passing traveller."

How forcibly does the above account, given by William Gill, who lately travelled through Eastern Tibet, recall the advice of our Saviour to his disciples not to use vain repetitions in their prayers, and to avoid the error of the Scribes and Pharisees who thought that the should be heard for their much speaking. How difficult does it seem to be for men learn, that no prayer is availing but that which is begotten in the heart by the Spirit of the Lord himself, who graciously regards the breathings of the soul towards Him, even when not expressed in words. Alas, we ne not go so far as Tibet to find sufficient evidence that some benighted ones hope to secure the Divine favor by some of the many forms "bodily exercise," which as the apostle says "profiteth little;" while it is still true that "godliness is profitable for all things."

Religious Excitement.

In a new edition of his work on "Holiness" Canon Ryle says:—

"The older I grow, the more I am convinced that real practical holiness does not receive the attention it deserves, and that there is a most painfully low standard of living among many high professors of religion in the land. But, at the same time, I am increasingly convinced that the zealous efforts of some well-meaning persons to promote a higher standard of spiritual life are often according to knowledge, and are really calculated to do more harm than good. Let me explain what I mean: It is easy to get crowded together for what are called 'Higher Life' and 'Consecration' meetings. Sensational and exciting addresses by strange preachers, or by women, loud singing, hot rooms, crowded tents, the constant sight of strong religious feeling in the faces of all around; for several days, late hours, long protracted meetings, public profession of experience all this kind of thing is very interesting at the time, and seems to do good. But it is good real, deeply rooted, solid, lasting? That is the point. And I should like to ask a few questions about it. Do those who attend these meetings become more holy, meek, selfless, kind, good tempered, self-denying, Christ-like at home? Do they become more content with their position in life, and more free from restless craving after something different from that which God has given them? Do fathers, mothers, husbands, and other relatives and friends find them more pleasant and easy to live with? Can they enjoy quiet Sunday and quiet means of grace without noise, heat, and excitement? Above do they grow more in charity, and especially charity towards those who do not agree with them in every jot and tittle of their religion? These are serious and searching questions and deserve serious consideration. I have as anxious to promote real practical holiness in the land as any one. I admire willingly acknowledge the zeal and earnestness of many with whom I cannot co-operate who are trying to promote it. But I can withhold a growing suspicion that the great 'mass meetings' of the present day, for ostensible object of promoting spiritual, do not tend to promote private home religious Bible reading, private prayer, selfishness, and private walking with God; they are of any real value, they ought make people better husbands, and wives, fathers, and mothers, and sons, and daughters."

and brothers, and sisters, and masters, and mistresses, and servants. But I should like to have clear proofs that they do. I only know it is far easier to be a Christian among heathens, praying, sympathizing Christians, in a public room, than to be a consistent Christian in a quiet, retired, out-of-the-way, congenial home. The first position is one in which there is a great deal of nature to help us; the second is one which cannot be filled without grace. But, alas! many know now-a-days about 'conversion' who seem to be ignorant of the 'first principles of the oracles of God' about 'conversion.'

An Anchor to the Soul.—In a gale off the coast, a vessel was driving ashore. Her anchors were gone, and she refused to obey the helm. A few moments more and she would have been dashed to pieces. If any were saved, they must be tossed on the waves on the beach. In the midst of general consternation that prevailed, there was one man calm. He had done all that man could do to prepare for the worst, when the wreck was inevitable; and now that death's messenger apparently near, he was quietly waiting for the event. A friend of his demanded the occasion of his calmness in the midst of danger so imminent. "Do you not know the anchor on which we are drifting upon the coast?" "Certainly I do; but I have an anchor to my soul."

On this was his trust. It entered into that man's mind the veil. It was the ground of his confidence in the storm and enabled him to stand securely in view of instant and awful death.

long ages ago a fern leaf grew in a deep valley. No eye ever saw its beauty, and it lay at last into the earth, and sank away, and was lost. Surely, no record ever was made of its life and story. But the other day a man of science, with hammer in hand, was digging into the mysteries of nature, and striking a rock, there lay, in perfect outline, the whole delicate tracery of the little fern. After lying thousands of years in the darkness, lost and forgotten, it came forth to be looked at by admiring eyes. In like manner, obscure lives drop away and are forgotten, in like manner, also, will they reappear, smallest deed done for Christ shall be forgotten.

The Tampan.—When sleeping in the house of the commandant (in the interior of Angola), I was bitten by an insect well known in the southern country by the name of Tampan, bit my foot. It is a kind of tick, and chooses by preference the parts between the fingers or toes for inflicting its bite. It is seen from the size of a pin's head to that of a pea, and is common in all the native huts in this country. It sucks the blood until quite full, and is then of a dark color, and its skin so tough and yielding that it is impossible to burst it by any amount of squeezing with the fingers. I had felt the effects of its bite in former years, and eschewed native huts ever after; but as I was here in a European house, I shall allude to the effects of the bite. These are a tingling sensation of mingled pain and itching, which commenced ascending the limb until it reached the abdomen, and then the poison infused reaches the abdomen, where it soon causes violent vomiting and diarrhoea. Where these effects do not follow, as we found afterward at Tete, fever sets in; and I was assured by intelligent Portuguese there that death has sometimes been the result of this fever. The anxiety of my friends at Tete manifested to keep my feet out of the reach of the Tampan of the village, made it evident that they had seen cause to dread this insignificant insect. The only inconvenience I afterwards suffered from this bite was the continuance of the tingling sensation in the point bitten for about a week. In curing the bite of the Tampan, the natives administer one of the insects bruised in the medicine employed.—Livingstone's Travels.

Wax of China.—This valuable production is formed by an insect which grows on one species of tree or shrub and is transported by the Chinese to another species on which the wax is developed. The eggs are so delicate they must not be exposed to the heat of the sun, and whilst being carried from the breeding to the producing district, the coolies travel only in the night, when the road is said to present a very remarkable appearance, as they all carry lanterns. Ordinarily in China no traveling is done at night, and the gates of all towns and cities are closed at dusk, and are never opened for anybody. But during the time for bringing these eggs all the city gates are left open day and night.

The nests of the insect are about the size of a chicken's nest, and are removed by cutting off a portion of the branch to which they are attached. The sticks with the adhering nests are soaked for a quarter of an hour in unhusked-rice-water, when they may be separated.

The nests are then tied to a tree. In a few days they swell; the insects emerge from the eggs, and soon cover the branch of the tree with the white wax secretion.

It is a curious circumstance, that one species of tree should be favorable to the growth of the insect, and another to the production of the wax.—Capt. Gill.

Geese as Guards.—A flock of enormous geese that were quite quiet before we arrived set up a loud cackling on our approach. In some parts of China geese are frequently kept as guards to a house, as they always cackle at the appearance of a stranger on their premises.—Gill's Narrative.

Buttered Tea.—In a cold climate, buttered tea, made with good tea and fresh butter, is admirably adapted for a people living at the great altitude of the Tibetan plateau.

When the howling winds of winter sweep across those dreary wastes of snow, they can only maintain their vital heat by large quantities of carbonaceous food, and butter is the most suitable of all that can be obtained.

The tea-churn is almost a part of every Tibetan community. On entering a house at any hour, some one is certain to be seen making buttered tea in the churn. A churn for every three or four men forms part of every household; at a half, the churn is immediately produced. It is a cylinder of wood about two feet long and six inches in diameter. The butter is churned up in the boiling tea, and there is some art in doing this in such a manner as to make the ingredients mix properly.—Gill's Narrative.

Some interesting investigations have been made by Dr. Siemens of the influence of electric light upon vegetation. His conclusions have been singularly verified by observations made by Thomas Roulledge. He says that in India the bamboo rarely shoots with vigor before the occurrence of a thunder-storm, and that the heavier the storm the more rapid the growth, many measurements giving from two to two and a half feet in twenty-four hours, and as much as seventy feet in thirty days, the greatest activity occurring during the night. Regarding this Capt. H. H. Sleeman writes: "My bamboos at Jubbulpore had not thrown out their shoots at what I considered the proper time, and I asked my gardener the cause. He replied, 'We have had no thunder yet; as soon as the thunder comes you will get shoots.' I asked him what possible connection there could be between the claps of thunder and the shooting of the bamboos. 'God only knows,' said he; 'but we know that till the thunder comes the bamboos never shoot well.' The thunder came, and the gardener's theory was confirmed by a very steady and abundant shooting of the bamboos."

The ancient temples of Egypt furnish specimens of timber which are supposed to be the oldest wood in existence ever used by man. These specimens are found as doveclips in connection with stone work which is thought to be at least 4000 years old. The wood appears to be from the tamarisk or shittim, a sacred tree of ancient Egypt. From the wood of this tree the ark is supposed to have been constructed.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 20, 1880.

The dry weather which prevailed for several weeks in some parts of the Middle States of our Union, rendered the forest fires in York of New Jersey, Pennsylvania and New York unusually destructive. Some days ago, in walking along the dusty roads and over the fields of a portion of New Jersey, a few miles distant from our city, the attention was called to the stunted state of the grass, and the baked condition of the soil; and the mind was drawn out into sympathy with the farmers who are dependent on the products of the ground for the support of themselves and their families. They may faithfully cultivate their ground, properly manure it, plant the seeds in due season, and do their part fully; and yet, if it please Him who ruleth over all things to withhold the rain in its season, all their labor and care is of no avail. Is there not a lesson of instruction in such seasons of trial? Are they not needful to teach us how dependent we are, and that without the Divine blessing there can be no increase? The Scriptures declare that it is the Lord "Who sendeth rain on the earth and giveth water to the fields;" and this truth is not altered, nor the lesson it conveys to us rendered less important, by the light which modern science has thrown upon the wonderful processes of nature, by which the waters of the ocean are diffused through the atmosphere, conveyed by its currents to the thirsty lands, there made to descend as rain and dew, and finally returned by the rivers and streams to the great receptacle from whence they were drawn. All these things take place in accordance with the will and designs of Him, who Planned and built, and still upholds, a world so clothed with beauty, and who, as there is abundant evidence both ancient and modern to prove, still waxes over his creation, and listens to the cries of his children.

As the mind dwelt on these or similar reflections, an incident was brought to remembrance, related by the late Nathaniel Stokes, of Westfield, New Jersey. Many years ago that section of the State was visited by a severe and protracted drought in early summer, which was very disheartening to the farmers. The time of the Quarterly Meeting of Haddonfield drew on, which in the Sixth month of the year was held at Evesham, in Burlington county. After the meeting had gathered, that eminent minister, Richard Jordan, repeated the passage, in which the Apostle James declares: "Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed earnestly that it might not rain; and it rained not on the earth by the space of three years and six months. And he prayed again, and the heavens gave rain." He then fell upon his knees and poured forth a most fervent petition that it would please our Heavenly Father again to visit the land with his refreshing showers. This was in accordance with the advice of Paul to the Philippians—"In every thing by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God." We doubt not in this case it was a true prayer, and not a mere utterance of desires which was not prompted by the Spirit of truth; and it is a confirming circumstance, that the thirsty land was watered by rain that very day.

When Paul thus advised the Philippians to make known their requests unto God, he did not promise them that those requests should always be granted, but he affixes a much more important blessing to those who thus live in a state of communion with and dependence upon the Lord, when he adds, "And the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus."

Let us seek to abide in that state of filial submission to our Heavenly Father's will which will enable us to accept of all that He sees meet to dispense without murmuring,—with a living faith that He who is Judge of all the earth will do right. Then we may reasonably hope that a portion will descend upon us of the promise made by Isaiah of old: "Fear not, O Jacob, my servant; and thou, Jeshurun, whom I have chosen. For I will pour water on him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground; I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company have recently had the Baldwin works in this city, a locomotive to run on their road between Philadelphia and New York, with the intention of making the trip in 90 minutes, the distance being 90 miles. On the trial trip the distance was made in 98 minutes. The locomotive differs from those in general use in having but two drive wheels, six and a half feet in diameter.

The contributions of Philadelphia for the relief of the sufferers by the Milton fire, amounted to $10,538.40 up to the 24th inst., besides a large amount of clothing, furniture, &c.

The exports from Philadelphia to foreign ports during last month, amounted to $4,185,138, of which about one-eighth were carried in American vessels. This represents an increase compared with the same month last year, of about $250,000.

The value of the entire export of wheat, for the ten months ending 4th mo. 20th, was $157,382,000, an increase over last year of $48,464,000. This estimate, it is stated, omits the Pacific coast ports of San Francisco and Oregon. During that time San Francisco exported $19,400,000 in wheat, and $2,100,000 in flour.

The total crop of this country in 1879, was largely by 500,000 bales than ever before, being estimated at 5,000,000 bales. The tobacco crop was greater by 12,000,000 pounds, the estimate showing a yield of 600,000,000 pounds. Of what the product is 20,000,000 bushels—excess of any previous year, and of corn 100,000,000 bushels.

The forest fires in New Jersey are now abated and under control. In Atlantic county they have almost entirely exhausted themselves, after devastating 95,000 of the 120,000 acres comprising the area of the county. Of the burned territory, 75,000 acres were composed of 100,000 acres of vine land, and 9,000 of cranberry bog. Several thousand acres of farm land were also swept.

Forest fires have also been raging in the Catskills—as viewed from Kingston, "the whole brow of the Catskill is now a mass of smoke and flame."

Over 2,000 acres of woodland in the township of Brookhaven, Long Island, it is stated have been burned over since the 15th inst.

From 9 o'clock, on the morning of the 21st inst., until 3 A. M., on the 22nd, 9,921,000 inches of rain fell at Columbia, Georgia. All the railroads were broken, and all the mail and all the left Columbia on the 22nd. The low lands were submerged, and the crops damaged, and it is thought much of the cotton will have to be replanted.

The School Board of New Orleans has resolved to close the public schools in that city from the 30th of March until the 1st of 10th month, and to dismiss all employees from 7th mo. 31st, on account of the insufficiency of the appropriations from State and municipal sources.

The new grain elevator of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company at Jersey City, is nearing completion. It is 220 feet long, 145 feet wide, and will have a capacity of 1,500,000 bushels. Four "conveyers" will run from the building to the wharf, for unloading canal boats and loading ships; and the building will have twenty-four sets of elevating apparatus for taking grain from cars. It is mortally in this city the past week numbered 238, and a decrease of 8 over the previous week. Of this number 200 were adults and 138 children; 53 being under one year of age.

The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Co., and the Pennsylvania Iron Co., have been compelled to suspend payments. The information was received by the Managers on the 21st inst.; at the same time they announced that measures will immediately be taken to protect the properties of both companies, and to continue their business; and the revenues will be applied as far as necessary for the payment of wages and for supplies.

Markets, &c.—United States sixes, 1881, 107, do. 5 $\frac{1}{2}$ , 103 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ s, registered, 108 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; do. coupon, 109; 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ s, 107 $\frac{1}{2}$ .

Trade in nearly all departments is very dull, but in the whole, greater steadiness in the values of staple merchandise and produce, which is thought to be an indication that the shrinkage in values has nearly or quite run its course.

Cotton was firmly held. Sales of middlings are reported at 12 to 12 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per pound for uplands and New Orleans.

Lard and the market, for 41 cts. in barrels, and standard white, 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. for export, and 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  a cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour continues dull. Sales of 1000 lbs., including Minnesota extras, at $5 a $6.25; Penna. family at $5.25 to $5.50; western do., at $5.50 a $6.25, and patent and other high grades at $6.50 a $8. Hye-flour is firm at $4.50 a $4.75 per barrel.

Grain.—The wheat market is quiet, but a shaler firm. Sales of 25,000 bushels red at \$1.29, and amber at \$1.30 a \$1.31. Rye is firm at 90 cts. for Pennsylvania, and 85 cts. for New York, 50,000 bushels, including rejected and steamer, at 52 cts. Yellow at 53 a 53 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts.; yellow at 54 a 55 cts. At the Call Board, first call, there were no sales. Oats are less active. Sales of 5000 bushels, including mixed, at 41 $\frac{1}{2}$  a 42 cts., and white at 44 a 47 cts.

Lard and the market, for 41 cts. ending 5th mo. 22d, 1880.—Loads of hay, 34 $\frac{1}{2}$ ; straw, 63. Average for the week: Prime timothy, \$1.10 a \$1.20 per 100 pounds; mixed, \$1 to \$1.10; straw, 1.35 a \$1.50.

Seeds.—Clover, 61 a 74 cts. per pound. Timothy, 71 $\frac{1}{2}$  a 73 $\frac{1}{2}$  per bushel. Flaxseed, \$1.45. Orchard grass, 71 $\frac{1}{2}$  a 73 $\frac{1}{2}$  per bushel.

Oils—Lined, 76 a 77 cts.; Neats foot, 55 a 75 cts.;

Lard oil, 45 a 56 cts.; Sperma, erend, 49 a 50 a bleached virgin, $1.17 a $1.20.

Wool.—The market is dull, the demand from manufacturers being insignificant. Among the sales was Ohio fine and 1 blood at 52 cts.; Ohio medium 55; Ohio 1 blood, 57 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts.; combing New York, low, 52; unwashed Virginia, 1, 37 cts.; unwashed Va. 2, 42 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts.

Beef cattle were rather firmer—2400 head arr and sold at the different yards at 3 a 5 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per lb. to condense.

Sheep were a fraction lower; 8000 head sold at the different yards at 3 a 4 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per lb. Lambs were and lower. Sales at 6 a 8 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per lb.

Hogs continue dull; 5000 head sold at the different yards at 7 a 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per lb.

Cows were unchanged—200 head sold at $20 a per head as to quality.

FOREIGN.—The Parliament of Great Britain assembled on the 20th inst. The Queen's speech re to the cordial relations with all Powers; hopes for speedy execution of the whole Treaty of Berlin, says the efforts to pacify the Afghans and establish strong but friendly Government will be unnecessary. condition of Indian finances will require special attention. A policy of confederation in South Africa advised, but the Transvaal will be retained. The preservation act in Ireland, which expires the first month, will not be renewed. The loyalty and sense of the Irish people justify a reliance on provisions of the ordinary law firmly administered the maintenance of peace and order.

The Executive Committee of the Blackburn co operatives, advise all the strikers to resume work the mills are re-opened.

The striking operatives at Roubaix have sold aid from the English trade unions, but the reply unfavorable, the strike seems nearly at an end.

The Communist demonstration on the 23d passed without the serious trouble feared. Thirteen per were arrested.

A despatch from Pesth says: "The distress in north of Hungary is increasing. Hundreds of people have no other food than grass, mushrooms, &c. Tr of emigrants are leaving the country. The Government has ordered the authorities to stop the emigration, the police have arrested some emigrants.

News from the East have been received from M. where famine has prevailed. The price of bread has been reduced two-thirds; but in other parts famine rages, and deaths are numerous.

Madrid.—The persons who wrecked a train on the Andalusia Railway recently, have been court-martialed. Two of them have been sentenced to death, and two to imprisonment for twenty years.

On the Ministry.

With regard to the ministry that we now see in our meetings, is it not usually of a very different character from what we remember as having been such a blessing to us when we were young? In thinking deeply his subject, the query has often presented of doubtless to many minds, is the change ourselves, or is it in the ministry, that what we hear in meetings has such a different effect on our hearts now, from what it used to have some ago? Is it that in youth our feelings are more susceptible? Is it that the ministrations all being our seniors, we listened to communications with more reverence, and we now find it possible to do to those preached by contemporaries and juniors?

We are quite willing to allow that it is possible for these last mentioned reasons to have more weight with us than we could have at that age. And yet, when we are favored once and then to hear a soul-stirring sermon, that is accompanied with such life and power, that it carries its own evidence with it, being a message from above, we then find that our hearts are not impervious, that we can still appreciate true, gospel, baptizing ministry, and can devoutly thank the Lord for such is not utterly extinct among us. Our vitality, our growth in spirituality, largely depend upon our having a living ministry in our meetings, and to have this, the true gospel ground for ministry must be kept to, such as our early Friends professed and practised, and considered above all things essential. I am Penn in speaking of the ministry, "I am earnest in this above all other considerations, well-knowing how much it concerns the present and future state and salvation of the Church of Christ Jesus. It has been gathered and built up by a strong and powerful ministry, that the ministrations held, preserved, and continued in the ministrations, motions, and supplies of the life and power from time to time."

Now in listening to the unbaptized, weak, feeble communications, which are often to be heard in our meetings, can we believe that true ground for ministry is kept to? We have many times heard the opinion expressed in speaking in the mission meetings connected with the First-day schools, is a very different thing from speaking in our Meetings of Worship; and that a Christian interest for the good of those assembled, is a sufficient qualification for vocal service in those mission meetings. The idea is also often expressed, that it was a gloomy and uninspiring notion of Friends in years gone by, to think it necessary to wait for the "woe" (see I Cor. ix. 16), before preaching the gospel.

The beloved disciple will ever esteem it a joy and delight, and will not associate such a service with any feelings of gloom or restraint. We believe the heart of the true gospel minister will very often be bowed in humble gratitude that his Lord should condescend to entrust him with His messages, and when these messages have been delivered, in complete abasements of self, and in living dependence on Divine guidance, he will not infrequently be favored to partake of that heavenly peace, which the world can neither give nor take away. But if the Lord's messages are delivered with life and power, the messenger must wait on every occasion for the baptism of the Holy Spirit. He will not dare to speak his own words, but will wait "to be anointed with fresh oil." And although to the truly dedicated servant it will be a joy to run on his Lord's errands, yet, knowing his own weakness, and complete nothingness, he will so shrink from running without being sent, that humiliation of the creature, and at times deep conflict of spirit will be experienced, in being fully assured that he has the Divine commission, and that if he ventures to break the silence, the Lord will be with him, and will be to him strength and wisdom, tongue and utterance, that will answer the prayer so frequently breathed on such occasions, that the poor instrument may be endowed with the right thoughts, and the ability to clothe those thoughts in words. And is it not often the case that the most experienced ministers will be those who will most distrust themselves, and that will pass through the deepest baptisms of spirit in preparation for service? And are not the sacrifices thus prepared of the Lord in deep prostration of soul, and under baptisms of spirit renewed on every occasion; are not these the sacrifices that will be acceptable to the Lord? And is not the ministry exercised under such an influence the kind that is the most likely to reach the hearts of the hearers, and to cooperate with, and strengthen the voice of the Holy Spirit within them?

If then it be conceded that all true ministry must be of the Lord's requiring, renewed on every fresh occasion, and consequently accompanied with the life and power that comes from Him alone; and that such ministry is the most effectual in arousing the sinner, in comforting the afflicted, in strengthening the weak, and in animating the lowly disciple to persevere in his Christian course, why then (as seems the opinion of some) should it be thought allowable, and even expedient, by many of our dear friends who take part in these mission meetings, to depart from the higher ground for ministry, which Friends have ever professed, and suppose that the lower ground is sufficient, viz., a Christian interest for the welfare of those assembled?

It is greatly to be feared that the liberty exercised in this way, has had, and is having an undermining effect in regard to the true grounds for ministry amongst us; and that its changed character in our Meetings for Worship of late years, its lack of depth, of action, and of that precious baptizing power with which in the early days of our Society, as well as more recently, it was often accompanied, may in degree be attributed to the spread of the modern idea, that such a deep work is not required, and that the lower ground (before alluded to) for these vocal religious services is sufficient.

There is also another snare laid for some who speak in our meetings, into which the intellectual and educated will be the most tempted to fall. And here the writer would not be misunderstood, nor appear to set light by intellect or education; being fully persuaded that all our talents, natural and acquired, if sanctified by the Lord, and used in humble submission to his will, and in reverent dependence on his guidance, will be made subservient to his glory, and will enable the possessor of such talents to promote with greater efficiency, the Lord's great work in the earth. But is there not a danger of some of our ministers relying too much on their own mental powers? And do not some under the idea of increasing their usefulness, prepare their subject beforehand? and thus the address delivered becomes more like an intellectual discourse on the passage of Scripture selected, than a living message from the Lord. We believe it is quite possible, and a frequent experience with some, that before going to meeting a subject will be presented to the mind of a minister, on which he thinks it may be required of him to speak. But then the only safe way will be, when in the meeting, to commit the matter entirely to the Lord. He only knows the hearts of those assembled, with their many and varied needs; and He only can instruct the ministers as to what "food is convenient for them." And if the minister is (as he should be) as passive clay in the hands of the great Potter, he may find that (if required to speak at all) it may be right for him to speak on a very different subject from that which he brought to meeting with him, and thus he will confess that, his safety consists in being content that his own will and wisdom should be laid low, "so that no flesh should glory in his presence," and "that he that glorieth should glory in the Lord."

When we consider the solemn importance of this subject, and how largely our continuance as a Christian church, our vitality, our usefulness, our well being in every way, depend on a living ministry being exercised in our meetings, does it not behoove us to lay these things to heart? and have we not cause to "search and try our ways, and turn again to the Lord?"

Having lately been much struck in reading some valuable counsel and remarks on the subject of the ministry in Penn's excellent preface to George Fox's Journal, and thinking they contain much deep instruction for us at the present day, a few extracts may appropriately conclude this paper:—

William Penn says, "And to you, my beloved and much honored brethren in Christ, that are in the ministry: oh, feel life in your ministry! Let life be your commission, your well-spring, and treasury on all occasions, else, you well know, there can be no begetting to God, since nothing can quicken or make people alive to God, but the life of God; and it must be a ministry in and from Life, that enlivens any people to God."

"It is the Spirit of the Lord immediately or through the ministry of his servants, that teacheth his people to profit; and to be sure, so far as we take Him along with us in our services, so far we are profitable, and no farther. For if it be the Lord that must work all things in us, and for our salvation, much more is it the Lord, who must work in us, for the conversion of others. If therefore it was once a cross to us to speak, though the Lord required it at our hands, let it never be so to be silent when He does not."

"Wherefore, brethren, let us be careful neither to outgo our Guide, nor yet loiter behind Him; since he that makes haste may miss his way, and he that stays behind lose his Guide: for even those who have received the word of the Lord, had need wait for wisdom, that they may see how to divide the word aright; which plainly implies that it is possible for one that hath received the word of the Lord, to miss in the division and application of it, which must come from an impatience of spirit, and a self-working, which makes an unsound and dangerous mixture; and will hardly beget a right-minded, living people to God."

"Nor is it enough that we have known the Divine gift, and in it have reached to the spirits in prison, and been the instruments of convincing others of the way of God, if we keep not as low and poor in ourselves, and as depending upon the Lord as ever; since no memory, no repetitions of former openings, revelations, or enjoyments, will bring a soul to God, or afford bread to the hungry, or water to the thirsty, unless life go with what we say; and that must be waited for."

"Oh that we may have no other fountain, treasury, or dependence! that none may presume at any rate to act of themselves for God! because they have long acted from God, that we may not supply what of waiting with our own wisdom, or think that we may take less care, and more liberty in speaking than formerly; and that where we do not feel the Lord by his power to open and enlarge us, whatever be the expectation of the people, or has been our customary supply and character, we may not exceed, or fill up the time with our own words."

"I hope we shall ever remember who it was that said, 'Without me you can do nothing; our sufficiency is in Him. And if we are not to speak our own words, or take thought what we should say to men in our defence, when exposed for our testimony, surely we ought to speak none of our own words, or take thought what we shall say in our testimony and ministry in the name of the Lord, to the souls of the people; for then of all times, and of all other occasions, should it be fulfilled in us, 'For it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of my Father that speaketh in you.'"

DAMASCUS.

BY MARCUS D. BUELL.

Whoever has looked thoughtfully down from the dome of St. Peter's, from the broken pediment of the Pantheon, or from the Mount of Olives, has viewed in fancy a long paganant history, but not so long as has he who has stood upon the crest of Mohammed's hill to the north of Damascus. Nevertheless, the oldest city in the world, whose name is mentioned as incidentally in Genesis as in Galatians, whose origin is as untraceable as that of its own beautiful river bursting from the foot of Anti-Lebanon, seems as much at home in the present century as in any that is gone. Telegraph poles run across its broad plain toward the south, and the French diligence road, connecting with the Mediterranean steamship, has supplanted the old caravan route to Egypt. Manchester goods have displaced hand woven fabrics, and I even saw a veiled Mohammedan woman bending over a silversmith's bench with a sewing-machine shuttle which she wished to get repaired. The wakaful whistle of the locomotive will yet frighten the camel-trains among the mulberry and apricot groves.

As yet, however, Damascus looks toward the desert, rather than the sea, retaining, in spite of all Western influences, an Oriental cast. The American missionary recounts his thrilling experiences in the massacre of 1860, when 6,000 Christians were murdered in Damascus alone, and calmly assures us that he to this hour carries his life in his hand. After we have threaded the bazaars all day without seeing a single person in European costume, and have noted the gloomy religious hate that glistens in many a dark eye turned askance upon us, we can but be glad when the brow of a hill beneath Hermon has hidden the fanatical city from our sight. An hour after sundown the streets are as quiet as a country village, excepting only the continued baying of relays of the forty thousand dogs which prowls about the town. No one ventures into the street after dark without a lantern, and very few, indeed, go abroad at all after night-fall.

Trade goes on in odd fashion. All retail business is conducted in slightly built booths, ranged on the sides of covered and dimly-lighted passage-ways, crowded with a motley confusion of p-destrians, mounted soldiers, donkeys laden with every thing, from a sack of grain to a load of furniture, and trains of stinking camels. It is worth meditation that, at two or three points in this never ceasing babel, the shrill call to prayer pierces between buyer and seller. A system of fixed prices is wholly unknown, so that the purchase of the smallest article becomes a tedious barter. The sale of a horse involves a lively gymnastic exercise. The purchaser grasps the hand of the seller, and with the aid of a broker violently wrenches the latter's arm with a pump-handle sort of motion until he comes down to a certain desired price.

No one can visit a Damascus house of the better sort without taking away a sweet dream with him. A dull, lofty wall shuts off the noisy, perfidious world. Within is a court with the stars, sun, and moon of the open sky sweeping over it. Orange and lemon trees fling their shadows athwart a fountain in the centre. The fountain is not of that high pressure, squirting variety, so dear to the Western heart. It is an infant Abana, slipping with gentle melody into the marble basin.

A crowd of little children returning from school in the Christian quarter, with faces of fascinating beauty, reached out their hands toward us. We thought the gesture meant back-sheesh, of course, until several of them fervently kissed the extended hand of one of our number. They were the children of Arabs belonging to the Greek Church, as such was the manner of their greeting to those whose European dress they regarded as badge of the Christian religion.

The vision of their faces came back to when the mezzuin's cry trembled on the long before day-break next morning; and the form of the peculiar baskets and ropes camel's hair I had seen for sale in the street the day before, made fresh again the story Paul's conversion and neutral escape from this very city; and I felt a new emphasis the Christian inscription on the great mosque ignorantly spared by the ruthless Moslem. "Thy kingdom, O Christ, is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion from generation to generation." The streets of the city shall no longer breathe out cruelty; the high brick wall shall be no more a screen to hide brut hearts when, like the water of the brook Abana, the truth that made Saul of Tarsus free, shall have in all the city free course, and be glorified.

For "The Friend"

A Letter of Sarah Hillman.

[It is thought that some of those who know and loved our late valued friend Sarah Hillman, may be interested in the following letter written in her younger years to Benj. Roberts, of Burlington county, New Jersey. "The separation of a part of the Month Meeting" to which she refers, was probably due to an adjustment of the boundaries of districts belonging to the city Monthly Meetings, by which a part of the members was transferred from one Monthly Meeting another.]

Philada., 5th mo. 29th, 1837.

In an unchanging hope that we are travelling together towards the Heavenly Cana, I am engaged to salute thee, under a banner that it is allowable at the present day formerly, for those who "fear the Lord speak often one unto another." Desires I have raised in my heart that the thing this world may not unnecessarily occupy attention, but that we may be concerned above every other consideration, to follow blessed Master in unreserved dedication, thus we may experience by following or know Him, "his going forth to be prepared for the morning, and his coming in to be the former and the latter rain," mercifully evincing to his depending children that he remains to be the same, "a sure rock and a falling refuge," and his testimonies stand. Many of us in this part of the city, feel separation of a part of our Monthly Meeting to be a trying one, through a fear that length will not be sufficient for the weight of the burden that may fall on our shoulders, that the ark of the testimony may suffer or want of suitably qualified instruments to support it; yet I trust, as we are concerned to keep a single eye to Israel's Shepherd, and mission [is] wrought in us, qualification will be furnished to go forward in his name and perform his work. Much do I desire to one of "this man's disciples," to be enabled to fully to bear his blessed cross, and to see the shame; which when under his blessing influence is easy indeed, and his burden is light to all those who prefer the prosperity of us to their chief joy. And although the sun of the morning is allowed to pre-empt his gilded toys, and say, "all these will I have thee if thou wilt fall down and worship," let us not consent to his insinuations, with an eye to our great Head, say, "Get thee behind me." May we run with patience a race set before us, looking to Him who is able to help all our endeavors, and will as we rely to Him, strengthen us to perform his will in all things, and thus in the conclusion of the blessed sentence will be held forth, one ye blessed." What greater joy can we expect than this? This is worth toiling after; let us labor after this; yea, dig deep, and let us be nailed to the cross for this glorious reward. When the blessed light is as behind the curtain, and we can see the clear of murmuring, how hard is it for us to submit to this dispensation! We are lost ready to say, "make us gods to go before us, for as for this Moses we wot not what become of him." Let us pray for ability of patience to wait the Lord's time, till He pleased to send our Moses down out of the tent and unfold his blessed will; then I believe our joy would be like the joy of harvest, our souls would be filled with divine content. We should be willing to journey forth, though we might have to pass through fire and the water, if so be that we might be admitted within the gates of that celestial which is prepared of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. Thus, dear B., the heart of thy S. breathes, though she advances slowly (if at all) in holy way.

Thine affectionately,

S. HILLMAN.

Procuring Slaves in Africa.—We never realized the atrocious nature of the traffic, we saw it at the fountain-head. There, "Satan has his seat." Besides those actually captured, thousands are killed and their wounds and famine, driven from their villages by the slave-raid proper. Thou spearest in internecine warfare, for slaves are their own clansmen and neighbors, slain for the lust of gain, which is stimulated, to be plundered always, by the slave purchasers, who are seen among rocks and woods, by the pools, and along the paths of the wilderness, attest the awful sacrifice of human life which must be attributed, directly or indirectly, to this trade of hell. We would ask our countrymen to believe us when we say, we can conscientiously can, that it is our dear opinion, from what we know and see, that not one fifth of the victims of the slave-trade ever become slaves. Taking the Shire Valley as an average, we should say not even one-tenth arrive at their destination.—D. Livingstone.

The Reality of Manner.

Lord Chesterfield, whose life was chiefly devoted to studying and teaching the art of polite behavior, declared that, in his opinion, manner was of more importance than matter. Doubtless he thought that he believed this, and yet he somewhat strangely contradicted himself in end-avoring to prove his point. "Look," he said, "in the face of the person to whom you are speaking, if you wish to know his real sentiments, for he can command his words more easily than his countenance." Here he evidently values manner as the revealer of "real sentiments," thus unconsciously, perhaps, acknowledging that in them, not in it, resides the true superiority. They are, of course, the matter, of which the tell-tale face is but the door-opener, exposing it to our view. Many persons make the same mistake. They see clearly that what is said or done is one thing, and the way it is said or done, is quite another. A favor conferred may be given so grudgingly or superciliously as to kill all pleasure or gratitude; or it may be bestowed with a hearty cordiality or a graceful delicacy that shall be worth more than the favor itself. Thus it seems to them, as it did to Chesterfield, that the manner is more important than the matter. This is because they recognize nothing deeper than the favor itself, whereas that is but a product of something in the heart. It may be merely vanity or self-interest, or it may be pure benevolence or affection, but, whatever it be, it takes precedence of the action itself, and gives birth to it. Now, the value of the manner, is that it shows this disposition or feeling. Its only intrinsic worth is that of a glass, which mirrors forth with truthfulness either beauty or deformity.

Two men may be performing identical work. The manner of the one is earnest and interested; that of the other, listless and indifferent. Each one's manner is but the sign involuntarily given of the real feelings, which would otherwise lie hidden. It is not that their manner of working is of more importance than the work itself, but that there is something else more important than either—their own interest in the work and desires for excellence; and these are made manifest more by the manner of their working than by the work itself.

The same is true of every action, small as well as great. The greeting of a neighbor may be stiff and cold, or warm and friendly. The obedience of a child may be sullen and tardy, or cheerful and willing. The benevolent action may be chilling and haughty, or delicate and gracious. It is the manner in them all that gives tone and character to the deed, but only because it is the symbol of something superior to the deed itself.

If this be so, it follows that the whole value of manner lies in its sincerity. If it be not a true expression of the inner feelings, it is nothing. The great mistake of Lord Chesterfield was in teaching that as manner was so important it should be selected, laid out, and put on like a dress, instead of being developed from within. This is a favorite idea of many persons. They see the advantage of manners, which are graceful and dignified, cordial and genial, sympathetic and kind, and they determine to adopt and recommend them. They do not reflect that such manners are the natural outflow of a benevolent heart and a friendly feeling, and not to be counterfeited by any artificial semblance. What they have to do is to cultivate, not manner, but reality; to cherish a living interest in the welfare and concerns of others, a warm feeling of sympathy, and a hearty desire to contribute to the general happiness—then the manner they so much admire will follow as naturally as the bloom on freshly gathered fruit.

Some see and covet brilliancy in conversation, but trying to be brilliant ends in being only ridiculous. There are speakers who depend on tricks of oratory, and writers who depend on tricks of style, and every employment has many in it whose endeavors reach only to its most superficial parts. Those who admire earnestness of manner will sometimes try to put it on, but no one is deceived. It does not fit it on, but they cannot wear it. What we delight in, in manners, is its perfect naturalness as a symbol of what is within. Take that away, and a feeling of contempt alone is excited. Even when it imposes successfully for a time, it is like a thin coating of cheap paint, which a little wear and a few hard knocks soon dispose of. On the other hand, when manner is the involuntary expression of a rich and full nature, it resembles the beautiful coloring and the delicate odor of flowers, which nature, not artifice, must produce. The gardener who would realize this loveliness, does not paint colorless weeds or perfume scentless blossoms, but cherishes and nourishes the particular roots, of which beauty and fragrance are the natural issues. So, if we would possess the character of manner, let us dig about the roots of earnestness, and cultivate them with all earnestness. As in nature's growth, there is first the root, then the plant, and then the flower, so we have first the thought or motive, then the action, then the manner; and as the flower proclaims the hidden root from which the plant has sprung, so the manner proclaims the hidden motive which has called forth the action. Goethe says, "If you would create something, you must be something; so if we would produce the charm of the dower in our manners, we must see to it that the roots of our being are vigorous and healthy.—Public Ledger.

The Rat in the Ham.—On the farm of Manorlee, in Fife-shire, and in the house of Alexander Gibson, a large and very tempting ham hung from one of the rafters running across the ceiling. In the same house there was a rat whose taste lay strongly in the direction of ham, and this rat, with rare instinct, gnawed a hole in the wood-work directly over the tempting morsel, and, descending, ate itself into the inside of it. How long the excavating went on is not known, but one day the house-wife found it necessary to commence operations on the ham, when, on lifting it down, out bolted the depredator. The ham was a perfect shell, skin and bone only remaining to show its form. The animal, after feeding slyly, had commenced to build a nest inside. This anecdote is not simply amusing; it serves well to illustrate the operation of secret sin, eating away our spiritual life till nothing remains but a deceptive form of godliness—the mere rind and shell of religion.—S.L.

For "The Friend."

In "The Friend" a few weeks since, appeared a paragraph headed, a "Well preserved man," in which it seemed that to be deemed such was a discredit—implying that he must be a lazy indolent man—not a hard worker, &c., as if industrious habits must be in some way connected with hard manual labor. I am not far from my three score years and ten, and it is the first time that I have seen such a sentiment in print. I had regarded the "well preserved man," in a general way, to present the evidence of the blessing which attends the practice of virtuous habits in early life—the blessing of preservation from vice, intemperance, bad company and sensual indulgence of every kind, by which not only the welfare of the immortal soul is imperilled, but the constitution in most cases, if not destroyed, is undermined in such a way as to produce what is called "premature old age." May our young men take the hint and consider in good time the blessings which are alone to be found in the ways of virtue, and the misery and distress which may be avoided by walking in her paths. It is an old saying: "He that will live long, and be in fact a well preserved man," must begin early."

As the outward order of society sometimes suggests hints that lead towards Divine truths, it is remarkable that the various professors of Christianity have not more frequently discovered, that the servant who waits in silent attention on his Master, is the most likely to discover his will. Thus it appears to me that the most acceptable homage to the all-seeing, all-knowing Master and Sovereign of the universe, is a waiting in humble reverent silence before Him; and when we meet for the purpose of worshipping Him, instead of rushing into his presence with speeches of our own contriving, the fruits of our own self-sufficiency, that it is more pleasing in his sight to wait in all humility and singleness of heart, to feel his love operate in our minds and his good spirit refresh our hearts. Thus would his worship, whether in vocal homage, or silent adoration, be an offering of his own preparing, and acceptable in his sight; and while such a disposition prevailed, even if He saw meet, for the trial of our constancy, to withhold his sensible presence from us, I have no doubt that our patient dedication of heart would be well pleasing to Him.—Life of John Pemberton.

Selected.

Asleep! asleep! men talk of "sleep,"
When all around the silent deep
The shades of night are stealing;
When like a curtain, soft and vast,
The darkness over all is cast,
And sombre stillness comes at last,
To the mute heart appearing.

Asleep! asleep! when soft and low
The patient watchers come and go,
Their loving vigil keeping;
When from the dear eyes fades the light,
When pales the flush so strangely bright,
And the glad spirit takes its flight,
We speak of death as "sleeping."

Or when—as dies the orb of day—
The aged Christian sinks away,
And the lone mourner weepeth;
When thus the pilgrim goes to rest,
With meek hands folded on his breast,
And his last sigh a prayer confess'd—
We say of such, "He sleeps."

A DREAM OF SUMMER.

Selected.

Bland as the morning breath of June,
The southwest breeze play;
And, through its haze, the winter noon
Seems warm as summer's day.
The snow-plumed Angel of the North
Has dropped his icy spear;
Again the mossy earth looks forth,
Again the streams gush clear.

The fox his hillside coil forsakes,
The minkrat leaves his nook,
The bluebird in the meadow brakes
Is singing with the brook.
"Bear up, O Mother Nature!" cry
The raven, crow, and streamer free;
"Our winter voices prophesy
Of summer days to thee!"

So, in those winters of the soul,
By bitter blasts and drear
O'erawpt from memory's frozen pole,
Will sunny days appear.
Reviving Hope and Faith, they show
The soul its living power,
And how beneath the winter's snow
Lie germs of summer flowers!

The night is mother of the Day,
The Winter of the Spring,
And ever upon old Decay
The greenest mosses cling.
The night the cloud the starlight lurks,
Through showers the sunbeams fall;
For God, who loves all his works,
Has left his Hope with all.

"WHO SHALL ROLL AWAY THE STONE?"

That which weeping ones were saying,
Eighteen hundred years ago,
We, the same weak faith betraying,
Say in our sad hours of woe.
Looking at some trouble bringing
Of the dark and dread unknown,
We, too, often ask with sighing,
"Who shall roll away the stone?"

Thus with care our spirits crushing,
When they might for care be free,
And, in joyous soul outgushing,
Are, in rapture, Lord, to thee.
For, before the way was ended,
Of we had with joy to own
Angels have from heaven descended,
And have rolled away the stone.

Many a storm-cloud sweeping o'er us
Never pours on us its rain;
Many a grief we see before us
Never comes to cause us pain.
Outlines in the fearful "to-morrow"
Sunshine comes—the cloud has flown!
Ask not then in foolish sorrow,
"Who shall roll away the stone?"

Burden not thy soul with sadness;
Make a wiser, better choice;
Drink the wine of life with gladness;
God doth bid thee, man, "rejoice!"
In to-day's bright sunlight basking,
Leave to-morrow's evils alone;
Spill not present joys by asking,
"Who shall roll away the stone?"

Let the bright beams of Science shed
Their choicest influence o'er thy head;
And let the classic page impart
Its raptures to thy glowing heart—
If Christ, thy Lord, thou do not know,
Wretched and ignorant art thou.

But though to thee her bearing ray
Fair Science deigns not to display;
And, though thy heart has never glowed
With warmth, by classic page bestowed;
Still, if thy Saviour, Christ, thou know,
Happy, and learned, and wise art thou.

The darkest hour in the history of any young man is when he sits down to study how to get money without honestly earning it.

From "The British Friend."

Polished shafts.

Prepared men are needed for prepared work. When our Lord bade his disciples to lift their eyes and behold the fields white unharvest, the sight of the work to be done and of the fewness of the laborers, was enough to send them to the Lord of the harvest prayer for more laborers, but not to the field to enter upon his work unbidden. They continued with Him, in due time they received the commission and the qualification to go into the harvest field of souls.

The soldiers that win battles are trained soldiers. The workmen whose works endure are trained workmen. They who teach others need first to be taught themselves. Of discipline comes skill in all knowledge, and art. Applying these aphorisms to Christian work, can we wonder that vast expenditure of effort often yields so little of permanent good results? The products of genius in the great masters of art descend from age to age both in the models they have wrought and the thoroughness of their teaching, which impressed something of themselves upon the pupils and their schools.

The great Master of us all, in his transcendent work, keeps them long and meditates with Himself, whom He entrusts to build with gold and silver and precious stones the superstructure of his temple. In his work He takes time—not time for idleness, but time to perfect the little parts.

These considerations necessarily connect themselves with the importance of a high standard in the Church. Our Saviour, who longed to save the world was infinitely above the fullest measure of our love for souls, we content to go alone in those places where perfect witness to the perfect truth distance every follower.

Is there not occasion to fear that in our Society now, the desire to gain numbers coming to be altogether disproportioned to the desire to exalt the perfect model?

Is there not occasion to fear that in our great Church gatherings the tendency is to dwell more on figures, and the means of multiplying our membership, than upon the loft and finer characteristics of Christian holiness which should distinguish the Lord's people?

I would never disparage nor discourage a desire to gather souls to Christ and his kingdom. But his kingdom is not of this world. And if we do not lead men out of sin, and of the self-pleasing and self-flattering vanity of the world, are we really leading them to Christ? His way remains the same as when He said, "Except a man deny himself, he cannot be my disciple." They who are to be instrumental in promoting this thorough work must learn it first themselves, and practice themselves.

The life whose walk is with Christ, whose work is under his immediate tuition after his own model, has in itself an attraction which no human powers or gifts can efface. Such a life sheds light. Such a life is a truthful testimony in itself to the love and power of the Lord Jesus Christ, and an answerable argument against infidelity.

It is what a Church is, that will give life to what it does. Activity will spring from healthy life. But the activity which stimulates to public work, while the home gates and field are untilled, and sends out the night and the unskilled to teach and leaders, cannot be expected to benefit the church nor the world.

So it seems to me the standard of pure christianity practically lived, can never cease to be a primary concern in a living Church. If a pure standard is to be maintained with integrity, they who represent it officially must present it practically. And the work of each, and such only, will gather others to a pure standard.

It has been the blessed privilege of our Society to be taught the reality and sufficiency of the Divine presence; and its grand testimony has been to every meeting and to every shipper assembled to wait upon God, that minister is there who can speak to the condition of every soul, and who will call his ministers, and give the message for his sick children. Is it a good sign when meetings with such assured privileges are being and calling for teachers, and when the Church so taught goes about providing a minister for every meeting?

When Israel, not satisfied with their real good, sought a human king to govern and rule them, they sinned. Every release from the fullest and most practical recognition of the presence and sufficiency of our Lord has been marked by a craving for more of visible human instrumentality in worship. Can people, blessed as the Society of Friends have been, be repeating within its borders here, there, to any fellow-being, the cry of the land of Macedonia, in benighted heathenism, "Come over and help us," without in some sense rejecting and grieving Him who has so long and so graciously manifested himself to us, as the source of our help,—as Redeemer, our Shepherd, our Teacher, our King?

Let us beware lest his reproving language spoken of us, "My people have committed evils; they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns,—broken cisterns that can hold no water."

To those who have received an unction in the Holy One, it is written, "Ye have heard that any man teach you, but as the anointing teacheth you, which is truth, receive it; but as that which is not of truth, receive it not." The source of all true teaching is the anointing; and the anointing is of the Holy One. The polishing of the shabts, the filling of the quiver, and the power to bend the bow, of the Lord.

The First Steamboat in Cashmere.

The Queen of England having presented to Maharajah of Cashmere a small steamer, its trial trip on the waters of the lake a memorable day to the inhabitants of the valley. Steam power was a mystery to them, and never before had the mountains bounding their homes echoed back the sound of the whistle—a potent uproar of ideas and prejudices. At an early hour the city was full of people, and the river crowded with boats. All were desirous of going as good a place as possible to obtain a view of the wonderful mystery of a boat going over the water without the agency of oars.

It had been sent to the country in pieces, and were finally put together under the direction of an European engineer. As the steamer for starting drew near, the occupants of the boats became more excited than ever, and shrieked, gesticulated and swayed about on their frail crafts. The Maharajah took his seat on the deck in a solemn and dignified manner, and gave the word to start. The drummers sounded, the musicians blew, the drummers smote their drums, and the people shouted; but the vessel stirred not. It was not till the following day that the defect in the machinery which caused the failure was rectified. That having been done, the boat was brought through the canal from the lake into the river Jhelam, where its acquisition proved a source of great amusement to the Maharajah, who every evening steamed up and down the watery highway of the city, much to the delight of his faithful subjects, who clustered like bees on every commanding point that afforded a view of the royal progress.—D. ### Letter from Sarah [Lynes] Grubb to Henry Hull.

The following are extracts from a letter of our late friend Sarah Grubb, which appears to have been written about the time that modified Quakerism, as it is termed by John Barclay, was putting on a bold front in England, and which caused the separation of Isaac Crewdson, and others, from the Society of Friends. Henry Hull had visited England, and not only felt a deep interest in many things there, but as a faithful watchman over the flock, was desirous of understanding what new machinations Satan was using to lay waste its harmony, that he might not be ignorant of his devices, if he should attempt to exert them among his beloved Friends and homes, who had just been torn asunder by Hicksism. It is no uncommon thing for those upon whom the care of the churches rests daily, to feel solicitude for their brethren of other Yearly Meetings, and to take common cause with them against the invasions of an enemy. How similar is the treatment received by dignified instruments in different ages, whom the Lord qualifies to show Jacob their transgressions and Israel their sins! But the word of the Lord, by his servants, will be fulfilled—and it was so, we believe, in the warnings of Sarah Grubb.

"Lexden, near Colchester, 2d mo. 2, 1834.

"My dear friend Henry Hull,—My husband's sight having failed a good deal of late, he wishes me to take the pen and assure thee that it is very pleasant to receive from thee hand some testimonial of continued remembrance and brotherly love, after a lapse of time nearly amounting to three and twenty years, when we had the privilege of thy company, and could exchange sentiment, and compare views in the freedom of children of one family. Not less grateful to our best feelings is the sense which covers our minds, while enjoying thy communication, that the unchangeable power of the Most High has kept thee in a state, prepared to sympathize with his church militant, and to travel for the preservation of our poor Society; that it might not slide from the sure foundation, upon which it was originally gathered, and upon which it stood safe and strong, through the fire of persecution, in the days of our forefathers.

We do not marvel that thou shouldst bestir thyself to inquire concerning the rumor of some something like schism amongst us in this land. The testimonies given the people called Quakers to bear, have long been too lightly esteemed by many under our name; yea, by some filling very conspicuous stations in this community. And now there seems to be no inconsiderable leaning to that, out of which the sons of the morning of our day as a people, were brought by the strong hand and mighty arm of Jehovah. Alas, alas, we are fast going back to Episcopalianism, little being wanting with many to range on this side, except partaking of the outward ordinances of that church.

Faith in the atoning sacrifice is abundantly enforced, while there is little said inviting us to yield up the will, with the affections and lusts to be crucified. But without this knowledge of the power and Spirit of Christ, what will a literal faith do for us? or how can we learn duly to appreciate the adorable love and mercy which brought the Son of God among men in a body of flesh, to live a life of sorrow, and die in ignominy and in agony, for sinful man, the just for the unjust! They tell us that we are come now to the dispensation of reconciliation, and to that which speaketh better things than the blood of Abel, &c., &c. Yes; but how can we as individuals, experience this, or how receive the ministration of justification, save as we know the day of the Lord to be come to our souls, which burneth as an oven, even inwardly and powerfully, wherein all the proud and all that doth wickedly is as stubble, and the root and branch of the corrupt tree is destroyed. Truly some of us have not so learned Christ, as to conclude that He doth the great work of salvation for us without us, or that we have nothing to do with co-operation. But fleshly indulgence is what we naturally wish for; and here is a newly devised bait of the serpent to ensnare us in this country; for be knew that the same make and shape in the way of temptation which laid waste in America, would not allure here just now, and he has succeeded in a sorrowful degree—so that there are those in the ministry, who appeared to be established in the true faith of the Gospel, who for want of dwelling deep with the humbling power, preach up a literal gospel, as well as a literal faith, to be comprehended by the human understanding alone; at least this is what I gather from their sermons; but sometimes it is the case, that the most orthodox among us can by no means object to the doctrine held forth, and yet the life seems wanting, even "the demonstration of the Spirit and of power."

Thou wilt believe that it is a very trying time, and has occasioned the lowly, the faithful ones amongst us to go mourning on their way. This hath been the case for a long while past; yet there are those, who, trusting in the Lord, and not leaning to their own understanding, are indeed 'steadfast, immovable.' I have a firm hope, that a remnant will be found adhering through all difficulty, to the invincible Rock, against which the very highest authority declares, 'the gates of hell shall not prevail.' But oh, how is the innocent life now trampled upon! how is the mystical body of Christ despised within our pale! Surely if the members are set at nought, so is the Head, and I am persuaded that the true Christ is crucified afresh, and put to open shame, under the very pretence of extolling Him. We have indeed 'the lo, here, and the lo, there' come with power, but concerning which we had need attend to the warning and prohibition, 'go ye not forth to meet them.'

Whether these things will bring to any outward line of separation or not, is yet to be proved. Great want of unity is apparent. We who do not profess to see further than our first Friends did, and who consider that the boast of greater light on Gospel truth, than they were to speak of, is not safe—I say we are styled 'ignorant,' 'prejudiced,' and 'uncharitable.' But is not the straitness in that which thinketh it knoweth any thing, without the Spirit that searcheth all things, even the deep things of God? And is not that out of the true charity, which denies 'Christ within, the hope of glory?' It has been my painful lot from year to year, for many years past, to utter a warning voice in our annual assemblies, and at other times, against the very things that are come upon us; but I was told again and again that I must be mistaken; and recommended to endeavor to look on the bright side of things, &c.; and even now, in effect, the cry is, 'prophecy peace, prophecy smooth things,' or else cease silence.

My dear husband and I, with our dear family of three children, removed to this country in 1818, residing at Bury, in Suffolk, five years, at Chelmsford, in Essex, six years, and since at Stoke Newington, about four miles from London, where we have lived four years; and which is still our home. The motive for leaving Colmeel, in Ireland, was no other than to be found following our dear Master—nor have we taken any fresh steps of the same kind in this land without the same thing in view. It has not been very pleasant to our nature to be thus thrown about, nor to relinquish my husband's prospects in business, yet we must acknowledge to a portion of that peace in making the sacrifice, which is of more value than outward ease, or than all the treasures of this world. Many, very many, have nevertheless been our trials of various kinds. We are now in the last stage of life; still moving about a little in religious service—holding at present a certificate for appointing public meetings in this county and Suffolk. We have never been long at a time without active engagements from a sense of duty, since we last saw thee. Our son takes us from place to place where we feel drawn to have meetings. My dear John and I are much pleased to find thou hast temporal as well as spiritual blessings bestowed upon thee and thine. May He who has been with thee to this day, continue near. May He who has redeemed and delivered thy soul out of all adversity, still prove thy sufficiency, guiding thee in the remaining steps down the bill of life, even by his counsel, and afterwards crown all thy labors and sufferings with ineffable and eternal glory. So farewell, saith

Thy affectionate friend,

SARAH GRUBE."

Speaking of the Yearly Meeting of 1832, in a letter to his children, contained in his Journal Daniel Wheeler says:—"In a striking and awful manner Sarah Grubb adverted to the permitted visitation of the pestilence in this country; and afterwards she had a very close and powerful testimony to the meeting, on the present state of our religious Society, by way of solemn warning of the approaching judgments of the Lord upon us for the neglect of those things, which, in a peculiar manner, were given us to bear in the early times of our Society, when Friends were called out from the world to be a separate people. Her concern was, that we should return to first principles; but her more especial warning was, that if there was not a coming down, from the heights to which many have climbed, there were those amongst us, who might be compared to the golden vessels of the temple, such as had really stood the fire, and had not only been rightly filled, but employed of the Lord to communicate to the people, who would be permitted to be carried away captives to Babylon. That there was and is amongst us, a Babel now building, whose top is intended to reach unto heaven, which must and will come down; and that there is, though not clearly seen by ourselves, a peeling and scattering amongst us, which is clearly shown in the vision and light of the Lord; and that if we did not repent and return, we should be left very few in number; but that the Lord would not leave himself without a people, &c. She spoke further in reference to some, who had been rightly gifted to speak the word of the Lord; but who, for want of dwelling low and deep enough, had had their brightness diminished; adding, when "Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel, but when he offered in Baal, he died."

That was a thoroughly characteristic and sincere reply which a surprised saloon-keeper is reported as making, the other day, to a religious worker who visited him in his place of business, and asked him whether he expected to go to heaven. "To be sure," he replied; "zum time, bimbevy. Vy yud't I?" The intentions and expectations of a large proportion of mankind, concerning the future state, and their individual interests in it, could hardly have been better expressed in the same number of words. Not many people have come to a deliberate conclusion that they are not going to heaven, or that they do not deserve to go there. Some time or other, and in some way which they have not yet fully determined, they suppose that things will come out all right; and meantime they go drifting along, in the opposite direction, in shiftless sin, even when they do not deliberately take backward steps. On and on they follow the downward path, and trust that in the vague future it will take an upward turn. But is that the way in which earthly wisdom, or health, or possessions are won? And is a heavenly and spiritual and eternal possession to be attained more easily than an earthly and material and perishable one?—S. S. Times.

Making Characters.—So many people seem to forget that character grows. That it is not something to be put on, ready made, with manhood and womanhood; but day by day, here a little and there a little, grows with the growth and strengthens with the strength, until, good or bad, it becomes almost a coat of mail. Look at the model man of a business—prompt, reliable, conscientious, cool and cautious, yet clear headed and energetic. When do you suppose he developed all these admirable qualities? When he was a boy. Let me see the way in which a boy of ten gets up in the morning, works, plays, studies, and I will tell you just about what kind of a man he will make. The boy that is late at the breakfast table, late at school, who never quits do anything at the right time, stands a poor chance to be a prompt man. The boy who h washes his face, half does his chores, h learns his lessons, will never make a thorough man. The boy who neglects his duties, they ever so small, and then excuses himself by saying, "O, I forgot! I didn't think!" never be a reliable man. And the boy who finds pleasure in the pain and suffering weaker things, will never be a noble, generous, kindly man; a gentle man.

And what about the girls? A girl who peevish and pettish and careless of the comfort of others, who is untidy in her ways, a thinks it does not matter what she says does at home, or how rude and unbecoming she may be to the loved ones there, is sure grow into such a womanhood as, I am sorry say, we have already too much of; the womanhood that scorns the old-fashioned virtues industry and thrift and skilful handwork, love, and gentleness, and brave self-sacrifice of the charity that thinketh no evil, th seeketh not her own, and that never fails! She will never be a lady in the old Sax meaning of the word, "lady," a loaf girl—Little Corporal.

True peace of mind does not depend, some seem to suppose, on the external indents of riches and poverty, of health and sickness, of friendship and enmities. It has necessary dependance upon society or seclusion; upon dwelling in cities or in the desert upon the possession of temporal power, or condition of temporal insignificance and weakness. "The kingdom of God is within us. Let the heart be right, let it be fully with the will of God, and we shall be entirely content with those circumstances in which Providence has seen fit to place us, however unpropitious they may be in a worldly point of view. who gains the victory over himself, gains the victory over all his enemies.

Some persons think of obedience as if were nothing else, and could be nothing of than servitude. And it must be admit that constrained obedience is so. He who obeys by compulsion, and not freely, wears chain upon his spirit which continually frets and torments, while it confines him. This is not Christian obedience. To obey with the whole heart, in other words, to obey as Christ would have us, is essentially the same as to be perfectly resigned to the will of God; having no will but his. And must have strange notions of the interior a purified life, who supposes that the obedient which revolves constantly and joyfully within the limits of the divine will, partakes the nature of servitude. On the contrary true obedience, that which has its seat in the affections, and which flows out like the gushing of water, may be said, in a very important sense, to possess not only the nature, but the very essence of freedom.—T. C. Upham.

Moving easily in this world generally means going down hill. Getting upward always calls for hard work. That life will be the most pleasant to us is not likely to be the most pleasurable life. And those friends who have helped us most are perhaps the ones who have cost us most. That which brings thought and doubt, and tears, and which necessitates study, and effort, and self-abnegation, is often more of a gain than that which gives unloyed pleasure.

Auricular Confession.—At the Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church, Bishop Evans strongly condemned the efforts now making to introduce this practice, which at the time of the Reformation had been repudiated and cast out. He says:—

"I need spend but little time in speaking of a so-called Scripture argument for auricular confession and priestly absolution. A careful study of each text quoted by its defenders shows that it is only by gross perversion, false interpretation and unfair dealing that any one of them can be forced into the unnatural duty of sustaining such teaching. The uniform testimony of every honest and well-informed interpreter of God's word [the Bible] is, that auricular confession to a priest, as a duty of Christians, with a view to sacerdotal absolution, is nowhere taught in the Scriptures; but, on the contrary, its whole tone and teaching thoroughly condemns it as foreign and derogatory of the work and person of Christ as the one mediator of the new covenant. If the clergy, especially the younger clergy, would study the Bible more, and Pious and Medieval writers less; would take heed to the dicta of the Holy Ghost than the dicta of some self-constituted leaders, they would be more truth and less error; more soundness and less rottenness; more piety and less pietism; more order and less lawlessness; more building up of living stones in the Church's one foundation, and less of 'wood and hay and stubble' that shall be trodden at the last.

To sum up all, I would say that individualism, the confessional destroys personal responsibility, endangers personal purity and vitiates a wrong standard of personal holiness. Socially, the confessional introduces domestic life a grave and blistering evil, which has left its scorchings in many hearts and homes. Politically the confessional is dangerous, as all history tells us, wherever it ascends in the nation. Theologically the confessional is not only not warranted by the Bible, but its whole underlying principles are condemned and rebuked by the Old Testament and the New."

Natural History, Science, &amp;c.

the Lotus and Horned Water-nut.—The Nelumbium speciosum is very common on the lakes of Cashmere, in fact the leaves so numerous that in some places they cover a green carpet, over which numerous water birds, as ducks and moor-hens, run freely to and fro. When in blossom, such as present a beautiful sight. Lilies of various colors peep from amidst the verdant spring, while the queen of them all, the magnificent Lotus, towers above with its stately leaf, and tall and quivering stem, rising under the weight of the exquisite noble tulip-shaped pink and white flowers. The horned water-nut is in many places abundant, and is a source of considerable revenue to the government. It is considered State property, and the nuts are gathered annually and sold to the people. Ground flour and made into bread, it forms a principal article of diet to many. The root of the Lotus is also collected and sold in long dried pieces. When boiled and flavored, it is much esteemed by the inhabitants of the valley.—D. Wakefield.

Terror caused by white-skins.—There must be something in the appearance of white men slightly repulsive to the unsophisticated natives of Africa; for, on entering villages previously unvisited by Europeans, if we met a child coming quietly and unsuspectingly towards us, the moment he raised his eyes and saw the men in "bags," he would take to his heels if we met a live Egyptian mummy at the door of the British Museum. Alarmed by the child's wild outcries, the mother rushes out of her hut, but darts back again at the first glimpse of the same fearful apparition. Dogs turn tail, and scour off in dismay; and hens, abandoning their chickens, fly screaming to the tops of the houses. The so lately peaceful village becomes a scene of confusion and hubbub until calmed by the laughing assurance of our men that white people do not eat black folk; a joke having oftentimes a greater influence in Africa than solemn assertions.

Some of our young swells, on entering an African village, might experience a collapse of self-inflation at the sight of all the pretty girls fleeing from them as from hideous animals, or by witnessing, as we have done, the conversion of themselves into public hobgoblins, the mammas holding naughty children away from them, and saying, "Be good, or I shall call the white man to bite you."—D. Livingston.

Chinese Ceremony.—The Chinese, in the matter of issuing and accepting invitations, are as ceremonious as in all else. A card is usually received by the guests, inviting them to dine for about four o'clock; but Chinese etiquette lays it down that they must wait for three notices before setting out. A second invitation is given later, praying the guests earnestly to come at once; but until the third pressing them to be quick, has been duly received, they are not expected to leave their houses. Sometimes the ceremony is rendered more intricate by the issue of four instead of three notices. The dinner hour is quite unconnected with the hour named in the invitation, and that again has nothing to do with the hour at which the guests are expected.—Gilt's Narrative.

What a Lightning Bolt Did.—The South Bend (Ind.) Tribune says: F. E. Higbee detailed to a Tribune representative the fearful work done by lightning to his residence, on the Chicago road, about six miles from this city. He and his wife and child were sleeping in one bed, and his cousin, Lucy Higbee, in an adjoining room. All were sound asleep when the building was struck. He was awakened by a noise which sounded as if the whole house was falling about him. He jumped from the bed and struck a light, and found more debris than he supposed it was possible to make out of his house and furniture. The clock was thrown from the mantel and lay smashed on the floor; the cook-stove was broken and the bottom knocked one leg broken; the pipes and elbows of the stoves were burst and flattened out of shape and looked as if they had been heated red-hot; Lucy Higbee's bed was badly ricked and splintered; a castor was knocked from the dining-table; the cupboard was broken and the lids torn from all the cans in it, and many of the cans thrown to the floor; a bottle of bluing was broken and the liquid thrown on the walls; the carpet was torn up and little shreds of it scattered all over the house; in short there was scarcely an article of furniture in the rooms that was not misplaced or damaged. Bricks from the chimney were scattered about, mixed with plastering from the walls, and the laths of the ceiling were partly forced from their places and hanging down into the room. The sashes of the north windows were broken and parts of them and the glass found several rods away from the house. F. E. Higbee says it is evident the lightning entered the house through the chimney, and then scattered in a score of different directions. It filled the house with a sulphurous smoke that was so suffocating that the inmates of the house had to get out doors as soon as possible. There were not a dozen whole bricks of the chimney left, and some of the bats were thrown a distance of five or six rods. One of the bricks struck him on the knee, and this was the most serious damage done to any of the inmates, although all of them were slightly shocked. The wonder is that they were not killed outright. One peculiar feature about the occurrence is that every piece of steel and iron about the house is magnetized. He first discovered it while using his knife to drive some glazier's points in the window sash. He then tried the knives and forks, scissors, a bayonet, his wife's corset steels, and found that all were heavily charged.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 5, 1880.

We insert in our present number the greater part of a valuable article, on the Ministry, taken from the British Friend. It contains much that may be read to profit, by other Friends than those residing in Great Britain, to whose condition it may be supposed principally to refer. We believe the article, when speaking of the decline in spiritual power and life in the ministry, is correct in regarding as one cause of this, the practice of speaking in Mission Meetings with no higher authority than a feeling of "Christian interest for the welfare of those assembled." It is one of the tendencies of the Bible Schools, Mission Meetings, and other philanthropic agencies of the kind, to train up a set of preachers, who stand on no higher platform than most of the ministers of other denominations, who prepare themselves to speak at stated times. The dependence of these is largely placed on their familiarity with the language of Scripture, and on that facility of expressing their thoughts which results from frequent practice. Their ability to speak does not stand in the pure openings of the Spirit of Christ on their hearts. That such would be one of the effects of systematic Scripture training, as latterly introduced, was long ago foreseen. Some, who had at heart departed from the true foundation of our principles, advocated these agencies as a means of training up preachers for the Society; recommending that the young people should first be employed as teachers in the First-Day Schools, and there be made familiar with the Scriptures, and with explaining their meaning to others; and then sent out into the more public Mission Meetings and other outside work, where their powers might be further developed; and thus finally they might be prepared for preachers in the meetings of Friends. When ministers are introduced into our meetings who are trained on such a principle, is it any marvel that the degeneracy, complained of by the writer of the article we are considering, should exist?

By the recent elections in England, the Beaconsfield administration has been overthrown, and the reins of government placed in the hands of others who it is confidently believed will conduct it more in accordance with true Christian principles. This event has given great satisfaction to many in this country, who have viewed with sad forebodings for our English brethren, the unjust and aggressive wars which have lately been waged by the British Government in Africa and India; and who have been reminded of the prophetic declaration, "vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord."

Friends in England have taken an unusually active part in the election contest—probably impelled thereto by a sense of the very important interests at stake. One of the results of this has been the election of eleven members of the Society of Friends to Parliament, and of as many more who have been members or are in some way connected with it. This is a remarkable circumstance, considering the very small percentage of the whole population who belong to Friends, and shows that their members possess an influence far beyond that due to numbers alone. But the public favor thus shown to our people carries a snare with it; and its tendency is to draw away from that humility without which there is no spiritual safety. It is often the case with those who are put into responsible positions, that they are set "in slippery places," and this remark applies to collected bodies as well as to individuals. We are pleased therefore to notice in The London Friend a caution extended to its readers, as to the danger of having their attention too much turned to a dependence on outward means for effecting good results. In the editorial alluded to it says:—

"No part of the heritage of truth specially grasped by Friends has been more precious, or more fruitful in its power over character, than their appreciation of the essentially inward and spiritual nature of the Kingdom of Christ. No other tribe in the Christian Commonwealth has more entirely realized the truth of Christ's words, that 'the kingdom of Heaven cometh not with observation.' The seat of that kingdom is deep down in the hearts of its citizens. Its growth there is oftentimes slow though powerful. The growth of the kingdom of Christ in the world, for which the Church ever prays, is mainly dependent on its growth in the number of hearts that have accepted its rule. Now it would be a grave, perhaps an irreparable error, if the drift of thought in the Society of Friends were too strongly to set in the direction of admiration for that which is external and palpable, and away from that which is internal and spiritual."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In 1820, the anthracite coal trade amounted to 365 tons—this has steadily increased until in 1877 the output was over 25,000,000 tons. The Wyoming district is said to lead, although the deposit in the Schuylkill coal field is thought to be somewhat greater. The amount of anthracite coal in Pennsylvania is estimated at 8,246,858,666 tons. Seventy per cent. of the Schuylkill coal field, and 32 per cent. in the middle coal field, belong to the Philadelphia and Reading Coal and Iron Company. The amount of coal mined in the United States is a little more than that of Germany, and less than half that of Great Britain.

While the British ship, Sapphire, was discharging a cargo of pig-iron at Reed St. wharf, on the 29th ult., a barrel of coal oil, which was stored in the carpenter shop, exploded, resulting in the death of four of the crew, and a fifth very seriously injured. The cause of the explosion is not known.

It is stated that over three million feet of lumber and a vast amount of valuable timber land have been destroyed, in Pike county in this State, by forest fires, within the last few weeks.

The sales of public lands to homestead settlers, during the past fiscal year, have been greatly in excess of former years.

There was a white frost in Montreal on the night of the 28th ult., which did some damage to vegetation.

The town of Saxon, in Texas, was destroyed by a cyclone on the 28th ult.,—only five houses escaping damage. Nine persons were killed, and sixty injured, some of them fatally.

The first new wheat of the season, received at St. Louis, was from Texas, on the 29th. It sold at auction for $1.02 per bushel.

At a recent meeting of the Amalgamated Iron and Steel workers in Pittsburg, it was resolved to demand $5.00 per ton for puddling. The manufacturers refused the demand, and it is expected the mills in that district will soon close. This strike will throw about 50,000 men out of employment in the Pittsburgh district alone.

Owing to sickness among the students of Princeton College, the authorities have decided to close the school, until a few days before the commencement, which occurs on the 23d of the month.

According to a record kept at the U. S. Signal Service office in this city, the average temperature for the past month was 68.8 degrees. This is 5.8 degrees above the average for the last five years. The highest temperature recorded was 96 degrees—in other localities it was two to three degrees higher. It is said the temperature has not been so great, in the corresponding month, for twenty-seven years. The lowest temperature was 32 degrees, on the 1st. Total rainfall, 54 inches. Number of days on which rain fell 6. Number of clear days 15. Prevailing direction of wind, south-west. Maximum velocity 34 miles per hour.

The wet weather during the last week, seems to have been most severe in New England and the Middle States. At Wilmington, Del., the thermometer registered on the 27th, as high as 100 deg. in the shade; and at Newton, N. J., 103; at Great Neck, L. I., 100 deg. A freight train, at Long Branch, had to be abandoned on account of the prostration of the train hands. During the day there were 32 cases of stroke and 6 deaths in New York city and Brooklyn.

The mortality in Philadelphia during the past week was 306. Of this number 63 were under one year of age.

Markets. 6c.—U. S. sixes, 1881, 100; do. 5's, 103; 4's, 102; 4's, 107, 109.

Dried is very quiet in all departments, and prices of general merchandise are rather weak.

Cotton remains about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 12 to 12½ cts. per pound for options in New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and standard white, 7½ cts. for export, and 7½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour is dull and weak. Sales of 1400 bins, including Minnesota extras, at $5.25 a $6; Penna. family at $4.75 a $5.30; western do., at $5.25 a $6.25, and patent at $6.40 a $8. Rye-flour is steady at $4.92 a $4.75. Grain.—Wheat is unsettled and very irregular,—sales of 25,000 bushels—red at $1.40 a $1.45; amber at $1.42 a $1.45. Rye sold slowly at 90 a 91 cts. for Pennsylvania. Corn is in fair request and firm; sales of 2000 bushels, including yellow at $1.45 a 56 cts. mixed at $1.45 a 55 cts., and steamer at $1.45 cts. Oats dull and weak; Sales of 5000 bushels, including mixed, at 39 a 40 cts., and white at 41½ a 45 cts.

Beef cattle were dull and prices were a fraction lower; 3000 head sold at the different yards at from 3 a 5½ cts. per lb. as to quality.

Sheep were dull and lower; 10,000 head sold at the different yards at 3½ a 6 cts. per lb. Lambs were also lower; sales were 4 a 7½ cts. per lb.

Hogs were 1c. per pound lower; 4500 head sold at the different yards at from 6 a 6½ cts. per lb.

Wool.—The trade has come to a halt, the manufacturers showing no inclination to operate, and it is thought this state of affairs is likely to continue some time. Sales are reported of Ohio, fine, at 47 Ohio ½ 51 cts.; do. ½ blood, 54 cts.; do. medium cts.; unwashed Ohio and Penna. at 32 a 35 cts.

FOREIGN.—Correspondents state that no better time has been experienced in Ireland for many a year than now. The crop is healthy and well advanced. An unusual amount of potatoes, which crop well, and it is hoped the crop will be sound plentiful.

In the House of Commons on the 31st ult., W. Forster stated that he believed the measures which had been taken for the relief of Irish distress were sufficient but that he intended to introduce a bill to provide further from the surplus of the church fund.

Colonel Gordon, in speaking of the resuscitation the slave trade in Central Equatorial Africa, says: "It is time we should cease to accept the evasions and excuses of the Egyptian authorities. The slave trade never be put down by the voluntary action of Egypt under its present ruler."

The Calcutta correspondent of the Times says: "Many preparations against the Rumpia rebellion are pressing, and there is now every possibility of no tedious campaign in that fever-stricken district."

Switzerland.—A committee of the National Assembly seems clearing up. The great labor strikes in Provinces are ended. The Communist demonstrations have been abandoned by all but a handful of fanatics and the attack in the Chamber of Deputies on the 16th of Police minister only 31 votes.

Switzerland.—A committee of the National Council after discussing the effect of the expected expulsion the Jesuits from France, have requested the Concil take measures to prevent their establishing themselves on Swiss territory.

A difficulty has been met with in the construction of the Gotthard Tunnel which threatens seriously to retard its completion. In part of it the formation of porous white stone, and here it has required great care to prevent the passage from completely collapsing. A granite wall six feet thick has just been finished with a belief it would support the superincumbent mass of the walls as they are being raised, and the engineers are at a loss how to overcome the difficulty.

Turkey.—The newspapers have been instructed to oppose the mission of the British Special Ambassador and speak of a religious war and wholesale massacre of Christians as likely to follow any attempt at coercion. The British Government has been asked to sympathize with the mission of the ambassador.

WANTED

A Friend and his wife, to take charge of the Farm, Tunnessassa, and to have the general superintending of the school and family at that place.

Application may be made to Samuel Morris, Olney P. O., Philadelphia. Joseph L. Bailey, Pine Iron Works, Berks Co., Joseph S. Elkinton, 325 Pine St., Philadelphia.

DIED, Twelfth month 26th, 1879, at her residence, Montrose, Pa., FRANCES M. DEINKER, widow of late Henry Deinker, in the 68th year of her age.

She was buried at the morning Meeting of Friends in Wilmington, Del. Though long isolated from friends, she was warmly attached to the views of religious Society.

—, in the township of Ullyses, Tompkins Co., N. York, on the 24th of 2nd mo. 1880, EARLE HALLGREN, in the 73rd year of his age, a member of the Meeting of Friends. He evinced an earnest desire to be ready at the Master's call; and we do not but have rested into everlasting rest.

—, at her residence in New Garden, Chester Co., Pa., 2nd mo. 7th, 1880, MARY H., wife of Daniel Thompson, in the 75th year of her age, an esteemed member and elder of New Garden Monthly Meet. She was faithful and diligent in the performance of duties, and was concerned for her friends that they should prepare for death while in health, and to treat them not to defer to a dying hour, the great work of the soul's salvation; she had felt the necessity of preparing for herself as well as for others; and though her sickness was short, it did not find her unprepared. She felt nothing in her way; and when the summons came, she was found with her "lamp trimmed and burning," and prepared, through releasing love, to be admitted into the mansions of eternal rest.

For "The Friend."

few extracts from letters of a dear young man who deceased not very long ago. She one who was found living daily in the love of the Lord, and when the "midnight" was heard, was prepared we humbly believe, to enter into the joy of her Lord, and Heavenly Master's rest.

Blessed are the dead who have died in the Lord, they do rest from their labors and their works do follow them." Blessed, also, are the living who live in the Lord. Ah! there are many young people still left, whose daily concern is to be found living in the Lord's most precious love; may all such as these be helped on their way, and be made, in the Lord, helpers to others. Remember, my precious young friends, "The work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness, quietness and assurance forever."

11th mo. 28th, 1854. "Through this life is full of trials and difficulties, still how many, my dear friends, blessings we enjoy. He whose passionate mercy faileth not, is daily seen to shower down numberless blessings upon us; and though in our path we find many trials, I believe even these are sent in mercy, to cleanse us from this world, and to teach us that our earth is not our abiding place, nor 'the inheritance'; the time is fast approaching when we shall all be gathered to our final resting place, and each one will have to render up a strict account for themselves. My desire is that I may so live that when my summons comes, if at midnight, at cock-crow, or at noonday, I may be found among the many number who have bowed their necks under the yoke of Christ: and having taken up our cross, are prepared to wear an un fading crown of glory.

10th mo. I suppose Enos Thomas will be married to the silent grave; another warning to us to prepare to meet our Lord, seeing we know not when the call may be extended."

12th mo. 27th, 1854. "It does seem this morning, dear friend, that I hear the 'still small voice,' entreating me to 'come taste and see that the Lord is good,' and I do not think I ever felt a greater desire to live aright, and a willingness to yield my heart wholly unto Him whose compassionate mercy faileth not, and who, I know, is able to command and support all those who put their trust in Him. Yes, dear friend, my fervent desire is that I may so live, that should it please my Heavenly Father to prolong my life, I may be a helper in his church, or should He see meet to call me home in the morning of my day, I may have the blessed assurance of a glorious immortality."

5th mo. 1855. "Heard yesterday of the death of one of your children—no doubt it is a trial to you all; but He who knows what is best for us, hath done it, and we can only say, 'Thy will be done.' It is good for us to have trials to bear, good for us all to be afflicted; and oh! what necessity there is for each one of us to set our houses in order, trim our lamps, and keep them burning. * * * I do crave, dear friend, to be of the happy number, whose work keeps pace with the day; dwelling continually in the love and fear of Him, 'whose ways are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts; looking unto Him as my only hope and helper; and I think I can say, I have not sought his face in vain, but oftentimes experience his divine hand upon me; for these, and his many mercies, I desire to render thanks, and crave a continuation of them for by Him alone we can be saved; with Him is everlasting joy; without Him there is no peace."

1st mo. 1856. A dear speaking of "renewed desires to tread the path that alone will conduct me to a happy and peaceful conclusion," she says: "Every day the relentless hand of death is reminding us, that we have no continuing city here, and youth is in no ways exempt from the stroke. My feelings are oftentimes awakened to the sense of my own unfaithfulness, and I often query with myself, 'Am I prepared to go?' I do desire to bow my neck to his yoke, and yield to the purifying operations of grace on my heart, that when my call shall come, whether suddenly or otherwise, I may with faith in my Redeemer look with an eye of confidence beyond the things of time, and hope for a glorious admittance into the realms of eternal happiness, where I hope to be made participant in the joys unknown to mortals."

11th mo. 1856. * * * "Time in its rapid course has brought many changes; death has severed the links of affection that bound us to a darling little babe committed to our care for a short time, and also taken away two affectionate cousins; we have watched beside the sick, and we thought dying-bed of a dear sister, and were at one time made willing, I trust, to adopt the language, 'If this cup pass not from me, except I drink it, Thy will not mine be done;'" but through the adorable mercy of Him to whom belongs all power, she hath been restored.

Truly, dear friend, there is cause of thankfulness even in these afflictions, that the way hath been made clear, and the outstretched arm of the Most High hath been underneath to support each one through the dark valley of the shadow of death. Oh! the necessity there is for every soul to draw near unto Him who alone is able to save, and make us wise unto salvation; it shows us that the way of holiness is the alone sure way of safety, for even infancy and youth are not exempt from death, we cannot secure unto ourselves one day, and oh! the awfulness of leaving an acquaintance with God for a sick bed; but the blessedness of that condition wherein we could adopt the language of dear cousin D, 'If I die I go happy, I know I will.' I trust these things may not be forgotten, but be stamped on our minds indelibly, and be the means of weaning us from this world, and drawing us nearer unto our holy Head, who can do all things whatsoever we ask; as our entire faith is in Him, and a willingness on our part to serve Him with a perfect heart and a willing mind, hard things will be made easy, and bitter things sweet; and when the awful messenger of death shall approach, there will be a blessed assurance granted of rest beyond the grave—even a glorious immortality in the regions of eternal joy, where there is no more sorrow or sighing, neither sickness nor pain, but joy and gladness that mortal knows not of;—for eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive the good things that God hath in store for them that love Him; * * * "May I and purify until I am made clean in his holy eyesight, and prepared for a glorious immortality."

7th mo. 1857. * * * "Poor creature as I am I feel that I can acknowledge to the tendering visitations of my Heavenly Father's love to my poor soul, and in sincerity I crave that he would continue to visit and re-visit me till all is brought into a conformity to his will, that so my whole heart may be given up unreservedly to serving Him; then whether many days or few be allotted me on earth, all will be well. Such are my desires for myself and for many others, that we may all choose the Lord for our portion; for my young companions and friends I feel this and should rejoice could we all bow together at the Heavenly footstool, and feel every one for ourselves the blessedness of the people of God than to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season." Then there would be no dread of death. No! None could fear to die, for having done his will on earth, they could hope for rest in Heaven."

10th mo. 1857. * * * "I was disappointed I could not attend our last Monthly Meeting —was glad to hear you had a good one. What a blessing a good meeting is! think of latter times I more fully know the value of it, though have often to regret my weakness in not firmly enough resisting the adversary when he presents himself and draws my mind away from heavenly contemplations. * * * it is not in us to resist his entreaties ourselves, it is only as we receive strength from our Heavenly Father that we can soar above him: He it is who helps when all else fails. * * * Not that I would exalt the creature, dear friend, but I feel I can acknowledge to the tender dealings of the Saviour, * * * through the unmerited mercy of a crucified and risen Lord. * * * The removal by death of many of the pillars of our church of latter time, has, I humbly hope, a tendency to increase my desire after good things; that there may be a succession raised up to plead the Master's cause. Truly, dear friend, I desire to grow in grace, that should my life be lengthened out, I may be made a fruit-bearing branch in the Lord's vineyard—or should the work be cut short, may it be in righteousness.

No date. "Very often of latter time, I have been made to dwell on the uncertainty of life, and the certainty of death, and how necessary it is for every one to live in a state of preparation should it please Him whose ways are inscrutable, to send his messenger at an unlooked for hour, that so we may be found with our lamps trimmed and burning. The ways of Providence are mysterious, and we can only submit to what He directs. * * * No one can commence the work of the soul's salvation too early in life; how often do we see the truth verified, 'the young may die.' Then happy they who have submitted to the spirit of truth, and have become redeemed from the world, and live in accordance with what their Great Master may require at their hands. There is but the one way to the kingdom, even the 'strait and narrow way,' and in it we must walk if we become children of the Most High, and heirs of his kingdom—though it leads to the foot of the cross, it is a safe way. * * * may I early learn to bow my neck to his yoke, take up my cross and follow Him the great 'I AM,' then when the hour of dissolution arrives, death can bring to me no fears."

In the early death of this dear young friend, how strikingly was illustrated the Scripture declaration: "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

The Locusts.

For "The Friend"

It is well known that the Locusts in their periodical return do not visit all parts of the country at the same time, and that they make their appearance in the same district but once in a term of seventeen years; hence, those who were children too young to recollect much concerning them at the time of their appearance seventeen years ago, are now nearly grown to the age of maturity, and may desire to know some details of previous observation as a starting point for their investigations at the present time, and perhaps, a more correct description.

Early in the spring preceding their appearance they may be found, from six to eight inches below the surface of the earth, in the form of a large pale-yellow bug. They become more numerous as the season advances, until about the 20th of Fifth month they begin to appear above the surface, each leaving an opening in the ground about three-eighths of an inch in diameter, and immediately commence climbing up on trees, fences, or anything else within their reach; and after elevating themselves sufficiently as instinct inclines them, they commence opening lengthwise on the back, and soon the real Locust crawls out of its yellow casing, as white and as tender, apparently, as a lump of milk-curd. The wings at this time are in folds, each forming a narrow pointed strip; but in the course of ten or fifteen minutes they open out beautifully transparent, and as fine in appearance as the most delicate texture of paper. They generally cling closely to their bursted shell till they gain sufficient strength to crawl from it, and as the minutes pass on their color gradually changes to a dark brown, and in a few hours they are able to fly. Close observation justifies the belief that they always come up in the night. This conclusion is come to from the fact of never having actually seen one break through the surface; but in the twilight of the morning some may be found but a few inches from the aperture which they had evidently left but a short time before, while others had been out long enough to crawl up a short distance, and others to greater heights, and so on.

In accordance with my observation, there appears to be two distinct classes of them, male and female of each class. The females of neither class make any noise. The males commence singing about the third day after their appearance above ground; but each class sings its own peculiar song, having but little resemblance to each other. There is also a difference in the size and color of the two classes. The larger ones are brown, as before stated, and make a noise resembling the word "Pharo," while the smaller ones are black, and make a sharp shrill noise similar to that of a grasshopper, or katy did, except louder and more extended.*

There is still another trait in the smaller ones peculiar to themselves; their shrill notes are but seldom heard in the forepart of the day, but commence soon after noon, and continue till night; while the larger ones are heard at all times in each day while they live.

The males of both classes have small bellows or air-valves at the waist, under their wings, somewhat resembling in size and appearance, one half of a small pea; and while they are in the act of singing, those valves vibrate, or quake, similar to the agitated rattles of a snake. The females have no valves, but have perforators, which the males are destitute of. Their perforators are about three-eighths of an inch in length, and with these they deposit their eggs in the tender branches of the trees by inserting them their full length in such a number of places, so closely connected, that many branches are perforated to the heart almost from end to end.

This work of depositing the egg for the perpetuation of the species, appears to be the whole object of their active existence; for when this is done, a few more days of aged, bodily infirmity closes their career of only about twenty-six days; during which time there is no appearance of their partaking of food of any kind.

In this singular place of deposit the eggs remain for a period of about seventy days, when they disappear and return to the earth from whence they came, there to remain invisible through a process unknown for another long term of seventeen years.

The periodical appearance of this mysterious portion of creation introduces to the mind

* This latter class are not so apparent at this time as in former times.

a channel of serious thoughtfulness, and most solemn associations. The query forcibly arises again hearing their mournful song, "Who now are those dear ones with whom we mingled when last before we heard the same?" Or those little prattlers who then composed our social family band—where are they? How performing the duties required of them in accordance with their parents' wishes, that their Heavenly Father's will?" "The daged parent, perhaps,—and counsellor—truly affectionate companion and bosom friend—or other near relatives and friends, who when sharing with us the enjoyment of life where are they? perhaps long ago removed from our sight to be seen of men no more while we still remain as monuments of unmerited mercy; and long before the term expires our heads may be lying as lifeless as theirs."

These are solemn reflections, and only a few of the many intimately associated with the return of those numerous little visitors. What a lesson of instruction may daily be drawn from their earnest devotedness and active perseverance in accomplishing the work designed for them to do in the very brief span of time allotted to them! They do not stop till to-morrow what can be done to-day, but industriously pursue their round of duty moving from place to place, and repeating their mournful song as though conscious of the shortness of their time, and that their long night was approaching wherein they could not work.

How prone is thoughtless, procrastinating to do otherwise; like the short-lived Locust, he comes from the earth, and unto the earth he soon returns; but is he as faithful to the design of his existence by performing the great work required of him, while time and opportunity is afforded? Man come into the world a more helpless creature instinctively clinging to that which affords him support; wholly dependent on the hand that provides for him. Did he through faithful obedience to his great Creator, only retain the innocence and simplicity of this dependent state in the strength of manhood, experiencing it to influence all his movements, to govern all his actions through life, how much more a parallel case in accordance with the design of his creation, and how great his peace in the end!

Brands Plucked from the Fire.—A plain countryman who had been effectually called by divine grace, by means of a sermon from Zeck. iii. 2, was some time after solicited by an old companion to accompany him to a male house; but the good man strongly resisted every persuasion, saying, "I am a brand plucked from the fire." His old companion not understanding this, he explained it to him thus: "Look ye," said he; "there is a great difference between a brand and a green stick. If a spark flies upon a brand that has been partly burnt, it will soon catch fire again; but it is not so with a green stick. I tell you, I am that brand plucked out of the fire, and dare not venture in the way of temptation for fear of being set on fire again."

If rich, be not too joyful in having; if solicitous in keeping; too anxious in increasing; nor too sorrowful in losing.

Shepherd's Voice, and the Hindrances to our Hearing it.

BY HORATIUS BONAR.

ere, amid the sounds of earth, many things go in to intercept or to drown this voice; even the sheep often cease to hear it, or it only as an indistinct, uncertain sound; we allow these interruptions; we suffer voices of the world to deaden the heavenly; we tolerate, or, perhaps, at times, wish, the things which render us "dull of hearing," insensible to the blessed sounds.

The cares of this world, the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things," all go to drown the Shepherd's voice. Business, pleasure, politics, literature, worldly concerns, and idle vanities, all tend to this newspaper, the novel, the fascinating me, tend to this. The excessive love of the eagerness to keep abreast with the news and speculations of the day, and even pursuit of science, tend to this. Domestic duties, public duties, idle amusements, excessive or unwise recreations and self-indulgences, tend to this. The "itebing car," the change and novelty, the whirl of society, the incessant motion by which every eye is more or less affected in this age of railways and telegraphs, the restlessness of men things around us, tend to this. It is not to hear the Shepherd's voice in the midst of this bustle and turmoil, these snares and actions. Oh, how careful should the sheep be to watch against all these disadvantages, difficulties, lawful or unlawful as they be. If they intercept the gracious voice, is enough for us. They must be shunned. Nothing must be allowed to come between sheep and the Shepherd, or blunt the influence of his voice. Even when the things lawful and harmless in themselves, the attention requires always to be considered, do they affect our hearing of the Shepherd's voice? Yes; and even in Christian things, this ought more to be weighed than in any other. I may be allowed to say, and I do say it unanalysed, that work for Christ times comes between us and Christ. Worldly things are not the only kind of bustle that intercepts the voice; religious bustle does the same. It is in solitude that this voice sounds sweetest, sweetest, fullest; and though He calls us to work, and to abound in work, yet must keep in mind the danger to which excessive work (without interval of solitude) exposes us. The political platform is not the best for hearing that voice; but sometimes religious platform proves no less a snare. A crowded meeting, the eloquent speech, the fervent appeal, the hearty music, are very valuable, but they are not without their dangers. The Shepherd's voice may perchance strike in the excitement of human feeling, but "out of hearing" of that voice is fatal; or following Him; but even when we keep close in hearing, we must be on our guard, lest the confusion and mixture of other sounds and one dear voice should lose all its power and sweetness. For there is but one voice that we need to hear, and to hear continually. Whatever, then, dulls that voice, or weakens its influence, is injury, with which we must not trifle.

Remember one, a classical scholar, who, when he first turned his back upon the world, left aside his classics, lest they should intercept his hearing of the Shepherd's voice.

It may be that he went too far; but his feeling was a true and healthy one. Everything must give way to spiritual progress.

I have heard of another, a musician, who, in similar circumstances, did the same with music. He could not trust himself to go on as he had done. His spiritual welfare was at stake. Music was not Christ; and he had too long treated it as if it had been so. He had delighted in it; he had lived in it and upon it. But a voice sweeter than all earthly sweetness had now reached his ear; and everything must be surrendered to that.

There was a congregation in which music was cultivated to the utmost. The ear was gratified every Sunday with singing of the most perfect kind. Worldly men dropped in to hear the musical "treat" prepared in the name of worship, and I went away in raptures. But as these dropped in the "odily" dropped out. They could no longer hear the Shepherd's voice. It was drowned in human melody.

The Shepherd's voice! In this day of discord, this age of Babel-sounds, this time of worldly enlightenment, and breath of thought and endless variety of speech; how needful that we should be recalled to the one sound that alone can revive the Church of God and lift us out of our low and second-rate Christianity. Spasmodic efforts, great organizations, eloquent orators, large societies, will not lift us up. They will only galvanize and produce a hollow religion. Culture, poetry, literature, song, sensation, will not supply the lack of the Holy Spirit, or make up for the want of the Shepherd's voice.

Let us listen to that voice, and the true revival comes. For that voice awakes the sleeper and raises the dead. Let us allow nothing of earth or of self, or of the flesh, or of man, to come between us and that voice. Is not this the Church's great sin, and the cause of declension among us, that she is listening to other voices, and is led captive by other sounds? The one voice that contains life is left unheard!—Word and Work.

For "The Friend."

"I will not let thee go unless thou bless me."

The following memorandum was found in the pocket book of a Friend in England, after her decease, which occurred about a year subsequent to the date attached to it, at the advanced age of 82. Her niece (from whom it was received) states, that she was a "sincere disciple," and that the year preceding her death "was marked by ripening fruits of faith, hope and love."

There is something instructive in the lively concern manifested by this aged Friend to be kept under the preserving care of her Heavenly Father, and in the sweet sense of his love and goodness which was given in answer to her prayers. The impressions on the senses of feeling and sight, of which she speaks, at the moment of awaking from sleep and of returning consciousness, have no especial significance, except as connected with a sense of Divine favor which rested on her spirit and confirmed her faith. The memorandum is as follows:

"12th mo. 30th, 1873.

On Third-day night my mind was brought into much thoughtfulness in prayer to my Heavenly Father, that He would be pleased to give me some evidence of his tender watchfulness over me, as lately at times my spirits have been rather depressed, so that it was late ere I could settle to sleep without a deep earnest wrestling for help, and for an evidence that the Lord would not leave me nor forsake me, feeling I could say, 'O Lord, I will not let thee go unless thou bless me!' After which I had some sweet sleep for hours, and from which I partly awoke with a sense of feeling a gentle pressure of a hand on my right shoulder, which roused me from my sleep, when I clearly seemed to see it, and beautifully white it was; and also the appearance of the Lord my Saviour standing close beside me, shining in his most glorious brightness. The vision, if I may so express it, was only permitted me to be as a transient view, which too soon passed away, for it was magnificently beautiful and glorious, which my eyes feasted upon while it lasted, with intense admiration; and on quite waking up, my mind was filled with thankfulness and praise, in the full assurance that my prayer had been received. Oh! what can I render unto the Lord for all his manifold gifts and tender mercies unto me from time to time, in answer to my prayers in my times of need? And now at the close of the year of 1873, I can thankfully acknowledge 'the Lord has been my help and my shield.'

"And now, as time passes on to the end of my days, I trust when they be no longer, that I may be permitted an entrance into his heavenly kingdom, there to join the spirits of those of my dear relatives, who are now safely at rest, I cannot doubt; and also of more recent date, as well as the sweet spirit of my dear husband, who died on the 23rd of 12th mo. 1860, sweetly sensible of his approaching end, expressing to every nearest, 'I am going home.'"

A Bible in a Hotel.

A small party of friends, gathered about a cosy tea-table, were discussing the propriety of the Bible Society placing copies of the Holy Scriptures in railroad cars, steamers, hotels, and other places of public resort. One or two of this party raised the objection to the practice, that in such public places the Bible often received rude and careless treatment at the hands of irreverent and irreligious persons. After all the rest had expressed an opinion, a woman, the sweet graces of whose Christian character gave her a wide-reaching influence in the village, related this touching incident of personal experience:

It seems that two or three years after her conversion and union with the Church, troubles came upon her and her family. Instead of bearing her trials with patience and submission, she lost faith in the goodness of God, in his ever-watchful care, doubted the genuineness of her conversion, ceased to pray, to read her Bible, or to even think of seeking divine guidance. While in this pitiable state, circumstances made it imperative for her to visit the city of New York on a very painful matter of business. She was of a retiring disposition, unused to travelling, and had never been in a large city. While on her journey, in the cars, a slight act of courtesy led her to make the acquaintance of a gentleman and his wife, who took her under their protection, and after their arrival in the city, went out of the way to leave her at the entrance of a respectable hotel.

She ascended the stairs oppressed with an almost overwhelming sense of loneliness, mingled with the consciousness of an utter inability to perform the unpleasant errand she had in hand. On being ushered into the capacious and elegantly-furnished parlors she walked mechanically to a center-table, and opening the single book which lay on the marble top, her eye fell upon these words, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." An emotion of tenderness suddenly stole into her heart. Still bending over the precious book, she gathered tears beginning to dim her eyes, she read further on—"Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." The comfort which these passages of Scripture brought to her it was impossible to describe. The black clouds of unbelief and doubt rolled away. The glorious sunlight of divine love and protection shone in upon her soul. She was no longer alone; and this assurance came to her heart like a balm and a blessing. Her perturbed and distracted mind was at rest now, and by the gone joy, peace, and trust sat again upon the throne of her heart, and held more potent, loving sway than ever. "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and forever!" she kept saying to herself over and over again.

Quieted and perfectly self-poised now, she gave her orders with the assurance of an experienced traveller. She ate a hearty supper, went to her room, and in time to her bed, with as great a sense of security as if she had been in her own house. She slept peacefully, and awoke at her usual time in the morning thoroughly refreshed. Unexpected facilities for transacting her trying business opened up on all sides. She was uniformly treated with respect. Her questions were promptly answered. She was marvellously aided in her quest, and her mission proved successful.

Had it not been for that copy of the Bible, found so opportunely in her pathway, she was sure she would have taken the next return train to her distant home without making an effort even toward the accomplishment of her mission. The Bible in the hotel was in the right place.—American Messenger.

HYMN TO THE SEASONS.

Selected.

When Spring unlocks the flowers, to paint the laughing soil;
When Summer's balmy showers refresh the mower's toil;
When Winter binds in frosty chains the fallow and the flood,
In God the earth rejoiceth still, and owns his Maker good.

The birds that wake the morning, and those that love the shade;
The winds that sweep the mountain, or lull the drowsy glade;
The sun that from his amber bowler rejoiceth on his way,
The moon, and stars, their Maker's name in silent pomp display.

Shall man, the lord of nature, expectant of the sky,—
Shall man alone unthankful, his little praise deny?
No;—let the year forsake his course, the seasons cease to be,
Thee, Master, must we always love; and, Saviour, honor Thee.

The flowers of Spring may wither,—the hope of Summer fade,—
The Autumn droop in Winter,—the birds forsake the shade,—
The wind be lulled,—the sun and moon forget their old decree,—
But we, in nature's latest hour, O Lord! will cling to Thee.

—Bishop Heber.

A ROYAL SERVICE.

Selected.

DEDICATED TO "THE WAITING ONES" IN THE KINGDOM AND PATIENCE OF JESUS CHRIST.

Among the Master's callings of high honor,
One oftentimes we miss,
Because our hearts, in their impatient yearning,
Fail to perceive its bliss;

Fail to perceive the grandeur of its service,
The deep, sweet joy it brings,
And deem some other easier or nobler,
With richer harvestings.

And so we may not choose, but Christ appoints us
The work of sitting still,
And saith, "My child, in quietness and patience
This service now fulfil."

"Since all these hours of weariness and waiting
Are precious unto me,
Each one must needs be freighted with some blessing,
Love's perfect choice for me."

Then think not of that art kept within the shadow
Of long inactive years,
Without some purpose infinitely glorious,
Some harvest sown in tears.

And so there comes a glory and a gladness
Into the weary days,
And in our hearts there shines a solemn radiance,
Inwrought with quiet praise.

We learn that we are given this sweet service
Because the Master sees
That thus his delegates must oft be fitted
For higher embassies.

We praise Him for these lonely hours of waiting,
And, trusting, look above,
Till all the hush and silence of their service
Grows luminous with love.

We muse upon that ministry at Nazareth,
Until it seems to be
A fellowship most sweet, a royal honor,
To wait, O Christ, with Thee.

And ever as we stand within the shadow
Of those long years of thine,
Our waiting days grow better, hollier, grander,
Their service more sublime;

Until at last we hear Thy dear voice saying,
"Child, I have need of thee
To fill this vacant place of trust and honor,
To do this work for Me."

And then, as fellow-workers with the Master,
We shall arise and go
Forth to the harvest-fields of earth, it may be,
The reaper's joy to know;

Or to some perfect, wondrous service yonder,
Within that Holy Place,
Where, veiled, in its full transfigured glory,
His servants see his face.

SOWING.

Selected.

Every one is sowing, both by word and deed;
All mankind are growing, either wheat or weed;
Thoughtless ones are throwing any sort of seed.

Serious ones are seeking seed already sown;
Many eyes are weeping, now the crop is grown;
Think upon the reaping—each one reaps his own.

Surely as the sowing shall the harvest be—
See what you are throwing over hill or lea,
Words and deeds are growing for eternity.

There is One all-knowing, looking on always,
Fruit to him is flowing, feeling for the day—
Will your heart be glowing in the grand array?

Ye that would be bringing sheaves of golden grain
Mind what you are bringing, both from hand and brain,
Then 'mid glad songs singing, you shall glean great gain.

The Ponca Investigation.

Senator Dawes of the Senate Committee investigate the removal of the Ponca Indians from their reservation has presented a report on this subject, recommending the passage of a bill he had previously introduced for their relief.

The report opens with a brief history of the friendly relations of the United States with this tribe, which culminated in a treaty in 1853, by which the Poncas ceded to the United States a portion of the territory then occupied by them, in return for which the United States agreed to protect the Poncas in the possession of the tract of land reserved for their future homes and in their persons and property during good behavior on that part.

The report then says that in 1878 the Government, in providing a reservation for several bands of the Sioux Indians, made treaty with those Indians including within the limits of their new reservation the entire Ponca reservation of 96,000 acres. The Committee are unable to find in the Indian Bureau any reason for thus including this reservation and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, it says, in his report for 1878, describes it as a blunder, in which opinion the present Secretary of the Interior coincides, but was unable to inform the Committee whether it was a blunder in policy or a mistake in boundary.

The Committee then refer to the action of Congress in 1876, which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to remove the Ponca to the Indian Territory after obtaining the consent of the tribe. No notice, the Committee say, of this legislation was furnished to the tribe until communicated to them by E. C. Kemble, who arrived upon the reservation in January, 1877, under orders from the Indian Bureau, to carry out the provision of the law of 1876.

After reviewing the testimony adduced before the Committee bearing directly upon transactions which resulted in the removal of the Poncas, the Committee find that Poncas "were one of the most peaceable of the Indian tribes; that they were dwelt upon a reservation which they had occupied ever since they were known as a tribe, in words of absolute grant from the United States, accompanied by a covenant of peaceable enjoyment during their good behavior, that, without their knowledge and with compensation, and without a shadow of complaint against them as a tribe, the United States included their reservation by mistake of boundaries within the limits of the reservation set apart for the Sioux; that the United States has never undertaken to compensate them in any way for thus attempting to deprive them of their home; that to relieve itself of the difficulties in which this matter had involved the United States, the Government undertook to remove the Poncas from their home and provide for them elsewhere, and Congress authorized their removal to Indian Territory, if they should give free consent to such removal; that the Government, failing to obtain such free consent, removed them by force, and placed them where they now are against their will, leaving their houses and all other property which they were unable to take with them, lodging them in a hot and, to them, an inhospitable climate; that they have suffered greatly from their removal to the present

d have thereby been greatly diminished in numbers; that they are at the present moment contented, discouraged and disheartened, and are making no progress toward self-support; that this proceeding on the part of the United States was without justification, and is a great wrong to the peaceful tribe of Indians, and demands at the hands of the United States speedily and full redress."

The report then enters upon a discussion of the question as to what should be the nature of that redress under existing circumstances in view of the general Indian policy of the Government, and the effect it may have on the neighboring tribes. The Committee held that this is a question of some difficulty, and that the principal objection that it would give to trouble with the Sioux, to whom this reservation is now set apart, is combated by pointing to evidence that shows the Sioux are willing that the Poncas should return to their old reservations providing the Government will compensate the Sioux for the lands reserved to the Poncas.

The Committee, in conclusion, say they can see no valid objection, therefore, to that means of redress, which comes nearest to putting the Indians in precisely the condition they were in when the Government undertook to remove them from their homes into the Indian Territory. They, therefore, report back the bill introduced by Dawes, and recommend its passage.

The bill proposes to require the Secretary of the Interior to cause the Poncas to be removed without delay to their Dakota reservation, and provides that their title to the land shall be deemed valid, anything in the existing treaty to the contrary notwithstanding.

It also requires the Secretary of the Interior to restore to the Poncas "use and enjoyment, the same condition, as nearly as may be attained by them, all houses and other improvements on personal property belonging to the tribe when removed from Dakota, and all the foregoing purposes provides an appropriation of $50,000."

For "The Friend."

Would it not be well for all of those who profess to be followers of Christ, each to endeavor, prayerfully, to examine their own hearts, asking to be shown any thing which is not in accordance with His spirit. Surely we are not walking in the Light or there would be more of a unity of spirit, for "If we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin."

Where there is not the true spiritual fellowship, as in many parts of our Society now, why all be willing to ask to be shown the way, and for strength to walk in the footsteps of our Saviour; seeking first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, trusting that all things needful shall be added.

Many of us profess to consecrate ourselves to the Lord; is not this profession made sometimes by some who do not really understand the importance of what they are doing? It has always seemed to me to be a great attainment to live a consecrated life so fully that I never spend an idle moment or a cent needlessly. We cannot live so unless we have a continual abiding in One who said, "I am the vine ye are the branches," then shall we bring forth fruit to his glory and honor.

M.

John Bunyan.

For "The Friend."

A series of small duodecimo volumes entitled English Men of Letters, edited by John Morley, and written by popular authors, has been in the course of publication for some time, and though too concise to satisfy a desire for a thorough knowledge of any of the characters described, the books have proved desirable additions to the biographies of the day. One of these little volumes, and a pleasantly written one, is a Life of John Bunyan, by J. A. Froude. Our attention was called to a passage in it by a friend where Froude asserts that our early Friends disbelieved the Divinity of Christ and the inspiration of the Scriptures. I felt at a loss how a writer of Froude's reputation could make so strange an assertion when it would have taken but little research on his part to have found the falsity of the charge. On endeavoring to trace the matter I find he has founded his accusation against Friends on a long and disconnected attack of Bunyan's on Edward Burrough. The whole article, covering 33 pages in his works, is little else than railing accusations against Edward Burrough, and by implication, his friends. Bunyan calls his tract a Vindication of Gospel Truths; Edward Burrough answered it at considerable length.

We who are of the same household of faith are not interested to go into those long-forgotten disputations other than that we entertain a jealousy least the good name of our fathers should in any wise suffer by the carelessness of such an one as Froude. Some extracts from the letter of George Fox to the Governor of Barbadoes will set forth our early Friends' views very clearly. He says:

"Whereas many scandalous lies and slanders have been cast upon us to render us odious; as that, 'We deny God, Christ Jesus, and the Scriptures of Truth,' &c. This is to inform you, That all our books and declarations, which for these many years have been published to the world, clearly testify the contrary." "And we own and believe in Jesus Christ, his beloved and only-begotten Son, in whom He is well pleased; who was conceived by the Holy Ghost, and born of the Virgin Mary; in whom we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins; who is the express image of the Invisible God, the first-born of every creature, by whom were all things created that are in heaven and in earth, visible and invisible, whether they be thrones, dominions, principalities, or powers; all things were created by Him. And we own and believe that He was made a sacrifice for sin, who knew no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth; that He was crucified for us in the flesh, with our pain and the pain of heaven; and that He was buried, and rose again the third day, by the power of his Father, for our justification; and that He ascended up into heaven, and now sitteth at the right hand of God. This Jesus, who was the foundation of the holy prophets and apostles, is our foundation; and we believe there is no other foundation to be laid but that which is laid, even Christ Jesus; who tasted death for every man, shed his blood for all men, is the propitiation for our sins, and not for ours only, but also for the sins of the whole world; according as John the Baptist testified of Him, when he said, 'Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world,' John i. 29. We believe that He alone is our Redeemer and Saviour, the captain of our salvation, who saves us from sin, as well as from hell and the wrath to come, and destroys the devil and his works; He is the Seed of the woman that bruises the serpent's head, to wit, Christ Jesus, the Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last. He is (as the Scriptures of Truth say of Him) our wisdom, righteousness, justification, and redemption; neither is there salvation in any other, for there is no other name under heaven given among men, whereby we may be saved. He alone is the Shepherd and Bishop of our souls; He is our Prophet, whom Moses long since testified of, saying, 'A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren, like unto me; Him shall ye hear in all things, whatsoever He shall say unto you; and it shall come to pass, that every soul which will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed from among the people,' Acts, iii. 22, 23. He is now come in Spirit, 'and hath given us an understanding, that we may know Him that is true.' He rules in our hearts by his law of love and life, and makes us free from the law of sin and death. We have no life, but by Him; for He is the quickening Spirit, the second Adam, the Lord from heaven, by whose blood we are cleansed, and our consciences sprinkled from dead works, to serve the living God. He is our Mediator, who makes peace and reconciliation between God offended and us offending; He being the Oath of God, the new covenant of light, life, grace, and peace, the author and finisher of our faith. This Lord Jesus Christ, the heavenly man, the Emmanuel, God with us, we all own and believe in; He whom the high-priest raged against, and had him crucified; whom the priests and elders of the Jews took counsel together against, and put to death; the same whom Judas betrayed for thirty pieces of silver, which the priests gave him as a reward for his treason; who also gave large money to the soldiers to broach an horrible lie, namely, 'That his disciples came by night, and stole Him away while we slept.' After He was risen from the dead, the history of the Acts of the apostles sets forth how the chief priests and elders persecuted the disciples of this Jesus, for preaching Christ and His resurrection. This, we say, is that Lord Jesus Christ, whom we own to be our life and salvation."

"Concerning the Holy Scriptures, we believe they were given forth by the holy Spirit of God, through the holy men of God, who (as the Scripture itself declares, 2 Pet. i. 21.) 'spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.' We believe they are to be read, believed, and fulfilled (he that fulfils them is Christ); and they are 'profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works,' 2 Tim. iii. 16, 17; and are able to 'make wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.' We believe the Holy Scriptures are the words of God; for it is said in Exodus xx. 1, 'God spake all these words, saying,' &c., meaning the ten commandments given forth upon Mount Sinai. And in Rev. xxii. 18, saith John, 'I testify to every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book, if any man shall add unto these,' and 'if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy'

(not the Word), &c. So in Luke i. 20: 'Because thou believest not my words.' And in John v. 47; xv. 7; xiv. 23; xii. 47. So that we call the Holy Scriptures as Christ, the apostles, and holy men of God called them, viz, the words of God.'

"Freemen's Paradise."

Under this head, Dr. S. W. Marston writes to the Religious Herald concerning the colored people in Beaufort Co., S. C.:

Whatever hindrances and opposition, imaginary or real, may be said to exist in other portions of the South to mar the happiness and retard the progress and prosperity of the freedmen, thereby causing them to migrate to Kansas, Africa, and elsewhere, it is apparent from existing facts that, in the above-named county they are contented and happy. Here they enjoy all the rights and privileges vouchsafed to any class of United States citizens. Here they are largely in the ascendancy as to numbers, and exercise rights of suffrage without fear of molestation. Politically, they have it all their own way. And on this account I suppose it is, that Beaufort County is called all over the State, "The Black County."

By the exigencies of the war, this county, made up mostly of islands, and once owned by wealthy planters, was confiscated for taxes, and placed upon the market for sale in such a way that the lands could be bought in small tracts, ranging from ten to one hundred acres each. The colored people purchased the most of it; and now nearly all who live upon it are landlords—that is, they own the lands they cultivate. They work for themselves. And as the very choice kind of cotton known in the world, called the "Sea Island Cotton," grows in this county, and scarcely anywhere else, it is easy to see what superior advantages for thrift and prosperity the people here enjoy.

The population of the county is about 40,000, and of this number 30,000 are blacks. The island of St. Helena alone contains 10,000 blacks and only seventy-five whites; and in the city of Beaufort, the county seat, there are 3,000 blacks and only 1,800 whites. These statistics clearly show that the colored people have it all their own way, if they choose to.

Let us now consider their financial condition, and see if they have made a good use of their opportunities. I am told that there are on these cotton-growing islands, 2,700 men who are heads of families; that they live in good houses, own their own farms, ride in their own carriages, and wear "made to order" broad-cloth clothes to church; that in the city of Beaufort, there are not less than 500 families that own the residences they live in—many of which indicate, by their external appearance and surroundings, that the inmates possess a high degree of social refinement, and are prosperous and happy. It is said to be a very rare thing to see a colored beggar upon the streets asking for food, raiment, or shelter.

But the most remarkable fact of all is, that in this county of 40,000 people—three-fourths of whom are blacks—not a single murder has been committed since the war, and that only an average of ten criminals, during the past four years, has been in the hands of the law. These facts are from the records of the sheriff's office, and were given to me by Alfred Williams, the Mayor of Beaufort, who, by the suffrage of the people, both black and white, has been elected six times to fill the office he now occupies; and who, I judge, is a man of undoubted integrity and veracity.

Now, if we accept newspaper reports as correct, there have been in the other counties of South Carolina, during the past four months, twenty-six murders and sixteen assaults with intent to kill. We may well ask, Why this difference? Why should the people of Beaufort County be so much more peaceable than those of other counties of the State? It cannot be simply because so large a proportion of its citizens are colored people, nor because the few whites living there are so much better than the white people in the rest of the State. I am inclined to the opinion, that it is because the colored people in this county own the lands they cultivate and the houses they live in; and this possession of real estate has so inspired their industry and manhood, and developed their self-respect, as to make them lovers of good order in society. As a general rule, any man, black or white, feels better and behaves better, and does better in every respect, when he works for himself on his own land, than he does when working for another by the day, month or year, or even when cultivating land on shares.

Allowing this to be the correct view of the matter, may we not go a little further and say that the elevation, prosperity and peace of the freedmen of the South can best be promoted by giving them an opportunity to obtain, individually, an interest in the land they cultivate? They have muscle and mind—the two elements of honest wealth—and when these are stimulated by the opportunity to purchase lands to live upon and cultivate, I believe they will become an industrious, frugal, and happy people.

In the agitations of the present life, beset and perplexed as we are with troubles, how natural it is to seek earnestly some place of rest! and hence it is that we so often reveal our cares and perplexities to our fellow-men, and seek comfort and strength from that source. But the sanctified soul, having experienced the uncertainties of all human aids, turns instinctively to the great God; and hiding itself in the presence and protection of the divine existence, it reposes there, as in a strong tower, which no enemies can conquer, and, as on an everlasting rock, which no floods can wash away. It knows the instructive import of that sublime exclamation of the psalmist, "My soul, wait thou only upon God; for my expectation is from Him."

—T. C. Upham.

In this meeting I had to remind them of that declaration that we have all sinned and fallen short, but how far, or the extent, we ought each to seek to know for ourselves. Our great adversary endeavors to palliate, and is very expert in using arguments to set us at ease in our sins; but if we bring them to the discovering light of Christ in our minds, we shall see them as they are in the sight of God, where no palliations or excuses will cover them from his righteous judgments, which will be revealed against every thing that is not of his own begetting; therefore I exhorted Friends to bring their deeds to this light, that they may pass under the flaming sword, for nothing that is unclean, or done in the will of the creature, will be permitted to enter that kingdom which is purity, peace, and joy, in the Holy Spirit.—Life of John Conran.

Friend, Don't Swear.

Upon going into a wagon-shop, a few days since, the first thing that met our gaze was the above sentence, printed in large capital and posted up in a conspicuous place.

These three short words were suggestive. First, they gave undoubted proof that some one connected with the shop was a man who had not forgotten God's injunction not to take his name in vain. Second, they showed that he wished others to remember the same injunction; and third, they showed, we thought, that he had taken a very good way to give them a warning to that effect. The was nothing harsh about it—perfectly correct and mild, indeed something pleasant—"Friend, don't Swear"—just as though a peculiar interest was felt in each individual who might read it. It might have read, "No swear! allowed here," "All profanity forbidden here," or any other peremptory command; but we doubt whether either would have accomplished so much as the simple request "Friend, don't Swear." Would it not be well if, in proving all kinds of iniquity, we were to use more mildness, and not so much denunciation. Now, we have known some good men, indeed Christian men, who, of course, would not for world swear themselves, but who, nevertheless, would seem very much delighted with well told story, even though it abounded in oaths, and would laugh heartily at a joke even though a serious subject was the butt of it. But this sentence, on the contrary, in the same solemn, gentle admonition to such—"Friend, don't Swear." We are informed that the effect of this silent yet ever speaking little sentence of truth was very happy; that, although frequented by all classes of men, an oath was rarely heard in that shop. We long for such purity of public sentiment that the face of every respectable man should bear on its every lineament such a legend, and unmistakable "Friend, don't Swear" would effectually awe down the terrible profanity which is now so abounding—that awful swearing because of which the Lamentation, might entirely and forever cease.—Selected.

Religious Hints, &c.

R. L. Stanton, in the N. Y. Independent, describes the effect of remorse, and the character it produced in the character of Charles Reed, the novelist.

"Its immediate occasion was the death of Mrs. Seymour, (a personal friend,) and it is just at this point that a rather romantic interest attends the case. A strong attachment between C. Reed and this lady had existed for many years, and in her house, amid loneliness, and in her society, he found a bright and a friend. Upon her death, after a very brief illness, Mr. Reed was plunged into sorrow. He bitterly reproached himself for his influence upon Mrs. Seymour's opinions. This added greatly to the pangs he suffered at her loss. 'But for my influence,' as he said referring to his 'rationalistic views,' as he understood, 'she might have been an emigrant saint; and now, if she is not saved, I am responsible for it.' This self-reproach was a keen edge of Mr. Reed's grief, and his exquisite sensibilities were so moved that almost sank under it."

Feet Washing.—On Holy Thursday the Emperor and Empress of Austria, in the presence of their whole Court, of the Privy Council, the Diplomatic Corps, and the senior officers of the Vienna Garrison, washed the feet of twenty-four poor old men and women, having previously served these honorable paupers with a plentiful meal, placing several dishes before their humble guests with their own hands. After the old people had partaken of the good things provided for them by the Imperial bounty, the tables were cleared by Imperial Archdukes and Ladies of honor. The feast consisted of four courses, conveyed into the banqueting-hall by noble men and patrician pages, under the direction of Kinsky, the High Cook Marshall. At conclusion the feet-washing ceremony took place, a court chaplain reading aloud from the Holy Writ during the performance of this pious rite. Subsequently a purse containing thirty pieces of silver, was presented by the Emperor to each of the old men, and by the Empress to each of the venerable dames, of whom had all but attained her hundred year, while the youngest of the twelve is a hearty octogenarian. The service was in supposed fulfillment of Christ's injunction to "wash one another's feet."—Christian Statesman.

Protestant churches are multiplying very rapidly in Italy. Of churches which have been erected in a foreign tongue for foreign people there are fifty; of churches composed of Italian converts from Catholicism there are twelve, of which the Methodists have forty-four, the Vandois thirty-nine, the Free Church thirty-one, the Baptists nineteen, the Plymouth brethren fifteen.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Effect of the Sun on the Rocks.—Several of the mountain-sides of this country are remarkably steep, and the loose blocks on them are flat and angular, without a trace of weathering. For a time we considered the angularity of these loose fragments as evidence, that the parent was of comparatively recent formation; but we afterward heard the opinion generally going on by which the boulders are broken into these sharp fragments. The rocks heated by the torrid sun during the day to such an extent that one sometimes started sitting down on them after dark to find a quite too hot for the flesh, protected by thin trousers, to bear. The thermometer cooled on them rises to 137° in the sun. These red surfaces, cooling from without by the evening air, contract more externally than internally, and the unyielding interior forces off the outer parts to a distance of one or two feet. Let any one in a rocky place observe fragments that have been thus shot off, he will find in the vicinity pieces from a distance of one or two hundred paces in length, which exactly fit the new surface of the original block; and he may hear in the distance among the hills, where sound travels freely, the ringing echo of the report.—D. Westgate.

The Crystal Spring of the Waicissa river is described by the Monticello Constitution. "Although our residence in Jefferson City dates back more than twenty years, we did not visit the Crystal Spring until Saturday for the first time when we floated in the clear and sparkling waters of the Waicissa river, and were really surprised at the magnitude and beauty of the stream, which has an average depth of from four to seven feet from its head to the canal that connects it with the Anella—a distance of about ten miles. We also visited several of the numerous springs that supply the vast expanse of water, and among the number what is known as the 'Big Spring'—a very ordinary name for one of the grandest and most beautiful of springs in the entire South. It forms a circular basin, forty or fifty yards across, and its depth is unknown. The water is clear, and when illuminated by the rays of a noontday sun, probably hundreds of feet beneath the surface, can be seen the trunks and particles of large trees, covered with small and the impetus of the water as it rushes in a vast volume from the spring, forces upward myriads of small shells that permeate the entire basin, and have the appearance of sprays of brilliants. A close inspection also reveals the fact that this basin is surrounded, many feet below the surface of the water, by jagged walls of rock, and the outlet to the same in on the other side by what appears to be a solid mass of nature's masonry.

The powers of the various kinds of building stone to resist pressure and atmospheric influences are well-known, but there scarcely ever occurs an extensive fire which does not emphasize the need of better information as to the effect of heat upon stone. This need Hiram A. Cutting, State Geologist of Vermont, has undertaken to supply by a series of experiments, the first result of which is to confirm and give exactness to the general impression that granite is a poor heat-resistor, and the second to show that there is wide choice—even in granite—in this respect. He collected 22 specimens of the best known quarries, and found that while all were unaffacted by 500 deg. of heat, damage usually began at 600 deg., was serious and frequent at 800 deg., and at 1,000 deg. all the specimens were ruined, the stone from Mt. Desert standing the test, perhaps, better than any other. He gives it as his opinion that the effect of water on heated granite is rather apparent than real. The importance of this information is very great, especially to builders and insurers. In spite of these hints, this favorite stone will probably continue to be used in "fire-proof" buildings, and possibly without serious danger, if it is only used in very solid walls; but to use it in building supporting columns, especially within the walls, is only to invite the gutting of the whole interior of the building if a fire should break out.

Saffron.—This is largely cultivated in the valley of Cashmere. It flowers in the Tenth month, and when the blossoms open, they are plucked, and the different colored stamens picked out and separated. The red and white only are of value, the yellow being generally given to the cattle. The former after proper preparation, yield the saffron, which is used in medicine, as a dye-stuff, and in oriental cooking.

How to Obey.—In a panic in a public school, caused by the cry of fire, one little girl sat perfectly still. On being asked why she did so, she said: "My father is a fireman, and told me if the school should be afire I would be far safer to sit in my place until the rush was over, and then get out quietly." She knew how to obey.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 12, 1880.

It is not uncommon for ministers of other denominations to use, near the conclusion of their public prayers, a form of words about as follows: "We ask all these things in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ." Of latter years we have frequently heard ministers of our own religious Society use the same formula, or some modification of it, such as, "We ask these things in the all-availing name of Jesus." We have often been unpleasantly impressed on such occasions with a fear that those who thus spoke attached in their minds some virtue or influence to the mere use of those words, independently of that Divine power or unction which alone renders prayer availing. The word Name is often used in the Scriptures as synonymous with power, as where the Proverb says: "The name of the Lord is a strong tower. The righteous runneth into it and is safe;" and the prophet Micah declares, "We will walk in the name of the Lord our God forever." In this sense of the word, it is very true that all our petitions ought to be offered in the name, that is in the living power and virtue of Christ; but to introduce into them such a formula, or any other expressions which do not arise from the prompting of the Lord Himself, is inconsistent with the real nature of prayer, which is the outpouring of the soul to its Creator as inspired by his own Holy Spirit.

This subject is by no means a new one in our history—as may be shown by the following extract from the writings of William Bayly, one of the early members and ministers among Friends. He says:—

"There is a great noise by way of objection among many of the professors in this age, against the people called Quakers; which is on this wise, viz: 'We do not understand,' say they, 'that you ever pray to God in the name of Jesus, or in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, &c., though we grant you often preach and pray, and many good exhortations there are to be heard among you, but we seldom or never hear you preach or pray in the name of Jesus.' * * *

To which I shall endeavor to answer as I have received of the Lord. * * *

I do affirm, that they who preach and pray in the spirit and power and light and wisdom of God, do pray in the name of Jesus, for Jesus is but a name which was given unto that which was before that name was. * *

Now if any pray or preach or speak in the power of God, and in the wisdom of God, they do it in the name of Jesus; or if any pray in the truth and the life and the way, they pray in the name of Jesus; and if any pray in the true light and spirit of God (which lighteth every man that cometh into the world), they pray in the name of Jesus."

Isaac Penington also refers to this subject in one of his letters, saying:

"A second thing wherein professors generally mistake, is about praying in the name of Christ; in which name, he that asketh, receiveth; and, out of which, there is no right asking of the Father. They think that praying in the name of Christ, consists in using some outward words, as, 'Do this for thy Son's sake,' or, 'We beg of thee in Christ's name; whereas, that in the heart which knoweth not the Father, may use such words; and that which is taught of the Father to pray, and prayeth in the Son, may not be led to use those words. The name, wherein the asking and acceptance is, is living; and he that prayeth in the motion of the Spirit, and in the power and virtue of the Son's life, he prayeth in the name and his voice is owned of the Father; and not the other, who hath learned in his own will, time and spirit, to use those words relative to the Son."

In the article in our last number, entitled, Polished Shofis, taken from The British Friend, there are allusions and cautions which may not be fully appreciated by some of our readers in the limits of Philadelphia and Ohio Yearly Meetings, who have not had much opportunity of observing what is transpiring in other places. We refer especially to those paragraphs which speak of the demand for ministers and teachers as evidencing that some under our name do not realize the value of the testimony borne by our Society to the "reality and the sufficiency of the Divine Presence" to teach those who wait upon God.

In attending some meetings outside of the two Yearly Meetings referred to, and in reading the reports of the proceedings of others, and the communications from their members published in some of the Journals of the day, it is painful to observe how outward the views of many have become, and how largely their reliance seems to be placed on public preaching for any growth in the Church, or even for the preservation of the members who now belong to it. We do not undervalue a true gospel ministry, which is a great blessing to the church; but unless our members are brought to be acquainted with Him who teacheth in the secret of the soul as never man taught, and learn to look up to Him for wisdom and strength, they will be like those of whom the apostle spoke, who were ever learning and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.

A Friend in a Western State has sent us a copy of the Weekly Bulletin of the Young Men's Christian Association of Richmond, Indiana, for 5th mo. 7th last, in which, among other announcements of services at the different places of worship to be held on the following First-day, it is published that "S. M. Grannis [who in another page of the Bulletin is styled a 'noted gospel-singer,' will sing at Fifth Street Friends' Meeting-house in the morning."

It is also stated that, "in the afternoon, at 3.30, a mass praise service will be held in the Indiana Yearly Meeting-house," in which two of the noted gospel-singers, and other prominent individuals "will participate." Cordial invitation to the public is extended.

Such incidents furnish convincing evidence of the extent to which the testimonies and usages of our Society are departed from by those who open the meeting-houses of Friends to exhibitions so inconsistent with its principles; and they tend to quench the hopes of those who would gladly see in the different Yearly Meetings, a more lively concern to return to the standard of doctrine and practice which our forefathers exhibited to the world.

It is an illustration of the truth stated in an article in our last issue, that "Every lapse from the fullest and most practical recognition of the presence and sufficiency of our Lord, has been marked by a craving for more of visible and human instrumentality in worship."

"The Pennsylvania Society for the Protection of Children from Cruelty," incorporated in 1877, in an appeal to the citizens of Philadelphia for aid, state, that during the three years of its existence it has been called upon to care for and protect more than three thousand children, which it has been able to do effectually, sometimes by good counsel, at others by stern and timely warning or by appeal to law, and always by careful subsequent supervision. Nine hundred of these children it has been obliged to remove from under the charge of cruel and unnatural parents, or of guardians who had abused their trust, and by decree of the proper court it has placed them in safe and better keeping. And in no instance has any charge of improper interference between parent and child, guardian and ward, master and apprentice, been made good against this Society; the decision of the court being invariably in its favor.

Its office is 1406 Chestnut St., Philadelphia.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—During the 5th month the public debt shows a reduction of $15,928,033—a rate of payment of more than half a million per day—at which rate the whole debt could be cancelled within seven or eight years.

Philadelphia exhibitors received thirty-two prizes at the Sydney (Australia) International Exhibition. John Elk, a Winnebago Indian, has sued a Ward Register in Omaha, Neb., for $6000 damages, for refusing to register him at the late municipal election. His petition alleges that he is an Indian, born within the United States, and that more than a year previous to the grievance complained of, he had secured his tribal relations, and rendered himself to the jurisdiction of the United States, and avers that under the fourteenth amendment he is a citizen of the United States, and entitled to the rights and privileges of citizenship. Advances from Fort Walsh, Manitoba, report trouble between the Arctian and Canadian Indians; several slight conflicts have occurred.

In 1879, 1062 persons were killed and 3573 injured, on the railways of Great Britain. According to the Railroad Gazette, from 5th mo. 1879, to the end of 4th mo. 1880, 180 persons were killed, and 644 injured, on the railways of the United States. The very fast rates the London trains are run in England, are considered largely responsible for the great loss of life which results from accidents.

At the Brewers' National Convention recently held in Buffalo, it was stated that there are now in the United States more than 2000 breweries, which annually consume 1,000,000,000 pounds of barley and 25,000,000 pounds of hops.

The U. S. Senate has passed the Eaton bill, which provides for the appointment of nine commissioners from civil life, to be selected by the President, and subject to the approval of the Senate, who are to consider the whole question of the revision of the tariff laws. They are to report the result of their investigation from time to time, and make a final report by the first of next year. The bill is now before the House.

The army worm is reported to be devastating the wheat and timothy crops, in portions of the Ocean and Monmouth counties, N. J. They appeared suddenly, and in some instances destroyed acres of wheat and grass in one night before they were discovered.

The number of deaths in Philadelphia during last week was 55, an increase of 49 over the previous week. Of this number 17 were aged persons.

Marked case.—U. S. cases, 1881, registered, 1093; coupon, 1062; 88, 103; 44, 109; 48, 109.

Trade in all departments continues inactive, but prices generally have been comparatively steady.

Cotton was quiet but firm. Sales of middlings at 12 a 12 1/2 cts. and for upland at 10 1/2 to 11 cts.

Petroleum is dull at 7 1/2 cts. for refined in barrels, and at 11 cts. for do. in cases.

Flour is dull and prices are weak. Sales of 900 hbls., Minnesota extras, at $4.80 a $6.25; Penna. family at $4.75 a $5.25; western do., at $5 a $6, and patents $6.50 a $8. Rye-flour is steady at $4.62 1/2 a $4.75.

Grain.—Wheat is strong, but lacks vitality. Sale 4 1/2 cts. for No. 1, $1.28 a $1.28 1/2; do. number 1, $1. Eye is selling at 88 cts. for Pennsylvania. Corn new with a fair inquiry at full prices. Sales of 6000 bushels rejected at 49 1/2 a 51 cts., steamer at 50 a 50 1/2 cts.; mix at 51 a 51 1/2 cts., and yellow at 52 a 53 cts. Oats—dull. Sales of 4200 bushels mixed at 35 cts. and white at 36 1/2 cts. The receipts 6th mo. 5th were as follows: 28-10 barrels flour, 59,000 bushels wheat, 134,400 bushels corn, 500 bushels rye, 25,200 bushels of oats.

Hay and straw market, for week ending 6th mo. 5, 1880.—Loads of hay, 292; straw, 61. Average price during the week: Prime timothy, $1.15 a $1.20 per 1000 lbs.; mixed, $1.10 to $1.20; straw, $1.25 a $1.40. There is no change of importance to note in the position of this market. The small sales were generally a few cents lower than the previous week.

Oils.—Prime Lard, 55 cts.; No. 1, 49 cts.; No. 2, 45 cts.; Nests foot, extra, 70 a 75 cts.; No. 1, 65, and 50 cts.; 75 cts. Lard-cakes. Sperm, crude, 49 a 50 cts. extra bleached tallow, $1.17 a $1.20.

Beef cattle were in good demand, and prices were fraction higher; 2400 head sold at the different yards at 3 1/2 a 5 cts. per lb. as to condition.

Cows were dull; 190 head sold at the different yards at 1 1/2 a 2 cts. per head.

Sheep were a fraction higher; 8000 head sold at the different yards at 3 1/2 a 5 cts. per lb. and lambs 5 cts. per lb.

Hogs were in demand at former rates; 4500 lb sold at the different yards at 6 a 6 1/2 cts. per lb., as quality.

FRANCE.—The Dublin correspondent of the TV says: "Accounts from all parts of the country regarding the state of the crops give the highest promise of abundance."

The committee to distribute the New York Relief fund, are giving special attention to the needs of children. One of the committee says: "We are now giving breakfasts to considerably more than fifty thousand poor children. The average attendance at schools in the distressed districts has largely increased and we are in receipt of numberless most touching letters from all parts of the country, testifying to the immense importance of this part of our committee work. We have also clothed several thousand boys and girls, employing not only poor seamstresses in Dub but also people in distant villages in the manufacture of goods."

The Empress of Russia died on the 3rd inst., in fifty-sixth year.

Intelligence has reached St. Petersburg that Chinese are massing large bodies of troops on the Russian frontier, and that an attack is expected with the formality of a declaration of war.

A telegram referring to the late Josiah Kardinia Armonis at Western Persia, states that forty thousand persons must be fed for two months, if they are to live. A great many people have already died starvation.

Information has been received from Paris, that government has resolved to close all the Jesuit establishments in France, without further warning.

The opening of the Mount Vesuvius Railway to place on the 6th inst. Several successful ascents were made. The time occupied on the journey from the foot of the mountain to the terminus of the railway, eight minutes.

It is reported that the cattle plague has happened on the island of Cyprus, and that 2000 animals had died, out of a total of 100,000 in the island.

Ancient Testimonies Revived.

Samuel Alexander addresses to "Members Attenders of Friends' Meetings," the three following extracts from the writings of Friends, showing their objection to "the heathen names-days," which he says now "are placed on Meeting-house walls" referring to the notice to the notices of meetings posted on the walls, and dated in the fashionable style.

From Samuel Fothergill:—"The testimonies given to us as a people, in various epochs, have been a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence, to many, who have desired a crown, without our cross, and have overlooked and despised the peculiarity of our testimony—or rather the Lord's testimony through us. The language, customs, and notions of this world, though by many esteemed indifferent, are not so by us, but are part of the growth, the underwood of the lofty banian, which the day of the Lord is to be upon, as well as upon the tall cedars, and when that day comes, it will burn as an oak, with prevailing heat, so as to leave in neither root nor branch.

"All who have entered into fellowship with through the Baptism of Christ, the only door of entrance, have, not from imitation or clear conviction, found this compliance irridisable duty."

From William Young, of Leominster:—Upon after entering into my usual employment, I became uneasy at our being in the habit of using the common names of the months, and writing them in the shop-books, and taking of those adopted by Friends. I took up such a cross, without being satisfied it was a required duty, as I was one day thoughtful about it, having a Bible in my hand, on opening it, the thirteenth verse of the twenty-third chapter of Exodus immediately presented itself to my view:—And all things that I have said unto you, be ye diligent; and make no mention of the name of other gods, neither let it be heard of thy mouth." This struck my attention, and fixed my judgment."

From Loveday Henwood:—"About the end of the year, when I had to write out my bills, great exercise came over my mind, in reference to the names of the months. I sat down, and did not feel easy to call them as I had formerly done; I therefore desired in my heart, to be shown what I ought to do, when it was clearly spoken inwardly to me, in these words, 'In the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened.'—Gen. vii. 11. I hesitated no longer, but wrote according to the direction I had been graciously favored with."

To these may be added the following tract on "The Plain Language."

"A circumstance which need not here be entered into has led the writer into a very serious consideration of what may perhaps be styled "The Plain Language Question." In a spirit of tender love to all, he felt warranted in giving forth this leaflet for the consideration of others who may have had the matter before their minds, particularly those who are members of the highly-professing Christian society, known as the Society of Friends. A Churchman by birth, a Dissenter by choice, and later, a Friend by conviction, the writer has a special desire that Friends in particular should weigh well and carefully the matter with which this leaflet deals. The plain language is one of the peculiarities of Friends, and for one who was known as a Quaker to use the ordinary language of the world, was years ago an occurrence very rarely heard of. Of late years, however, Friends have lost much of this peculiarity, and at present perhaps a majority in the Society use the common language, and indeed some seem offended if they are addressed as 'thee' or 'thou.' The object of this little tract is to try to ascertain whether this change is a change for good, and whether sound reasons can be given against the upholding of a testimony which the early Friends evidently considered an important one, and for which they suffered long and grievously.

"In the view of the writer, a sincere Christian—one who is truly humbled before God, and feels that the world and all it can give is but a small thing compared to the blessed hope of eternal life in Christ Jesus—such an one will not be nice in desiring titles and flattering language, nor yet will such an one be fond of gratifying the vanity of others, or using terms which may be misleading and incorrect. The early Friends were intensely watchful in this matter, refusing under any circumstances to address any as master or mistress unless they really were so, and saying generally just what they meant, firmly, plainly, yet respectfully. Believing that it was best and most in accord with the general Scriptural position they took up, they adopted the Scriptural language, saying 'thee' or 'thou' to a single person, and rejected the world's custom of saying 'you,' which was considered more honorable to the party addressed. This was a straight blow at the pride and height of the carnal mind, and earthly spirit; and the world, lost in its vain imaginations, felt offended when so addressed. Now it is very desirable not to offend, but still more desirable to do God's will. It is hard to the flesh to give up, indeed the writer knows from experience that one of the most difficult things to be yielded to is this. To be more particularly so when the person has previously used the world's language, and now from conviction has to say 'thou' to persons whom he has for many years been accustomed to address as 'you'; or to address masters, or persons in authority, or persons much older than himself, in the plain language. The shopkeeper fears, to offend the sensitiveness of his customers, the young man applying for a situation lacks courage to say 'thou' or 'thee.'

"Thus many shrink from the test, and are day by day grieved at heart at their little faith. Others take courage to use the plain language to Friends, but through fear of giving offence, or attracting attention, or being laughed at, they speak to others as formerly, although they find clear checks in their minds that show them their considering what the world will say is a hindrance to their growth in the Truth. There are others, children of worthy parents, who from early childhood have been taught to use the plain language, yet give it up when not addressing Friends. The query that has arisen in the writer's mind here is: Is it right thus to shrink from the use of this mode of speaking if it is the best and most consistent? Surely there can be but one answer to that query. The plain language is not only grammatical and Scriptural, but it is the language in which we address our Heavenly Father.

"George Fox says: 'Thou and thee' was a sore cut to proud flesh and them that sought self-honor, who, though they would say it to God and Christ, could not endure to have it said to themselves.' Surely we will not be easy in giving greater honor to our fellow-creatures than to our Creator. If we say 'thou' and 'thee' to God, and say 'you' to our fellow-man because he regards it as more honorable and respectful, what a sad position we occupy. And oh, what a safeguard it would be to young Friends in particular—what a help to their keeping other testimonies of Truth—if they only took up this cross and faithfully bore it. Our dear Lord did so, he received not honor from men, nor yet gave it, yet loved all and sought their good.

"Yet this safeguard is thrown away, and the testimony lost—for what? Why, for a little approbation of the world! Surely this is a matter for deep heart-searching, for the spirit of the world and the Spirit of God cannot be mixed together.

"The spirit of the world rejects the Light and the good, and chooses the darkness and the evil. It says, 'Away with this Jesus; give us Barabbas.' It revels in the praise of men, but knows not the sweetness of the praise of God. It cannot be encouraged without loss of spiritual power, and barrenness of sonl to those who encourage it. Oh, what leanness has resulted from the want of that close watchfulness, that inwardness so faithfully preached by those that are gone! Oh, upon how few have their mantles fallen! They were indeed led by the Truth, and they walked in the Truth, and in that Spirit which delivered them from fulfilling the lusts of the flesh. 'But the use of the plain language is such a small thing,' say some, 'it does not constitute religion; we can give it up safely, and yet be truly the children of God.'

"The writer tenderly asks: "Can anything be called a small matter into which the Spirit of God has led, and for which the Lord has suffered his faithful ones to be beaten, and bruised, and slain?"

"It is far from his thoughts to teach that religion consists in the saying 'thou' and 'thee,' or to advocate a paying of tithes of mint, and anise, and cummin, and trusting in these, whilst neglecting the weightier matters of the law. 'These' (the weightier matters) 'ought ye to have done,' said the Master, 'and not have left the other undone.' But let Truth reign in all things, and the government, even in what seem small things, be upon his shoulder, whose right it is. Why should Friends give up the plain language? Does the Lord require it? Do those who set it aside as an unimportant matter grow more spiritual, more Christ-like, in their supposed liberty? Does not this giving up to the world lead to the gradual giving up of most of the distinguishing testimonies of Friends? Oh, these are searching questions. The flesh shrinks from the cross; but it is not to the flesh to choose. If we feel that truth requires the cross to be taken up, that is enough; bear it, hear it, the crown will be an ample recompense, and the Master's 'Well done, good and faithful servant' will in a moment efface all the memories of a world's mocking and scorn. Much more might be said, but it seems well to stop, and with these few broken remarks, offered in tender love, those who may read them are left to carry 'the plain language question' to the Great Teacher, and by his living voice within be instructed, and helped, and made willing to bow down to his easy yoke, and in this as in all things, be led to ask 'Lord, what wilt Thou have me to do!'

T. W. J."

Cockermouth, England, 1870.

African Tradings.—We had an opportunity of purchasing a fine large canoe. We paid what was considered a large price for it: twelve strings of blue cut glass neck-beads, an equal number of large blue ones of the size of marbles, and two yards of gray calico. Had the beads been coarse they would have been more valuable, because such were in fashion. Before concluding the bargain the owner said "his bowels yearned for his canoe, and we must give a little more to stop their yearning." This was irresistible.—D. Livingstone.

By continually looking upwards our minds will themselves grow upwards, and as a man by indulging in habits of scorn and contempt for others, is sure to descend to the level of what he despises, so the opposite habits of admiration and enthusiastic reverence for excellence impart to ourselves a portion of the qualities which we admire, and here, as in every thing else, humility is the surest path to exaltation.—Dr. Arnold.

For "The Friend." Avon and its Surroundings.

Avon is a beautiful rural village of Livingston county, lying eighteen miles south of Rochester, and upon a branch of the Erie railway leading from Corning to Batavia and Buffalo. It stands upon the ridge bordering the Valley of the Genesee on the east, and the views across the vale to the western ranges, as they rise successively in the distance, when in autumn the sugar maples and hickories have painted the landscape, are of striking beauty. The rural landscapes at all seasons of verdure are very pleasing to the eye of taste, from the abundance and picturesque arrangement of the many giant elms and oaks which stand as if planted to adorn some vast park. Their dimensions attest the fertility of the soil in its virgin state, but man has by careless and exhaustive culture, robbed it of much of its pristine strength, and vile weeds usurp the place of valuable grasses and other crops to a deplorable degree. A wide extent of thistles, derived from Canada, but originally of European introduction, disgraces the cultivator and robs him of his expected rewards.

This region, and that northward more immediately under the influence of the great lakes, is well adapted to the growth of apples, and among the most pleasing sights daily witnessed, are the teeming orchards burdened with crimson or golden fruitage. In this region the mountain ash finds a congenial home, and hangs out its beautiful clusters of scarlet apples, for it is properly an apple, being known as the Pyrus aucuparia. This is the cultivated European variety. An American species, known as the Pyrus Americana, is a slender and low tree, also prized for its ornamental clusters of fruit, which are not larger than large peas.

Avon was a favorite region for the Indians, drawn thither by the natural beauty of its groves and forests, as well as by the supposed healing properties of its mineral springs. In more modern times this village lay on the western side of the river, but it was the water of the springs that gave it its name (Gan-naw-gus—fétid water). The healing quality of the springs, it is said, was known to the Indians long before any authentic account of this region had been gathered by the whites, and frequent visits to the fetid waters were made by Red Jacket and other red men. When first visited by the whites, the upper spring, which rises in the park before the nickel-locks, Hall, bubbled up from a perfect bog filled with logs and brush. The lower spring, which is stronger and more agreeable to drink, now flows through a pipe of 4 inches diameter, sunken to the depth of 60 feet, and opens into the bottom of a marble basin. The water is believed by many to have been useful for the cure of rheumatism and skin diseases, and is now sent in bottles to distant places. An extensive range of bathing apartments is connected with this spring, which supplies an abundance of water, and is applied warm or cold.

Westward a short distance from this picturesque valley park, the Conness Creek, an outlet of the blue lake of that name, that heralded among the hills a few miles distant, dances over its pebbly bottom to be lost in the darker and deeper waters of the Genesee, about one mile to the northward.

Some distance north of the mouth of the Conness Creek, is the site of the ancient village Gan-naw-gus, the birth place of that famous Gy-ant-wa, known among the whites as Conruler.

One of the decisive battles between the French, under the Marquis De Noyville, at the Senecas, under old Cannohoat, in 1687, said to have taken place near the eastern bank of the river, not far from the railroad bridge, crossing the Genesee,

"Where low was mighty sachem brought,
For lord had Gan-naw-gus lost."

Hosmer, the poet of Avon, after lauding heroically the valor of the Senecas and the bravery of De Noyville, whose

"Flashing eye and lifted arm,
In that dread crisis of alarm,
A knightly scorn of fear revealed,
Worthy of Bayard, when he met
By overwhelming odds beset,
Death on his last red field,"

Justly records his detestation of war and its barbarism, in the following strain:

"Thou phantom—military Fame!
How low will genius land thy name,
And certain features from the sight
More foul than these Khorassan's seer
Hid behind veil of silver bright,
Thinking his name how low near?
How long will thy misleading lamp,
Through regions wrapp'd in smoke and fire,
To slaughter's cavern, red and damp,
Guide beardless boy or gray-haired sire?
Up! fearless butlers for the right,
And lead us! and growing earth with light!
Bid nations ponder well and pause,
When blood corrupt ambition draws—
Oh! teach the world that conquest wears
A darker brand than felon bears;
Prolific poen from earliest time,
Of murder, orphanage and crime."

"The poem "Yonnondio," from which we have made extracts, is descriptive of ever that transpired in the valley of the Genesee during the winter and autumn of 1687, when the Marquis De Noyville made an attempt to plant the standard of Louis XIV. in the best fertile country of the Senecas. This was open infraction of the treaty of the previous year between Great Britain and France, which it was settled that the Indian trade America, should remain free to both crowns. The Five Nations were in alliance with the former, and English parties were cut off from the lakes, their effects seized and persons imprisoned, previous to any hostile demonstration on the part of the Senecas.

The earliest permanent settlement in Avon was a log-tavern, near the site of the present iron bridge over the Genesee, and built early as 1789. Here a trader in furs, who carried a brisk business with trappers and hunters; and his pack horses, laden with the spoil of the forest, were often seen threading the long Indian trail to and from Albany.

In 1790, five Connecticut men purchased the township, and paid eighteen pence per acre, New England currency, a price then considered high because of the open market. One family name among the pioneers of Avon, that of the Walley brothers, calls an eventful page of English history. Richard Walley was one of the judges of the High Court of Justice, before whom King Charles was tried and condemned. When Charles came to the throne, the vindictive Charles clamored for the death of the judges or exiles, as they were called. Some gave the selves up and were barbarously executed, but others fled to the continent, and among them the latter were Walley and G. who remained in voluntary seclusion to G.

ad of their days. The descendants of Richard Whalley were among the pioneers of Avon, and did much to reclaim the waste places.

In the town of Avon were early built by James Wadsworth, a tavern, to which the poet and hostess, Timothy Hosmer and wife, were an enviable reputation. Jo-win-sta-ga, "Big Fire," was the apt name by which the landlord was known to the Senecas, referring to the capacious hearth, with its immense black-log and formidable fore-stick, on which were high piled the flaming faggots in winter, the roar of the chimney—the wind-pipe of careful hospitality—was sweeter than the music of summer birds to the chilled Indian or belated traveller. Many travellers of his time have sat beside this fire, and found rest and refreshment under the ample roof, among these were Joseph Bonaparte, ex-king of Spain, Louis Philippe, afterward king of the French, Commodore Perry, General Moreau, an exiled hero of Hohenlinden, and Marshal Soult, the marplot of Waterloo, whose names adorn the moth-eaten register of this ancient hostelry.

The fertile alluvial soil of the Genesee flats favorable to the growth of giant elms and oaks, the oevercup or quercus macrocarpa. That known as the Markham Elms near the dividing line between the townships of Avon and Rush, and before it is shorn by time, measured forty feet in circumference, and its old protecting boughs shadowed an acre of ground. It was celebrated in Indian tradition, and under its capacious canopy chief, sage and warrior met in olden time. It has lately been much deplored by fire, and portions of it have fallen.

"Like an old tribesman, now
It stands dejected and alone,
And the wind lifting up its sigh,
Gives out a mournful tone;
It stirs no more; the river near,
Breaks with sad whisper on the shore,
As if his waters [sighed] to hear
The Indian's voice once more."

The First False Step.—If we stop the first we stop all the rest; if we do not use the profane word, we shall never use the second. If we are not disobedient the first, we shall never be disobedient. If we do not smoke the first cigar or pipe, we shall never use the second. If we do not take the first glass of wine or beer, we shall never become a drunkard.—Children's Friend.

William Henry Cuyler Hosmer was born at Avon, 1814, and he became an author at a very early age. His muse finding congenial themes in the legends, customs and superstitions of the Senecas, with which he had been familiar from his childhood. His poems, settled in the Genesee Valley while it was yet occupied by the Senecas, and his mother conversed with them in their language, and was familiar with their customs. His poem, "Yonondio, or the Warriors of Genesee," was published in 1844, and was followed in 1854, by a collection of his poetical works, which included legends of the Senecas, and contain also his "Bird Notes," or pleasantly verified descriptions of the American birds, and "the Mounts," or poetical renderings of nature. In these latter themes he has faithfully subjected the muse to the requirements of truth, and says "Crisp," or an Audubon or a Michaux, would be in vain for an error in his plumage or foliage, which a Colver might give the finishing touches to the tints and shadows of his landscapes from the poet's narration of atmospheric effects or the changing innocence of the season." He revels in the natural beauty of the scenes around him, and maintains throughout spirited and animated strain. He died at Avon in 1861.

Silent Meetings.

For "The Friend."

"Keep silence before me, O Islands, and let the people renew their strength," was a command of the Most High through the mouth of his servants; yet, we must acknowledge our fear, in the belief, that too many even of our own members know but little of its nature. I was lately struck with the reply of one, not of our religious Society, who attended one of our meetings, to a member, who had expressed a regret that we had no preaching that day (and which was unusual.) She said, "Silent meetings seemed to her the most solemn." She was a Presbyterian, but appears to have been able to distinguish between the voice of the true Shepherd and the voice of the stranger. I have sometimes thought there were many members of the different organizations in the religious world who, if they could only break loose from the fetters which enslave them, and were privileged in their religious assemblies to sit in the quiet apart from all forms and ceremonious observances, there to wait upon Him "who remains to be waited for," they would be taught by Him "who teacheth as never man taught." But such is the influence of education and example, that many honest and well-disposed professors of the Christian name are kept in ignorance of the very nature of true worship, supposing that without the intervention of man they cannot be brought to an acquaintance with Christ.

"Acquaint thyself with God and be at peace with Him," was the language of an English poet—one who well knew of what he spoke; who had himself felt the force of his own words, and who could best testify to the importance of what he so fully recommended. The prophet, in view of the glorious gospel day in which we live, declared, "They shall no more teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, know the Lord; for they shall know me from the least of them unto the greatest of them." What a privilege! but do we sufficiently prize it? Are we concerned daily to knock at wisdom's gate, waiting at the posts of her doors? Is there a proper dependence upon our Holy Head, or is there a leaning to man? If so, can we expect to grow in grace and in the saving knowledge of Christ? "Accursed be man that trusteth in man and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord," was the exclamation of one of former time; and well assured I am, that such as trust in man and make flesh their arm, will depart from the Lord.

I have long mourned over these things, in the belief that there were too many of our members who are not sufficiently acquainted with the principles of our Society. I fear that, like other professors, we are more desirous to hear what man may say than to listen to the still small voice that speaks to the soul showing its true condition, and which can never err. George Fox said he was concerned to draw people to Christ, and there to leave them; and he left them in safe hands. But what seems to live with me at this time is a fear that all the religious teaching of those who at times speak to the people, may not tend in this direction. We may have a proper concern for the spiritual welfare of others; we may be prompted to utter expressions of interest in their behalf; and, at the same time, our solicitude may be wanting in the qualifying power of truth. I now remember the expression of a minister, long since gone to her everlasting reward. She said: "There were many things that came before the view of her mind whilst sitting in meeting; but what gave her the most concern was to know what was for the people and what for herself." May all be thus exercised.

Irrelevant In.

[Our attention has been called to a newspaper article on the above subject, by George Warrington, of New Jersey, in which the writer utters a protest against the increasing practice of publishing pictures (especially in illustrated Bibles and other religious books) designed to portray the Deity. This he considers as a violation of the Commandment to the Jews, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or likeness;" "thou shalt not bow down thyself to them nor serve them." In this practice he sees a drifting towards idolatry, of which he thinks there is more danger than many are prepared to believe. The early Reformers from the errors of Popery were very clear and decided in their condemnation of forming any image of the Deity either outwardly or in the mind, in the resemblance of anything material or created, as being an inlet to gross outward idolatry; and they declared it to be unlawful to have images or pictures in places for worship, even when designed merely for instruction or raising the affections; because the tendency of such things is to beget a veneration for them as something sacred. The change which has taken place in the practice of their successors is accounted for by the writer in the following extracts from his article.]

As Israel was tempted to idolatry by his contact with the idolaters of Canaan and the neighboring nations, so our present frequent and easy intercourse with the nations which are given over to Romanism has brought about a dangerous relapse and indifference. Travelling to Europe, especially to France and Italy, has thrown men into contact with the attractive features of Popery, with that which is pleasing to the external senses. Ministers and laymen alike have been attracted by the magnificence of her cathedrals, the splendor of her art, the excellence of her taste. Such as were susceptible to music were charmed by the choice and beautiful rendering of the works of masters; such as were students of architecture were interested in the styles of the various centuries; such as were lovers of the fine arts eagerly gazed upon the treasures in the galleries of palaces, and in the churches and cathedrals. It has not been without its effect upon us, and every year has seen both the second and seventh commandments disregarded by the influx of the copies of originals of French and Italian art. We need to compare or contrast with them the feelings and spirit of a traveller centuries ago to a centre of world-renowned beauty, art, and learning.

"While Paul waited at Athens, his spirit was stirred in him, when he saw the city wholly given to idolatry." Nowhere, before or since, was there gathered together such a wealth and profusion of grand and beautiful objects, the creation of man's skill and fancy. He also was no ignorant, uncultured boy, but by education and refinement, well fitted to stand before rulers and kings. Whatever of admiration for the beautiful, of delight in the grand, moved his soul, was entirely overpowered and swept away by the sight of such spiritual blindness and folly. He admired their carefulness in religion, but deplored its wretched aim and direction; he disputed in the markets with them, and on Mars Hill wished to declare to them the unknown God, whom they ignorantly worshipped. How different his zeal from that of many who visit that spot in our day! They lament the ravages of time, and labor to preserve the few broken relics and remains of a former glory and grandeur; he lamented the ravages of idolatry, and endeavored to restore that image of the Creator which sin had erased from the creature. As by his preaching at Ephesus he induced them to burn their books of magic to the value of 50,000 pieces of silver, so here he would use his eloquence to persuade them to destroy and despise their idols and objects of worship. Instead of seeing anything lovely or attractive in their devotion, his inspired verdict is, "The things which the Gentiles sacrifice, they sacrifice to devils." They who go abroad witness a people wholly given to idolatry, crowding the churches and bringing their offerings to the shrines of favorite saints, but with widely different emotions from the apostle in Athens—for they admire, praise, and love to gaze upon pictures and statues which are perpetually the objects of idolatrous worship.

Of old, God commanded his people to destroy every vestige of idolatry and all monuments of false worship, lest they should be tempted and drawn aside to follow the corruptions of the nations about them. Their altars were to be thrown down; their groves cut down; their sanctuaries defiled; their images destroyed; their worship abhorred. But the great majority of those who have journeyed across the ocean have reversed this, and have brought over to us from Romish countries copies of their objects of religious worship and veneration. Life-like photographs and engravings of the masterpieces of the painter and sculptor in church and cathedral, are to be found adorning the centre-table and walls of wealthy homes, while the cheap reprints are scattered broadcast in the homes of the humble. Like the locusts of Egypt, this plague extends everywhere—in our books, secular and religious, on the walls and in the publications of the Sabbath-school, in the stained-glass windows of the churches and how long will it before they become the objects of veneration and worship? Like Saul, when commanded to destroy, they have spared Agag and the best of the animals. "Behold to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." These things, these so-called sacred pictures, are the objects of Romish idolatry. Will not the possession and use of them be a snare to entice to idolatry, just as Israel of old was led astray? Do we not see some of the signs of defection and degeneracy? Are we not on the eve of an extensive and general return to idolatrous worship? Has it not already begun? And have not the watchmen of Israel been criminally negligent?

We keep ourselves long complaining by not fully submitting. Great part of the many bitter pills and potions is greatly owing to want of resignation.—J. Scott.

HARVEST HYMN.

Selected.

Once more the liberal year laughs out
O'er richer stores than gems of gold;
Once more with harvest song and shout
Is nature's bloodless triumph told.

Our common mother rests and sings
Like Ruth among her garnered sheaves;
Her lap is full of goodly things,
Her brow is bright with autumn leaves.

O favors old, yet ever new!
O blessings with the sunshine sent!
The bounty overruns our door,
The fulness shames our discontent.

We shut our eyes, the flowers bloom on,
We murmur, but the corn ears fill;
We choose the shadow, but the sun
That casts it shines behind us still.

God gives us with our rugged soil
The power to make it Eden fair;
And richer fruit to crown our toil
Than summer-wedded islands bear.

Who murmurs at his lot to-day?
Who scorns his native fruit and bloom,
Or sighs for dainties far away,
Besides the bounteous board of home?

Thank heaven, instead, that freedom's arm
Can change a rocky soil to gold;
That brave and generous lives can warm
A clime with northern ices cold.

And by these altars wreathed with flowers,
And fields of fruits, awake again
Thanksgiving for the golden hours,
The early and the latter rain.

THE "CONSTELLATION" WAR-SHIP.

BY JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

Oh, favored Constellation, now sailing o'er the sea,
Deep freighted with the offerings that sweet mercy
sends by thee,
Was there ever grander service by a gallant war-ship
done,
Or ever nobler triumph thus attempted to be won?

From the port-holes of this war-ship, no grim cannon's mouth doth glare—
On the deck-planks of this vessel neither shot nor shell are there,
And the flag that proudly flutters at the mast-head far above,
Is no signal of defiance, but a pennon broad of love.

All the day let favoring west-winds speed thee swiftly to thy goal,
All the night let ocean's billows from thy prow to rudder roll,
And the stars that stud the azure their benignant vigils keep,
Every heavenly constellation bend in love above the deep.

On thy rugged coasts, oh Connaught! now the waves of thy deep
And the heights of Conemara all the grateful echoes wake,
For a deed that Heaven smiles on is voiced from every wave—
The war-ship! yes, the war-ship! It comes men's lives to save!

Oh, better, braver, grander, to use our brethren so,
Than with bursting shell and grape-shot to lay them bleeding low—
Than to invoke that great commandment, which, by Him who knoweth best,
Was to all the after ages thus in words of truth expressed:

"If thy enemy be hungry, let this gracious thought be his—
To feed him with thy substance, and with drink assuage
his thirst,
For by doing so thou shalt surely kill the hate within—Thou wilt also gain thy brother—thou wilt save thy soul from sin."

THE MESSENGER OF LOVE.

Selected.

"And they all with one consent, began to make excuses."—Luke xiv. 18.

The messenger of Love
Went forth with heavenly word,
To call the wedding guests
To the supper of the Lord.

"I cannot heed thee now!"
Said a youth of eagle eye,
As he pointed to the steps
Where the shrine of Fame rose high—

"I cannot heed thee now!
I cannot here delay;
A voice from yonder height,
Is calling me away.

"It tells of deathless wreaths,
That wait to crown my brow,
Oh yet a while delay,
For, I cannot heed thee now."

And the messenger divine
A pitying tear let fall,
As he turned in other paths
The wedding-guests to call.

"Speak not of heavenly love!"
Said one in tones of glee;
"There's a love of mortal growth
That is dearer far to me.

"There's a brow of mortal mould,
Whose light to me is given;
And earth can offer more Than I ask or hope of heaven!"

"I cannot heed thee now!"
Said the man of power and gold;
"I have many years of life—
I have treasures yet untold.

"When the heavy hand of grief
Is chill upon my brow,
I will call thee—then return,
For I cannot heed thee now!"

And the messenger divine,
With a glance of woe to seek,
Went forth in other paths
The wedding-guests to seek.

"And hast thou come at last?"
Said the weeping child of sin;
"Are mercy's gates unlocked?
Will Jesus let me in?"

"O wondrous power of grace,
For sinners such as I;
Thou hast answered to my call—
Thou hast heard my pleading cry!"

And the messenger of Love,
Rejected, turned aside
From the shrine of earthly fame,
And the pomp of earthly pride.

But he took the contrite hearts,
And bore them up to heaven;
And to them the feast was served,
And the wedding-ropes were given.

Let not, my dear —, the example others who may be ashamed of the cross, of the plainness and simplicity which we possess, influence thy conduct; nor the levity, heart incident to youth, prevent thy serious and frequently reflecting on the shortness uncertainty of this life, and the continuance of the next, as well as on the infinity of consequences of our present conduct. We advised to pass the time of our sojourning in fear; how different is the conduct of world! It ridicules or despises that fea-which are true safety and real wisdom.
Let us be rather the companions of the saviour followers of a despised and crucified Saviour, in meekness and lowliness of m than grieve them, and injure our own by conforming to the world and its fashand practices.—Richard Reynolds.

Corea.

For "The Friend."

The people inhabiting this peninsula on the eastern shores of Asia, still maintain the policy of excluding foreigners from their dominions which long prevailed in the neighboring kingdoms of China and Japan. Though more powerful nations at times have exercised dominion over portions of the country, yet it has for many years acted as an independent government. Besides numerous adjacent islands, the territory belonging to the Coreans on the mainland is about 160 miles in length by from 60 to 369 in breadth, and the whole population is estimated at about 6,000,000.

The history of the country shows the same ancient wars and changes which have agitated many of the Asiatic nations; and its position between China and Japan naturally involved it in the contests between those nations.

Christianity was introduced into Corea by native converts who had been brought over by the influence of Roman Catholic missionaries at Peking. The degraded state of Corean priesthood, and the disrespect into which they had fallen, probably facilitated the spread of the new doctrines, so that by the end of that century, the number of Christians there is said to have been nearly 10,000. The government, although fully aware of it was going on, appears to have remained perfectly passive, on account perhaps of favor with which the then reigning king reported to have regarded their doings, until the death of the king however, in the beginning of this century, a persecution of Christians broke out, in which many lost their lives, but which did not prevent the spreading of the new doctrine. For first time, two Roman Catholic missionaries entered the country secretly in 1835, and were joined in 1837 by a third. They settled in Saoul, and remained in that capital quite unmolested until 1839. For reasons which have never been cleared up, they were then suddenly arrested, and without trial brutally decapitated, upon which a fresh persecution was undertaken against all converts, which was carried on with great severity, and the murder of these three missionaries became known, and the ships of war approached the coast several times, with the object to try and get satisfaction, but they did not communicate with the far distant authorities, and soon retired, without being able to effect their purpose.

It means deterred by the fate of the others soon followed their lead, using precaution to enter the country under covering protection of the mourning dress, which allowed them to go about unquestioned unmolested wherever they liked,* and in this manner twelve missionaries had succeeded in getting over the frontiers, and to do so, secretly at first, stations in various parts of the province of Kienki, and to gradually increase in influence. The last king of

E. Oppert says: "As a general rule no mourning is put on for dead relations; but whenever this is done, only for parents, it is carried through in a very unusual manner. The mourner puts on a dress adapted to the occasion, covers his head and the face with a pointed hat, and passes during the mourning season himself, as it were, for dead, avoiding contact with the outer world, nor is it permitted to see or to molest him in any way during the whole of mourning."

the Yi dynasty was a very kind hearted sovereign, and generally beloved on account of his benevolence, who did not throw any difficulties in their way, and, by the aid of some converts of high standing, they had actually obtained a footing at court itself, as the queen, though not baptized herself, inclined strongly to the new creed, and assisted them indirectly as far as she could."

By the death of this king in 1864, the direct royal line became extinct, and the queen adopted as successor, a boy about four years old, the son of a distant relation of the royal family. The father of the boy took the title of regent, and sensible of the opposition to his rule, became suspicious and despotic. Bishop Berneux, and eight of his fellow-missionaries, were arrested and beheaded in the spring of 1866. Three others, Féron, Ridel and Calais, who were stationed at some distance from the capital, received timely warning of the fate which had befallen their colleagues, and with the assistance of the natives they managed to hide themselves, and finally to escape from the claws of the regent, who had ordered the strictest search to be made for them. But the death of the missionaries alone did not satisfy him. A downright hunt commenced for all native Christians, and in cruelty surpassed all previous persecutions under which they had suffered. Many thousands were put to death, and entire villages were nearly depopulated.* This persecution was not, however, confined to Christians only; it soon extended to all those who were, however slightly, suspected to be opposed and hostile to the new state of things. This was followed by an interdiction of the yearly fair held in the north, by a prohibition of import of all foreign goods, especially European, transgressors being threatened with capital punishment, and by a systematic suppression of all branches of industry which were not absolutely required for the necessities of life.

To this "forbidden land," where no foreigner enters without running the risk of paying for his boldness with his life, three voyages have recently been made by Ernest Oppert, from whose descriptions the information contained in this article is derived. His object was the establishment of commercial relations; and he showed a high degree of courage, and it may be said of effrontery, in his efforts.

Before relating his adventures, it may be well to speak of the people themselves. Among them the distinctions of caste are observed almost as rigidly as among the Hindus, but it seems to be more political than religious in its character. After the different grades of the nobles come the evile caste—comprising the upper portion of the city populations, and counting among its numbers merchants, manufacturers and artisans. The people's caste comprises the great bulk of the people. Between these and the slaves or bondsmen (for slavery exists here, though not in the adjoining countries), comes what is called the despicable or despicable caste. To this belong, among others, the butchers, workers in leather and the priests. The official religion is the * E. Oppert states:—"Several years later I received from natives in Corea a list containing the names of the places in which these massacres had taken place, and the number of killed in each. Up to that period the number of persons put to death had reached a total of more than 10,000."

worship of Buddha, which was introduced from China about 372 A. D.; but it has little hold on the popular mind, for the people show an almost total disregard for their own religious ceremonies. This may be partly owing to the profligate and dissolute behavior of the bonzes or priests, who are considered as at the bottom of the despicable caste. As an illustration of the popular feeling, our author says:

"Considerable and densely populated places even own, at the best, a miserable shrine, the dilapidated condition of which clearly demonstrates the neglect and disregard in which it is held. In several large villages, with some hundreds of inhabitants, I had often observed near the roadway a number of shapely trunks of trees of an arm's thickness, and of various sizes, without however paying any attention to them for some time. I was not a little surprised, when on closer inspection these misshapen sticks turned out to represent the idols or josses of these villages, standing there in place of a temple or joss-house, and which, without regard to their preservation, had been stuck in the open road without any ceremony whatever, under the presumption, not perhaps quite unreasonable, that a joss ought to be able to take care of himself in all kinds of weather. All the decoration of these wood pieces, varying in height from two to four feet, consisted in the outer bark being stripped, and abominable features having been cut into the upper end in the most primitive manner; there they stood, more or less firmly fixed in the ground, in all sorts of positions, straight and crooked, while some, weakened by old age, had tumbled down in toto, lying with their tired-out heads on the ground, as if they had made up their minds to remain and rest there after the troubles of an existence which had exposed them to a more than ordinary share of stormy weather. I confess that the impression these idols made on me was more of a painful than of a comical nature, while the natives themselves considered it capital fun to kick those unfortunate fallen josses about, which was done amidst the shouts of laughter of the people standing by.

Notwithstanding all however I have been compelled to state above, it would be altogether erroneous to believe that the Corean is incapable of improvement in a mental point of view. I have already given it as my opinion, that the low moral standing of the people is principally owing to, and a consequence of, the sad state of degradation of the priesthood, and I am prepared to go even further than this. I venture to maintain, that none among the races of the Asiatic Continent can more easily be rendered accessible to a true and sincere religious feeling than the Corean, and that the latter, once converted to Christianity, shows a far deeper comprehension, and adheres to its teachings with greater fidelity and firmness, than for instance the Chinese."

The Coreans are honest, faithful and good-natured, and attach themselves with almost childlike confidence to those in whose sincerity they trust. They are superior to the Chinese in tallness and bodily strength, and in fortitude and energy; but show less cultivation and polish of manners.

"The women have to remain in the apartments set specially apart for their use, and those of the higher classes are even more isolated here than in China; a little more liberty is allowed them in the country, where a portion of the labor in the fields falls to their share, but although they can move about there somewhat more at their ease, they are still much more restricted than the female country population in China. In cities and small townships, it is, however, considered a great offence against modesty and custom, whenever a woman is met in the public streets in the daytime, and they quit their apartments hardly ever during the day. To indemnify them for this strictly kept up seclusion, the following remarkable arrangement has been made. At nine o'clock in the evening during summer, and at an earlier hour in winter time, the city gates of Saoul and other towns are closed at a given signal. As soon as this has taken place all men are bound to leave the streets, and these are abandoned to the women for the purposes of recreation and promenading. Any male finding himself by accident belated and behind the appointed time in the streets, is sure to hurry to his house as fast as possible without looking up or regarding about him, and severe punishment would fall upon any person daring, in the face of the stringent prohibition, to molest women in the least. Good breeding demands from any man (and this is always done) to cover his face with a fan, as soon as he encounters ladies walking during these hours, so that he may not be recognized, and to walk over to the other side of the street so as not to disturb or terrify them.

(To be continued.)

A Christian Brahmin.

Bachan Masih was an earnest Christian man. He was by birth a Brahmin, a native of Benares. His last few years were spent in the service of his Master as an unpaid mission agent.

He usually sat at the door of his house near the road, and, as pilgrims passed by, spoke to them of Jesus. One day an aged pilgrim came slowly along the road, leaning on his staff; he seemed weary, faint, and sad. Bachan Masih addressed him, saying:

"Maharaj, (great king,) where do you come from, and whither are you going, and what is the object of your journey?"

The weary pilgrim answered:

"I come from such-and-such places, where I have been on pilgrimage, seeking rest for my poor, weary, and sad heart, but I have found none. I have now come to Kashi (Benares); may I find rest here?"

Bachan Masih invited him to sit down, and spoke to him of Jesus. He said to him:

"Why will you wander about in search of God, who is near you? Why will you bow down to idols and images made of stone, which cannot save you? What is your Maker, a stone? Is God confined only to certain places? No, no! He is now here. Jesus is in the midst of us, and now invites you, saying, 'Come unto me, you that are sad, weary, and heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'"

The aged pilgrim listened with deep attention and emotion. The Lord opened his heart. After some silence, he exclaimed:

"Is this message indeed from God? Does God think of me? Did Jesus die for me also? and can He—does He—love me, a poor, old, unworthy sinner?"

Bachan Masih grasped his hand, and, in the fulness of his heart, said:

"Yes, brother, he does!"

Upon this the aged wanderer exclaimed: "Jesus is a Saviour such as I need; in Him see all I have sought for years. I will stay with you."

At another time Bachan Masih brought me a blind man, who said:

"In my younger days I was very careless about God and my salvation. Being active and strong, I became the servant of a great man, and I was renowned for wrestling and fighting. One day, whilst so engaged, the thought struck me. What would become of me if I should be injured and die? I became alarmed, and began to read my Shastas; but they could not quiet my mind. I worshipped my household gods, but I found no rest. I then went on pilgrimages, visiting various shrines; but all in vain—my anxiety remained. I then resolved to join the Mohammedans. I went and lived among them; but I perceived that they were as ignorant of God and the way of salvation as I was. Whenever I spoke to them of my anxiety, they always said: 'Be of good comfort; God is great; and what he has decreed will take place.' Whilst among them I became blind. Thus, blind within and blind without, I left them and resolved upon going to Kashi. As I was slowly passing along, feeling my way with my staff, a friendly voice called out to me, 'Whither are you going, and what are you in search of?' I stopped. Seeing that I was weary and faint, my new friend ordered me some food from a Brahmin, of which I partook. I then opened my mind to him. He seemed to understand me fully. He spoke to me of Jesus. He also prayed with me and for me. Jesus is such a Saviour as I need. I believe in Him. I am the Prodigal Son. Bachan Masih has taken me by the hand, and has led me back to my Father."—Exchange.

Safety of Peace Principles.—I have a firm and fixed belief, that should any whole nation be convinced of the peaceable principles of the gospel, and in sincerity endeavor to live up to them, in their full extent; where such a nation was once invaded from abroad, the warring nation would be many times invaded; and where the regular administration of civil justice would be obstructed in such a nation for a month, it would oftener be so in other nations for years. But alas! how many are like poor unbelieving Peter, when he began to walk on the water, though his Lord commanded it, yet for want of faith he sunk amidst the waves and lost his resolution.—J. Scott.

It is one thing to forgive our enemies as a general class, but it is a very different thing to forgive a particular enemy. No such spiritual strength is needed to make us say that we will forgive all "Jews, Turks, infidels, and heretics," as is demanded for our genuine forgiveness of the John Doe who poisoned our dog, or the Richard Roe who told lying stories about us behind our backs. Yet it is the individual who has injured us, whom, after Christ's example, we are bidden to forgive. The historian Prescott knew and kindly treated, during years and years of suffering, the person whose careless loss of a bread-crust, in the college dining-room, made him virtually blind for the rest of his life. And that godly Englishwoman known as Sister Dora, who is now winning posthumous honor from all who read the story of her noble life, was privileged to be able to devote the tenderness, in her hospital ward, to a man who had stoned her in the open streets of Walsall, and who, when he confessed his fault in penitence and tears, was told by the gentle spirit that she had known his face from the moment he threw the stone that cruelly cut her forehead. Not all of us are called upon to forgive those who have destroyed our eyes or stoned us in the streets. But do not we know some of who has wronged us; and have we willingness and fully forgiven him?—S. S. Times.

"Short Measure."

A man who traveled the country district of Yorkshire in the character of a peddler used to carry a stick with him, which served the double purpose of a walking-stick and yard measure. Having been employed prettily in the former capacity, it was ultimately worn down beyond the point of justice; and as the peddler continued to measure his goods by it, he proceeded to himself the appellation of "Short Measure."

One day, William Dawson, a preacher, late of Barnbow, near Leeds, was preaching the neighborhood of that town. His text was Dan. v. 27: "Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting." "Short Measure" stood immediately in front of the preacher; and being rather ostentatious in his profession of religion, and very ready in what he thought a suitable response when any striking remark was made, he manifested signs of approbation while Dawson adjusted the scales, and placed different classes of wares in them; uttering, at the close of each particular description, in a subdued tone, loud enough for those around to hear, "Light weight!" "Short again!" &c. After describing the open worldling, the moralist, the formalist, the preacher at length came to speak of such persons as possessed religious light and conviction, but gave little evidence of spirituality of mind; who have the substance of much zeal, but who employed false weights and measures. Here, without adding in his mind to the case of his noisy audience, he perceived the muscles of his face working in the report of the peddler's "short measure" occurred to him. Resolved, however to soften on previous expression, and to proceed with an analysis and full description of the matter, he placed the delinquent, in a singularly striking way, in the scale. Instead of the usual response, the peddler, struck by the force of truth, took his stick, the favor measure from under his arm, raised one foot from the floor, bent his knee, and taking hold of the offending instrument by both ends, snatched it in two, exclaiming as he dashed to the ground, "Thou shalt do it no more."

We remember to have read of a woman who went to hear a minister who on a particular occasion denounced the sin of fondle dealings. The next day he called upon her, and tried to get from her whether remembered any portion of the sermon of previous day. Alas! she complained of bad memory; "but, sir," she added, "thing I did remember; I remembered to have my bushel." Conscience, in this case, at that of the peddler, had been aroused, and sense of the evil of dishonest trading.

Temperance, employment, and a cheery spirit, are the great preservers of health.

Religious Items, &amp;c.

The Methodist Episcopal Church.—A pastoral address from the General Conference of this day, recently held at Cincinnati, represents its membership at 1,700,000, owning 17,000 churches of worship, valued at $70,000,000; and urges to view the serious responsibilities entailed upon them by the possession of such means of influence. The value of the religious services of women are recognized in the following sentence: "Faithful women not a few are achieving, instrumentally, great things towards the redemption of man. Through their agency, in union with the pastors, and by special efforts as preachers of righteousness, God is moving through the churches to great awakening and converting power." Several of the paragraphs of the Address, and a few of which are below extracted, contain useful hints:—

The decay of spiritual life begins where constant prayer ceases, and the promise of the Father that now is becomes an absorbing pursuit, and a selfish worldliness. Keep the lines of demarcation between the narrow path of self-denial for Christ's sake and the broad way of conformity to the world, remembering the dreadful narrative, "If any man love the world, the Father is not in him."

As American citizens, we do right to inculcate our choice of just men to rule over us, and to exercise the right of suffrage faithfully, also to vindicate and maintain the equal political rights of our native, our adopted, and our naturalized citizens. All this may be performed as religiously as the duty of prayer, and as a duty to the glory of God, the maintenance of good order in society, and the elevation of man.

Parents' oversight of the literature of childhood and youth is of equal importance, and jealous watchfulness over the companions read to them. We fear that thousands of children know very little of the reading of the Bible, and they allow unchallenged, and even licentious literature, the influence of their homes, which poisons the imagination, and despoils the heart and lives of the children of our Church.

Our camp-meetings are less helpful to the moral life of the Church than they should be. Especially is this true when they are a source of revenue mainly, or where the aim is to raise money rather than salvation is the end. Serious hindrances to the cause of the Christ are often suffered over a large extension of territory near camp-meetings by the exhibition of houses of worship, the suspension of the public service, and a general demoralization of the community, and by the desecration of the Sabbath day in public travel. This is an evil that demands correction.

The question seriously the propriety of a permanent union efforts where the distinctive features of the Church are yielded to conform to the prejudices of good men of other denominations. We lose more than the Master while others gain all we lose. We do not be bigots, yet we do well always to remember we are Methodist Christians.

Where we are constrained to condemn as a false doctrine to all good people, many meetings in the name of Christianity and of temperance, which are controlled by inexperienced and in some cases by irreligious men, often supersede religious worship, and the standard of piety."

Natural History, Science, &amp;c.

Pestiferous Valley of the Lu Chiang.—The muleteers were anxious to cross the dreadful Lu Chiang before the sun was hot; and every one was, for once, ready at an early hour. We started among round-undulating hills, but soon entered a valley, which we descended by an easy gradient until we could see the mysterious river at our feet.

Centuries have passed by since Marco Polo spoke of the country, as "impossible to pass, the air in summer is so impure and bad; and any foreigner attempting it would die for certain." Already at Ta-Chien-Lu, M. Chauveau had warned us of this pestiferous place, and had told us that before the rebellion had destroyed every organization in the province, it had been customary to keep a guard at certain places on the road, to prevent any one from attempting the passage during the unhealthy season. As we approached nearer and nearer, though the warnings were more frequent, the details of the story varied but little, and, incomprehensible though they appeared, we could not but give credence to the tales so oft repeated of "the valley of the shadow of death."

As it lay at our feet, all nature seemed to smile, and invite the tired traveller to stay and rest. But it was the smile of the siren, for should a stranger venture there to pass the night, it would be with fever-stricken limbs that, when the morning broke, he would attempt the escalade of the surrounding heights.

Even in autumn, the most healthy season, it is with bated breath that passengers hurry across at a favorable moment; and when the fiery rays of summer are darted on that low-lying valley, even the acclimated inhabitants flee, and for months no living thing may venture there.

From the rapidity of the river, and the undulating nature of the ground, it might have been supposed this district would be healthy enough; but the secrets of its miasma yet remain hidden in the recesses of the beautiful yet deadly vale.—Gill's Narrative.

Shipping and Planting of Virginia Oysters.—On the shore of Chincoteague Bay are two villages, named Franklin and Greenback, which have grown up since the war, and have been doing an extensive business in shipping the far-famed Chincoteague oysters to Europe and coastwise to the Eastern cities for sale during the open season, and in forwarding during the close season, schooner loads of oyster "plants" from the James river to be deposited in Eastern waters, or to plant out fresh beds in Chincoteague Bay. The bottom of the James river, for twenty miles from its mouth, writes a correspondent of the New York Times, is one enormous oyster bed.

The work of catching oysters for planting elsewhere is carried on with tongs at variable depths, not exceeding ten or twelve feet water. Dredging is strictly prohibited, and it is only on the shoals, ranging from fifty to five hundred acres in area, and occupying the central portions of the river, that the tongmen are allowed to take oysters, the shores being staked out by private owners as planting grounds. The spring season for catching oysters and planting, opens about the 1st of 4th mo. and ends on the 20th of 5th mo. In 9th mo. the tongmen will begin again on the same shoals, and may work for three or four months catching "plants." An idea of the enormous quantity of oyster plants taken every year from the shoals of the James may be gathered from the fact that in the two months of the season just closed, it is stated that 500,000 bushels were taken from a single shoal of 500 acres, so that the average product of the shoal from less than 60 working days, was 1000 bushels to the acre. The cost of catching, freight, planting and preparing for market, when taken up at the end of eighteen months from the Chincoteague beds, is about 20 cents a bushel. The price, delivered on board vessels in the bay ranges from 50 to 60 cents per bushel.—Baltimore Sun.

Cowitch.—The Cowitch has a velvety-brown covering of minute prickles, which, if touched, enter the pores of the skin and cause a painful tingling. The women, in times of scarcity, collect the pods, kindle a fire of grass over them to destroy the prickles, then steep the beans till they begin to sprout, wash them in pure water, and either boil them or pound them into meal, which resembles our bean-meal. This plant climbs up the long grass and abounds in all ready parts, and, though a plague to the traveller who touches its pods, it performs good service in times of famine by saving many a life from starvation.—Livingstone's Exp. to Zambesi.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 19, 1880.

In the printed Minutes of the Binn's Meeting of Ohio for 1879, are contained three doctrinal minutes adopted by its Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders in 1877, 8 and 9, and pronounced "for the satisfaction and instruction of the membership." Some of our readers will remember that an Editorial article in "The Friend," vol. 52, p. 286, written by our late friend, Charles Evans, in decided terms pointed out the inconsistency of the earlier of these minutes with the doctrines of the Society of Friends. The attention which was drawn to this subject probably led to the preparation of an explanatory minute in 1879, designed to defend those before issued.

We have received a review of the whole in pamphlet form, written by Cyrus W. Harvey, of Kansas, which clearly shows that the authors of these minutes had imbibed sentiments at variance with those held by our early members. As we have twice before borne a testimony against the doctrines contained in them, it does not seem needful at this time to enlarge much upon the subject.

After referring to the doctrine of the Light of Christ in man, (declared by William Penn to be God's gift for Man's salvation) as that especially aimed at by the Binn's Meeting, the reviewer says:—

"The feeling of those through the Society of Friends who are in unity with the sentiments promulgated by the Ohio minutes is such, that orthodox Friends have been accused of Hicksism; accused of denying the atonement; accused of 'teaching a natural light or principle not lost in the fall'; accused of unsoundness and mysticism; all because they hold and endeavor to maintain the doctrines of sound Quakerism."

"With all the professions of faith in the work of the Holy Spirit at this time, there is little more of real understanding of the experience of the perceptible guidance of the Spirit than at the time of the foundation of our Society. When this doctrine is rejected, there is little left of genuine Quakerism; for, as William Penn justly says, it is the 'root of the godly tree of doctrine, that grow and branched from it.' "It is the desertion of this doctrine, that has made possible the present instantaneous theory of conversion, with the attendant ritualistic performances of 'consecrations,' 'sanctifications,' 'mourning,' and the like." "It seems to be the law of apostasy, that as spiritual life is lost, outward acts are substituted and multiplied, as aids to quiet the cravings of an unsatisfied conscience. So when, by the rejection of the doctrine of the Light of Christ in men, by which they are to experience salvation, the eye of the mind was turned away from the light, we see these outward performances at once introduced into the worship of Friends."

We have at different times received several small tracts put forth by concerned Friends in England, some quite recently and others of somewhat older date, but all encouraging to faithfulness in the support of our testimonies, some of which are greatly neglected by many in that land as well as in America. Many are the discouragements which press on the spirits of those who believe that our early Friends were rightly led in advocating the doctrines they proclaimed to the world, and in exhibiting the practical fruits which flow from individual faithfulness to those doctrines; and who now behold many who profess to be Friends, departing from the footsteps of their predecessors in religious profession. We hope that the confidence of such burden bearers may be renewed in that Divine Power, which is able in his own time and way, to revive his work and cause in the earth; and that the tracts above referred to may be to them a source of comfort and encouragement. We insert some of them in another part of our paper, under the heading, "Ancient Testimonies Revived."

We have received from J. Fitzgerald & Co., 143 Fourth Avenue, N. Y., the sixth number of the Humboldt Library of Popular Science, containing Town Geology, by Charles Kingsley. Price 15 cents. It is interestingly written, and treats of the formation of the soil in the fields, of the pebbles in the streets, the stones in the wall, the coal in the fire, the lime in the mortar, the slates on the roof, and of coral and coral reefs.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the night of the 11th inst., the Soud steamers Stonington, bound to New York from Stonington, ran into the Narragansett of the same line, bound in the opposite direction, and so injured her that she sunk in from thirty to forty minutes after the collision. The Narragansett took fire. From 200 to 250 persons were on board. The Stonington, and the steamer City of New York, picked up some 250 persons. Twenty-five are known to be lost, and many are missing. The collision occurred between five and six miles from Naybrook, Conn.

The first of the monster engines to be known as class K, has just been run out of the Altoona shops for a trial run. It is intended for the fast trains between this city and New York. The cylinders are one inch in diameter larger than those of any other passenger cylinder in service; and the boiler is made correspondingly large to supply the required amount of steam. The cylinders are 19 x 24, and the driving wheels are five feet eight inches in diameter. It is expected to make sixty miles per hour, and greater speed is hoped for.

It is stated there are 97,000 miles of submarine telegraph cable in working order.

Reports continue to be received of the ravages of the army worm in New Jersey, which following the drought, are likely to make this year a disastrous one for the farmers in portions of that State.

Six steamers sailed from New York on the 12th, and it is said every state room and every berth had its excess, and in some cases, handsome premiums were offered for the privilege of occupying the shipments of merchandise to be large. The city of Chester, for Liverpool, carried 30,011 boxes of cheese.

The import trade of the country for the Fourth month last, amounted to $74,388,000—which has not been equalled in any month for several years—and it exceeds the exports, for the first time since 8th month, 1865. The public debt of the country since 1840, to $1,590,000,000, and the annual interest from $151,000,000 to $80,000,000; in addition to this, there has been a vast reduction in taxation. At the present time, the amount of debt per capita of the population is about $40.

A blast furnace at Pittsburgh recently yielded, in seven consecutive days, the enormous quantity of 1,141 tons of pig-iron. This is said to be unparalleled by any blast furnace in the world.

On the 11th inst., a 20,000 barrel oil tank, situated on an eminence above Titusville, was fired by lightning. The fire was communicated to other tanks and works, and before it was under control had destroyed property to the value of $1,500,000.

The Deputy Marshall's bill was passed by the Senate on the 14th inst., with the House amendments. In the House the Electoral count resolution was considered, but when it became evident that the Republicans did not intend to allow the resolution to be voted on, it was decided to postpone it till next session of Congress. The mortality of Philadelphia during the week ending on the 12th, was 285. Of this number 144 were adults and 141 children.

Markets, &c.—The following were the quotations on the 12th: U. S. sixes, 1881, registered, 100; do. coupon, 107; 5's, 103½; 4's, 110; 4's, registered, 108; do. coupon, 109.

Cotton.—Prices remain about the same as last quoted. Sales of middlings are reported at 12 a 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and refined 8 cts. per gallon.

Flour.—Market dull, but prices without essential change. Penna. extra family, $4.75 a $5; Ohio do. $5 a $5.50; Minnesota, $5.12 a $5.75; patents and fancy, $7.12 a $7.50. Rye-flo. $4.62½. Bran, $14 a $15 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat was unsettled, and on one two cts. per bushel. Red, $1.25; and white, $1.27. Rye 88 cts. per bushel. Corn, western and southern yellow, at 51 a 52 cts.; white, 55 cts. Oats were more active. Sales of white at 42 a 43 cts., and mixed at 38 a 39 cts. per bushel.

Hay and straw.—Average price during the week: Prime timothy, $1.15 a $1.20; do. 100 pounds; mixed, $1, and $1.20 a $1.20 a $1.40.

Wool.—The demand from manufacturers is quite limited, and an unsettled feeling prevails. Among the sales were, Ohio 1 blood at 42 cts.; do. 3 blood 49 cts.; do. medium, 50; washed Penna. 32½ cts.

Lard.—Lined, 66 a 67 cts.; New York, 65 a 75 cts.; Ohio, 49 a 55 cts.; Super, 49 a 50 cts.; winter blend, $1.12 a $1.20 per gallon.

Beef cattle were in demand, and prices were a shade higher: 23 head arrived and sold at the different yards at 31 a 51 cts. per lb. as to condition.

Sheep were in fair demand at former rates; 8000 head sold at the different yards at 31 a 51 cts. per lb., and lambs 5 a 8 cts. per lb. as to quality.

Hogs were unchanged: 5000 head sold at the different yards at 6 a 6½ cts. per lb.

Cows were dull; 180 head sold at $20 a $50 per head.

FOREIGN.—The emigration returns from the Mercury for the last month show that 66,576 ships, with 25,127 passengers, sailed for the United States; thirteen with 3,367 passengers, to British North America, and six ships, with 167 passengers, to South America. The total number of emigrants for the month was 29,992, of whom 7,226 are English, 6,330 Irish, 276 Scotch, and the remainder foreigners.

The municipality of Paris has decided to impose a tax of one penny on each one per cent, on the purchase value of all houses and buildings of every description, the proceeds to be devoted to reducing the octroi duties.

Indian papers report that during the past year thirty divers engaged in the pearl fishery in the Persian Gulf lost their lives, most of them by the victims of the monsoons. The value of the pearls taken in 1879, in the Persian Gulf, was set down at about $1,500,000.

The foreign ambassadors at Constantinople have presented a collective note to the Porte, announcing that the supplementary conference will be held at Berlin, and urging the fulfillment of the non-executed clauses of the treaty of Berlin regarding Greece, Montenegro and Armenia.

Greece, it is said, is already taking measures for a military occupation, after the conclusion of the conference at Berlin, of the provinces which the conference shall award her.

Twenty-five deaths occurred from yellow fever, and fourteen from small-pox in Havana last week.

An Alexandria dispatch says, the Egyptian obelisk has left for the United States.

The Chinese Embassy at Berlin denies all knowledge of war preparations in China.

The University of Tokio (Tokio Daigaku), has published a calendar, which shows that this institution, originally a "translation office," for the interpretation of Dutch books, has undergone progressive modifications, until it is now a well-equipped University, having departments of law, science and literature, while a number of native professors are engaged. There are also several foreign teachers, chiefly Americans.

Japanese teachers were educated either in this country or in Europe, and have been instrumental in developing this native school, until it has attained a high second only to that of the best universities in Europe. There are about two hundred students in the University and twenty-three have been sent to complete their studies in this country or in Europe. The University Memoirs, including illustrated lectures, &c., are printed in English, and are really handsome specimens of typography. The volumes, including drawings, maps, graphs, printing and paper, are of Japanese origin. Under the educational system now fairly established in that country with the Tokio University at its head will not be many years before the Japanese get abreast of the most highly developed nations of the world.

FIRST VOYAGE TO COREA.

Through the co-operation of one of the large British mercantile firms in China, Ernest Oppert was enabled to make his first voyage to Corea. The steamer Rona, belonging to the same, had been chartered for a voyage to another port; and it was arranged that in deviation from her direct course, she should visit the east coast of Corea. Only five days could be allotted for the trip. The object in the first instance was to discover and ascend the Yalu river leading to the capital, and to enter a preliminary communication with the local authorities, with the view to open up commercial and friendly relations with the country. As the position of neither the capital nor the river was known with any precision, it was a difficult problem to decide where to commence a search. Prince Jerome was selected as a starting point, to collect any information attainable in some of the numerous bays adjacent. The first landing, in a small fishing village on Caroline Bay, was made in company with Morrison, the captain of the steamer, and a Chinese interpreter. Most of the inhabitants ran off at their approach, which was scarcely to be wondered at as a steamer had never before entered the bay. A few old and decrepit persons remained, one of whom, a venerable-looking man, our author says: "Come up to me with signs of great deference, bearing in his hands a brazier with charcoal burning in it—this was possibly intended to drive away any evil spirits, for which the simple people may have taken us. But the old gentleman and his friend got visibly more at ease as soon as they found that we came with peaceful and friendly intentions; and when the people on the hills, who had watched our approach attentively, seemed satisfied by the cordial intercourse that there was no danger to be feared, they returned one by one after awhile, and we soon found ourselves surrounded by a large crowd of natives, who with many exclamations, uttered their surprise at our strange looks."

On their return from a walk over the neighboring hills, the old Corean presented his visitors with twenty fine fresh herrings, which were thankfully accepted, and a number of empty bottles and some other trifles given in return. The bottles were quite new to the people, and were eagerly received, though they knew not what to do with them.

At the end of the golf, they met with others of the inhabitants, of whom they inquired for the elder of the largest village in the neighborhood. Here they learned that the name of the capital of the country is Saoul, and a promise was given to send for the highest official of the district, who resided at a distance of some miles. He subsequently came on board the steamer with many other of the curious natives—where he was kindly entertained, and the object of the visit explained to him—viz.—to open commercial and friendly relations with Corea. This was a subject which the old Mandarin very properly said must be referred to the government at Saoul, and he promised to send off a messenger with despatches for that purpose. As the steamer could not be detained from her voyage till the return of the messenger, E. Oppert proposed remaining on shore and carrying on the negotiations, but this was strongly opposed by the local governor, who feared it might subject him to suspicion and danger from the central government. There seemed therefore no course open but to postpone further intercourse to a future visit—and with many expressions of goodwill from the natives, the steamer left Corea.

SECOND VOYAGE TO COREA.

The first visit had convinced E. Oppert that the population of Corea generally shared in the desire to have the barrier removed that separated them from the outer world, and this encouraged him to hope that the Government might be induced to relax its policy of non-intercourse. It was therefore decided to return and renew the effort, with the assistance of the same firm which had before taken part in the enterprise. This conclusion was not altered by the news of the murder of the French missionaries (as mentioned in the previous number of this article) information of which had arrived in the meantime.

A small, light-draught steamer was procured, and Prince Jerome Gulf again visited, both to have a certain starting point for exploration and in hope of obtaining a pilot. Our author says:

"I landed at the foot of a wooded hill which was crowded by natives. I had hardly set my foot on shore, when a great many of these rushed toward me, and ran up to me greatly astonished; and all appearance much delighted; and was I less pleased when I recognized most of them as old acquaintances from my former voyage. The good people seemed really pleased to see me return, and told me that old Ta-wah was still at Heim, and that I should see him soon. My supply of segars was quickly divided amongst them, and I left them discoursing eagerly upon the great news of my reappearance."

The visit of the old Mandarin, Ta-wah, on board of the vessel is thus described:

"Evidently somewhat embarrassed, in the uncertainty how far I had knowledge of what had happened," he came up to me, but appeared much relieved when I expressed neither by words nor looks that I was aware of what had occurred. He seemed overjoyed at seeing me again, though in his heart of hearts he may have wished me a thousand miles away. His finely cut, quite European, features beamed with benevolence and pleasure, and one was almost tempted to believe in the sincerity of his expressions of love and goodwill. Nor do I doubt but that he was personally well and favorably inclined to me—indeed there was no reason why he should not have been so after the previous friendly intercourse between us, and the treatment he had received on board the Rona. But with him and all his colleagues the fear of the Government and of the responsibility which they incurred outweighed all personal feelings and considerations."

"Captain James had gone on shore shortly after daybreak next morning to take observations, but returned immediately after in a state of great excitement. A Corean had come up to him in a mysterious and secret manner, and had delivered to him a letter for me, which he brought at once on board. The letter, written in French, I found to be signed by Monsieur Ridel, one of the three French missionaries who had escaped the fury of the regent, and who, with his unfortunate companions, had now been hunted for months by his officers all over the country. They had been obliged to hide in the mountains, woods, and caverns, and had miserably sustained their lives by the scanty supply of food which compassionate natives secretly contrived to furnish them with. When I looked up, after having perused the letter, I observed two or three natives at some distance from each other, walking up and down opposite our anchorage on the shore, who made the sign of the cross when they saw that I had remarked them. I wrote an answer to Monsieur Ridel on the spot, promising to render him and his companions any assistance within my power, and offering them as a matter of course a refuge on board our steamer. I informed them at the same time of my plan to penetrate as near as possible to the capital, as soon as we had found the river leading to the same, and gave them a sketch of the route I proposed to follow; as the news of our whereabouts spread rapidly enough through the country, they would not find any great difficulty in being directed by friendly natives to the spot where we happened to be."

"As soon as my answer was written I set off for the shore, where I was anxiously awaited by the messengers. They were overjoyed at having at last been able to deliver the letter to its address, and made themselves known as Corean Christians. Unfortunately however, my appearance on shore had attracted a great crowd, whose idle though not ill-intentioned curiosity it was difficult to keep off without creating suspicion against the converts, who were strangers in this part of the country, and though I had much wished to take them on board at once to get further details from them, I desisted at their request on account of the risk they might run. I managed though, with the assistance of the boat's crew to keep the crowd at a distance while I entered into a short conversation with these men and delivered the answer I had written to Monsieur Ridel's letter, while one of them sat down in a spot sheltered from the looks of the people, and wrote down the following: "Ego Philippus, alumnus corensis, secundum pactum cum duobus natis hert ante mediam noctem veni in hunc destinatum locum et tota nocte hic vigilavi, in hac nocte post tenebras navicula veniret optimum erit, nane, etiam hic sumus."

* The murder of the French missionaries.

It was certainly a remarkable sight to see this poor, rough-looking and worn-out native sit down and indite Latin letters as if he had done nothing else all his lifetime. I told him that the ship's boat would be waiting for them at eight o'clock in the evening, and he promised to be punctual at the appointment; now, however, they were anxious to withdraw from the inquisitive looks and questions of the people around us, so I watched until I saw them off safe before I myself returned to the steamer.

Punctually at the hour fixed they were again on the spot, and they were soon safe and sound on board the steamer. There were three of them, a fourth had started back at once ready with my reply to the fugitive missionaries, who were some days' journey distant in the interior. It is almost impossible to describe the joy and happiness of these poor people to find themselves, at least for a time, surrounded by friendly and sympathizing faces, and they hardly knew how to express their gratitude and thankfulness. And I must say it was a sight worth seeing to observe our hush sailors, and all other hands on board rush forward to meet them and shake hands with them—it was a spontaneous tribute offered to the courage and disinterested conduct of these brave fellows.

For forty-eight hours they had not tasted a morsel of food; being strangers in the neighborhood they had not dared to ask for anything for fear of being discovered by the authorities. When their hunger was somewhat appeased they found time to give me a full and detailed account of everything that had occurred since my last visit and of the general state of the country."

Excellent and indispensable as morality of life is, it is only as we come to pass from a state of nature to a state of grace, and our souls experience the renewsings of the Holy Ghost, that our conduct amongst men will redound to the glory of God, and be viewed with acceptance in his pure and holy sight.

* I, Philippus, a Corean disciple, as agreed upon, arrived in this place with two sailors before midnight yesterday, and we have watched here all night. It would be well if a small boat came to-night after dark to fetch us, and we shall also then be here.

An Account of some Expressions of Catharine Burling in her last sickness.

Catharine Burling, daughter of John and Ann Burling of New York, was taken ill of a slow fever, which weakened her gradually, so that, to use her own expressions, she was reduced step by step, all means used for her help proving ineffectual.

When she was brought low and her recovery appeared doubtful, she was for a time under great exercise of mind concerning her future state, and prayed to the Lord for a little more time, and that she might witness a better state, which He was graciously pleased to answer, she not long after saying her mind was changed: she came to witness the child's state, being filled with innocence, often saying, "My mind is like a little child's;" and her heart came to be filled with the love of God; and in the abounding thereof, for several weeks before her departure, she was at times enabled to declare of the Lord's goodness to her in a wonderful manner, and also to exhort many who came to visit her, to amendment of life, that so, when they came to lie on a sick bed, they might be made enjoyers of that peace she was then made a partaker of; often saying she felt his peace flow in her mind as a gentle stream, and that her cup ran over.

Many were the sweet expressions which she uttered, some of which, as near as could be remembered, are here set down, though order of time could not exactly be kept to—"Many wearisome nights have I gone through, and have watered my pillow with my tears. I was long in doubt of my eternal happiness, and in the time of greatest distress I cried to the Lord that He would be pleased to lengthen my time, that I might be more fully prepared for it; and He was graciously pleased to hear and grant my request, and give me a full assurance of it; and He has been pleased to lengthen my time a little longer, that I might speak of his goodness to others, and tell what He has done for my soul. Oh praises! praises! praises! be given to his great and glorious name. My tongue is too short by far. Oh, if I had the tongue of an angel, I could not sufficiently express my gratitude to that gracious God who has been thus pleased to favor me in so eminent a manner.

"My disorder is very changeable—very flattering it would be to some, but it doth not flatter me—I am resigned to the Lord's will; let Him do just as it best pleaseth Him with me, his poor frail creature.

"The work of regeneration is a great work: I know it now experimentally. I am become a new creature: new thoughts, new desires! my affections set on things above. I have a new name written in the Lamb's Book of Life, and the white stone is given to me."

She at the same time advised her brothers and sisters to plainness of speech and apparel, saying, "Remember our blessed Lord, that great pattern of plainness, who when on earth went up and down doing good, and wore a garment without seam. He was crucified—He was nailed to the cross for our sins! for my sins! Oh love inexpressible."

One evening, as her father was sitting by her bedside, she said to him, "Thou art my father; but now I have another Father—I have an Heavenly Father. I love thee dearly, but I love Him much more. Oh, He is the chiefest of ten thousands!"

One morning she told her father that she had had a dream or vision, (whether she was asleep or not she could not tell) which was that she died, and her soul was carried to Heaven, and her blessed Saviour received with open arms into his bosom, saying, "Come thou blessed, inherit the joys prepared for thee."

During the last five weeks of her illness speaking frequently of the Lord's goodness to her, with which she was favored in an extraordinary manner, she said, "I have nothing to do with this world. Oh let my time be employed in praising the Lord, and telling his merciful dealings with my soul."

She would often say, "I am humbly thankful to the Lord for all his favors conferred on me; and when I don't speak I am thankful my heart, and that is more than words. The Lord don't require lip honor, but when a heart is filled I can't help speaking." Another time, "Many are the changes and vicissitudes I experience, and what may concern none of us knows; but I am resigned and thankful to the Lord for all his mercies to me, his poor frail creature. He must be with me just as He pleases; we should be thankful for all the Lord's favors. I hope and pray that I may be kept thankful a humble, meek and low before Him, wait for my change, and a happy change it will be to me."

One morning as her mother and sisters were putting on her clothes, she desired them to stop, and then expressed herself to the effect, "I now no longer wonder that the martyrs could sing in the flames, I could the same."

A Cinerary Urn.

BY SELAH MERRILL.

Among the relics which I brought from the east is a pottery jar which would hold about three pints. It is globe-shaped, with a handle, a small neck and a flaring mouth. The width of the opening is one and one-half inches, and the height of the jar is eight inches. When found it was full of very fine ashes, stopped the mouth of the vessel, but a great deal of the dust sifted out and was lost on the way home. A double-handful remains, however, and portions of this have been subjected to a careful examination. The analysis shows that the powder, or ashes, is of an animal or vegetable origin. The vessel is of such a grade that it is decomposing in our atmosphere. I suspect that this jar is a "cinerary" and contains the ashes of some person who was cremated in ancient times. The real nature or importance of the object did not occur to me when I found it. I do not think I regard it now with anything like sacred feelings, yet my imagination is strangely busy when I reflect upon what these silent ashes may have been. The jar stands quietly in my cabinet, and I consider myself the owner of the mysterious dust which it contains, and hope that no ghost will ever appear to dispute my claim. I found the jar in Egypt in 1874-5 a short piece of railroad was being connected the one leading from Alexandria to Cairo with that leading to Ramleh, I believe. Near Alexandria a cutting had been made through a hill, which was from forty-sixty feet high. On the top were some rail military earth-works. At a depth of at least thirty feet from the top of the hill an graveyard had been struck and cut through, that the level of the road was twenty feet below it. The coffins were all of terra-cotta. There were six, and, at one point, as many as eight tiers of coffins. One tier would be crosses of the one below it, and they were all, apparently, without any regard to the contents of the coffins. Multitudes of the coffins had been broken, and the debris was abundant. Great numbers projected from the ends, and were still perfect. A number of them I broke open, but found generally in them no remains except a little fine dust. In some cases, however, I found small pottery vessels, vases, bottles, &c., placed about whose heads of the dead body would lie. These ornamentation. The coffins themselves, so far as I observed, had no ornamentation on the remains of what were doubtless personal ornaments, bracelets, rings, &c., mostly copper.

When the cutting was first made through the old graveyard a number of valuable objects were found, which went immediately to the collections of private individuals, English, French, or others. Just beyond the beds of coffins, near the foot of the present hill, and about on a level with the road-level, there were the remains of what had been earthen furnaces. These, being found so near the coffins, were much more interesting than the coffins themselves. So far as I could judge of their original form, they were six feet deep, and four feet in diameter, and shaped at the top like the big end of an egg. The form was of brick, and a glance revealed the unstable fact that they had been subjected to very great heat. By the heat, possibly of age, the bricks forming the walls of the furnaces, had been concreted into a solid mass. These furnaces, if they were such, were considerably below the present surface of the hill, and also considerably below the level of the lowest tier of coffins. They may originally have been situated on a plain, or at the foot of a small hill on the top of which would be the cemetery. How the graveyard came to be buried thirty or more feet below the present surface of the ground is something I do not attempt to explain. The fact, however, is well known to explorers in the East, that one must penetrate far beneath the surface if one would find the genuine remains of remote antiquity. The excavations that have been made at Mycenae, Ephesus, Troy, the valley of the Tigris, in Egypt, and in eastern Asia, all prove the truth of the statement just made. It is well known that at Jerusalem, excavations were carried to a depth of sixty, and even to eighty and ninety feet, before the original rock and ground work was struck.

I have endeavored to state all the important facts connected with the locality where the urn which I have described, was found. It was not taken from one of these coffins, nor from one of these furnaces, but from the earth near the latter. The reader who is interested in these details, will be able to find them, I trust, to form an intelligent opinion respecting what I call, with some imitation, of course, a "cinerary urn." "The urn of an unknown body that was burned," "the furnaces that were used for the purposes of cremation."—The Oriental Journal.

An Earnest Appeal.

To J. C.

Providence, 7th of 9th mo. 1781.

I have often had thee in remembrance, since last I saw thee, and now believe it best to write the feelings of my mind; and I desire to speak to that in thee which can savor words, and which has long been visited, and yet continues long in bondage. May I query, Why is it so? Dear cousin, why is it so? Answer, because Pharaoh's heart is hardened, so that he will not let the true Israelitish seed go forth to do sacrifice to the Lord, the everlasting God. Know thou, that plagues and tribulations will attend that hardened heart, unless it submits. And unless there is a giving up to the holy influence of that fire, which burns as an oven (inwardly,) thy lot, I think, will be to drag out a miserable life of emptiness and desolation of soul; when, at the same time, I am as fully satisfied, that by a full surrender, thou mightest come to feed upon the bread of life, and drink of the new wine, with Christ in his Father's kingdom.

I have been discouraged about writing; for, if thou wilt not hearken to the voice within, in vain might one rise even from the dead, to invite thee. Take this not as rough language. It is in the breathings of my soul for thy welfare, that I am engaged thus to call upon thee to make no longer delay, lest the night overtake thee; but improve the present time. Now is the accepted time. Now is the visitation continued. How long ere it may be too late, we know not. Great is the consequence to thy immortal soul. Oh! I entreat thee stand out no longer. Resist no longer the offers of God's loving-kindness to thee! What satisfaction canst thou have in the thoughts of spending all thy days in thralldom, in Egyptian bondage? Or what reason hast thou to think it will ever be easier than now, to make a full revolt from under the government of the king of tyrants? Let thy comrades laugh; and let deists argue as they please. He who knows not the peace of God that passeth mere human understanding, notwithstanding all his wit and all his cunning, is, as to the inward state of his soul, in a land of emptiness, famishing and starving for want of that food which only nourisheth to eternal life.

Farewell, says thy true friend and cousin.

Indian Training.

The Council Fire, in a sketch of William J. Pollock, one of the Indian Inspectors, gives a lively account of the removal of the Sioux Indians of Spotted Tail's band from their old homes to the reservation at Rosebud. W. J. Pollock was then their Agent, and had won the confidence of the chiefs. He suggested that to save expense they should move themselves independent of contractors, and it was done at a trifling cost. The disappointed contractors were astonished at his "audacity," but hoped to make large profits on the hauling of supplies—for 6,000 people were to be fed, and building material to be transported over one hundred miles from navigation. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs advertised for bids for freighting. The contractors thinking that outside parties could not get their teams and wagons on the ground in time, put in exorbitant bids. The Commissioner telegraphed Colonel Pollock that the bids were too high. One hundred light wagons and harness for four hundred horses were shipped to Rosebud lauding. With these Colonel Pollock commenced Indian freighting. The scene is thus described:—

"Agent Pollock, accompanied by Spotted Tail, had also come down to the landing to expedite matters in furtherance of the enterprise.

"The labor of putting the wagons and harness together was a work of several days, the great chief watching the proceedings in the meantime with an interest difficult to describe. Not a thing escaped his attention. If a nut or a bolt was forgotten by the mechanics, the quick eye of Spotted Tail readily detected the omission, and he instantly pointed it out. As soon as a wagon was put together it was drawn to the warehouse, loaded, numbered and an inventory taken of its contents, after which it was hauled up on the plateau, until the whole hundred wagons, covered with canvas, stood in order on the line of a semicircle. On the arrival of 'Horned Antelope' at the agency, the Indians hurriedly gathered their ponies, and without waiting for each other, or starting in any kind of order, dashed away for the river as fast as horseflesh could carry them; some accompanied by their squaws, each striving to reach the wagons first. When they came over the brow of the hill and saw the wagons standing in line, their enthusiasm knew no bounds; their yells of delight could have been heard for miles up and down the river. No war-whoop ever awakened louder echoes. Then they dashed down the hill and circled round and round their new wagons, their ponies at full speed, war feathers flying in the air, whooping, yelling, some erect, some leaning over so far that they could view the field from under their flying ponies.

"All night long their camp fires were kept up, and their weird songs rang out upon the air. With the morning came the time for the transition from the breech-clothed savage to the man beginning his career in civilization. Before the distribution of the wagons took place the roll was called, and a suit of clothing issued to each of these embryo teamsters. Then came the change. Blankets were thrown aside, pantaloons were drawn upon legs for the first time, vests followed, then coats, then hats, and the transformation from the wild, roving, idle and careless savage in one brief moment was complete, and a hundred men clad in the garb of civilization had taken their places.

"The harnessing of ponies then commenced. The harness was too large; the Indians did not know how to adjust it to the animals; but all the employees under the direction of the agent lent a helping hand, and this part of the work was soon completed.

"As soon as a team was harnesses and hitched to a wagon, an effort was made to start. Some of the ponies went backward, refusing to pull a pound; some forward, while others at full gallop went dashing in every direction. The Indians did not know how to drive; their animals having never been driven. The rattling of wagons, the sight of those flying past, added to the excitement and made confusion perfect. * * *

"The effect of this adventure had been wonderful, for not only have the most sanguine expectations as to cheap transportation been fully realized, but incidentally and unconsciously the Indians' hereditary prejudice against labor has been broken down, and the problem, so long presented, "How best to induce wild Indians to abandon an idle and shiftless life for one involving manual labor," is at last approaching solution."

* The Indian courier sent to announce the arrival of the wagons.

These two experiments were successfully executed with wild Indians, and without the aid or presence of military or other restraining or impelling influences, save the indomitable will and character of the Agent.

Training of Children.

"Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it." These are inspired words. Train up a child in the way he should go.

The question is often asked, "How is it that so many children of professedly Christian parents grow up without becoming Christians, and in many instances are worldly and ungodly?" Does it not result from the neglect of proper early training?

What strange carelessness and indifference is manifested in watching over the tender plants of childhood! Blighting worldly influences are allowed to possess the opening mind, and no anxiety felt for the result. Children are committed to the care of improper nurses and governesses; educated in schools where religion is ignored; entertained in parties of the gay and thoughtless; admitted to friendships low and debasing, where God is dishonored and his cause lightly esteemed. The spirit of the age is extremely lax in family discipline. Children must be allowed great independence; great liberality must be exercised toward them, and nothing must be done to bring them under any rules of home government. Indeed, the governing power in many families is committed to the children. In how many home circles may it be said, Children rule here.

The government of the family was early committed to its head by Divine authority. The Lord said of Abraham: "I know him that he will command his children and household after him; and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment, and that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which I have spoken of him." What hath the Lord spoken of Abraham that He might bring upon him? It reads thus: "I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee." Of course this blessing was to be secured by his commanding his children and household after him. "Command," as used here, is a very significant word, showing that it is the duty of parents to govern the family.

Parents cannot be too careful and attentive in properly directing and instructing the youthful minds committed to their care. While they "command" or govern, they should do it wisely, giving to the household circle a pleasing, cheerful, loving aspect, contributing in every possible way consistent with Christian principle, to make home the pleasantest place on earth. Religious light should shine there with a clear, steady brightness. Where the home is right, government properly administered, religion taught as it should be by precept and example, and illustrated in all of the social and domestic relations, and a genial, warm, pleasant feeling, running through all of the family circle, there, the young life will develop and show its richer, nobler qualities in its advance to manhood; and such has been its training that it will experience a powerful influence in restraining it from evil and in guiding it in the way of truth and righteousness.—Christian Union.

WAIT.

Wait! for the day is breaking,
Though the dull night be long:
Wait! Heart is not forsaking
Thy heart. Be strong—be strong!

Wait! and the clouds of sorrow
Shall melt in gentle showers,
And hues from heaven shall borrow,
As they fall amidst the flowers.

Wait! 'tis the key to pleasure,
And to the plan of God;
Oh, tarry thou his leisure,
Thy soul shall bear no load.

Wait! for the time is hastening
When life shall be made clear,
And all who know heart-wasting
Shall feel that God is dear.

RAIN IN SUMMER.

H. W. LONGFELLOW.

How beautiful is the rain!
After the dust and heat,
In the broad and fiery street,
In the narrow lane,
How beautiful is the rain!

How it clatters along the roofs,
Like the tramp of hoofs!
How it gushes and struggles out
From the throat of the overflowing spout!
Across the window-pane
It pours and pears;
And swift and wise,
With a muddy tide,
Like a river, down the gutter roars
The rain, the welcome rain!

The sick man from his chamber looks
At the twisted brooks;
He can feel the cool
Breath of each little pool;
His fevered brain
Grows calm again
And he breathes a blessing on the rain.

From the neighboring school
Come the boys
With more than their wonted noise
And commotion;
And down the wet streets
Sail their mimic fleets
Till the treacherous pool
Inflates them in its whirling
And turbulent ocean.

In the country on every side,
Where far and wide,
Like a leopard's tawny and spotted hide
Stretches the plain,
To the dry grass and the dryer grain
How welcome is the rain!

In the furrowed land
The toilsome and patient oxen stand;
Lifting the yoke-encumbered head,
With their dilated nostrils spread,
They silently inhale
The clover-scented gale,
And the vapors which arise
From the well-watered and smoking sod
Seem to thank the Lord
More than man's spoken word.

Near at hand
From under the sheltering trees,
The farmer sees
His pastures and his fields of grain,
As they bend their tops
To the numberless beating drops
Of the incessant rain.
He counts it as no sin
That he sees therein
Only his own thrift and gain.

Selected.

These, and far more than these
The poet sees!
He can behold

Aquarius old
Walking the fenceless fields of air;
And from each ample fold
Of the clouds about him rolled Scattering everywhere
The showery rain
As the farmer scatters his grain.

He can behold
Things manifold
That have not been wholly told,—
Have not been wholly sung or said,
For his thought that never stops,
Follows the water-drops
Down to the graves of the dead,
Down through chasms and gulfs profound,
To the dreary fountain head
Of lakes and rivers underground;
And sees them when the rain is done,
On the bridge of colors seven
Climbing up once more to heaven,
Opposite the setting sun.

Thus the seer,
With vision clear,
Sees forms appear and disappear
In the perpetual round of strange,
Mysterious change
From birth to death, from death to birth,
From earth to heaven, from heaven to earth,
Till glimpses more sublime
Of things, unseen before,
Unto his wondering eyes reveal
The universe as an immeasurable wheel
Turning forevermore
In the rapid and rushing river of Time.

About Debt.

Living beyond their incomes is the ruin of many of my neighbors; they can barely afford to keep a rabbit, and must needs drive a pony and chaise. I am afraid extravagance is the common disease of the times, and many professing Christians have caught it, to the shame and sorrow. Good cotton or stockings are not good enough now-a-days; gowns must have silks and satins, and then there is a bill at the dressmaker's as long as a winter's night, and quite as dismal. Show and smartness run away with a man's meal and keep the family poor, and the father's neck on the grindstone. Frogs try to look as big as bulls, and burst themselves. A pound week apes five hundred a year, and comes the county court. Men burn the candle both ends, and then say they are very unfortunate—why don't they put the saddle on a right horse, and say they are extravagant. Economy is half the battle in life; it is no hard to earn money as to spend it we. Hundreds would have never known want, they had not first known waste. Dear in some people are much too fine now-a-days; eat what their fathers were thankful to sit on the table, and so they please their palate with costly feeding, come to the work-house and expect everybody to pity them. They turned up their noses at bread and butter and came to eat raw turnips stolen out of fields. They who live like fighting-cocks other men's costs will get their combs cut, perhaps get roasted for it one of these days. If you have a great store of peas, you may put the more in the soup; but everybody should fare according to his earnings. He both a fool and a knave who has a shilling coming in, and on the strength of it spends a pound which does not belong to him.

Now, if owing leads to lying, who shall say that it is not a most evil thing? Of course there are exceptions, and I do not want.

hard upon an honest man who is brought by sickness or heavy losses; but take rule as a rule, and you will find debt to a great dismal swamp, a huge mud-hole, a y ditch: happy is the man who gets out it after once tumbling in, but happiest all is he who has been by God's goodness t out of the mire altogether. Where a has laid one egg, she is very likely to lay ther; when a man is once in debt, he is ly to get into it again; better keep clear from the first. He who gets in for a ny will soon be in for a pound, and when a is an over shoer, he is very liable to be r boots. Never owe a farthing, and you never owe a guinea.

ly motto is, pay as you go, and keep from ill scores. Short reckonings are soon red. Pay what you owe, and what you're th you'll know. Better go to bed with your supper than get up in debt. Sin debt are always more than we think a to be. Little by little a man gets over head and ears. It is the petty expenses empty the purse. Money is round, and away easily. Tom Thriftless buys that does not want because it is a great bar-
; and so is soon brought to sell what does want, and finds it a very little bar-
; he cannot say "No" to his friend who ts him to be security; he gives grand ers, makes many holidays, keeps a fat e, lets his wife dress fine, never looks after servants, and by-and-by he is quite sur-d to find the quarter days come round so fast, and that his creditors bark so loud.
assowed his money in the field of thought-ness, and now he wonders that he has to the harvest of poverty. Still he hopes something to turn up to help him out of cultry, and so muddles himself into more ble, forgetting that hope and expectations fool's income. Being hard up, he goes market with empty pockets, and buys at ever prices tradesmen like to charge him, so he pays them double, and gets deeper deeper into the mire. This leads him to ming, and trying little tricks and meanges, for it is hard for an empty sack to d upright. This is sure not to answer, schemes are like spiders' webs, which can or catch anything better than flies, and soon swept away. As well attempt to ken your shoes with brown paper, or stop d window with a sheet of ice, as to try atch up a falling business with manoeuvring scheming. When the schemer is found he is like a dog in church, whom every-y kicks at, and like a barrel of powder,
h nobody wants for a neighbor.

hey say poverty is a sixth sense, and it need be, for many debtors seem to have the other five, or were born without consensus, for they appear to fancy that they only make debts, but pay them by borrow-

A man pays Peter with what he has owed of Paul, and thinks he is getting of his difficulties, when he is putting one in the mud to pull his other foot out. It ard to shave an egg, or to pull hairs out bald pate, but they are both easier than ng debts out of an empty pocket. Samson a strong man, but he could not pay debts out money, and he is a fool who thinks an do it by scheming. As to borrowing ey of loan societies, it's like a drowning catching at razors. A man must cut n his outgoings and save his incomings if he wants to clear himself; you can't spend your penny and pay debts with it too. Stint the kitchen if the parse is bare. Don't believe in any way of wiping out debts except by paying hard cash. Promises make debts, and debts make promises, but promises never pay debts; promising is one thing, and performing is quite another. A good man's word should be as binding as an oath, and he should never promise to pay unless he has clear prospect of doing so in due time; those who stave off payment by false promises deserve no mercy. It is all very well to say, "I'm very sorry," but

A hundred years of regret,

Pay not a farthing of debt.

Now, I'm afraid all this sound advice might as well have been given to my master's cocks and hens as to those who have got in the way of spending what is not their own, for advice to such people goes in at one ear and out at the other; well, those who refuse cheap advice will have to buy dear repentance; but to young people beginning life, a word may be worth a world, and this shall be John Ploughman's short sermon, with three leads to it—always live a little below your means, never get into debt, and remember—

He who goes a borrowing

Goes a sorrowing.

—C. H. Spurgeon.

Favored Meetings.—Job Scott, writing from Philadelphia in 1786 says: "The awfulness, the solemnity, and reverent abased waiting before the Lord, in these highly favored meetings, bows my soul in grateful admiration of that glory, that so often and so abundantly and overshadowingly, filled the Lord's house on these precious and important occasions.
Ah me! may I ever humbly retain a sense of it, proportionate to the gracious condescension of an all-powerful God, to poor, unworthy, and as to Him, unprofitable servants. I expect the day of adversity will soon be set over against this precious day of prosperity. But as the prosperous day is and has been, far more in a humble, silent feeling of Divine fulness and sufficiency, than in words, even in that which in great degree swallows up and supercedes many words, I have some hope of escaping without such deep returns of painful strippings as has sometimes followed the most open and freely flowing verbal communications. However, the way has been pretty open in that sense too; but as it has been thankfully felt, that a very few words in right authority do much more than a multiplicity out of it, the business of these meetings has been conducted with the fewest words, and yet with far the most life, of any I ever attended."

Hit in a Nipkin.—Not many years ago a man appeared at the counter of the bank in Middletown, Connecticut, asking and receiving specie for bills on the bank to the amount of one thousand dollars. He had kept these bills just as he had received them more than twenty years before. If he had deposited them in a savings-bank and allowed them to remain on interest, he might have drawn almost three times the amount at the end of this long interval.

How many men will appear at the judgment to give an account of their stewardship, with their talents as little improved by wise and diligent use. To hold aloof from the service of the Lord is foolish, unprofitable, and dangerous. God gives faculties and opportunities to be cultivated and improved by diligent service. Let every man see to it that he make the most of himself and of his opportunities for advancing the glory of God in the world, for every man must give account of himself to God.

From the "Herald of Truth."

Abstain from all Appearance of Evil.—1 Thess. v. 22.

This is a text that we should always bear in mind; but I fear that some of us are too forgetful, and sometimes go in the way of evil men instead of turning away. Each one should examine himself to see if he has been living up to the text. When a professor of religion goes to the theatre "to see what people can do," thinking that these things make no difference, from whence are such thoughts?
Is there not in it all an appearance of evil,
which the text teaches us to avoid?

Perhaps some professor of Christianity, who reads this, is in the habit of going into the saloon for pleasure and pastime. This is a bad place to pass a way time in; there is nothing found there that is good to read, no Bible, no religious books. But there stands the billiard table and other objects for amusement. Is there not in the act of going to such a place, an appearance of evil that the text requires us to avoid?

Sometimes in public places there is jesting, and profane language is used, and persons are entertained and amused; and how often are professors of religion sent to listen to and take part with evil men. Such things suit the carnal mind, which is at enmity with God.
If we are indulging that which is enmity against God, and makes us his enemies, how can we expect to be his sons and daughters?

Another very common appearance of evil is the manifestation of pride among all classes of people. They try to excel one another in building fine houses, in riding in fine carriages, and wearing fine clothes. Others manifest their pride by trying to gain honor of men being highly esteemed in the world. Sometimes parents assume to avoid the appearance of evil in fashionable dressing by putting modest apparel on themselves, while their children are indulged in all their vanity, and even the innocent little babe is arrayed in a manner unbecoming for people who profess to follow the teachings of the New Testament, the parent claiming that these things make no difference. This is setting a trap for Satan in which to catch the children. What is wrong for us to do, is also wrong to be taught to the children. Avoid all appearance of evil by "training up the child in the way he should go."

Dear reader, let us avoid all appearance of evil, that when our time here is ended, we may meet God in peace; and meet also the little children who have gone before, not clothed after the vanities of the world, but with the pure white robes of the righteousness of Christ.

That we may also mingle in the company of pious forefathers, in higher enjoyment than that furnished by the saloon and the theatre.
—Peter A. Blough.

Poverty is the load of some, and wealth is the load of others, perhaps the greater load of the two. It may weigh them to perdition.
Bear the load of thy neighbor's poverty, and let him bear with thee the load of thy wealth.
Thou lightenest thy load by lightening his.

"A Missionary Whip."—Andrew Chernside, a recent traveller in Central Africa, has placed in the hands of Dr. Cameron, M. P., a whip, with which he states that the missionaries at a mission station established near Lake Nyassa are in the habit of flogging their refractory converts. The whip consists of several very thick thongs, and is a more formidable weapon of punishment than the Navy cut which was exhibited at the House of Commons last year. The subject is, we hear, likely to undergo official investigation.—London Paper.

[We hope the "official investigation" will evince that the whip has been used for some other purpose than to punish "refractory converts." Pending this, it is wise to withhold a judgment. The religion of Christ can only be set up in the hearts of men by its Divine Author, and no man can forward this work except as he is qualified and commissioned for the service by Him who is Head over all things to his Church. We are scarcely prepared to believe that among Protestant missionaries there are any so ignorant of the first principles of the Gospel, as to suppose that outward force can produce inward conviction. If the reports of A. Chernside are correct, it is most likely that the instrument of punishment is used to maintain outward order and the police regulations of the communities—for in the unsettled condition of some parts of Africa, the tendency would be for the missionary establishments to become centres of civil government, as well as of educational and religious influence.]

Spread of the Bible.—At the last anniversary of the General Prussian Bible Society, Professor Theodor Christlieb, of Bonn, spoke of some length concerning the spread of the Bible throughout the world, and its mission among many peoples. "At the commencement of this century we had translations of the Scriptures in only about fifty languages, and about five million copies of the precious Book were spread abroad; and to-day it is translated into three hundred and eight languages and dialects, and circulated to an extent of one hundred and fifty million copies. That I call a boundless course! It is my comfort, when I look out upon the adversaries of the [Bible], that the greater part of all the inhabitants of the earth, if they can read at all, can read [it]. Then it is spread in those languages which are the most widely understood in the world. I may mention the sacred language of the Mohammedans, the Arabic. In that a most excellent translation has appeared, and has already gone everywhere. From Fez and Morocco on through Africa, from Constantinople on through all Asia Minor to Persia, there are innumerable villages and cities, in which a copy of the Holy Scriptures is to be found. [It] is spread also through eastern Asia. For from thirty to forty years the Chinese have had the translation of the Bible made by Morrison, and to-day they have a translation in a style as elegant as any in the world.

The Holy Land.—Some interesting facts have been published, showing the progress which has been made in the Holy Land during the past quarter of a century. Great extensions have taken place in the larger towns, and in Jerusalem the number of houses has been more than doubled in the twenty-five years. Bethelhem conveys the impressio of a newly-built town, and the same may be said of Nazareth. Nearly all the houses have now glass windows, a rare thing twenty years ago, while on several buildings clocks have been placed which strike the hours. European furniture, chairs, sofas, and tables are now common. Great advances have been made in agriculture, and in the vicinity of Jerusalem the land has all been taken up, trees have been planted and cisterns dug. Bells are now allowed to be tolled in Christian places of worship; old Christian church-buildings have been restored, and new ones built in many towns.

Natural History, Science, &amp;c.

Protection against Mosquitos and other Insects.—W. Chappel, in Nature, recommends for this purpose a weak solution of Quassia, made by boiling Quassia chips in successive baths of water, so as to use eight gallons of water to one pound of Quassia chips. This he found effectual in preserving his peach trees and grape vines from blight. A young friend of his, who had been severely bitten by mosquitos, dipped her hands in the quassia-water at night, and left it to dry on her face. This was a perfect protection, and continued to be so whenever applied.

Lightning.—A tall tree at Geneva, Switzerland, having been struck by lightning, was examined by Prof. Colladen, who states as his belief, that the electricity descends as a sheet or shower, running down the smaller branches to the trunk. This is a poorer conductor than the branches, which are generally wet by rain, and contain more of the natural moisture of the plant; and therefore the heat and repulsive effects of the electricity are generally manifested there. Some trees, as the poplar, are less liable to injury than others, being better conductors. The presence of water near the root is often the determining cause of its attraction for the electric fluid. Large trees placed near a house may serve as very efficient lightning conductors, but always on the indispensable condition that there is no well or running water on the opposite side of the house, for in that case, the lightning, if it struck the tree, might pass through the house on its way to the water. This same principle should be considered in placing lightning rods, which are much more effective when the part entering the ground has a connection with water.

Fire by Air Compression.—Captain Gill describes an instrument for making a light in use among the natives of Easter's Tibet. It consists of a wooden cylinder, two and a half inches long by three-quarters of an inch in diameter. This is closed at one end; the bore being about the size of a stout quill or pen, an air tight piston fits into this, with a large flat knob at the top. The other end of the piston is slightly hollowed out, and a very small piece of tinder is placed in the cup thus formed. The cylinder is held in one hand, the piston inserted, and pushed about half way down; a very sharp blow is then delivered with the palm of the hand on to the top of the knob; the hand must at the same time close on the knob, and instantly withdraw the piston, when the tinder will be found alight. The compression of the air produces heat enough to light the tinder; but this will go out again unless the piston is withdrawn very sharply.

A Dangerous Material.—The late fire in the bonded warehouse at Leory and Washington streets, whereby $5,000,000 worth of store property was put in jeopardy, spontaneous broke out, the Custom House and insurance people say, not among the bales of wool but in a lot of German black silk twist. There were many boxes of this dangerous material in the place. It is imported by merchants large quantities from Germany. The raw silk is sent thither for coloring. The chemical used in the German process gives a thread a glossiness and weight which can be obtained elsewhere. So dangerous, however, becomes the material when thus prepared, that in its exportation it is packed perforated boxes to permit free access of a

Not long ago, a case of what was classed silk goods was brought out of the hold of Bremen steamship. The case had not been long on the wharf when it was discovered to be on fire. It was immediately thrown in water, and after the fire was extinguished was discovered that the case contained German black silk twist.

The ready combustibility of the silk in question is said to be due to a certain acid used in its preparation. Under very ordinary conditions evaporation takes place, and the silk becomes burning hot. When cooled it is found to be completely rotten.

The Army Worm.—The army worm which is now devouring the crops of portions of Long Island and New Jersey, is the grub of a nocturnal moth known to entomologists as Leucania unipuncta. The moth when first extended is about an inch long and an inch and three-quarters in width from tip to tip, and is of a yellowish-drab color inclining russet. Its fore-wings—for the leucania, like all other lepidoptera, has two sets of wings—are each decorated with one dot near center and a dusky oblique stripe at the tip. It generally deposits its eggs at the base of perennial grass stalks about the end of June or early in July, and they are hatched the next spring. For about a month after they are hatched they feed voraciously upon vegetation, and then descend into the ground, where in an oval chamber, the larva changes to a shining, mahogany-colored chrysalis, which in two weeks develops into the imago, a mature insect, by killing which the bird multitudes of offspring may be prevented. The larva or worm, when it has attained full growth, is from an inch to an inch and three-quarters long; dark gray, and marked with three narrow, yellowish stripes above and a broader one of the same color or slightly darker upon each side. It is thinly clothed with short hairs, and has a black line on head shaped like the letter V. The larva is fully furnished with apparatus for mastication and sets out on its travels, doing nothing but creep and gnaw the vegetation that comes in its way. When the insect appears in its incalculably vast armies as those in which has come this year, farmers and gardeners at a loss for means to stay its progress, in ordinary times it may be destroyed by London purple or Paris green, and its way may be cut off by trenches dug in the line of its advance. Preventive measures are plunging of an infested field in the autumn to destroy the eggs, or burning the stub over the eggs. Natural enemies of the worm are crows and blackbirds, hogs and ichneumon flies, which later are the deadly foe to the lepidoptera. They deposit their eggs

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 26, 1850.

We condense from The British Friend the following account of London Yearly Meeting. It has been a satisfaction to notice a concern manifested by several Friends on different occasions to check the departures from the ancient practices of the Society—departures which often involve a want of allegiance to its doctrines and testimonies.

At the Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight, held 5th mo. 17th, "in the report from York Quarterly Meeting, reference was made to invitations having been given to ministers of their Meeting on Ministry and Oversight to hold meetings in the chapels of some other denominations. This led to an enquiry how these meetings were held, when it appeared that the service had not been always in accordance with the sentiments and practice of Friends. A considerable amount of discussion followed, mostly deprecating a compliance with the observances of others on these occasions, as directly tending to an infraction of the Society's testimony in regard to Worship and Ministry.

One Friend observed that—In the manner of holding these meetings a very important principle is involved. The author of the little work called 'The Free Church of Ancient Christendom,' says, 'The special priesthood could never have arisen in the Christian Church in any other way than by a shameful abdication on the part of believers of the universal one left by the apostles.'

The individual believers placed on one man the responsibility of the preaching, praying, and conducting the service. Friends hold this universal individual priesthood of believers under the one Head and High Priest. If we believe that Christ has come, we must also believe that the types and shadows of the law, and the priesthood under the law, are done away, that we each have access through Him by the one Spirit unto the Father. The principle on which our meetings are held is, that each man and woman there has this access, and that we do not know on which individual the vocal service may fall. If we abandon this principle, it will be an abdication of our individual priesthood as believers, and of the liberty we each one have for exercising our responsible position therein."

At the meeting of the same body 5th mo. 18th, "Helen Bilk returned the certificate given her in 1877 for religious service in the United States. She briefly alluded to her having been recalled by her Monthly Meeting, in consequence of her having ceased to be in harmony with Friends in regard to Water Baptism, and the partaking of bread and wine at the Lord's Supper. From her own confession, her labors as a minister had little to distinguish them as expositions of the distinctive views of Friends; and because she believed the Divine blessing had been vouchsafed to her ministrations, she seemed to infer that she had been guided aright therein. Though out of unity with Friends, she considered herself still commissioned by the Lord to preach the Gospel, and she would not voluntarily sever herself from the Society of Friends.

Quite a number of Friends spoke to the case—all of them much to the same import, viz.—that it could not be expected of any meeting to grant a certificate to an applicant who was known to be out of unity with the Society on points of doctrine, though such persons might not, as a matter of necessity, be hastily disowned."

The Yearly Meeting at large commenced on Fourth day, 5th mo. 19th. At this session some discussion arose as to the admission to the Yearly Meeting of members of the bodies in Norway, south of France and elsewhere with which a correspondence was maintained. The subject was referred to the Meeting for Sufferings, to make report on next year.

The epistle from the Bins Meeting in Ohio elicited the following comments:

"Charles Thompson thought that attaching as we did a great importance to those yearly letters between the Yearly Meetings, it well became us to consider whether they really answered their end in keeping up brotherly affection between us, or whether they did not sometimes tend to shut the door of real intercourse. He felt that if we based our union with Ohio Yearly Meeting on such a document as this it would be but a loose bond. This epistle had come from a body which we had recognized since 1855, but which was then a secession from the original Yearly Meeting. The original body was still existing, composed of solid and worthy Friends, with whom we might have sweet fellowship, but towards whom we had shut the door of access and isolated ourselves. He hoped that the time would come when this Yearly Meeting would consider the whole question of our correspondence with these American meetings, for he felt that it should embrace Friends more widely than it did. Ohio was not a solitary instance. There were several other Yearly Meetings in the Western States and Canada in this unsettled condition. He could not but feel that it was unwise on our part hastily to recognize one body to the exclusion of others. We could not set aside the claims of the original body; and he thought that we might well open up the case, and see if we could not renew our connection with that larger body.

William Graham could not recollect such a document being sent to the Yearly Meeting. He felt obliged to call attention to the unsatisfactory nature of almost the whole of it. He regretted with Charles Thompson our action in 1855.

Joseph Arnfield agreed. He considered that this epistle contained that which any sound Friend would have declared to be most unsound doctrine. He commented on its dogmatical character, and doubted whether it was possible for us to receive such a document with any degree of satisfaction or respect."

5th mo. 20th. It was agreed to raise a fund by sub-cription to assist in building meeting-houses in the limits of Kansas and North Carolina Yearly Meetings.

In connection with the reports from the Quarterly Meetings, it was thought by some that they did not convey the same full information as to the state of the Society as was formerly given by the Queries and Answers. "William Graham believed that we had suffered from the abolition of so many of the answered Queries. In our various Meetings for Discipline there was now practically nothing to bring the state of our Society before us. He referred to the faithful ministry of our late Friend Sarah Grubb, and he thought that eggs, larvae and pupae of these insects, and paying attention to the army worm they three or four white eggs upon his skin behind the head, and when the ichneumon eggs are hatched, they proceed at once to devour a meal of their involuntary host. Near-incident with the appearance of the army worm on Long Island was that of a "strange" which is now commonly thought by the people to be the parent of the worm, but is much more likely that the fly was the nemeton instinctively seeking a home and ample food for its young, yet unborn. The nemeton fly itself is harmless to man, and the sake of the good that it does should be recommended by him, as also should the dead crow which has been shown to be more feasible to the farmer by reason of the insects which it destroys, than it is troublesome to him in the cornfield.—New York World.

any glorious things, according to the monition of the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles, do accompany those that wait upon the Lord, and are enjoyed by them. One day, "They that wait upon the Lord, I want no good thing." This one sentence sufficient to try all pretended waiters upon the Lord. Poverty, blindness and nakedness, weakness of soul and barrenness of heart, are no daily companions; so, instead of wanting no good thing, they want all good things coming to their inward man.

Another could say, they that wait upon the Lord, their strength shall be renewed, they shall mount upward as upon eagles' wings, without weariness, run without fainting, carry a formal professor can be a living wit of these things; such may infallibly come, though they are deceived and mistaken in the cause, when the effect doth not follow; this is the testimony of truth to all sects—freedom, let them profess what they will, yet though it be the truth itself, if they do not the good things, if they feel not strength renewed so as to run without sin, and walk without fainting; if they do not from grace to grace, from knowledge to knowledge; if they increase not with the use of God in the inward man; if they do their own souls with a vain, dead, fruitless profession; which profits nothing, but will exhale like smoke in the day of the Lord.—Shewen.

one of the marks of an enthusiastic and ideal state of mind, is a fiery, an unreasoned impetuosity of feeling; a rushing on, sometimes very blindly, as if the world were danger, or as if the great Creator were not to be felt. It is not only feeling without a degree of judgment, but, what is the apting and fatal trait, it is feeling without a due degree of confidence in God.—T. C. Am.

our own real good is in God. Other things in a lower sense, good, as He is pleased to give us real enjoyment in them; but by these, we must be separated from them all, for a short time only, but forever. How full then, that we be so prepared to take fiction in Him only, as that this greater may not deprive us of our happiness.—Scott.

you cannot dream yourself into a character, must hammer and forge yourself one.

modern innovation and worldliness were eating the life of our Society away. When should we stop? We had gone so far astray from our right path, that we doubted whether it was possible to stray further. Let us return to these principles, which, upheld by Dewsbury, and vindicated by Barclay, it was remarkable to see, remained unchallenged to this hour. Rather let us return as a Society to our old standard, than see other bodies raised up to take our place."

The tabular statement showed the whole number of members 14,892. The deaths during the year were reported to be 283, and the births 231. Of 108 members married during the year 48 were married to non-members. The number of public meetings for Worship was 309.

In the deliberation on the state of Society, attention was called to the danger of losing our distinguishing characteristics in the attempt to be universal. We must be willing to work within the limits which it has pleased our Father in Heaven to set us. Because we think it pleased God to work through a Whitfield, or Wesley, or Fenlon, or Cramer; we must not therefore work in the same lines. If we keep under the guidance of the Spirit of Christ, but within the limitations in which He has been pleased to place us, we shall find room enough to use all our energies and faculties.

Another Friend referred to the laxity of doctrines allowed in our ministry, till our message has come to be the same as that of other churches; and we have to teach the truths of Quakerism as an after process; and our younger members have come to look upon Christianity and Quakerism as different things. It will not be talents or riches, but the Spirit itself that must give us power. Another spoke of the importance of frequent, private retirement for the renewal of our spiritual strength. Another said that if we are living Christians, our religion will influence our whole lives, wherever we are and whatever we are about. Attention was called to novel reading as deadening to the spiritual life and one form of that worldliness, which another Friend said was making havoc amongst many. He stated "he had heard in one case that more than half the members of one meeting frequented either the theatre, oratorios or concerts. He had spoken to an elder, who was also an overseer on the subject. He was powerless, he said, and so not a word was said to them about it."

The further account is postponed to our next number.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Congress adjourned at noon on the 16th inst., all the annual appropriation bills having been passed and signed by the President. His veto of the Deputy Marshal's bill was not read, but remained on the table of the Senate at the time of adjournment. During the session just closed, 117 bills and joint resolutions were introduced in the Senate, and 428 bills and joint resolutions in the House. Besides a large number not yet reported from the committees, there remained at adjournment about 800 bills and resolutions on the calendar of the Senate, and about 1400 bills and resolutions on the calendar of the House. In the Cabinet meeting on the 15th inst., Secretary Evans pre-ent the affidavits of the captain and crew of the Philadelphia schooner, recently fired by a Spanish cruiser. It was decided that an explanation should be demanded of the Spanish Government.

The President has appointed General Hartranft to be acting collector of customs for Philadelphia. He will assume the duties of his office when his bond is filed.

The War Department has received a telegram from General Whipple at Chicago, confirming the report of the surrender of part of Sitting Bull's Sioux—385 Indians surrendered at Fort Keogh.

Red Cloud and Spotted Tail, who, with other Sioux chiefs have been in Washington for several days, had a "farewell talk" with Secretary Schurz on the 19th, and expressed warm approval of the Indian Schools at Hampton and Carlisle.

The Government has in contemplation a survey of the Gulf Stream, from its origin to its final whirl around the Saragossa Sea. The plan embraces soundings, deep sea temperatures, and current observations. The practical value of the proposed work, in its bearings on commerce and meteorology, is very great.

What is claimed to be the fastest time on record between Philadelphia and Jersey City, was recently made on the Pennsylvania railroad, the distance, 90 miles, was travelled in 93 minutes. Four stops were made during the run, and the train was slowed down twice, preparatory to crossing bridges.

The distance from Trenton to New Brunswick, twenty-five and a half miles, was made in twenty-four minutes.

Four members of the Bethlehem Iron Company, and one of the Pennsylvania Steel Company, have sailed for Southern Russia, for the purpose of inspecting that country with a view to opening up the coal fields there and erecting works for the manufacture of steel.

The President of the Board of Trustees of the Brooklyn Bridge, promises that the bridge will be ready for use in one year from the 4th of next month.

About forty survivors of the Narragansett disaster recently met in Boston; the chairman stated the object of the meeting was to consult regarding proper methods of securing a full investigation of the disaster, and also to provide for obtaining just settlements of the losses of the survivors.

The receipts of grain at Buffalo, N. York, by lake of this season are spoken of as enormous; amounting during the last week to nearly $1,000,000.

The dairy industry of the United States represents an investment of over $1,300,000,000, and our annual production of butter and cheese of $250,000,000.

According to the statistics of the Bureau Veritas, the cost of wages and board of an American crew of ten men, master and two mates, is $182 per month; for a British crew, $110; Norwegian, $239; German, $265; for an Austrian, $320; Italian, $234.

Three hundred feet of the new Hudson river tunnel, the foot of Fifteenth street, Jersey City, have been finished.

The mortality of Philadelphia during the week ending on the 19th, was 335. Of them 158 were adults, and 177 children, 90 being under one year of age. The number of deaths in New York for the same period was 707. The city is considered healthy, no epidemic diseases.

Markets, &c.—U. S. sixes, 1881, registered, 104; do, coupon, 107; 5's, 109; 4½'s, 109; 4's, registered, 108; coupon, 109.

Cotton remains about the same as last quoted. Sales of mailings are reported at 12 a 12½ cts. per lb. for upland, and 11 for Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ cts. in barrels, and standard white 8½ cts. for export, and 8½ cts. per gallon for home use.

Flour.—There was rather more inquiry for flour, but prices were unchanged: 2200 barrels sold, including Minnesota extra at $4.75; 55,000 Penna. Super at $4.50; 55 western do. at $5 a 50c, and patents at $6.50 a 7.75. Eye-flour is steady at $4.30 a $4.50.

Grain.—Wheat is in limited demand and rather easier. Sales of 2200 bushels red at $1.24; 5000 bushels at $1.25; amber at $1.26. Rye is steady at 88 cts. for Pennsylvania. Corn is firm in fair request. Sales of 12,000 bushels, including yellow, at 52½ a 55 cts.; mixed at 51½ a 52 cts.; oatmeal at 51 cts. and is rejected at 50 a 51 cts. Also; steamer quiet and weak. Sales of 5000 bushels, including mixed, at 37 cts., rejected at 38 cts., and white at 39 a 42 cts.

Hay and straw.—Average price during the week: Prime timothy, $1.15 a $1.20 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.10 a $1.20; straw, $1.20 a $1.40.

Wool.—Manufacturers have been buying more freely, and prices have been better than a few weeks ago. Ohio, mixed, 40 a 45 cts.; do, 80 a 85 cts.; do, washed 37½ cts.; unwashed Virginia, 33 a 39 cts.; do, unwashed, 34 a 35 cts.

Oils.—Lined, 62 a 63 cts.; Neats-foot, 55 a 57 cts.; Lard, 43 a 55 cts.; Sperma, crude, 48 a 50 cts.; winter tallow, 41 a 42 a 51.20 per gallon.

Beef tallow is in fair demand. This week, and prices were rather firmer: 3000 head sold at the different yards at 2½ a 6 cts. per lb. as to quality.

Sheep were unchanged: 8000 head sold at the different yards at 3½ a 5½ cts. per lb., and lambs at 5 cts. per lb.

Hogs were in good demand: 6000 head sold at different yards at 6 a 6½ cts. per lb.

Cows were in fair demand: 200 head sold at $2 $50 per head.

FOREIGN.—The new 4½ cent Indian Government loan of $500,000, has been taken entirely by a syndicate of French capitalists at 103.3-10. This news has been received throughout the country with great satisfaction, indicating as it does, that Indian finance has not drifted into as hopeless a condition as has been reported.

The House of Commons the second reading of Irish land bill was fixed for 22d inst. It is said bill will meet with determined opposition from Conservatives, who denounce it as confiscation.

The cotton manufacturers of North and North Lancashire, have notified the spinners and card-rooms that the state of trade does not warrant the advance in wages promised conditionally for the first week in next month.

The Chief Secretary for Ireland reports the extent of fever in some of the famine districts.

A Berlin dispatch to the Times says: "The supply of heavily destroying the crops in some districts is speedily understanding will be reached. It is unlikely that the Greek claims will be entertained."

A terrible storm and waterpout recently visited Dresden, by which it is stated sixty-three persons were killed. Severe storms have also occurred in Switzland, entirely destroying the crops in some districts.

FRANCE.—The Chamber of Deputies has passed Annet's bill, by a vote of 333 to 140. An amendment excluding from amnesty all persons guilty of crime against the common law, was rejected.

The gross receipts of the Suez Canal, in 1879, was $6,190,000 against $5,350,000 in 1878, out of which $1,000,000 was paid for interest and fixed charges amounting $5,610,000. The average tonnage of the vessels up the canal was 2191 tons.

Information has been published that a revolution broken out in Buenos Ayres, and the city is besieged.

A suitable Friend is wanted to superintend schools of the "Friends' Freedmen's Association Philadelphia," in North Carolina and Virginia.

DIED, at the residence of his son-in-law, Robert H. in Salem, 1st mo. 28th, 1880, MORDECAI MORL in the 87th year of his age; and GEORGE M. in the 6th mo. 9th, 1880, ELIZA ANN, widow of the late Mordecai Morlan, in the 80th year of her age, consistent and esteemed members of Salem Monthly Meeting of Friends, Ohio. We were pained to hear of these deaths, to which they were enabled to bear with Christian patience and resignation to the Divine will. And it is believed, through redeeming love and mercy, they have been gathered into everlasting rest and peace, even as the shock of corn cometh in his season.

Her only daughter, SARAH, only daughter John and Hannah Worth, of Chester Co., Pa., in 36th year. Much might be said of the upright, orthodox way of this dear young Friend—the stay and comfort of aged and infirm parents, and one towards whom church was looking, standing among the tide of victory, bravely abounding in the world. But "the end cometh all"; thus we speak only of her close, which was peaceful many days before her departure she said to Mother, "On your account I would wish to get up but seeing nothing in my way, feel resigned to Heaven's Father's will; to do with me as he sees best." She had lately "been reading the life of St. Fothergill, and found it very comforting to her mind. Her mother remarking "she had been a dutiful daughter," she said, "Oh, mother, give God the praise." It was often found in supplication, and near the close of her life, she was engaged in prayer, with calm and resignation alone with her, during her illness, she was the close as one sinking into a sweet sleep. "We blessed are the dead which die in the Lord from her forth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest in their labors; and their works do follow them."

from the Korean converts with whom he thus met, E. Oppert learned that there were only two of the three missionaries left and at present, who lived concealed, some days' journey from the coast, in company with some of their catechists, in wild inaccessible mountain passes. Thither had fled, travelling at night only, and attended by all sorts of dangers, from the place where they had been stationed when persecution suddenly broke out. And as they were waiting for a favorable opportunity to escape from the fury of the Taikoon.* Their position was a very perilous one. Having successfully evaded the net of the spies who tracked them continually, they were at night constantly in danger of being attacked by wild beasts, of which there are plenty in these parts—royals of the largest size being the most dangerous to be feared.

One of the converts, named E. B. F. F. F., who had managed to get down to the coast before means had been found to deliver his letter into my hands, and the assistance of some natives, had succeeded in finding a conveyance which brought to Chefoo.

The attachment, devotion, and self-sacrifice of the native Christians dispersed all over the district, who on the slightest ground for action exposed themselves to a sure and certain death, had rendered it possible for survivors to escape discovery up to the present. And really, these three rough-looking men, who so courageously braved all sorts of dangers and death itself, to save their brethren from the fate which threatened them, merited all praise for their self-devotion. Their plain and unadorned tale, and the detail-ouen-koon, or Tai-wagoon, the official title of the converts. Féron told me afterwards that he and his companions, after a long and wearisome march at night, tired [almost] to death, took refuge on one occasion day-break in a well-concealed place, where they were able to be secure and to find the necessary repose. In the utmost consternation however, they soon discovered that they had got into the lair of a tiger—the tiger itself was away, probably in search of food, while merciful growing brood had been left behind in the description of the sufferings which they had undergone to penetrate to us through a country where they had neither friends nor acquaintances, made an impression hardly to be described by me. Every one of the listeners, and to their honor be it recorded, even my Chinese friends and interpreters, got worked into such a pitch of excitement and enthusiasm, that they loudly uttered their sense of admiration for their conduct, and tried to give expression to their overflowing feeling by pressing upon them all kinds of small presents. They felt and admitted, that such self-denial was a thing rare with their own countrymen.

From these natives, who knew they could talk now without fear or restraint, I obtained an accurate and detailed account of the present state of affairs in the country, and learned something about the terrorism which reigned there. The persecution against the missionaries and the native converts had broken out quite suddenly and unexpectedly, and without the least palpable reason appearing or being given for it. It had then also been extended against all those who, though they had nothing whatever to do with the religious movement, or had given cause to suspect them on this account, were considered likely to be dissatisfied with the present state of things, and to crush all discontent in the bud and to prevent a general rising against the abhorred Government of the Taikoon-ou and his satellites.

The two missionaries who were left behind, on receiving the letter of E. Oppert made their way to the coast, but missed meeting with his vessel. They found however passage in a native boat to the China coast, and reached it in safety, in company with several Korean converts who chose to accompany them.

One of the Koreans who had come on board was a sailor by trade, and offered to pilot the steamer; but the vessel was so closely watched by the authorities, that no opportunity was found for him to come on board unobserved, and he was afraid of being put to death if detected, so the Emperor had to proceed on her voyage of discovery without his aid. It was known that the capital was situated on a large river, and to find the mouth of this was the first point to be gained.

On entering the Prince Imperial archipelago, they found themselves amidst numberless islands and reefs, and surrounded by vast banks on all sides. From the top of one of the high mountains on shore, countless large and small islands, in the full bloom of verdure, lay resplendent in the morning sun, but even with the aid of the marine glasses no signs of the proximity of a large river was to be discovered. Almost the whole length of the archipelago was traversed without success, the supply of coal began to run short, and discouragement and dejection took hold of the minds of most on board. The charts proved to be so inaccurate as to be of no value.

Having found a safe anchorage in the northwestern part of the archipelago, while the engineers were overhauling the engines and making calculations of the length of time the coal would keep the engines in motion, the chief officer, Parker, was sent out in the cutter to explore the navigable channels. Our author thus describes his feelings:

"It was with a heavy heart that I saw the cutter sheer off from the steamer, for I felt that the turning point had now arrived, and that this attempt must finally decide the fate of the expedition. Indeed my position had not been an ever pleasant one for some time past. Captain James, generally so energetic, had lost all his spirits, and pressed me hard to give orders to return; and though I had hitherto steadfastly refused, I knew that it had at last to come to this, if my hope in the success of our cutter's errand was foiled, or if it were proved by the examination that our stock of coals was not sufficient for a longer voyage."

"How heavily and slowly passed the hours of the following day! One load was at last taken from my mind; in the afternoon the chief engineer brought the glad report, that our coals would last for nine or ten days more under full steam; so this point was set at the deck restlessly hour after hour, without any sign from our cutter, which was to be back by day-break at latest, I confess even I felt my hopes sink within me more and more. The rising sun found every soul on deck and on the look-out, but there was no sign of a sail within sight; when several hours had passed over the time fixed for the cutter's return, the excitement rose nearly to fever heat. At last, towards noon, when I had just left deck for a moment, a ringing cheer from all hands made me rush back again, and there, thank God, the white sail of the boat became visible! The belief that Parker and his brave companions were safe, made us forget the ends of their mission for a moment, but of course the general expectation soon turned again to the news we were to receive. Another long and wearisome hour went by before the cutter came within hail, but all pain and trouble was forgotten, when a loud cheer from the boat's crew and the words 'The river' reached us. And so it turned out, from the report which Parker gave us when he had returned on board. The first object of the expedition was gained, and I had the satisfaction to learn that I had not been misled in the hope to be near the same. The mouth of the large river had been found, which could be no other than the Kang-kiang. The chief officer reported, that he had anchored close to some fishing-boats during the night after leaving us, and that the captain of one of these boats had not only given him a sketch of the position and extent of all the banks around, but had provided him with directions so clear and complete, that by following them he had had no difficulty in gaining the entrance of the river itself. When he had made sure of this, he had immediately turned back, not to keep us any longer in suspense.

The good news had imparted fresh spirit to every one; gloom and sluggishness disappeared as if by magic, and gave place to bustle and activity, preparatory to an immediate start. As steam had been ordered as soon as our cutter came in sight, we were soon ready to leave our anchorage, which was about fifteen miles northward of the newly discovered entrance; and, skirting the outlines of the banks, we rounded a few hours later the first island leading into the Kang-kiang."

"Steaming now close along the shore, a varied and beautiful scenery developed itself to our sight; pretty, well-cultivated valleys, changing with thickly-wooded hills, running down in steep precipitous rocky masses to the water's edge, while the high summits of the mountain ranges towered in the background. Many large and small hamlets and villages are on the main shore, showing signs of much life and activity, their inhabitants crowding to the shore and up the hill-sides, to gaze at the foreign vessel moving up the river without a sail. The whole country seemed to be alive and stirring of a sudden, thousands upon thousands flocked together from all sides; their white garments, the highly picturesque scenery of the river shore, in the first glow of a fine, clear summer morning, all combined to make it a sight never to be forgotten."

The vessel proceeded up the river till within 15 or 20 miles of Saoul, when the water became so shallow and full of obstructions that it was unsafe to go further. To this point, which was near a large Korean town, with much courteousness communicated the decision of the Government to decline the proposals to open the country to foreign trade. From his own narrative, it is evident that the reply of our author to this unwelcome decision was not marked by the same politeness of manner and was very deficient in ordinary diplomatic courtesy.

On the day following the last interview, the steamer was turned homeward; and the shores of China were reached in safety.

While anchored in the river, during these negotiations an incident occurred which is creditable to the honesty of the Koreans. The natives were generally allowed free access to the ship, which was a wonderful curiosity to them; and on one occasion a sudden disturbance among them occurred on the hurricane deck, where they had laid hold of one of their countrymen and were beating him as hard as they could. The narrative says: "It appeared that this man, passing by the open windows of the captain's deck cabin, had taken, as he thought unobserved, a silver teaspoon from the window-sill, and had just about been hiding the same in his sleeve, when he was found out in the act by his own countrymen. The indignation caused amongst them by this attempted abstraction was so great, that we had pains to save the man from being lynched on the spot; and quiet was only restored after he had been transported into the boat, and put under the guard of some of the crew. Though I interceded for the culprit, there was little chance of his escaping summary punishment on shore; for theft is considered one of the blackest crimes in Corea, and punished with extreme severity.

To the honor of the Koreans I may state, that this was the only case of thieving committed by any of them, before or after, among the thousands of native visitors whom we let have the free run over our ships during my voyages to the country."

Some two years after E. Oppert made a third voyage, through the persuasion of one of the escaped missionaries and his Korean converts, who were greatly grieved at the sufferings from the cruelty of the government of a regent. They stated that the regent was a very superstitious person, and considered the fortune of himself and family to be dependent on the possession of certain relics, which were kept and guarded in a secluded part of the country, known to some of the converts. They believed it possible to seize upon these; and that the Regent would yield to their demands to regain possession of them. Wild as the scheme seemed, it was undertaken and was nearly successful. The party landed at a point on the coast, made a forced march to the spot, which proved to be walled in and protected by an earth-work. Five hours of labor were required to reach the doorway, and then this was found to be closed by a huge stone block fitted into it. As several hours more would have been necessary to move this, and the spring tide, which alone had enabled them to reach the vicinity was falling, they were compelled to desist and hasten back to their boat to avoid being left as prisoners on the shore.

For "The Friend."

Mental Exercise in Old Age.

"The man who would preserve the full integrity of his mind, must avoid excesses of every description, and must endeavor to employ the higher faculties of his mind somewhat more energetically than is now always customary. A time comes to every one when the physical powers begin to decay; and then, unless the brain has been kept active and recipient by its exercises, there is nothing left to live, and the man perishes. We say that he died of gout, or of over eating, or of heart-disease, or of kidney disease, or of the failure of the particular organ which was the first to exhibit symptoms of the approaching end. In reality, he had died of stupidity, artificially produced by neglect of the talents with which he was endowed."

It is better to wear out than to rust out, and the preceding extract contains a practical truth which it would be well for those who are advancing in years to remember. There is no doubt that much of the weariness of old age comes from the causes here referred to. Just as the muscles of the arm waste away if not used, so it is with the brain if its proper exercise be neglected.

Many of us can recall, in the circle of our own friends, bright, vigorous intellects, even in advanced life. This has not been the result of accident, but because they were not permitted to "rust out" from disuse. An active interest in what is going on, the continued cultivation of the social and intellectual faculties, and an humble but firm trust in God, will make the evening one of the most lovely and the brightest periods of life, as the sun is more beautiful and more admired at its setting than when in all the blaze of its noon-day brightness.

J. L.

To those under Visitation.

The following letter of J. Scott, written about a century ago, is commended to perusal of all those who have felt the tending influence of the love of God to their souls. May they be encouraged to yield themselves unreservedly to the Heavenly visitation; through rebellion or neglect it may be withdrawn, and they become as the heath in desert, dried up and withered, and known not when good cometh.

Feeling, in the aboundings of my Heavenly Father's love, a renewed and earnest engagement for the eternal welfare of that part thee which must endure beyond the grave am inclined to acquaint thee with the trials of my soul, and breathings of my spirit, to eternal Fountain of all good, on thy account. For, indeed, the consideration of thy state, at times, drawn tears from mine eyes, whilst the desire of my heart hath been, that thou mightest come to know, in this time of thy visitation, the things that belong to peace; before they may be hid from thine eyes. Oh! that thou knewest how to prize unspeakable favor, vouchsafed thee in tender visitation, and would improve it to the glory of Him who hath called thee, and to salvation of thy own soul.

But, alas! while I have been contemplating the merciful kindness of a long-suffering God, and those ravishing delights, which not but disobedience deprives thee of, I have to view the many difficulties and discouragements, yea, and the allurements, with which the adversary of all good, disturbs and fuses the minds of such as are desirous of possessing out of his territories, and of being redeemed from under his dominion. What have thought on these things, a fear hath possessed my mind, lest, for want of a thore resignation, the enemy should prove too strong for thee. But when I have considered the unlimited power of Him who inhabits eternity and dwells in the light, and who is able to remove mountains, and divide the seas, I had a secret hope that by his unremitting strivings, He would prevail with thee to sake all, and follow Him; to come out an separate from, and not touch the unclean thing; that so He might receive thee.

Oh! how I have lamented and mourned, see the unhappy condition of many of those visited of our God, who, notwithstanding holy call, are not willing to desist from the taking of the unclean thing, with the child of a dissipated age. Be not offended at sorrows I have felt on account of the captivity of those, whose happiness I greatly desire, but bow down thine ear and hear, and give the voice of Him, who comes not to bring peace on the earthly mind, but a sword. Submit thy neck to his yoke, and thy shoulder to his cross. Suffer the operation of his refining fire, and purifying soap. Dwell in the discipline of his holy rod; and learn to give up thy whole heart to Him, and to esteem his reproach, greater riches than the treasures of Egypt, having respect unto the recompense of reward; remembering, that if thou lovest anything more than Christ, thou art not worthy of Him, according to his own word. Therefore, consult not with flesh and blood, but stand gazing at the hardness of way; but cast thy care upon Him who called thee; and give up to his call. He ble thee to answer the requireing thereof, to run the way of his commandments in delight. But if thou lookest at this, at, and the other difficulty, and goest tooning against the conviction in thy own d, thou wilt therefore drown its voice, and thyself into confusion, and perhaps, lose sense of truth.

Thou shalt arise, arise! and trim thy lamp, and abide therein the oil of the kingdom, by opening up to receive from Him who is desirous to communicate, but in his own way, the way of the cross. Hast thou not stood long enough to know, that that will give thee the work? If so, I beseech thee, at length, be engaged to work out thy salvation with fear and trembling; for it is that worketh in thee; and would, didst thou but cleave close to his workings, work the will and the deed, but not without consent; for thou must be a co-worker with Him. Oh! I entreat thee, do not look the way and means, yea, the only way and means which He ever hath offered, for will offer thee; which, are, "the rays of instruction, the way of life." If thou couldst live and employ a thousand years' search of another way, thou might search vain. And at last, if ever thou know salvation, thou must know it by the same stony and rock of offence; through which, (but for want of belief therein, and hence thereto,) thou and thousands more, at, in a short time, come to witness peace as a river. This is He who hath been dwelling place of the righteous in all ages, who, blessed be his name, He is so to a remnant in this age; and oh! that the number be increased, of those who take sanctuary in Him. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it and is saved."

And now, my beloved friend, let me prevail in thee, to attend to this most important errand; and give not sleep to thy eyes, nor to thy eyelids, until thou hast prepared a habitation for the God of Jacob to dwell in; and art united to Him in a covenant everlasting righteousness and peace. Which thy state I ardently desire thou mayst attain to, and thus rejoice upon the banks of grace, with those to whom it is given in mercy, even those who have come through tribulation. Oh! that I could paint in view that unspeakable consolation which so much desire thou mayst partake of; but I cannot describe it, therefore I remind thee to the protection of that all-merciful arm, which, as thou relies thereon, be underneath and sustain thee; and oh! I hope thou wilt not distrust, flee from, forsake; but seek after a more intimate maintenance with, and continue thy seeking I thou findest it; that so thou mayst be prepared to enter the mansions of glory, to partake the praise of Him who is now eternally waiting to be gracious unto thee. I am thy sincere friend and well-wisher,

JOHN SEOTT.

That better is the Christian who gets no personal communion and help from his Father than the heathen who has no God? If it be so, better, better in knowledge and a possible access to God in need, it must be added, worse responsibility that comes from the opportunity unimproved and known duty not done.

A Talk with Girls and their Mothers.

I wish I could make you all understand how great a mistake you make when you sacrifice health, or the physical comfort on which health depends, to appearance, or to any other earthly good; when you neglect to provide, by regular exercise and wise care, a good stock of physical vigor for the labors and the burdens of the coming years. Without this foundation, all that you can learn in school, and all that wealth can buy for you, will be worthless. "Intellect in an enfeebled body," says some one whom I quote from memory, "is like gold in a spent swimmer's pocket—it only makes him sink the sooner."

Another great mistake that many of our girls are making, and that their mothers are either encouraging or allowing them to make, is that of spending their time out of school in idleness, or in frivolous amusements, doing no work to speak of, and learning nothing about the practical duties and the serious cares of life. It is not only in the wealthier families, that the girls are growing up indolent and unpractised in household work; indeed, I think that more attention is paid to the industrial training of girls in the wealthiest families, than in the families of mechanics and of people in moderate circumstances, where the mothers are compelled to work hard all the while.

The habits of indolence and of helplessness that are thus formed are not the greatest evils resulting from this bad practice; the selfishness that it fosters is the worst thing about it. How devoid of conscience, how lacking in all true sense of tenderness, or even of justice, a girl must be, who will thus consent to devote all her time out of school to pleasure, while her mother is bearing all the heavy burdens of the household! And the foolish way in which mothers themselves sometimes talk about this, even in the presence of their children, is mischievous in the extreme.

Closely connected with what has just been said, is the mistake of many girls in making dress the main business of life.

I do not think that the girls, or mothers, are wholly to blame for this absorbing devotion to dress. The vanity of women is stimulated by the foolishness of men. A young woman who is modestly and plainly clad, is much less likely to attract the notice of young men than one who is gorgeously arrayed. From bright, intelligent, cultured, sensible girls, whose chief adorning is not the adorning of braided hair, or golden ornaments, or of gay clothing, the young men often turn away in quest of some creature glittering in silks and jewelry, with a dull mind and a selfish heart. But I beseech you to remember, girls, that a young man who cares for nothing but "style" in a woman, is a young man whose admiration you can well afford to do without. The girl who catches a husband by fine dress, too often finds that the prize she has won is a broken heart.

Another mistake that many of our girls are making is in devoting too much of their time to novel-reading. The intemperate craving for sensational fiction weakens the mental grasp, destroys the love of good reading, and the power of sober and rational thinking, takes away relish from the realities of life, breeds discontent and indolence and selfishness.

Let me speak very briefly of some of the elements which go to make up a beautiful womanly character:

The first is industry. Willingness and ability to work lie, as I have said already, at the basis of all good character. The moral discipline, the patience, the steadiness of purpose, the power to overcome, that are gained in work, and only in work, are just as necessary to women as to men; and the girl who is given no chance of learning these traits is sadly defrauded.

After industry, comes thoroughness. It is not enough to be busy; we ought to do well whatever our hands find to do. To be thorough in study, to be thorough in all work, ought to be the aim of every girl, not less than of every boy.

After thoroughness, independence. A habit of relying on your own judgment, a habit of thinking for yourself, and caring for yourself, not selfishly, but in a true womanly fashion—a habit of taking responsibility and bearing it bravely is one of the habits that women as well as men need to cultivate. Your parents ought to give you some chance to form this habit; it is a great mistake to shield a girl from all care, and then, by and by, when the helpers on whom she has leaned fall by her side, to leave her with judgment untrained, and powers undisciplined, to carry the burdens of life.

What kind of work God has for you to do I cannot tell; but I know that He has called every one of you with a high calling, to some ennobling work. Not to be butterflies, not to be drones, not to be sponges, has he called any of you; but to be helpers, and ministers, and friends of all good; to wait with ready hands and loving hearts for the service that you can do for Him. Most of you will be called, by and by, to the dignity of wife-hood and mother-hood; there is no greater dignity than that and no nobler work.

The woman who builds and rules a beautiful and happy home; who holds the honor of her husband and the reverence of her children; who leads those whom God has given her up to vigorous and virtuous manhood and womanhood, imparting to them by daily communion with them her own wisdom and nobleness, and sending them forth to do good and brave service in the world, the woman who does such work as this, I say, is a successful woman; and there is no grander work than this within the measure of man.

But marriage is not for all of you, and should not be for any of you the chief end. Many women are living happily and nobly out of wedlock, and no one is fit for it who is not fit to live without it.

To what kind of service our Lord has called you, then, I cannot tell; but I know that for you the joy of life must be, not in being ministered unto, but in ministering. God help you to understand it, girls, before it is too late. There is so much good in living, if one knows how to live; there is such delight in serving when one has learned to serve, that I do not like to see any of you going on aimlessly and selfishly, and laying up in store for yourselves a future of disquietude and gloom. There is a better and brighter way than this, a way that has never been pointed out more clearly than in the simple words of our good friend Mr. Hale: "To look up and not down; to look forward and not back; to look out and not in; and to lend a hand." Set your feet in that path, and follow it patiently, and you will find it the path "that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."—Washington Gladden in St. Nicholas.

The hidden life, which God imparts to his accepted people, may flourish in solitudes and deserts; far from the societies of men and the din and disturbance of cities. From the cave of the hermit, from the cell of the solitary recluse, the fervent prayer has often arisen, which has been acceptable in the sight of God. But it would be a strange and fatal misconception, that religion, even in its most pure and triumphant exaltations, can flourish nowhere else. The home of holiness is in the heart, irrespective of outward situations and alliances; and therefore we may expect to find it, if there are hearts adapted to its reception and growth, in the haunts of business as well as in the silence of retirement; in the palaces of Rome, as well as in the deserts of the Thebais. It is a fatal mistake to suppose that we cannot be holy except on the condition of a situation and circumstances in life such as shall suit ourselves. It is one of the first principles of holiness to leave our times and our places, our going out and our coming in, our wasted and our goodly heritage, entirely with the Lord. Here, O Lord, hast thou placed us, and we will glorify thee here.—T. C. Upham.

SUMMER.

Selected.

Around this lovely valley rise
The purple hills of Paradise.
O softly on you banks of haze—
Her rosy face the Summer lays:
Beamed along the azure sky
The argosies of cloudland lie,
Whose shores with many a shining rift
Through all the long midsummer day
The meadow-sides are sweet with hay,
I seek the coolest sheltered seat,
Just where the field and forest meet—
Where grow the pine trees tall and bland,
The ancient oaks, austere and grand,
And fringy roots and pebbles fret
The ripples of the rivulet.

I watch the mowers as they go
Through the tall grass, a white sleeved row
With even stroke their scythes they swing,
In tune their merry whistlons ring.
Behind, the nimble youngsters run,
And toss the thick swaths in the sun.
The cattle graze, while warm and still
Slopes the broad pasture, basks the hill,
And bright, when Summer breezes break,
The green wheat crinkles like a lake.

The butterfly and bumble-bee
Come to the pleasant woods with me;
Quickly before me runs the quail,
Her chickens skulk behind the rail,
High up the lone wood-pigeon sits,
And the woodpecker pecks and flits;
Sweet woodland music sinks and swells,
The brooklet rings its tinkling bells.

The swarming insects drone and hum,
The partridge beats his bobbing drum,
The squirrel leaps among the boughs
And chatters in his leafy house;
The oriole flashes by; and look—
Into the mirror of the brook,
Where the vain blue-bird trims his coat,
Two tiny feathers fall and float.

As silently, as tenderly,
The dawn of peace descends on me,
Oh, this is peace! I have no need
Of friend to talk, or book to read;
A dear Companion here abides,
Close to my thrilling heart He hides;
The holy silence is his voice;
I lie, and listen, and rejoice.

QUIETNESS AND TRUST.

Selected.

I would be quiet, Lord, nor tease, nor fret;
Not one small need of mine will thou forget.

I am not wise to know what most I need;
I dare not cry too loud, lest thou should'st heed.

And in reply should say, "Child have thy will;
As thou hast chosen, so thy cup I fill!"

What most I crave, thou may'st in love withhold,
As we from hands unmet keep pearls or gold;

Or as when infant hands would play with fire,
We keep them from the flame that they desire.

Then, for me do thou choose; who knowest best;
This one, short, earnest prayer holds all the rest;

"Thy will be done;" 'tis from the heart I say,
And all my anxiety doth pass away.

This be my only, my supreme request;
Then as to all I need, I shall in thee be blest!

FAITH.

A swallow in the Spring,
Came to our granary, and 'neath the eaves
Essay'd to make a nest, and there did bring Wet earth and straw and leaves.

Day after day she toil'd,
With patient art, but ere her work was crown'd,
Some sad mishap the tiny fabric spoil'd,
And dashed it to the ground.

She found the ruin wroth;
Yet not cast down, forth from her place she flew,
And with her mate, fresh earth and grasses brought,
And built her nest anew.

But scarcely had she placed
The last soft feather on its ample floor,
When wicked hand, or chance, again laid waste,
And wrought the ruin o'er.

But still her hope she kept,
And to a third time, with loving toil,
Look'd, and to three little swallows slept,
Within the earth-made walls.

What truth is here, O Man!
Hath Hope been smitten in its early dawn?
Have clouds of earnest thy purpose, trust, or plan?
Have faith, and struggle on!

MARIANNA HACKER.

The following memoranda respecting a little child, Marianna Hacker, written by an aunt with whom she resided, were made immediately after her decease, which occurred on the 1st of 5th month, 1835.

The narrative says: "Soon after the decease of her mother she became a member of our family—when about four years old. Her guileless innocence and sweet and affectionate disposition, with her many other engaging qualities, rapidly won for her a warm place in our hearts, and we soon felt for her all of parental love, solicitude and responsibility.

"The first serious question I remember to have heard this precious child ask, occurred a few months after she came to reside with us; she was at the moment busily engaged with her play-things, and looking earnestly up, she said, 'Aunt, does thee think my mother was willing to die?' I answered, that I hoped so, but did not know, as I was not with her. She then thoughtfully said: 'was she ready?' because if she was ready, she would be willing.' Her uncommonly serious manner when asking the question, and her judicious discrimination between ready and willing, struck me at the time very forcibly; and it became increasingly interesting to ascertain the extent and depth of her serious feelings, as also to cherish and fortify them.

It was accordingly our daily morning practice to devote an hour or two to appropriate reading and conversation: for, infant as she was (little more than four years old) the term conversation is not misapplied.

"The New Testament being the only book in which she appeared particularly interested we read during the summer vacation but little beside, and I must confess that her questions were sometimes of so profound a character, made me feel my utter inability to answer them. They were often like the queries one advanced in religious experience, rather than one of such tender years. About this time she appeared exceedingly afraid of pride and would often say to me, she hoped she was not proud of having done such and such things for which she had gained some credit. Her hair had grown long and was rather troublesome, and under a pretence of her being in place (though a parent's pride was in her heart) I curled it up. When it was taken from the papers and I was combing it, she appeared very much agitated, and, almost tears she exclaimed, 'Brush it all out, aunt—brush it out! I feel the proutness coming over me;' and she was not satisfied until it was smooth and she had received a promise that it should not be repeated. Her regard to truth and her fear of deviating from it was remarkable, so much so that she would rarely make a positive assertion, or use any unqualified terms in expressing her intentions to any thing; and often, on hearing others speak without such caution, she would playfully prove them by adding, 'if.' Her time of going to bed was always a time of serious, base searching reflection, and she would come with tears and sobs, the little delinquents of the past day; and I have not infrequently been obliged to take her from her little bed and hold her in my arms, to soothe and moderate her excessive agitation, caused by some trifling short-comings such as we, who have grown old in sin, would let pass unheeded. From about the middle of her fifth year she had been accustomed, before composing herself to sleep, to repeat the Lord's prayer, accompanied generally by those four simple beautiful lines:

'Now I lay me down to sleep,
I give my soul' &c.

It might be apprehended that this would soon degenerate into a mere lifeless form, but on the contrary, it was in her case evident accompanied by true devotional feelings; her manner was characterized by great fervor of spirit; and not infrequently she was overwhelmed and tendered by her sense of the solemnity of the act, as to make utterance very difficult. She never commenced an after a considerable pause, designed to prepare her mind and enable her, as she sweetly expressed it, to forget every thing worldly. On one occasion in particular, I recollect her pausing a long time in the midst of her prayer; and then, after having proceeded to the conclusion, she said to me, 'Aunt, these notes I stopped a good while,—well, it was that might get rid of all other thoughts, common thoughts, thee knows, Aunt Hannah, that we come in sometimes, but I could not go on till they were all gone.'

"Several times, on going to my own bed after 10 o'clock, I have found the dear child awake and in tears, occasioned, as her answers to my enquiries informed me, by solicitude for the welfare of her sister."

ny,' she would say; 'I am so worried about— dear sister, I wish she was a better girl;— she help her? I love her so, I want her to be good. I am afraid she does not pray, or does not think when she prays.' On returning home from school she would sometimes sit out to tears the moment she entered, saying, 'Oh aunt, the children do trouble me; they get her angry with me, and I don't know that it's for my good when I try to advise them, and tell them how wrong it is, they laugh at it; O do take me away, it makes me feel so, so serious advice was sometimes extended to me; for although I believe she considered me, in most respects, all that she could wish, she could see that all was not right—that nothing was wanting—and with tears she would entreat me to try to be good; she would say I was not good enough; to try to pray;— one time when reading the little memoir of J. R. C., she perceived that I wept, and showing her little arms around my neck she exclaimed, 'Oh aunt, these must try to be good. O dear aunt Hannah, now, oh do pray that there will be helped. I will pray for thee, dear aunt, but these must try thyself.'

'Her thoughtfulness when sitting down to meals was remarkable, invariably dropping a little head, while a placid solemnity was strikingly visible in her countenance. Even when taking her seat after others had commenced eating, the pause was always observed here, and often when she saw others omit it, she would express her uneasiness that 'they do not think' before beginning their meal. In anxiety to act correctly herself, caused her to feel grieved by the aberrations of others whom she felt interested. Having one day served as a weeper in meeting, after returning home I enquired the cause, and she with a sad feeling said she had seen one of her sisters laugh in meeting.

'It had been her practice for about two years past, after rising in the morning to retire, by an open door, to a room by herself, the purpose of meditation and prayer; and when, as was sometimes the case, other rooms were all occupied, she would wander about in evident uneasiness until she had found a place of privacy where she could pour out her heart before her Maker. If it was omitted after breakfast, she would soon miss her seat in the parlor, and I have sometimes followed to her room, and without seeming to do so have watched her kneeling with her head on her hands on a chair before her, until my eyes have ached with cold—she would then, without noticing me, rise and walk soberly to the room. These exercises, as I found on enquiry of her, were not always the repetition of forms previously committed, but were the spontaneous aspirations (often without utterance) of a heart, sensible though languishing of its own weakness and its need to be strengthened from above. 'Not long since, on returning from school, she came to me in tears, and said she had not been very good, and she thought it was because she had forgotten to pray in the morning, 'for it is always Aunt Hannah, if I forget my prayers, and go all wrong.'

'With all this serious thoughtfulness and pietical piety, this precious child was the merriest and merryest in play with her cousins, took the lead, and they seemed to look to her for direction in all their little amusements. For several months she has appeared to be strongly impressed with the belief that she should not live long, and I thought it necessary to divert her attention from the idea lest it should injure her health. Scarcely a night has passed without her making some allusion to the prospect of being soon taken away,—expressing her self sometimes as follows:

'Aunt Hannah, I feel as if I should not live long; what shall I do to be a better little girl? I don't think I am good enough to die, but I will try to be it—do I try—and I trust in the Lord, and O, He is so kind to me, He gives me such kind friends; and she would often say, there is too kind to me, dear aunt, a great deal too kind, and so is dear uncle, but I will take care of thee when there is no. Her gratitude and love for us was unbounded. She would frequently, while the tears fell fast, say to me, 'Oh, aunt, I do not want to die and leave thee and dear uncle.'

'One night she said me, 'Does thee think uncle prays enough?—tell him I want him; I know he is very good, but I'm afraid he is not good enough; and she wept as if her little heart would break. 'Oh do tell him that he will be helped,' she added, 'and thee too, dear aunt.'

'Often when she saw her father distressed, she would speak of him with a great deal of feeling, and many tears, and would tell me she tried to comfort him all she could.

'About the middle of the 1st month, 1835, we went to spend some time at her father's house. She appeared quite happy while there, and my attention was so much occupied by the circumstances which had induced that visit, that I knew little of her private feelings. She one day came to me with an earnest request to return home, to our good little home, as she called it, 'for it was so much easier to be good there, than where there were so many things to take her attention.'

'When we got back she said to me one day, 'dear aunt, 'tis so delightful to be in our quiet home again, for here I can find a place to pray; and there were so many people down at father's I could not always think of it.'

'Her sickness commenced very soon after our return, and I am convinced that from the first, she had a strong impression she should not recover. One afternoon after having been to ride with her father, she complained of pain in her breast and back of her neck; and while at tea, she burst into tears, and leaning over towards me said, 'Aunt, I shall not live long, I think.' I had so often heard her say the same before, that I thought little of it, although it was the first time she had ever expressed herself so, except in private. When she was taken up stairs, it was a sunny day in the spring, and one of the view from the chamber window was one of much rural beauty and brightness. She looked towards the window, but with a shudder drew back saying, 'I can't bear to look out, it makes me feel as if I never shall go out again.' In the afternoon she said to me, 'Aunt Hannah, suppose I should not live till another Second day?' I said, my dear Marianna, there is not very sick, and will soon, we hope, be better—wishing to divert her mind from what seemed a groundless apprehension. But she again said, 'but suppose I should not live to see another Second day.' I then observed, Well, if it is thy Heavenly Father's will to take thee, my child, I hope thee will be willing. She looked up with a sorrowful but sweetly calm expression, and said, 'Oh, Aunt Hannah, I am not good enough.' I shrunk from the thought of the possibility of her early removal, and therefore endeavored to check her agitated feelings, and persuaded her to lie down with me and go to sleep. I could not listen to what I am now persuaded she wished to communicate.

'After some days, when in the progress of the disease it became difficult for her to speak articulately on account of the extreme dryness of her throat, she said to me, 'Dear aunt, what shall I do about my prayers? will it do if I pray in my heart? And my reply in the affirmative evidently gave her much comfort.

'One evening while she was extremely ill, and restless from great suffering, I asked her if I should read to her. 'Yes,' she replied, 'in the New Testament.' I opened it, and asked her if she had any choice—not thinking it possible that in her state of extreme suffering she could collect herself sufficiently to know one part from another—but she very promptly answered, 'The two or three first chapters of Matthew.' I then asked if she knew what they were about, she quickly replied, 'Yes, the birth of Christ, &c., but thee need not read the names, begin after them and read the two next chapters,—which I did while she lay quiet and attentive.

'From the time that her sickness assumed an alarming character, the difficulty of speaking before alluded to, was so great as to render utterance almost impracticable; thereby precluding the expression of feelings which she was many times evidently desirous of communicating to us.

'In the afternoon of the day before her death, she said to me, 'Aunt, I think I shall not live long now, but do not grieve for me.' There was something in her manner at the time so strikingly solemn, that I found it impossible to speak upon the subject; which I since much regret, as I am fully convinced it was her wish at that time to have some conversation with me.

'On the last morning of her life, almost the last words she distinctly uttered were the Lord's Prayer, which her cousin, who sat by her, heard her faintly but solemnly repeat.

'On reading over the foregoing memoranda, and taking a cursory retrospect of that portion of her life to which they relate, I perceive they omit much more than they record of the incidents exhibiting the various interesting traits of this precious child. Enough, however, has been said to answer the end in view, namely, a brief memorial of her; enough also, I think, to illustrate the touching words of our Saviour: "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise."

Home Thinking.

There are few things which show more markedly the advancement of true principles in human character, than the increasing respect paid to all honest thinking. Once even the claim to honesty was not allowed to views that differed from those in vogue. To hold belief, or to indulge sentiments adverse to those of the nation, or party, or clique, or sect whose watchword they were, was not merely to be in error, but in guilt. It was not only intellectual but moral delinquency, and the use of any force available to crush it out was held to be justifiable. Hence the cruelties of political and religious persecutions, from the mere recital of which we now shrink in horror, were not the outcome of any particular set of views, either of Church or State, but rather of that habit of mind which failed utterly to appreciate that right of private judgment which we are now learning gradually to honor.

Even yet, however, there is a long road to be travelled in the same direction. We no longer publicly torture people on account of their honest views on any subject, but we often despise them on no other ground; we often condemn their sincere expressions, and if we have endeavored unsuccessfully to convince them of error, we indulge a certain resentment, which appears to us only just. We attach more importance to the opinions themselves than to the sincerity with which they are held, and pay a higher respect to one who, with indifference or from policy, shares our beliefs than to one who sincerely and conscientiously opposes them.

Now we are very far from upholding that indifference which declares all opinions to be unimportant so long as the heart and the life are right. On the contrary, we deem that the life is largely dependent for its value and usefulness upon the opinions which guide it, and that each person is bound to use all his faculties in the investigation of truth. But this very duty presupposes the utmost freedom of thought and the absence of all interference, whether actual or incidental. Directly the fear of some one's displeasure or contempt, or of sinking in public esteem comes into the question, to that extent freedom fades and sincerity is endangered. Our attitude then towards those who differ from us in views, and towards those who agree with us, should not form so striking a contrast as they usually do. Both are worthy of our respect and sympathy in proportion to their fidelity in searching for truth, and to the amount of good which they have found. Both are deserving of our displeasure and rebuke as far as they lack these qualities. Our cordial esteem should go forth toward those who are earnest in their adherence to what they honestly believe, however contrary it may be to our own interpretation, and should be firmly withheld from those who, professing agreeing with us, are yet actuated by meaner motives than the love of truth itself.

As yet we are very far from such a condition of mind, or such a gauging of character. Neither can we expect it to come suddenly or by any immediate volition. It must be the gradual work of much thought and constant effort. It will be the result of a deeper fidelity to right, a finer discrimination as to motives, a more correct estimation of moral values. It will also involve a better appreciation of mental difficulties, and a considerable patience of uncertainties. Dr. Asa Gray, the well-known botanist, in a recently published lecture upon scientific and religious beliefs, distinguishes carefully between the various degrees of probability with which the mind holds its ideas. He says, "as to those who can forthwith assort the contents of their minds into two compartments, one for what they believe, and the other for what they disbelieve, neither their belief nor their denial can be of much account. In all subjects of inquiry those only are to be trusted who discriminate between inevitable beliefs, established convictions, probable opinions and hypotheses on trial." Certainly, the habit of keenly noting these differences of probability would do much to prevent antagonism between those who occupy different positions.

We are far too peremptory in our requirements upon people to declare their beliefs and disbeliefs. Those who instinctively hesitate in doing this we are apt to call weak or undecided, and to charge them with being "on the fence," whereas they are often the most earnest in their search for truth, and only cautious lest they be deceived. Frequently this state of doubt, or rather suspense of judgment, is the very best condition of mind for the time being, and the most favorable one for the discovery of truth; and he who frankly acknowledges that he is at present in this position as to the point at issue, is worthy of all sympathy and respect.

Underneath every error, however gross it may appear, beneath every superstition, however absurd we think it, there lies something true, valuable and necessary. Antagonistic parties, trying harder to overthrow one another than to establish true principles, seldom appreciate this. They see the evil, and magnify it to such undue proportions that the good is entirely hidden. To succeed in abolishing the whole party, or sect, or the entire system of opinions they represent, seems to them the most desirable of all things—while the really fortunate thing is that this can never be done. All that is false, all that is wrong, will in time drop away like a useless shell, but the kernel of truth that it held will remain and vitalize new systems and future generations.

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again,
The eternal years of God are hers,
But Error, wounded, writhes in pain,
And dies among his worshippers."

—Philadelphian Ledger.

Religious Items, &c.

The late Presbyterian General Assembly adopted the following report on the subject of Temperance.

"1. The General Assembly, viewing with grave apprehension the persistence and spread of the use of intoxicating drinks as among the greatest, if not the greatest evil of our day, as a curse resting upon every nation of Christendom, as multiplying their burdens of taxation, pauperism, and crime; as undermining their material prosperity, as a powerful hindrance to the gospel at home, and as still more deeply degrading the heathen, whom we seek to evangelize abroad, would rejoice at the revival in recent years of efforts to stay these great evils, and would renew its testimony, begun as early as 1812, (and continued to the present day), not only against actual intemperance, but against all those habits and indulgences which may have a tendency to produce it."

"2. We reiterate the judgments of former General Assemblies against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage, and against the renting of one's property knowingly for such manufacture and sale. We admonish our members to avoid all complicity in the traffic, and to use all their influence for the suppression of the same in such measures and to such degrees as shall seem to them wise and expedient."

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Floating gardens of Cushman.—At the present day, these do not grow flowers, but the more humble melons, cucumbers and other vegetables. They are formed in this manner: The roots of aquatic plants growing in shallow water, are divided about two feet below the surface, so that they completely lose all connection with the bottom of the lake, but retain their former situation in respect to each other. When thus detached from the soil, they are pressed into somewhat closer contact, and are formed into beds of about twenty yards in breadth, and of an indefinite length.

The heads of the sedges, reeds and other plants of the float, are now cut off and laid upon the surface, and covered with a thin coat of mud, which gradually sinks into the mass of matted roots. The bed floats, but is kept in place by a stake of willow driven through it at each end, which admits of its rising and falling with the water.—D. Wakefield.

Oriental Costume.—Protecting the Head and Neck.—A writer in Blackwell's Magazine states concerning Oriental costumes, that however undesirable it might be for a dominant race to assume the dress of a nation which it governs, there are yet certain peculiarities of costume which originate in the requirement of climate, and which may be adopted with advantage. The waistband is not the one article of dress which recommends itself being suitable to the climate. The flowy robes and loose white cloaks worn in summer are more effectual in keeping out the sun than are our own tight-fitting garments; and the native head-dresses deserve special mention as forming the best protection possible against sunstroke. The stagnation of the blood, which produces sunstroke, may occur in any part of the body, and sometimes attacks the knee when exposed with a tight-fitting covering especially in riding. The nape of the neck is, however, the most dangerous spot, and the Eastern head dresses cover it.

Water and Health.—Of the danger of injury to health from polluted wells, it is hardly possible to say too much. In one cholera season in London six hundred deaths were traced to the use of a single street pump. Typhoid fever has been repeatedly, indeed many times, known to affect whole families who resorted to a well for a common supply, while others in the same neighborhood, using different water, were not attacked. Women, yet, perhaps, seems to be the subtlety with which organic poison may be conveyed, by water, through milk, in dairymen's supplies. Several times this has happened in London and elsewhere in England. In one instance so far as appeared, the only mode of contamination was by the milk-pans at the dairies being washed in water from a stream into which leakage had occurred from a neighboring vault. At another time, several wells do families in London, one of them that of physician, were affected with typhoid fever. It was found that they were all supplied with milk by a company which furnished milk from several dairies. At last it was ascertained that cases of fever occurred only in those families to whom had been sent the milk of one particular dairy; and a local cause of contamination of its supply was also traced. What exquisite cleanliness of all things is required by this experience! Nothing is more sensitive than milk and cream to all impurity. Even the water which cows drink, which marshy and bad, has been known to make their milk unwholesome. Butter can be made good only where the most scrupulous sweetness, cleanliness, and freshness of everything, is maintained. This is the chief secret of good butter-making; and the "moral of it" may be extended and applied by saying that fect cleanliness of water, food, air, and soil is every-where absolutely necessary to feet health.—American Health Primer.

How they Find Scurvy-Gas in Boston.—For o or three or four years there have been spings and wallings and gnashings of teeth or the probable death-traps that were concealed in some of the finest houses on the picious Back Bay land here, and, indeed, along through the palaces of the West Id. In this time the Board of Health have come so active and intelligent that they've started a system, under a force of ex-ts, that is working a reform, and at the e time disclosing defects that make one dder while one blesses the reform. These erts have hit upon a plan for discovering er-gases and locating the precise locality escape, which is not a little funny at the ool, but which is said to be infallible. e plan is to go into the upper story of the ase and pour into a set bowl a small quan- of oil of peppermint, followed by a small nity of water to wash it down. Then the pector immediately leaves the room, close the door after him, and proceeds to visit lower rooms. He does not use his pepper-nt bottle again, but if in any one of these er rooms he is suddenly met by a strong ant of the mint, he looks like a first-class ective who has all at once come upon a ef and a murderer. He does not strike an titude and cry "Thou art the man," but ees" for the set bowl in that lower room, d presently a force of plumbers will prove sagacity by unearthing an earthen pipe erein there is a crack, through which the rderous sewer-gas, that is so doubly danger- because imperceptible to our ordinary ses, comes creeping. There are so many these breaks in the earthen pipes that they e to be banished from use, and iron pipes substituted. These expert inspectors not only d down the earthen pipes, but the venti- pipes for the soil pipes are condemned also, not constructed to extend to the top of the f. Cold air-boxes, too, catch it, and are d under the ban, if, as is usually the case, ings are made to open on a level with the ace of the ground.—Boston Correspondence the Providence Journal.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 3, 1850.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

In continuing the consideration of the state Society, Joseph Armfield called attention to the Spirit which gave forth the Scriptures, and which is indispensable for understanding and profiting by them, as the great remedy of all the evils visible among us—a remedy which he thought too seldom pointed to, even those who are recognized as teachers among us. He spoke of the tendency to set aside the testimonies of the Society. One of these was as to plainness of dress—which he faithfully maintained had been a rebuke to human pride. Another speaker commented on the neglect of the attendance of meetings, and thought that a Friend travelling through their meetings now would meet at them but a small portion of the members—"perhaps a quarter of the whole number."

In the Continental Committee's report, it was stated that in Australasia meetings are regularly kept up in the three colonies—Victoria, Tasmania and South Australia—and contain in all 333 members. Joseph James Neave had been visiting their meetings, travelling much of the time on foot and alone, across rough mountain passes, sometimes finding shelter for the night in the hollow trunk of a tree.

There were reported to be 96 members scattered through New Zealand, where a small meeting had lately been set up.

In Norway, meetings had been regularly held, and eight members had been added to their number.

There did not appear to be much change in the small bodies of Friends in the south of France, and at Minden in Germany.

Some information was given "about an extraordinary movement which has taken place in the district of Siegen, in Westphalia. There is a religious awakening there, the people assembling after the manner of Friends, with no paid or appointed preachers, their views on many subjects very similar to those of Friends. They are exceedingly glad of Friends' publications; one of them has been to Minden, and received some books from Friends there, and they rejoice greatly in them and pass them from hand to hand. In one village, of from 12 to 14 thousand inhabitants, 'all the people have come in.' Of the two dancing saloons and public-houses, one is now turned into a meeting-room, and the other is no longer used for dancing or the sale of liquor. The innkeeper had been to get a supply of spirits, but on the way home was so reached that he turned his barrels into the river. A shopkeeper there seems to be called to the ministry; and thus the work seems to be spreading. Minden Friends write:—'We do hope that some Friends will feel it in their minds to come over and visit them.' The Report alluded to the recent death of Adolph Gunter, a Friend at Minden, who had led a bright example behind him. This Friend was a tall, and became convinced of Friends' views; at length he espoused them openly; his wife was in great trouble; his business forsook him; the clergy denounced him; and he was brought into great straits, and tempted to swerve from his faith. But he was enabled to hold on and by degrees he got on again, and lived to take a father's position in the Church.

C. Thompson, though desirous to encourage any right concern, hoped that any help sent to Westphalia might be such as would be likely to promote the Lord's work there and not to retard it. We should rather direct the people to the Light which is working there than to rely on any outward help."

Reports were also made of small meetings of Friends in Denmark, Syria and India.

A report in reference to finances of the meeting expressed the desire that American Yearly Meetings would consider whether they could not more largely contribute to the expenses of their ministers when travelling abroad than heretofore. The greatest amount paid for this object in any one year of the last 40 years was about £1900.

Durham Quarterly Meeting had sent up a proposition on the subject of temperance, urging the Yearly Meeting to appeal to its members against the manufacture and use of intoxicating drinks; and also to take measures for promoting legislative action against intemperance. After considerable discussion, it was concluded not to adopt the proposition, but to insert a paragraph on the subject in the general Epistle; and to reprint and circulate the Appeal of 1874 in reference to this matter.

The distress in Ireland was referred to in the minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings, and many details were given of the position of the Irish peasantry. The meeting recommended Friends to raise a subscription of at least £2000 to promote measures for a more permanent improvement of the distressed districts.

The subject of the trade in opium carried on between India, England and China was brought forward by minutes of London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting. The traffic was regarded as a national disgrace, and as immoral and unjust. This appeared to be the sentiment of Friends generally, and after some extended remarks a minute was made by the Yearly Meeting "to the effect that the meeting had been led to condemn the great national sin practised in forcing a noxious and poisonous substance, viz., opium, upon the millions of a free and independent people. That it desired to bear an emphatic testimony, as a Christian Church, against a system so opposed to the teachings of Christianity, and involving so much of misery and bloodshed. Fully impressed with the truth that it is righteousness that exalteth a nation, the meeting had further desired to urge upon our rulers to do that which was just and right, also to appoint a deputation to wait upon the Government on the subject with a memorial from this meeting. The minute also encouraged Friends to do all in their power privately and otherwise to enlighten the popular mind on this great question."

The report of the Committee on General Meetings called forth remarks from several Friends who had evidently been grieved at the manner in which meetings had been held under its authority. "Richard Brockbank asked whether the committee was at liberty to override the feelings of Friends living in those neighborhoods in which they held their General Meetings, and to introduce practices which have never been sanctioned by the Yearly Meeting. In one instance in his own Quarterly Meeting some practices were introduced in these meetings which are contrary in principle to those testimonies about silent worship for which our early Friends have so often suffered, and which our Society has ever upheld for a period of over 200 years."

"Richard Ball Rutter queried whether Friends were not losing by adopting such practices as singing in meetings, contrary to their principles. He had heard of instances of Friends not being able to go to their meetings in consequence of this practice. He believed that, if ministers spoke in the power of the Lord, they would not have any need for such things. One Friend, a minister of experience, said to him that it was all a mistake, and he had heard from some working men who attended one of these meetings that they had come there expecting something far different and had been disappointed, saying that they did not need that kind of thing, and further, they did not like it either."

A number of Friends thought it was not best to reappoint the Committee, but it was finally decided to continue it for another year.

We have been requested to call attention to the need which "The Friends' Association of Philadelphia and its vicinity, for the relief of Colored Freedmen" now have of a person to superintend the schools under their care in Virginia and North Carolina. Alfred H. Jones, who had been in charge for twenty-years, has resigned. The Committee say they "trust that some suitable, conscientious, dedicated Friend may feel drawn to the work."

The A-association during the year sustained eighteen schools, located at various points, mainly in West Virginia, and central North Carolina. The number of scholars enrolled in these was 2469, and the average attendance 1660. They distributed among the colored people a large number of Bibles, tracts, &c.; and many garments, and much material for clothing.

The Christian Worker states that William Wetherald, the late Clerk of Canada Yearly Meeting, has resigned his right of membership in the Society of Friends. It may be remembered, that some months ago he commenced to officiate as Pastor in another religious Society, and in that capacity administered the bread and wine in what is called the Lord's Supper. The Monthly Meeting to which he belonged made the following minute: "It is the united judgment of this meeting, having carefully labored with him to no satisfaction, and inasmuch as he has departed from both the faith and practice of Friends on some points, that we accept his resignation."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the afternoon of the 24th ult., the block burned by Third, Fourth, Christian and Sixth streets, was destroyed by fire. Fifty-two dwelling-houses were more or less damaged, a saw and frame mill, and a large lumber-yard, were entirely destroyed. The loss on property is about $100,000. Many families are left in a destitute condition.

A fire in Turley's Park, on the afternoon of the 25th ult., destroyed thirty-one buildings, among them, three hotels, the Post office and Oil Exchange. The paper-mill of the Woodside Paper Company, near Hamilton, Ohio, was burned on the night of the 24th. Less than 9000 sixty hands are thrown out of employment. The same night a fire broke out at the rope walk in Elizabeth Avenue, Elizabeth Point, N. J. The damage was estimated at $75,000. Two men were killed and several seriously injured.

The gauge of the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio Railroad has been raised to a normal width, between Washington and Lewisburg. The work was completed in 61 hours; distance 225 miles.

A. V. Lynde has entered suit, in Boston, against the owners of the steamer Narragansett for $15,000 damages for loss of property, personal injuries, and nervous prostration. The case has been removed to the Superior Court in Boston on the 6th inst.

The semi-annual report of the Kansas Freedmen's Relief Association shows that between Tenth mo. 13th, 1879, and Third mo. 31st, 1880, fully 29,000 negroes arrived at Topeka from the Southern States, and were cared for by the association. The number of rice used at the same time amounted to $29,590.

The Cincinnati Convention, in speaking of the rapid disappearance of our forests, says, it requires yearly 200,000 acres of forests to supply cross-ties for the railroads of the United States. The number of trees used annually is given at 15,000,000, which cost about 35 cents each, or a total of $5,250,000.

The wheat harvest is nearly finished in the southern portion of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and the yield in most places ranges from 15 to 25 bushels per acre. The quality is good. A few crops have been shipped from East, the price being from 83 to 85 cents per bushel.

The farmers on Long Island are greatly alarmed by the continued drought. The crops already harvested have yielded only a fourth of the usual amount. The early cabbage, peas and timothy have failed, and there is so little pasture, many farmers are already feeding their cattle on hay. A similar condition exists in some parts of New Jersey.

Five steamers which left New York the past week, carried a part of their cargo, upwards of 50,000 boxes of cheese.

One thousand and ninety-six miles of railroad have been built in the United States so far this year, against three hundred and nine-one miles for the corresponding period last year.

A committee of English bondholders of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, is reported to have arrived in New York on the 23d ult., for the purpose of making an investigation into the affairs of the company, on behalf of the bondholders in England.

The mortality in this city during the week ending on the 26th ult., numbered 427. Of this number 176 were adults and 251 children, 159 being under one year of age. There were 53 deaths from consumption, and one SS cholera infantum. In New York city for the same period there were 1,033 deaths. The increase is said to be chiefly due to a fatal prevalence of cholera infantum among the children.

The Long Island steamer, Seawanhaka, was burned to the water's edge, off Randall's Island, East River, about 5 o'clock in the afternoon of the 27th. The fire is said to have originated from an explosion in the engine-room. About forty lives were lost.

Thirty-five cases of sunstroke were reported in New York on the 26th.

Wheat—No. 1, S. sixes, 1881, registered, 104; do, coupon, 107; 5's, 103; 4's, 1891, 109; 4's, registered, 108; do, coupon, 109.

Trade is dull in most departments, but prices of the leading articles of merchandise are about steady.

Cotton remains about the same as last week. Sales of Delaware are reported at 12 to 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Crude, 7½ a 8 cts. in bbls., and standard white 9 cts. per gallon for exports.

Flour.—There was very little demand for flour, either for export or home use, and prices are but buyers. Sales of 150 barrels western Pennsylvania extra at $3 a $3.25; 100 barrels Minnesota extra, old stock medium, at $4.80; 200 barrels do., good, at $5.12; 100 barrels do., fresh ground, at $5.75; 100 barrels do., straight, at $6; 200 barrels of Pennsylvania extra family, good, at $4.50; 50 65-100 fine do. at $4.75; 100 barrels Ohio do., fair, at $5.25; 200 barrels do., good, at $5.50; 100 barrels do., choice, at $6; 100 barrels Michigan do., at $5.50; 200 barrels Indiana do. do. $5.25; 100 barrels Minnesota patents, good, at $7.12; 100 barrels do., fancy, at $7.50. Flour is in good demand on private terms. Rye—hour is steady. Small sales at $4.25 a $4.37 per barrel. Cornmeal.—No sales; prices nominal. Bran sold at $15 a $15.25 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat was rather firm. Sales of 5000 bushels Pennsylvania red at $1.16 a $1.17; 3000 bushels new do. at $1.14 a $1.15 a $1.14½. Rye was in demand; sales of Pennsylvania at 85 cts. per bushel. In corn there was less doing. Sales of 4000 bushels Pennsylvania western and southern yellow, on track and in grain depot, at 52 cts; 2000 bushels Delaware grain depot, at 51 cts; 200 bushels, 4½, mixed, on track and in grain depot, at 51½ cts; 1200 bushels, 4½, mixed, on track and in grain depot, at 50 cts. The oats market is unsettled; sales of 6000 bushels, including No. 1 white, at 40 cts.; No. 2 do., at 38 a 40 cts.; No. 3 do., at 37 cts.; rejected at 35 cts., and mixed at 36 a 39½ cts.

Hay and straw market.—Four weeks' ending 6th mo. 26th, 1880.—Load of hay, 123 loads of straw, 26. Average price during the week: Prime timothy, $1.45 a $1.55 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.40 a $1.50; straw, $1.25 to $1.45 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were a fraction lower: 2800 head arrived at $3.50 cts. in the different yards at 3 a 5½ cts. per lb. as to condition.

Sheep were in fair demand, and sold at 3½ a 5½ cts., and lambs at 5 a 8 cts. per lb. as to condition.

Hogs were dull. Sales reported at 61 a 7 cts. per lb. 20's, 20 to $50 per head.

There has been very little activity in this staple the past week, and no essential change in prices. Among the sales were, Ohio, fine, 45 cts.; do. ½ and blood 48 cts.; unwa-hed Ohio, fine, 40 cts.; unwashed western, 2nd a 32 cts.

Oils.—Lard, 60 cts.; Neats foot, 55 a 65 cts.; Lard, 55 a 65 cts.; Linseed, crude, 39 a 50 cts.; bleached, $1.12 a $1.20 per gallon.

FOREIGN.—At a meeting of the committee of the Mission House Relief Fund, held on the 25th ult., it was announced that only £10 had been received since last meeting, that the fund now afforded only three weeks' supply, and that eight weeks of intense distress had to be faced.

In the House of Lords, on the 25th, the bill legalizing marriage with a deceased wife's sister, was rejected by a vote of 101 to 90.

During the past week, ten first class ocean steamers have embarked 3638 passengers in the Mersey for Great Britain and Canada.

The building of the new Edlystone Light-house making more rapid progress—it is thought the work will soon be less designed than tiles and weather.

The Conference at Berlin has agreed upon the boundary between Turkey and Greece. The Porte has informed the ambassadors, that they have only the right of mediation, and not of decision.

The newspapers announce that a number of Friends will be less desirous of their offices sooner than they might the decesses against the Jesuits and all unauthoritative congregations.

The steamer Desook, with the obelisk on board, was to sail from Gibraltar on the 25th.

The latest dispatch from Buenos Ayres amounting to a vote of 101 to 90.

summoned to capitulate within twenty-four hours. Forty-six deaths occurred from yellow fever and typhoid fever, in Havana, during the week ending the 25th.

MARRIED, at Friends' meeting-house, Salem, Ohio, Fourth-day, Fifth month 26th, 1880, CHARLES HALL, of East Carmel, Ohio, to MELISSA COPE, of the former place.

DECEASED, on the 12th of 3d month, 1880, THOMAS E. ROST, aged 74 years and 11 months, a member of Co. Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, Iowa. He had been severely ill with patience and resignation—gratitude seemed to be the clothing of his spirit—saying, "I have received many favors that I am unworthy of; how can I be Christ-like and cared for, if it could not be mercy &c. A short time previous to the close, he was asked if his mind was peaceful? "Oh yes!" he replied "if it were not so I should be miserable indeed; I have been taking a review of my past life, and I find nothing in my way, all is peace; but it is all through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus, and I find I have hope." He passed quietly and peacefully away, leaving his friends the comforting assurance that he has entered into everlasting rest.

—, in Philadelphia, on the 27th of 5th mo. 1880, ANNA N. WATSON, daughter of Thomas Watson, aged 60 years, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District. This young Friend was attacked with symptoms of consumption about two years previous to her death, which assumed a more alarming aspect during the last year of her life. Within this period she became truly exercised in a most Jesus-like and Holy Spirit-like manner for death. She altered the character of her reading and became much interested in the Holy Scriptures and also lost her relish for company or enjoyments of worldly kind. She was now very earnest to know her salvation certain, and to understand and exercise true faith in Christ Jesus. Nothing short of the baptism of the Holy Spirit, she accompanied with sincere repentance for sin, and giving up her own will could satisfy her exercised mind. During an opportunity, when sympathizing friends were sitting by her bedside, she was asked to give up her own will, and to know God. Truly it felt to those present, that she was passing through the baptism that saith; "Thine sins going beforehand to judgment; and the relief experienced after this severe struggle, was evident her altered manner and placid countenance. She was now in a most Jesus-like and Holy Spirit-like manner, was able to say, subsequent to this, that "she was satisfied, and could leave all and trust." A comfortable assurance rests upon the minds of her friends, that her sins were forgiven and washed away for His name sake who died for us.

For "The Friend"

The Bible in India.

Jacob Chamberlain, in a lecture delivered New York city, tells of the effect of reading the New Testament on the mind of an unlettered Hindu. Feeling the burden of sin, desiring relief, he went to a gathering of shippers who had assembled to draw the oil of Juggernaut, hoping to find comfort by being in the ceremonies. While there he saw a man who was carrying a New Testament, wrapped in the folds of his dress, and asked him what the book was? The man did not read it, and readily sold it for half a rupee (25 cents). The Hindu read it through; he read in the book that they were not to get the assembling of themselves together the first day of the week, as the manner of the Jews; and on the first day of their week gathered his neighbors in his own house near him read from "the wonderful Book." He taught his wife to read, a strange thing to a Hindu to do, as they never used to teach women to read; but he taught her to read in order that she might be able to read "the Book." Some years passed by and the man died. When he died he told his wife that they must not burn his body as the Hindus are wont to do, but bury it, for Christ is buried; that they must not perform any other ceremony over his grave. His wife began to read, on the first day of the week, to the people from this book. Years passed by. At last there came two missionaries into a village some fifteen miles from this place. They were preaching there to the people, as they supposed for the first time that they had heard of Christ and his mission, when two men that happened to be there in the market-place stepped forward and said, "Why, sirs, what you say is exactly the same as the man of the Book" down at our village used to teach." They asked about it and earned the story."

C. This relates his own experiences: Some fifteen years ago I took a long journey of five months through a native kingdom that had never before been traversed, so that I could learn, by my missionary, and from the Scriptures had never been circulated. I took the journey, an exploring and distributing journey, at the expense of the American Bible Society. We were warned we should meet with dangers and difficulties.

We did meet with them abundantly; but on the way the Master gave us such cheering signs of his presence that we were willing to go on. We had been warned not to go because of the danger, and were told that we would never all of us get home alive; but I read in my commission, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." It did not say, "except Hyderabad," and believing my commission was to be carried out, I went, taking with me four native assistants. I will remember one Saturday when we had attempted to cross a wide river in basket-boats, and had been swept down the stream three miles in crossing. At last we had gained the shore, but we had been delayed so long that it was midnight before we reached the town where we wished to spend the night. Camping outside the city we spent the rest of the night. In the afternoon we thought that though we had intended to rest we must go out to the bazaar. We went. A large audience assembled around us. We preached to them of Christ and his salvation. We distributed Scriptures and tracts among them, and came back before sundown to our camp, intending to lie down to rest very early, as we must start on our journey at half-past four the next morning, as was our wont; when the sun had set a group of men came out of the town with books in their hands saying to us, "Sirs, this is such wonderful news that you have told us. Won't you please come back and talk to us some more about it. The idea of a way of getting rid of sin without ourselves, by the help of a Divine Redeemer! It is wonderful. Please come back and talk to us some more about it." We went back. The market place was covered with Indian rugs and Persian rugs, and with pillows for us to sit upon, for they said they wanted us to talk longer than we could stand to talk. There were stakes driven in the ground floor, with little native lamps on them to light when it should grow dark, for they said they wanted us to talk long after it was dark. They kept us reading and talking until ten o'clock at night, and would not let us go. When at last we told them that they must allow us to rest, for we were very weary and had to start early in the morning, they allowed us to leave and we went and laid down to rest.

"At half past four in the morning we had arisen; our carts were packed and we were just starting, when out came a deputation from the town with books in their hands, with the leaves turned down here and there; for they said they had been reading the books all night long, for they were sure they would never have another chance to ask questions about them; and it was such strange news, and so good if true, they wanted to be sure that they understood all about it, and they had come to ask some questions before I started. I said to my native assistants, "You go on. Three miles north of here, I understand, is the town of Peberri. As you are walking and I have a horse, you go on, and I will stop and answer these questions, and then center on as rapidly as I can and overtake you. If you get there before I do, go into the town and offer the Scriptures and tracts for sale." We could not give them away there. There was a reason for it that I cannot stop here to explain. "You go on, and I will join you as soon as I can." They went on; I stopped and answered the questions. They asked a great many earnest questions. When I attempted to mount my horse, they put their hands on my shoulder and said, "No, sir—you cannot go until you answer some more questions." I answered a few more and tried to spring on my horse again and go on, as I did not like to leave my native assistants to encounter danger alone, if there were danger, and wished to hasten on. But they said, "No, sir; answer some more questions; don't go yet." I stayed three quarters of an hour and then went forward to join my assistants. I entered on as rapidly as I could, and as I approached the town of Peberri, which was a well-known place, I was met by my native assistants coming away from the town accompanied by some natives. Speaking in the Tamil language, which was not understood by the people there, I said to them, "Would not they let you go into the town? would not they let you preach? could you not dispose of any books?" "Yes, sir," said they; "we preached to a most intensely interested audience, and when we offered our books and tracts for sale they bought every one of them; we haven't a single one left; they paid for them all and wanted more. We told them you had your saddlebags full of books, and they have come out here to meet you and buy more books."

"Turning to them, I said (in their own language, the Telugu), 'Brothers, I have plenty of books—you shall have all you want. But first let us go back into the town, and I will tell you some more about this wonderful news.' We went back into the town. I saw that they were the chief men of the place. There in the square before the gate was the platform for the elders of the city to sit upon and administer the affairs of the town, as in ancient Jewish times. They escorted me to that platform and wished me to sit with them. As I preferred to stand and talk, so that I could be heard by a larger audience, they said they would stand too, for they did not wish to sit while their teacher was standing—it would not be polite. Standing there, I proclaimed to them again the gospel of eternal life through Jesus Christ. When I had done speaking, I took my saddlebags from the horse and offered them the books, and at once there was a rush for the books. I gave out book after book, and still they pressed upon me until every book was gone, and then there were forty hands held out, over the shoulders of those before them, with money in them; and they said, 'Here, sir, take what money you please, only give me a book that tells about the Divine Father that you have told us about.'—'Give me a book that tells about Jesus Christ and his salvation.'—'Give me a book that tells about heaven and how I can get there.'—'Take what money you please, only do give me a book.' I told them, 'Brothers, I am very sorry I did not know there were so many educated men here, and that so many books would be wanted. I have a cart-load of books that have gone on in advance, which I might have stopped for you to buy all you want.' They said, 'How far has the cart gone?' Judging from the time, I said that it must have got about three miles. They said, 'If we go on and overtake the cart, will you stop it and let us buy the books?' 'Certainly,' said I. 'They at once appointed a deputation to go on and buy the books. Five were appointed.'

Computation of Time.

An article by Spencer Bonsall on the "Computation of Time," originally prepared for the Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, has been reprinted in pamphlet form.

It contains a clear account of the inconveniences which have arisen because the civil year does not correspond in length with the solar year, which is the time occupied by the earth in its rotation around the sun; of the attempts to remedy these by the Julian and Gregorian calendars, and of the various perplexing corrections required to change dates from the New Style to the Old.

The solar or true year consists of 365 days, 5 hours, 48 minutes and 46 and a fraction seconds. The civil year, as fixed by Julius Cæsar and the astronomers of that day, had 365 days, and every fourth year had 366. This would have made the civil correspond exactly with the solar year, if the latter had been just 365 days and 6 hours long—but as it was really about 11 minutes and 14 seconds shorter, this difference in the lapse of ages so accumulated, that in the 16th century it was found that the vernal equinox came on the 11th instead of the 21st of the month. Pope Gregory XIII., assisted by several learned men, reformed the calendar—determining that the year which ended a century should not be a leap-year unless it had already accumulated, the year 1582, when the new Calendar was introduced, had 10 days dropped out of it, and was made to contain only 355 days. The change was soon adopted by the Catholic countries of Europe, but Russia and those under the dominion of the Greek Church were unwilling to accept even scientific improvements influenced the Protestant kingdoms, though these one after another for convenience sake, authorized the change.

In 1751 an act was passed to make the year in Great Britain and its colonies, correspond with that generally in use on the continent of Europe. By this it was decreed that the 2nd of September (then the Seventh month of the year, as the word indicates) should be the last day of the old style, and that the next day, instead of being the 3rd, should be reckoned as the 14th. The legal year had previously commenced, as it was named, on the 1st of January; but it was now decided that it should begin on the 1st of January, which had before been the Eleventh month. The remembrance of the former New-Years' day is still preserved in rural districts, by the practice of dating the lease of farms from the 25th of 3rd month, instead of the present time of commencing the year.

When this act was passed by the English Government it became necessary for the inhabitants of its colonies to conform to the new law. Accordingly at the Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Philadelphia in the Seventh month, 1751, it was—

"Agreed, that Friends within the Compass of this Yearly Meeting should concur with the Minute of the Yearly Meeting in London concerning the Method of computing time as prescribed by a late Act of Parliament, which minute is as follows, Viz:—

"Agreed, that, as by the late Act of Parliament for regulating the Commencement of the Year, it is ordered, that the first day of the Eleventh Month next, shall be deemed the first day of the Year 1752, and that the month called January shall be successively accounted the first month of the Year, and not the Month called March, as heretofore hath been our Method of Computing.

"That from and after the time above mentioned, the Eleventh month called January, shall thenceforward be deemed & reckoned the first month of every year, & to be so styled in all the Journals & Writings of Friends, instead of computing from the month called March, according to our present Practice: And Friends are recommended to go on with the Names of the following months numerically according to our Practice from the beginning, so that the Months may be called & written as follows, That named January to be called and written the first month, and February to be called and written the Second Month, & so on. All other Methods of computing or calling the months unavoidably leading into Contradiction.

"And Whereas for the more regular computation of Time the same Act directs, that in the Month now called September, which will be in the year 1752 after the second day of the said month, Eleven nominal Days shall be omitted and that which would have been the third shall be reckoned & Esteemed the fourteenth day of the said month, & that which would otherwise have been the fourth day of the said month must be deemed the Fifteenth, & so on. It appears likewise necessary that Friends should conform themselves to this direction and omit the Eleven nominal days accordingly."

"Business being Ended, The Meeting adjourned to Burlington on the 24th day of the Ninth Month in the next Year according to this new Method of Computing of Time, which will be on the Second First day of the Week, in the month by Law called September.

Plain-dwelling.

The period in which the Society of Friends arose was one in which the customs of the time sanctioned the use of great plainness of speech. This is especially observable in the controversial writings of that day; in those written by our early members in defence of the truth, as well as in those of their opponents. Yet it was often connected with a spirit of love and pity for those whose faults were in argument, or short-comings in practice were so openly and unsparringly exposed.

About the year 1653, some of the priests in Westmoreland presented a petition to the Justices of the Peace of that county, complaining of the success of James Naylor and George Fox in their preaching, accusing them of uttering "horrid blasphemies" and of teaching "damnable heresies and dangerous errors," and praying that they be hindered from going on with their work. Among other charges was one of using "abusive words." In a reply to these "Petitions," the charge of abusive words is denied, and the following explanation is given:

"Several of us, who be of one heart, meet together, sometimes in the market, and sometimes in other places; and if we see pride, drunkenness, and be moved to reprove and exhort; see and hear cursed speakers, swear, moved to reprove and exhort them; or fighting and brawling, coining, cheating, counterfeit merchandizing, lying and dissembing, which we say woe is upon, do you call it abusive? And we bid them repent and to unto the Lord while they have time, and not to prize it, for the great day of the Lord coming, wherein every one shall give an account. And the apostle warned all smalls great to turn unto the Lord and repent, which we cannot but do the same, who have favour of the Lord, who brought us to repentance, and changed our lives; and this is which you call abusive."

Gratitude's Expression.—J. B. Gough, a temperance lecturer, tells this incident from his experience:

I remember riding once in Scotland to place—I cannot pronounce it; I pronounce it once, and they laughed at me; I can say it, A-u-c-h-t-e-r-m-u-e-h-t-y. A man came to meet me at the Ladybank Junction, and to me six miles in a fly—a one-horse cab. We sat together, I noticed the man was leaning forward very strangely; I saw him take a handkerchief, that was the beginning of and tie it round his face.

Then he would sit a little and shake it, and then tie it another way, still leaning head forward. Said I, "Have you the toothache?" "No." "Have you taken cold?" "No." "Then will you be good enough tell me why you lean forward with the handkerchief, if you are not cold and have not toothache?" "Well," he said, "the wind of the fly is broken, and the wind is cold this morning, and I am trying to keep from you." "Why," I said, "you don't try to tell me you are sticking your head in a hole to keep the wind off me?" "Yes, I said, "Well, I thank you, my dear friend I never saw you before."

"No, I saw you; I was a ballad singer, used to go round with a half-starved wife; my baby in her arms, my wife often times with black eye. Some bow or another I got ear you in Edinburg in 1853, and you told me I was a man; and I went out of the place, and said, 'By the help of God, whatever it is, I'll be a man; and now I have a happy home, and wife and children gathered around me. God bless you, sir! I would stick my head in any hole under heaven if I could do you any good. God bless you!'

The House Sparrow.

I have kept Parrots, Thrushes, Skylarks, Robins, Canaries, and Sparrows; and excepting the English Robin Redbreast, there is no bird equal to the common English Sparrow as a house pet, not even the Canary. You may tame a Canary, but it is never safe to let out of doors, for while some will return, as a general thing, they don't seem to know very much about it, and keep hopping in and there till they soon lose themselves. A tame Sparrow knows the way home every time, and especially at meal time, which, I think, is after the English fashion five or six times a day.

I remember, when a boy, catching a full grown female in a brick trap, taking it home, as I had no cage, we gave it the liberty of the house; this was late in the fall, and the bird appreciated its comfortable quarters, and at once made itself at home. Our boarder became a great favorite with us, and needed very readily to come from any part of the house when called for; mother used to call her by some pet name; I always whistled; the little birdie understood either summons and promptly made her appearance. She had her regular place on the edge of the table at meal times, and would keep up a noisy chirping until her food was placed before her on a little toy plate, and when that was all gone would loudly call for more.

This pet staid with us all winter, and I often let out of doors, invariably came back again without any looking after. In the spring, however, she went off, as we supposed good, and it certainly was a surprise to find her in the fall to see her ladyship return with two or three young birds and a fine male sparrow, with glossy black breast and naughty eyes. She tried hard to coax him into the house, but we did all we could to help her, but he was too much for us, and after hanging round side for a day or two, was finally lost in a crowd of sparrows that were always trooping about; the young birds we had not tried to save, so they, too, went with the crowd. But our old pet staid with us that winter, and after a few days training resumed her old habits and cunning little ways. As the breeding season approached she was gone again for the summer, but not far, for she came daily to feed, and at the close of the summer took her abode with us again for the third year. I suppose this happy association must have lasted for years had not our little bird been accidentally killed before another year time dawned.

Eight or ten years ago, when I lived in New York, I had my studio in the city, the corner of a regular nesting place for the sparrow; and I feel myself among old familiar friends; and am ready to help them when opportunity offers. A few years ago, the winter was very severe, and several of the hardy birds suffered; one that we picked up on the sidewalk was chilled through, though alive. I took it home, wrapped it in wool, as farmers sometimes do with early spring chicks; in a little while we heard the well-known chirp, chirping. On removing the cover there sat the little fellow looking quite bright, and although not yet able to stand on his feet, he was ready for a good square meal. From that time he was at home with us, and became such a familiar pet that my wife began to think him a nuisance; so, on Christmas day, being warm and sunny, and quite a number of sparrows in the street, we thought it a good time to let him go. The window was opened, and Dickie set down outside the still; but he wouldn't go, and when we attempted to drive him out, he dodged past us into the room again, and perched high up on one of the picture frames, nor would he come down till the window was closed again. A few weeks later, another sparrow was picked up on the sidewalk, that by some mishap had broken its wing. This unfortunate one was also taken home to be company for Dickie. He took to the new comer very graciously, and did his best to make it feel at home by bringing it all sorts of scraps to eat, and even feeding it from his own beak. Just as the parent birds may be seen feeding their young. Dickie also took great pains to show the stranger all over the floor of the rooms, chirping the while in the most encouraging tones.

In the summer, while living in the country, I took two young sparrows home. Like a good many young birds, they had fallen from the nest in the cornice to the sidewalk and were unable to fly back again. They were so young we had to feed them with a quill, (their food was plain crackers soaked in milk,) and at night they were stowed away in a wooden canary cage. From the second or third day they learned to go to the cage at dusk as regularly as hens go to roost. Like the sparrows of my boyhood, they soon became very tame and intelligent, so that we could let them out into the orchard and call them back at any time. I remember our pastor calling to see us one day, and during our conversation, he said, "where are those English Sparrows I've heard so much about; I have looked all round and see nothing but an empty cage there in the corner." "Oh," said my wife, "that is their bedroom only; we keep them out in the orchard daytimes. If you would like to see them I will call them in." "Indeed," said he, "I would like to see an English Sparrow very much." Wife at once took a small white cup plate with some crackers broken on it, and going into the orchard we listened for their peculiar chirp, placed ourselves under the apple tree where they were; the little plate was held up and at the sound of our familiar voices the two sparrows flew down and perched on our shoulders, from whence they were taken in the hand and exhibited to our visitor. "Well," said he, "that is the prettiest piece of bird-taming I ever heard of." The English Robin and the Sparrow are equally well adapted for house pets, and both can be kept in cages, for we have kept them so, and they may be allowed the run of the house, providing there are no cats around. The sparrow when kept in the house undergoes a remarkable change, from a rough, rowdy looking bird, to a neat, clean, and handsome fellow. Regular baths, good food, and a clean cage tells materially on the appearance of the hardy little waif.—Viel's Magazine.

The Spring of True Prayer.

Alas for many professing Christians of our day! How little they are aware of the prevalence of idolatry among them! The same indeed in the ground, spring and substance of it, as that which is so repeatedly and severely reproved in the Scriptures. For truly, every offering which is not of God's immediate preparation in us, is idolatry, and not a whit more useful to men, or acceptable to God, than those idolatries among the Jews.

The preparation of the heart in man, and the answer of the tongue, are of the Lord. And whoever presumes to offer an offering, that He has not prepared, is implicitly saying, that God Almighty can be moved, influenced and induced by a sound of words, or by the warmth and passions, or vehement affections and address of man. When God draws out our souls, as it were, towards Him, through his own mighty power and lively influence upon us, and lays upon us a living necessity to call upon Him, it never, yea, never fails to do us good. But it is He only that therein does us good. It is not we that do ourselves good, or that stir Him up, or move Him to do us good. And therefore, all prayer, which is not of his immediate begetting in us, is mockery and idolatry. "We know not what to pray for, but as his Holy Spirit helpeth our infirmities," and teacheth us. And it is often the case, that even then, when his Spirit sensibly helpeth our infirmities, and giveth us the clear knowledge what to pray for, we cannot safely, nor without the loss of the very life and help, and holy unction thus afforded us, even attempt the vocal utterance of those petitions, which He enables us silently, fervently and affectionately to address unto Him. For the help thus afforded, amounts, at those seasons, only to the begetting of, and is wholly terminated in growings which cannot be vocally, and at the same time, livingly and acceptably uttered. And oh! how grievously do they err from the true standard of all acceptable prayer, who, at such times, in their own strength and forward willings and runnings, will be intruding upon God and the assembly, a vocal utterance of that which, according to his design, and to the utmost of his present assistance, cannot be profitably uttered.—J. Scott.

A Week in the Country.

Here is a little incident which has a special significance just as this time. Last summer a lady in a neighboring city became interested in the charity called the Children's Week, by which the boys and girls who would never otherwise see the country are received as guests or boarders at farm houses for a week or fortnight. There was a lame girl who sat at a corner of a noisy street selling papers and peanuts, a wizened, stolid little creature, with dull eyes and leathery skin. Her lady chose, prompted by some passing freak, as the subject of her charity, and sent her out to a farmer among the hills in Berks County to board. The farmer and his wife had, secretly, a poor opinion of "town tramps" or humanitarian experiments. They gave the children their meals, for which they were paid, ordered them out of the berry patch, counted the spoons when they were going, that none should be stolen, and felt that they had discharged their full duty. This girl, unlike the others, neither robbed the cherry trees nor trampled the berry beds.

She sat all day on the doorsteps looking out at hill and field, or sometimes followed the housewife to barn or poultry yard, or gravely watched the cows and chickens as if they had been new miracles in the world that day.

"A dumb, half-witted creature," was the good woman's verdict when she went away. In April the farmer's wife received an urgent message asking her to come to this girl, who was dying of some slow, inherited disease. She found her with a drunken woman, in a squalid room at the top of a tenement house, the one window of which opened on dingy brick walls and an asphalt roof, where a lean cat prowled among empty tomato cans. The country woman was not used to visits of sympathy. She was appalled by the dirt, the surrounding misery, the chance of small pox, the probable demand for money. "What do you want with me?" she asked. "Is it all there still?" the child demanded, her eyes kindled with fever.

The hills, the solemn sunsets, the green fields, even the cattle and simple sights and sounds of the farm haunted her like a wonderful vision. In the sixteen years during which the poor wretch had lived that one week had been her single glimpse of the beautiful world about her.

"Is it all there still? Tell me about it!" she said. "The woods, the cows, the things I saw you plant—anything, I haven't much time. I want to hear about them once before I go." The woman talked as she was bidden. Presently the facts of the situation forced themselves into her slow mind. "Why!" she said, starting up, her eyes full of motherly kindness, "Why shouldn't you come to it, child?" She took her home that night and nursed her tenderly, as if she had once been her own baby. If we would say that the sick child recovered in the pure air and quiet of the hills our story would have been pleasant to tell; but she did not recover. She died there after a month of happiness. The farm house, the woods putting out their tender leaves, the fields just upturned by the plough all became like home to her. She had a keen interest in the planting. The farmer, a rough Pennsylvania Dutchman, took time to carry her from place to place, made seats for her by the stream, under the oaks in the pasture. At last she closed her eyes contentedly on it all, and her tired body was laid to rest in the pure air and warm, friendly earth of the hills.—New York Tribune.

Well-Built Christians.—A well-built Christian is harmonious in all his parts. No one trait shames another. He is not a jumble of inconsistencies—to-day devout, to-morrow frivolous; to-day liberal to one cause, to-morrow niggardly toward another; to-day fluent in prayer, and to-morrow fluent in polite falsehoods. He does not keep the fourth commandment on the Sunday, and break the eighth commandment on Monday. He does not shirk an honest debt to make a huge donation. He is not in favor of temperance for other folk, and of a glass of toddy for himself. He does not exhort or pray at each of the few meetings he attends, to make up arrears for the more meetings which he neglects. He does not so consume his spiritual fuel during revival seasons, that he is cold as Nova Zembla during the rest of the time; nor do his spiritual fervors ever outrun his well-ordered conversation.—Chyler.

UNDER THE SHADOW.

Soft the moonlight shadow resteth
Over all;
Stealing where the early twilight
Wraps its pall;
And from out the deepening stillness
Voices call.

Gentle, low, and full of music,
Now they rise
From the grave of buried treasures
To the skies;
Where the sound of sacred anthem
Never dies.

Memory bears a precious burden;
Rich and clear
Fall the songs of by-gone pleasure
On the ear;
Loving words from gentle spirits
Linger near.

These have passed, and darkness falleth
On the scene!
Change, and death with leaden footstep
Come between.
Joys have vanished, hopes have perished
As a dream.

To a quiet little grave-yard
Am I led,
Where in deep unbroken slumber
Rest the dead,
Heeding not the lonely orphans'
Silent tread.

Father, mother,—tender guardians
Good and true,
Know you not your sorrowing children
Mourn for you,
Craving still the prayers and blessings
Once they knew.

Ye have passed from earthly trial
Earthly care;
Silent grief and dust temptation,
Child despair,
Murmuring hearts, and restless spirits
Are not there.

Sick and suffering, faint and weary,
Now we come,
Poor in spirit—pressing forward
Thro' the gloom,
Yearning for a gleam of sunshine
From your home.

Well we know the hand of mercy,
Opened wide,
Drops on earth its blight and blessing
Side by side;
In the furnace of affliction
Souls are tried.

If Thou prove us, Heavenly Father,
Trustest Friend,
May we trust, in every sorrow
Thou dost send;
Only grant us strength and patience
To the end.

We have, in life's weary conflict,
Prayed to die,
Longing for the changeless glory
Found on high.
Angel hands seemed outstretched to us
From the sky.

Now in hours of calmer sorrow
Deep and still,
Write we most for resignation
To thy will,
Waiting for Thy voice to whisper
"Peace be still."

If 'tis sin, oh, Heavenly Father,
Thine to shrink,
From the cup of bitter sorrow
We must drink,
When we feel the life-chain broken
Link by link,

Wilt Thou not in tender mercy
All forgive?
Teach us how to bear our sorrows,
How to live?
That to Thee this earnest warfare
Glory give.

Let Thy greatest benediction
Patience be;
Bear it to Thy earth-bound children,
Even me,
That we wait Thy time appointed
To be free.

Ask we not the needful portion
Thou wilt spare,
Of the purifying trials
Pain or care;
Only give us what Thou knowest
We can bear.

BLESSED BE THY NAME FOREVER.

Blessed be Thy name forever,
Thou of the life the guard and giver!
Thou canst guard thy creatures sleeping,
Heal the heart long broke with weeping.
God of stillness, and of motion,
Of the desert and the ocean,
Of the mountain, rock, and river,
Blessed be Thy name forever.

Thou who slumberest not nor sleepest,

Cleopatra's Needles.

The remarkable obelisks which have been known to the world under the singular names of Cleopatra's needles, and which are now being removed, one to England and the other to the United States, have a much more interesting archaeological interest than is generally supposed.

They were taken from the celebrated quarries at Syene, and were like others, constructed in the usual tapering form symbolizing the sun's rays. The material of which they are composed is a rose colored granite. Pli states that they were transported to the Nile with the aid of flat bottomed boats, floated in canals especially prepared for that purpose. It is supposed that they were afterwards erected to their place by making a groove in their base, in which they might turn as a hinge, and then building a mound of earth which increased in size as the top of the shaft rose, until the monument stood erect.

They were originally set up by Thothmes III, one of Egypt's greatest rulers, at Heliopolis, or the City of the Sun, as early as 1860 B. C.

They were transported to Alexandria and Tiberias, and set up in front of Caesar's temple, where they obtained the name which they bear. The name was given to them in consequence of a tradition that they were removed to Alexandria during the reign of Cleopatra.

The obelisk removed to England is 68 feet 5 inches high, and contains on its two facings hieroglyphs expressive of the titles of Thothmes III; on the other two, Ramses II. has added his own, illustrating only the pomp and vain glory of these monarchs; but absolute destitute of historical information. The other obelisk still standing contains many similar inscriptions, and was erected by the same monarch.

The significance to the Bible student which some remarkable monoliths possess, is not so much in their inscriptions or their form as in the fact that they were probably standing in front of the great temple to the Sun when the pelites were in Egypt. They also remind of the two pillars Jochin and Boaz, which Solomon erected in front of his temple. Such monoliths were always erected in pairs, and are the most common and prominent symbols of worship at the east.—The Oriental Herald.

For "The Friend."

Is there no help for our Society; must this sad spirit continue to cause discord? Is there none left amongst us who have power to prevail with God by prayer? "The effect, fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much." Do we not neglect the first part of verse two much? Are we humble-minded folks; willing to acknowledge mistakes to another? Have we that charity which inketh no evil, without which our works profit us nothing? I know from experience how difficult it is to work with those who do not feel it is required of them to work. I feel it is right for me to. An earnest, fervent prayerful life will have influence; stand firm for every thing which we believe to be right; expressing our views when we feel led upon to do so; if not heeded, leave those whom we feel to be mistaken in some of their views, in the care of Israel's slumbering shepherd; continuing in prayer to Him that our eyes may be opened to see more clearly way of life and salvation.

Remember Christ's answer to the disciple in those who followed not with them; that what Paul writes in Phil. i. 12. I also think there is one in our Society who does more earnestly than myself to see the members of our branch of the church return their first principles. Consecrating all to the Lord, not feeling that our time or money is our own; it is only lent to us to be employed in the advancement of Christ's kingdom on the earth. How can we answer a solemn question as to how the talents have been improved? Are we sure of receiving the reward of, Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy lord. M.

The Mistaken Divines.—Rica, having been visited by the library of a French convent, writes thus to a friend concerning what had been said: "Father," said I to the librarian, "what are these huge volumes that fill up the whole side of the library?" "Those," he, "are the interpreters of the Scriptures." "There is a prodigious number of them," replied I; "the Scriptures must have been very dark formerly, and be very clear at present. Do there remain still any doubts? Are there now any points contested?" "Are there?" answered he, with surprise; "are there?" "There are almost as many of them as there are lines." "You astonish me," said I. "That, then, have all these authors been?" "These authors," returned he, "have searched the Scriptures for what ought to be believed, but for what they did not believe themselves. They did not consider them as a book wherein were contained the principles they ought to receive, but as a work which might be made to authorize their own views."—Late Paper.

For "The Friend."

Philadelphia Home for Incurables.

Many readers of "The Friend" are helpers in this charity, either by annual subscription or by donation to the building fund for a permanent Home. These will find by the annual report that this Home is in process of construction. For the benefit of others, the following extracts are made with the hope of enlisting the sympathy and aid of many more in this excellent work.

The new building will stand on a lot having a frontage of 192 feet on Darby Road, at the corner of 48th street. It is designed to accommodate forty patients. This is the Administration House; and the addition of wings will be made as soon as the funds required can be raised. It is confidently expected that by 10th mo. 1st this main building will be finished and ready for occupancy.

The patients are all around us; daily their ranks are increasing; a sad suffering throng, for whom in this great city no other refuge has been provided, and who are looking forward to the building of this Home for some place to rest securely until released by death. We plead for them for His sake whose legacy they are, and who, centuries ago, trod this earth with weary feet, and "had not where to lay his head."

"What 'o'clock is it?"—When I was a young lad my father one day called me to him, that he might teach me to know what 'o'clock it was. He told me the use of the minute-finger and the hour-hand, and described to me the figures on the dial plate, until I was perfect in my part. No sooner was I quite master of this knowledge than I set off scampering to join my companions in a game of marbles; but my father called me back again. "Stop, Willie," said he; "I have something more to tell you." Back again I went, wondering what else I had got to learn; for I thought I knew all about the clock as well as my father did. "Willie," said he, "I have taught you to know the time of day. I must now teach you the time of your life."

I waited rather impatiently to hear how my father would explain this further lesson, for I wished to go to my marbles. "The Bible," said he, "describes the years of a man to be threescore-and-ten or fourscore years. Now, life is very uncertain, and you may not live a single day longer; but if we divide the fourscore years of an old man's life into twelve parts, like the dial of a clock, it will give almost seven years for every figure. When a boy is seven years old, then it is one 'o'clock of his life; and this is the case with you. When you reach fourteen years old, it will be two 'o'clock with you; and when at twenty-one, it will be three 'o'clock; at twenty-eight, it will be four 'o'clock; at thirty-five, it will be five 'o'clock; at forty-two, it will be six 'o'clock; at forty-nine, it will be seven 'o'clock. Should it please God to spare your life. In this manner you may always know the time of your life, and looking at the clock may remind you of it. My great-grandfather, according to this calculation, died at twelve 'o'clock, my grandfather at eleven, and my father at ten. At what hour you or I shall die, Willie, is only known to Him who knoweth all things." Seldom since then have I heard the inquiry, "What 'o'clock is it?" or looked at the face of a clock, without being reminded of the words of my father.—Exchange.

For "The Friend."

Part of William Evans' communication at the grave of Rebecca Brown, daughter of our friend Thomas Kite.

"Truly this is an unexpected blow to her friends, but to her an unspeakable mercy, to be thus early gathered from all the fluctuations and trials of this changeful scene, and united to the children of God above." He then went on to speak of the church, that it could but mourn when those were removed who had been in measure prepared for usefulness therein, but that it would not do to look too much to the clouds and the winds, but endeavor to draw near to Him, who has prepared servants and hand-maids for his service, and will still do so.

A London Fog.

BY SARAH F. HOPKINS.

To one whose vividest notions of a fog have been acquired at Newport or Nantucket, where, unreluctantly as a troop of ghosts at noonday, freakish clouds of mist whirl into the brilliant sunshine, blotting it out with every outline of the house across the narrow street, and as swiftly whirled away, or in New York, where real danger lurks on her shrouded water-ways, or in her busiest streets, that is marvellous reading that sets forth how a cloud of vapor can paralyze the activities of a city like a mighty world in itself—dead, as the death-rats swift and high, and fill the accident wards in the hospitals, and the casualty columns in the newspapers with victims.

But a dense London fog is a terrifying thing, whether one be indoors or out; depressing to sense and spirit, and if it be accompanied with air of bitter chilliness, it is extremely distressing to endure by anyone not in high health. The winter just past closed, in character, England's dark year. Murkiness of varying intensity reigned, day in, day out, for weeks together. A London letter said, in February, "we live by gas or candle-light. It is twilight from the time we get up until three 'o'clock, then it is dark; and on foggy days twilight is omitted." And in the same month the obituary lists of the "Times" were filled with the deaths of aged people. Protracted absence of sunshine is of itself a calamity. As the grey dead days follow each other, the yearning for light and heat becomes a positive pain. No dweller under brighter skies ever spends a November in London without amazement that any artist makes London his home. When in winter can he work? What light does he find to work by? And what does he do with the days when he wakes to a coffee-colored obscurity in his rooms, and all the world outside his windowpanes is drowned from sight in a lurid haze?

Sometimes the coppery vapor envelops everything as swiftly, with as little warning, as the white, clean mists play their pranks at Nantucket. A gentleman relating some fog experiences to the writer told how it befell him one mid-day, in clear weather, to go from his home in South Kensington upon some errand that took him down into "the city"—the business centre of London. It was before the days of the Underground Railway, and he went by cab, which he discharged. Before his errand was done, so heavy a fog descended that all cabs ceased to ply, and link boys with torches would have been a mercy. Street lights—gas lights, that is—are mere glow-worms in such cases; their glimmer scarcely reaches to the ground beneath them. Knowing his bearings well he made his way to Regent's Circus, hoping to find an omnibus that would at least take him some miles on his homeward way. Some omnibuses were still running, but they could only be heard and not seen at all from the sidewalks. After hailing several he found one that would serve his need, and the conductor, by some clever sense of divination, set him down at the point he had himself named as nearest his destination. Another gentleman descended at the same time from the omnibus and a lady also. They were all strangers to each other, but they entered at once into a consultation as to routes. The ways of the gentlemen were easily reconciled but the lady lived in a quite other direction. At that time literally one couldn't see a foot clearly before one, and of course they could not leave the lady helpless there. So taking her between them, and by dint of tapping with cane or umbrella, the one the area railings, the other the curb edge, they managed to keep on the pavement, and at last had the lady safe at her own door. But the detour bewildered them, and they had a long chapter of wanderings and harkings back before they found themselves, and were able unerringly to reckon the corners, crossings, turnings that still divided each from his desired shelter.

In 1873, for a week or more, London was afflicted by the most aggravated fogs on Londoners could remember. At times all movement ceased, and neither love nor money could command a carriage. When the dense yellow vapor lighted a little the fog-horn blew ceaselessly on railways, river, canal; and drivers of carts, omnibuses and cabs signalled each other and wayfarers with bells and shrill whistle, and crept along at a snail's pace. But, with all care, collisions were plenty; there were accidents terrible mingled with some only laughable; people lost themselves, and people and animals wandered helpless off piers, bridges and embankments. The writer was then staying just out of London, in the lovely hilly country toward Sydenham. Usually London lay beneath our gaze like a map unrolled: the Thames, with its grand bridges, the Houses of Parliament, the clo-tower and Westminster Abbey in the foreground, and the great dome of St. Paul's hovering high in the dim distance. Now London was hidden in a sea of sullen, smut-laden fog, and we seemed to be living alone in an enchanted world; for a white mist, untinted by any taint of smoke, lay like a light veil over everything, shut off houses and human beings, narrowed our vision to garden spaces, arches under old park trees, and hedge-rows on either side the country lanes in which we walked; and all out of doors was heavily powdered with hoar-frost, that, because of its slow deposition hour after hour of successive still, chill days, was the airiest, featheriest accretion of ice-crystal possible to fancy. With-out sun there was, of course, no glitter, no iridescence, but all was fantastic beauty, austere purity, and glorification of the commonest objects. Each little capsule of the mosses that veined the walls had turned itself into a fairy umbrella. The fruit of the arbutus trees glowed earmine under a filmy icing, and a white halo hung ray-wise, light as a breath, round the fringed disks of some late-lingering chrysanthemums in a sheltered nook of the garden. The sharp curled edges and bristling points of hollies were muffled in down; down outlined all the overlapping points of the black, green, rich-mottled leaves of the ivy screens; and the pines, the firs, the weeping birches and the gothic arcades of the park wore a solemn splendor.

But, stillness as the air was, its icy dampness pierced to the marrow. "The owl for all his feathers" would have shuddered as did we in furs when, on one of the days that the obscurity was lessened enough for cautious getting about, we set off by rail. As we neared the city the fog grew yellower and yellower, breathing became heavy work, we were too miserably cold for speech, and when finally we essayed to walk the trifling distance from the station where we left the train, to the Strand, our lungs, throats and eyes smarted so unbearably from the acrid, smoke-saturated mist that we were thankful to take refuge in a close carriage and dally away at the cafe the hours before we were due at St. James' Hall.

When we descended to the street again the cabs were all lighted, torches sped hither and thither, and our homeward way was a long toll of crawl, and pause, dismal clangor of bell, blasts of horn, shrieks of whistle, and physical discomfort that we bore in silence. When we read in the morning papers the last casualties of the darkness, the deaths from bronchitis and weakened heart, the subvention of the prize cante at the Smithfield show, we owned that a characteristic London fog has perils not lightly to be adventured.—Christian Union.

Speak not often of your own actions, nor even, when it can be properly avoided, make allusion to yourself, as an agent in transactions which are calculated to attract notice. We do not suppose, as some may be inclined to do, that frequent speaking of our actions is necessarily a proof, although it may furnish a presumption, of inordinate self-love or vanity; but it cannot be denied, that, by such a course, we expose ourselves to temptations and dangers in that direction. It is much safer, and is certainly much more profitable, to speak of what has been done for us and wrought in us; to speak, for instance, of ourselves as the recipients of the goodness of God, than to speak of what we have ourselves done. But even here, also, although it may often be an imperative duty, there is need of deliberation and caution.—T. C. Upham.

Knocking Infidelity Out.—At the close of an infidel lecture in England by a person, who challenged any one present to reply to his argument, a poor, ignorant collier arose and said:

"Me and my mate Jim were both Methodys till one of these infidel chaps cam' this way. Jim turned infidel and used to badger me about attending prayer-meetings; but one day in the pit a large cob of coal came down on Jim's head. Jim thought he was killed—and ab mon! but he did holler and cry to God." Then turning to the lecturer, with a knowing look, he said:—Young man, there's nowt like cobs of coal for knocking infidel out of a man!"

For "The Friend,"
Progress of Temperance Sentiment among Christi-denominations.

The subjoined extracts, taken from the "National Temperance Advocate," of New York, respecting the action of the representative Conferences of the Methodist and Presbyterian Churches lately held, are interesting and encouraging, as exhibiting the firm stand taken by these important bodies in adoption of disciplinary rules for their members against this national evil, which are in advance of former regulations. They conform closely to the principles governing our own Society, and the recommendation put forth in the late Address on this subject by our Meeting for Sufferings. It is also encouraging to Friends to read such a clear outspoken testimony as that given by the Methodist Conference against vain and popular amusements such as dancing-parties and schools, theatres, &c. Surely it is no time for us to relax our rules, or firm but tender dealing with those among us who may deviate from the cherished testimony held by Friends against these corrupting diversions.

"METHODIST GENERAL CONFERENCE.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church was held in Cincinnati commencing May 15, 1880. The following reports of the Committee on Temperance, Rev. John Russell, chairman, were adopted:

Report on Temperance.—No. 1. Your Committee respectfully submit the following partial report:

1. We recommend that ¶ 221 of the Discipline be so amended that it shall read as follows:

"But in case of neglect of duties of any kind imprudent conduct, indulging sinful temp-tations, or words, the buying, selling, or using intoxicating liquors as a beverage, signing petitions in favor of granting license for the sale of toxicating liquor, becoming bondsmen for persons engaged in such traffic, renting property to be used as the place in or on which manufacture or sell intoxicating liquors, dancing, playing at games of chance, attending theatres, horse-races, circuses, dancing-parties or patronizing dancing-schools, or taking at other amusements as are obviously of a leading or questionable moral tendency, disobedience to the order and Discipline of the Church—first, let private reproof be given by a preacher or leader, and if there be acknowledgment of the fault, and pro-humiliation, the person may be borne with. On a second offence the preacher or leader may take one or two faithful friends. On a third offence let him be brought to trial, if found guilty, and there be no sign of humiliation, he shall be expelled."

[The Extract from the Presbyterian Assembly was inserted in our last number under head "Religious Items."]

A poor Irish woman went to a priest Boston, the other day, says the Pilot, and asked him to forward to Ireland her help the famine sufferers. "How much can I spare?" asked the priest. "I have saved," she said, "and can spare that." The priest reasoned with her, saying that her was too great for her means; but she was firm in her purpose. It would do her good now that she had helped. She could rest upon thinking of the poor families she had freed from hunger and death. The priest received her money with moistened eyes. "Now, at is your name?" he asked, "that I may record it published?" "My name?" said the slave soul, counting over her money: "don't you do that, sir. Just send them the help and I will know my name."—Ledger.

Natural History, Science, &c.

The Cedar of Lebanon.—In the lately published part of the Journal of the Linnean Society, Sir J. D. Hooker publishes an account of the discovery of a variety of the cedar of Lebanon by Sir Samuel Baker on the mountains of Cyprus. It is interesting to find that, though the botany of this island has often been examined, this is the first record of such a discovery. The trees were described by the monks of Trooditissa Monastery as existing only on the mountains beyond the monastery of Kyker and the town of Chrysokos. This is a pathless and almost inaccessible region. The monks considered wood to be the Scriptural "Shittim wood." Joseph Hooker describes the specimens he gathered to him through the kind offices of the Marquis of Salisbury as differing from the known forms of Cedrus in the shortness of its leaves and the smallness of the female cones. He thinks that the now far-separated cedars of the Himalaya, Lebanon, the Taurus, and Algeria were races of one formerly more generally distributed tree, and that their isolation was due to geographical and climatic changes in the area over which the species was distributed. Their isolation is now very complete.

The nearest point to the Lebanon at which cedars have been up to this found is the Galgurdagh chain of the Taurus in Asia Minor, and from that point forests of C. Arabica extend eastward to Pisidia an hundred miles to the Anti-Taurus. At a distance of about 1400 miles from the cedar forests of Asia Minor, and separated from them by the breadth of the Mediterranean Sea, are the cedar forests of the Atlas (Cedrus atlantica). Proceeding eastward from the Atlas we come after another 1400 miles to the cedar forests of Afghanistan, which extend continuously eastward along the Himalaya almost to the confines of Nepal. This (C. Deodara) is perhaps the most distinct in habit of the three forms. As to the cedar of Sir Joseph Hooker says that it is of cone, and size, form and color of leaf, approaches the Algerian far more closely than it does any Taurian, Himalayan or Lebanese cedar.

Out.—According to Dr. J. M. Fothergill, requires about three generations to fully develop. He says: "The grandfather lived and died old, without ever having had a fit of gout, unless it was in the muscular tissue he called 'rheumatics.' The father, well, probably knew nothing of doctors, his rheumatism occasionally, and winter chills, and died of aortic disease. The next representative of the family has a great deal of articulate gout, a great toe that comes a good deal of his attention, and thick-knuckles—indeed, a full-blown gout." On the other hand, physicians tell us that in cases of so-called rheumatism and neuralgia are but the irregular, feeble, though striking expression of the inherited gouty basis, which two or three generations before, showed itself in severe pain and swelling of the smaller joints.—[J. J. L.]

Snake Biting Itself.—L. K. Wentle, in a communication to the Leicester Examiner, (Lis-mania) describes the movements of a poisonous species of black snake, which he captured by pinning it to the ground with a forked stick. In his haste, he pinned it to the ground near the middle of the body. No sooner had he done so, than the snake, whose head was at the highest pitch, buried his fangs in himself, making the spot wet, either with viscid slime, or the deadly poison. He had round the stick suddenly relaxed, and in less than three minutes he was perfectly dead. On a post mortem examination of the snake, the body was found almost bloodless, as though the action of the poison had destroyed the coloring matter of the blood.

It is rather surprising to find that some of the Japanese are addicted to the eating of earth. Dr. Love has lately published an analysis of a clay which is eaten to a considerable extent by the Ainos; it occurs in a conical, several feet thick, in the valley of Tsi-ton (eat earth valley), on the north coast of Yesso. It is light grey in color, and of fine structure. The people mix with the clay fragments of the leaf of some plant for the aromatic principle it contains. They eat the beneficial substance, not because it is a necessity with them. They have meat and an abundance of vegetable food. The clay is eaten in the form of a soup. Several pounds are boiled with lily roots in a small quantity of water, and afterwards strained. The Ainos pronounce the soup very palatable.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 10, 1880.

We have received the printed minutes of New York Yearly Meeting, held at Glenn Falls, commencing on the 25th of Fifth month. The statistical table gives the whole number of members at 5848.

The report of the Committee having charge of the Boarding School at Union Springs, complains that the number of children sent to the institution is not sufficient to enable it to meet the necessary expenses of conducting it. On the recommendation of a committee appointed to consider the subject, it was concluded that the Yearly Meeting should appropriate $5000 annually to discharge the indebtedness of about $2000 which had accumulated. The same Committee advised that the property should be leased to a suitable Friend for the purpose of a Friends' Boarding School—the lessee to be independent in the management of the institution, but subject to the general oversight of the Yearly Meeting's Committee as regards the character of the school.

The subject of uniting in the formation of an "American Friends' Missionary Board" referred to in the minutes of the previous year, was considered by a committee, who reported that they found "some difficulties in the way." The further examination of it was left till next year.

In reference to labor among the Indian tribes at the West, it was concluded to withdraw from connection with the Associated

Executive Committee on Indian Affairs. This action is the result of the cessation of cooperation by the United States Government with that Committee.

The reports of the Bible School and Missionary Board, the Committee on General Meetings, and the Temperance Committee, occupy much space in the Minutes, and show that considerable labor had been bestowed on the subjects committed to those bodies. The interest felt in them was evidenced by liberal appropriations and subscriptions, to be expended by the committees. One part of their work had been the support of 30 schools in the South—18 among the Freedmen and 12 among Friends in North Carolina. While we can rejoice in any well-directed and rightly-authorized effort for the good of mankind, yet, in reading over these reports, we were impressed with the need there is that Friends should be careful to keep within the limitations which our principles require. A few years ago, any one would have been deemed a visionary alarmist, if he had predicted that Standing Committees of a Yearly Meeting of Friends would make such statements and recommendations as are scattered through these reports, especially in that on General Meetings. This mentions the establishment of four "Prayer Meetings" as one of the results of their labors—expresses the belief in regard to one meeting, that "a blessing is designed for them, if the Church, recognizing their need, will assist in securing the help of a faithful Shepherd, who will gather and strengthen the little flock"—thinks that in another place the revival interest has declined "in consequence of the failure to provide a pastor to care for them, and break the Bread of Life to those who hunger and thirst after righteousness"—and of another it says: "To continue and increase their growth in [spiritual life], an experienced minister, with the qualifications of a pastor, seems indispensable." At one of the series of meetings but few attended at first, "but the numbers were largely augmented by the visitors calling on and praying with every family." Of the Prayer Meetings held in the same district, it says, "A faithful minister is present on these occasions, and if circumstances require his absence, the place is supplied, such work requiring a preached gospel to secure its establishment and success."

The undue dependence on outward ministry which this report exhibits, as well as many other things contained in it, show how rapidly some under our name are being trained to a course of proceeding inconsistent with our doctrines and testimonies. It would be a matter of sincere rejoicing, if Friends generally could be awakened to a sight and sense of this. If this is not the case, we fear the time is not far distant, when we shall find persons settled as ministers, with salaries to support them, over congregations of so-called Friends, expecting and being expected to preach as regularly as the meeting-day arrives; and the whole theory and practice of our meetings for Divine worship will be laid aside in some neighborhoods.

Richard Shackleton, in one or more of his valuable letters, speaks of his usual condition as one of poverty of spirit. To this state he seemed reconciled, as a safe habitation, and one which prepared him to receive with greater rejoicing those seasons of the extending of sensible help, comfort and power from the Lord, which are so refreshing to the traveller Zionward.

James Dickinson testified of his dear friend, that eminent minister of the Gospel, Thomas Wilson, that there was not anything more delightful to him than to be under the influence of God's Holy Spirit, "wherewith," he says, "he was often filled, not only for his own good, but for the good of others." Many can unite in the same sentiment, and declare that no joy is to be compared with the joy of God's salvation; and nothing so satisfying to the soul as the experience of the Divine power operating thereon. But the experience of the Lord's servants in all ages, we believe, has been that of the Apostle, who had learned to suffer want as well as to abound. He endeavored in whatsoever state he was, therein to be content.

Those who are passing through a dispensation of spiritual fasting, where but little pleasant bread is dispensed to them, may take comfort in the hope, that as the day succeeds the night, and the summer comes after the winter, so light and warmth will again flow into their hearts; and fresh songs of praise be lovingly raised to Him from whom cometh every good and perfect gift. If they are preserved in faithful allegiance to their Master, they may rest assured, however poor and weak they feel, "that those who do indeed keep the Lord's true fast, will in his own time be invited to a feast of his own preparing, well worth quietly waiting for."

THE CHILDREN'S COUNTRY WEEK.

By this excellent charity many are enabled to enjoy for a short time the benefits of change, and of country air and sights and sounds, who would otherwise be compelled to spend the hot season among the walls and streets of our cities. During last year the number of guests sent out from Philadelphia, by the Society was 676—of whom 221 were invited by those who kindly cared for them, and 455 were boarded at the expense of the Society. So economically was everything managed, that the cost of each guest for an average time of ten days, was only $2.00.

The office of the Philadelphia Society is at 1492 Market street, where those willing to take charge for a time of some of the neglected children of our common Father, or willing to contribute towards the necessary expenses, can communicate with the active workers in this cause—of whom Eliza S. Turner is the Corresponding Secretary.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The average temperature for Sixth month at Philadelphia, was 73.8 degrees, which is about two degrees above the average for the past five years. The highest temperature recorded at the U. S. signal office was 94 deg., on the 24th and 25th. Prevailing direction of wind, west. Maximum velocity, 32 miles per hour. Total rainfall 167 inches. Rain fell on seven days.

It is officially stated that the State Hospital for the Insane, at Norristown, will be open for the reception of patients on the 12th inst., when there will be accommodations for at least 400.

Census Supervisors Steel's report gives the population of this city in 6th mo, 1880, at 847,542—a net increase, since 1870, of 178,529.

The total earnings of the United States mints during the twelve months ending on the 30th ult., was 60,928,112 pieces, valued at $84,570,141. This is the largest coinage executed in any previous year. It includes 27,933,750 standard dollars.

The internal revenue receipts for fiscal year were $123,623,251, and the customs receipts $183,108,611. This is an increase on the receipts of last year of $10,061,640 from internal revenue, and $47,858,563 from customs.

The public debt statement for 6th month shows a decrease of $10,131,124.

The State Department is officially advised of the decree issued by the German Government prohibiting—it is said for sanitary reasons—the importation of all preparations of pork from the United States, except ham and bacon.

The Patriot, N. J. Press, of the 19th of 6th month says, there have been eighteen locomotives shipped from the shops during the seventeen working-days of the month. Work continues brisk, and the prospect is encouraging.

The Hazelton, Pa., Bulletin, recently makes mention of the largest locomotive built in the Lehigh Valley shops. This engine is designed expressly to take passenger trains across the mountains, and is expected to do the same work that has heretofore required the combined power of two.

The net profit of Sing Sing penitentiary, during the 6th month, was $27,355.

At a recent sale in Chicago, of short horned cattle from Canada, forty-three animals were sold for $35,255. Two of the herd brought $8,000 each, and another $3,900.

The United States Consul at Bordeaux, France, reports that 148,745 bushels of American wheat were exported at that port during 1879. At Bremen, last year, $3,500,000 worth more of raw cotton from the United States was received than in 1878.

The 29th ult. is reported as the hottest of the season at various points on the New Jersey coast. At Long Branch, where the temperature was 95 degrees on the 28th and 99 in the village. Several persons were sun-struck. At other points the temperature was two or three degrees higher. In New York there were seven deaths from the effects of the heat.

The total number of deaths in New York for the past week was 1297; and during the half year there were 15,279 deaths, an increase of 1,131 over the same period of last year.

The mortality in this city for the week ending at noon on the 3rd, was 609—which is nearly double the number for the same week last year. The large increase is due to the sudden heat term. Of the whole number 299 were adults and 400 children—299 being under one year of age. During the first six months of 1880, the deaths announced of persons who lived to the age of 80 years, numbered 397; of whom 104 were male and 293 were female.

Merchants, &c.—The following were quotations on the 3rd inst. U. S. sixes, 1881, 104; 7's, registered, 102; do. coupon, 103; 4 1/2's, 110; 4 per cents, 108.

Cotton.—Sales of middling uplands at 12 cts., and 1 1/2 at 12 1/2 cts. per lb. for New Orleans and Texas. Petroleum.—The market improved—refined in bbls. at 47 cts. and 1 1/2 in cases.

Flour.—Western and Penna. extra, $3 a $3.25; good, $5.50; fresh ground, $5.75 a $6; Penna. and Ohio extra family $5.25 a 6. Rye flour, $4.25 per barrel. Bran sold at $15.50 per ton.

Hay and Straw.—Average price during the week: Prime timothy, $1.60 a $1.70 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.40 a $1.50; straw, $1.15 a $1.35 per 100 pounds.

Wool.—The market for washed fleece continues somewhat dormant; unwashed has met a good demand at former figures. Manufacturers and dealers show more disposition to purchase. Among the sales observed this week, 50 a 52 cts.; unwashed wethers, 32 a 36 cts.; tub, Pa. and Va., 48 a 49 cts.

Oils.—Linseed, 58 a 60 cts.; Neats foot, 55 a 75 cts.; Lard oil, 3 1/2 a 55 cts.; Sperm, crude, 43 a 50 cts.; bleached, 41.75 a $1.13 per gallon.

Several persons are reported more or less injured from the use of pistols, fire crackers, &c., in the celebration of the 4th, in this city. Only three are thought to be dangerously injured.

FOREIGN.—The House of Commons has adopted the resolution, allowing members the privilege of illumination when it is preferred to the oath of office. The case of Bradlaugh was therefore settled by his affirming and taking his seat in the House. It is reported, however, that he will be prosecuted for his conduct.

The consideration of the Irish Relief Bill was before the House on the 5th, and a motion to reject it was defeated by a vote of 265 to 217. The bill was then read a second time.

The Tay Bridge Commissioners have presented by reports. The majority report censures more or less severely, the contractors, the engineer, and the railway company. The design of the bridge is condemned, and the company charged with neglecting to keep it in repair.

The quarterly returns just published show, that the gross revenue of the United Kingdom for the fiscal year ending on the 30th ult., was £81,962,063, against £83,230,327 last year.

The British Registrar-General's report, just issued for 1878, shows that during the year, the infant mortality in England and Wales, was 491,906 births, and 539,8 deaths. The death rate appears for this to be 21 per 1000. Sweden, Denmark and Belgium are the European countries having a lower death rate than England.

The Conference at Berlin has presented a plan for the rectification of the Greek frontier, and invited T. Porte and Greece to accept it. It is reported that the majority of the ministers favor resistance to the plan and that the Sultan has drawn up a secret proclamation inviting the Albanians to resist the Greeks.

In the French Senate, on the 3rd inst., the Pless amnesty bill, adopted by the House of Deputies, was rejected; but an amendment was adopted granting amnesty to all participants in the Commune, except assassins and incendiaries.

The decrees expelling the Jesuits are being carried into effect. Several disturbances are reported from provinces—the most serious at Havre, where sold charged the crowd. In some instances the authorities forcibly entered houses and drove the inhabitants out. At Lille the Jesuits have sued the Prefect for 10,000 francs for their expulsion.

The Spanish Government has granted numerous applications for permission to establish in Madrid; many parts of the Peninsula, monasteries and Jes colleges.

The popular vote in Switzerland on the law for separation of Church and State, resulted in the defeat of the measure, 9036 votes being cast against 4,104 for it.

Information has been received from Buenos Ayres that the rebellion has concluded with submission to national authority and complete pacification.

A suitable Friend is wanted to superintend schools of the "Friends' Freedmen's Association of Philadelphia" in North Carolina and Virginia.

The Bible in India.

As I had been talking, I particularly noted two who stood upon the platform, one with white hair and noble brow, a very courteous and intelligent gentleman, and his son, judged from his countenance, standing at his side. They had interrupted me now and then, as I was preaching, saying to me, 'Wait a moment, sir; won't you explain that point a little further?' This is such strange news, we thought to be sure that they were of the Brahmin caste, and I explained the point and then went on, and they would stop me again, asking intelligent questions, anxious to understand everything I said. They were among the deputation that were appointed to go forward. The noble put money in their hands, each one of them, 'Don't you forget to buy me a Bible.'—'Buy me a book that tells of Jesus Christ, my love.'—'Buy me one of those books that tell about the Creator, the Divine Father who loves us.'—'Get me a book that tells how we get rid of my load of sin.' So they commissioned them and sent them. We went of the gate of the city and turned into the way where my carts had gone—native carts with wooden wheels, drawn by young boys.

We walked on for a time, they asking questions and I answering them, when he said, 'Sir, we are going no faster than carts are; would you mind cantering on to overtake the carts and stop them; and then we must talk to us some more.' I put spurs to my horse and rode on. I had gone perhaps a mile and a quarter, and got into the thick of that interred between that town and the next village, and was passing up a little noisy cart-track through the jungle, when I heard the step of a powerful horse approaching from the rear. I had been warned in my mind in just such a place as that I would be in danger. Thinking it always safest to stop, I turned around and waited for the horse to pass. Soon, around a bend in the road, came a powerful Arab charger coming, with a rider and bridle bedecked with ornaments of silver and gold. Its rider had a turban of gold-lace trimmings, and with a necklace of pearls around his neck, with a jacket of India satin interwoven with threads of metallic gold. He rode rapidly on, and apparently was about passing me when he saw me, and pulling up his horse almost on his haunches, he said, 'Are you the man that has been in my town this morning with this strange doctrine?' I said, 'I have been in the town of Peberri, sir.' We had been told that this town was the summer residence of a petty Rajah, a feudatory of the Nizam of Hyderabad, but that at that season of the year the Rajah was at his other capital. He said to me—for it was the Rajah himself, 'I came in late last night from my other capital. I suppose the people did not know I was there. I got in late last night or early this morning, and we were not stirring when your people came so early. I suppose those were your men that came about sunrise with the books; but some of my courtiers were stirring and bought some of the books and brought them to the palace, and we were so busy reading the books that we did not know there was any second gathering in the streets. I wish I had known it, I would have sent out and asked you to come to the palace to tell us the news there; but when you had gone they brought some larger books, saying that the white man himself had been there and given them those books, and I was so anxious to see you that I ordered my swiftest horse, and I have outridden all my courtiers, as you see, to overtake you. Now, tell me all about it. Is it true? Is there a Saviour that can save us from our sin?' We rode on together. I on a little seraggy, country pony that had cost me thirty dollars, looking up to him on his magnificent Arab charger worth a thousand, and as I trotted along talking with him I could not help thinking of Philip and the Eunuch; and I tried as earnestly, I believe, as Philip did to tell my companion of Him of whom Moses in the law and the prophets did speak—even Jesus of Nazareth the Saviour of all them in all the world that would believe in him.

"We overtook the cart. 'Now,' said he, 'let me have a copy of every book you have; I don't care what you ask, I will pay for them.' One box after another was opened. He took out a book about the size of a small pulpit Bible, and said he, 'What book is that?' 'That is the Holy Bible, the Satya Veda, or True Veda, in the Telugu language—the language in which we were conversing.' 'Give me that.' Down it went on the ground. He took up another, of one-third the size. 'What is that?' 'That is the New Testament in the Canarese language.' 'Give me that; and down it went. 'What is that?'—taking up another. 'That is the New Testament in the Hindustani language.' 'Give me that.' 'What is that?' 'That is the New Testament in the Tamil language.' 'Give me that.' 'What is that?' 'That is the New Testament in the Marathi language.' 'But,' said I, 'you don't want all those, for this large one contains the whole thing. These others contain part, the best part to be sure, of the large one, in the different languages. But it is the same thing, verse for verse and word for word, only that each is in a different language. You know the Telugu language best. If you take the large one in that language you have the whole; for I wished to save some of these for use further on, in my journey. 'No,' said he; 'if you were to be here so that I could ask questions, that large one would be enough for me, but you are not going to be here, so I shall have no one to ask questions of, and I will take it and read it in the Telugu language, and I will perhaps not quite understand it; then I will take it in the Canarese language, for I can read that just as well, and it will be a little differently expressed, and by comparing the two I will understand it; if not, then I will read it in the Hindustani language, and comparing the three I will understand it better; or in the Marathi, or Tamil language, and comparing the four or five I shall be able to understand it all. I don't care what you ask for them, only let me have the books. I will pay for them.' So he took them.

"In the mean time the deputation came up. I found that the Brahmin whom I had noticed so particularly was the prime minister of the Rajah, his general manager, or Mantri, as they call it in India, and the son was being educated to succeed him in office. They all asked earnest questions, and kept me answering question after question and explaining the books for an hour and three-quarters, there in the road, before they would allow me to hitch on my oxen and pursue my journey. When they had bought and paid for their books, and at last had consented that I should pursue my journey, I bade them good-bye. But as we went on our way we could not help thinking of them and their earnest questions, and wondering whether the words thus scattered had done any good. We journeyed on, however, and at last after five months we came around to our homes, stricken down by disease to be sure, that we had contracted in those jungles, but all of us were alive. We came back to our homes, and still we could not forget those people. We wondered whether in that town, where they had so gladly met us and heard us preach Christ, there would be any fruit from the seed we had scattered. Three years passed by—years of sickness with me to be sure, resulting from that journey, for I had not recovered from it yet. We were still thinking of and praying for them, when the Lord allowed us to hear news from them. A chance traveller came that way—not a chance traveller; nothing ever happens by chance. God ordered, for the strengthening of my faith, that a traveller should come down through that infrequented way, and that he should be overtaken by night at that very town of Peberri. He was a half-cast, half-Portuguese and Half Hindu. He stopped in the rest-house built for travellers, by the gate of the city. In the evening that very Mantri, the Rajah's prime minister, hearing that there was a stranger there who dressed and appeared differently from the people there, came out to meet him, and said he, 'Stranger, you seem to have come from a distance; do you know anything of the people they call Christians?' 'Yes, I am one myself.' 'Are you?' I am glad of it. 'Stranger, do you know anything about a white man that came through here three years ago, in the month of August, with a book that he called the True Veda, telling about the Divine Redeemer, that he called Yesu Kristu'? (The Telugu for Jesus Christ.) 'Yes, Dr. Chamberlain is the only missionary that has ever been through here. He came this way about three years ago.' 'Do you know him? Have you ever seen him?' 'Is he living now? and will you ever see him again?' 'Yes, I met him years ago away up north, and in about a month I shall pass within about thirty or forty miles of where he is now living.' Said he, 'If you get as near him as that, you turn out of your way and find him, for I want you to carry him a message. Tell him that from the day he was here, neither my son nor I have ever worshipped an idol. Tell him that every day we read in that New Testament that he left with us, and every day we kneel and pray to that Yesu Kristu of whom he taught us, and tell him that through his merits we hope to meet him in heaven.' Tell him the Rajah has the Bible read every day in his palace, and we think that he too at heart is a believer in Jesus. Tell him we hope to meet him by-and-by when we can tell him all about it—saved because he came here and brought us those Bibles; but if you go anywhere near him, you turn out of your way and find him, and give him this message now, for it will do him good. When I heard that message I forgot the difficulties and perils of that journey. I forgot how we had been surrounded by tigers at night, keeping the campfires burning bright while we heard them roaring for prey in the jungles around us. I forgot how I had been swept away in the river. I forgot how we had been taken by the jungle fever and deserted by all our coolies. I could not remember any of these things then."

Frost Bitten.—Perils of Travels in Russia.

On arriving at Karabootook I asked the inspector to give an order for three horses to be harnessed to my sleigh. But there were no animals in the stable and we had to wait several hours before some could be procured. The snow storm had somewhat lulled, but the wind was almost as high as ever, and the cold more intense than anything hitherto experienced. On leaving the station, I had forgotten to put on my thick gloves, and took my seat in the sleigh, with each hand folded in the sleeve of its fellow, the fur pelisse, in this way, forming a sort of muff, and protecting my hands from the cold. The road was less jolty than usual, and the sleigh glided along, comparatively speaking, smoothly. The change of motion before long produced an effect; leaning back in the vehicle, I fell fast asleep. In the course of my slumbers, my hands slipped from the warm fur covering in which they were inserted, resting themselves on the side of the sleigh unprotected by any thick gloves, and exposed to the full power of the biting east wind.

In a few minutes I awoke; a feeling of intense pain had seized my extremities. It seemed as if they had been plunged into some corrosive acid which was gradually eating the flesh from the bones. I looked at my fingers; they were blue; the fingers and back part of my hand were of the same color, while my wrists and the lower part of my arm were of a waxen hue. There was no doubt about it, I was frost-bitten, and that in no slight degree; so calling to my servant, I made him rub the skin with some snow in hopes of recovering the vitality. This he did for several minutes, but all this time the same pain previously described, was gradually ascending my arms, while the lower portions of the limbs were lost to all sensation, dead to pain, dead to every sense of feeling, hanging quite listlessly by my side. Nazar, in vain, using all his energies so as to restore circulation.

"It is no good," he said, looking sorrowfully at me; "We must get on as fast as possible to the station. How far off is it?" he inquired of the driver. "Seven miles," was the answer.

"You go as fast as you can," I cried.

The pain, which by that time, had ascended to the glands under my arms, had become more acute than anything I had hitherto experienced. Apparently, extreme cold acts in two ways on the nervous system: sometimes by bringing on a slumber, from which the victim never awakes; and at others, by consuming him, as it were, over a slow fire, and limb by limb. All this time the perspiration was pouring down my forehead, my body itself being as if on fire, the pain gradually ascending the parts attacked.

Would the distance that separated us from the station ever be traversed? each mile seemed to me a league, and each league, a day's journey. At last we arrived. Hurrying to the waiting-room, I met three Cossacks, to whom I showed my hands. The soldiers led me into an outer room, and having taken off my coat and bared my arms, they plunged them up to the shoulder, in a tub of ice and water. However, there was no sensation whatever, and the limbs which were of a blue color, floated painlessly in the water.

The elder of the Cossacks shook his head and said, "Brother, it is a bad job; you will lose your hands." "They will drop off," remarked another, "if you cannot get back the circulation." "Have you any spirit with you," added a third. Nazar, on hearing this, ran out and brought in a tin bottle containing naphtha for cooking purposes, upon which the Cossacks, taking my arms out of the icy water, proceeded to rub them with the strong spirit.

"Rub, rub, rub; the skin peeled under their horny hands, and the spirit irritated the membrane below. At last a faint sensation, like a tickling, pervaded the elbow joints, and I slightly flinched.

"Does it hurt?" asked the elder of the Cossacks.

"A little."

"Capital, brothers!" he continued, "rub as hard as you can!" and after going on with the friction until the flesh was almost flayed, they suddenly plunged my arms again into the ice and water. I had not felt anything before, but this time the pain was very acute.

"Good!" said the Cossacks. "The more it hurts, the better chance you have of saving your hands." And after a short time, they let me take them out of the tub. "You are fortunate, little father," said the elder of the Cossacks. "If it had not been for the spirit your hands would have dropped off, if you had not lost your arms as well."

Rough, kind-hearted fellows were the poor soldiers; and when I forced on the old of them a present for himself and comrade, the old soldier simply added, "Are we not brothers when in misfortune? Would you not have helped me if I had been in a like predicament?"

I shook his hand heartily, and went to a waiting room to rest on the sofa, as the physical shock just undergone had, for a moment thoroughly prostrated me. My arms all were sore and inflamed, the spirit having some places, penetrated the raw flesh; and was several weeks before I thoroughly recovered from the effects of my carelessness. Burnaby.

For "The Friend"

A Plea for the Plain Language.

The testimony of the Society of Friends the use of the plain language is so frequent, disregarded, and in some places has so ceased to be a distinguishing mark of Friendliness that I venture to place before the readers this Journal, a few thoughts regarding it.

The inspired writings always represent t men and women they speak of, as usi "thee" or "thou" to a single person, wheti they addressed the highest or most lowly life. Profane History shows that this w the general custom among the ancient heath nations, and that the plural language, bei only applied to kings and emperors, or othe high in authority, was used for purpose flattery, and implied that the person so r dressed was more than a single individui This false custom gradually descended fro one grade of society to another, until fina in all Christian countries the plural langua was universally used as a mark of distinctio and the singular was spoken to the mean and poorest of the people. The use of t plural language to one person is directl contrary to the rules of grammar.

It has been because of the above excell reasons, and in accordance with the exam of our Saviour Himself set in speaking to f followers, that Friends have always ad opted the use of "thee" or "thou" to a sing individual. They objected to the use "Mr." and "Mrs.," remembering the co mand to "call no man master, for one is yo master, even Christ." In regard to the use "Sunday" or "April," &c., instead of "Fir day and Fourth month," they did not mere desire to revive ancient usages, but to ob the injunction given to the people of old, if they should not make mention of the heath deities, after whom many of the days a months now are called. They experie much suffering and ridicule for their prin ples, yet the very insults and reproache endured in upholding them, proved the ne sity of such errors being brought promine to the view of Christendom. From their d to the present time, the Society has alw maintained this testimony; and as its r members have been willing to accept the cre they have invariably felt called upon to be it in this particular.

There are many among our members w knowledge the correctness and importance these testimonies, but who fail to enforce them by practice, and this class will frequently use one form of speech in addressing a friend, and another in speaking to the rest of the world. Does it ever occur to them, that they may unintentionally become a stumbling-block to sincere seekers after a true knowledge of these things, and that they are easily earning credit for insincerity that they really do not mean to be guilty of? And when they alter their conversation to suit their company, is there not great danger that they sacrifice an important principle to a mere ostentatious display to please? If they have been educated in the Society, they most probably know the grounds on which this testimony is based, and very rare time they change their language, they fear they are influenced to disobey the command of Christ, who reproved the men of that day, because they gave and received honor of another.

It is very easy for the young to acquire the habit of incorrectly using the pronoun "you," when they speak it to one person, they little think of the sufferings endured by the early saints who could not conscientiously do so, and it is a habit difficult to get rid of, and there are doubtless not a few who feel they do not do this respect altogether do as they should. However, they are really attached to the Society, and are willing to yield to the cross because the grace of God assists them to bow there, they will find their efforts to be successful, and will appreciate that plainness of speech is not just a little thing, but is a testimony worthy to be handed down to our successors in the truth. They will discover a reservation in it they had previously little suspected, and although their dress may not always correspond, they will wherever they are regarded as Friends, and in a measure be shielded both in their business and social relations.

There is a cross and mortification in adopting the plain language, the world knows little of which our natural feelings strongly object; but like all other sacrifices to duty, it is not fail to secure the approbation of Him who loveth a cheerful giver. When we consider the principles involved, and recollect the same reasons now exist that always exist for the maintenance of them, should we examine ourselves, whether we are doing duty, either as Christians or as members of our own religious body? I know that in some cases it seems singular to fashionable people when we address them in the plain language; but although they may not exactly understand the motive, they will generally acquiesce with politeness those who do so. Every man or woman who uses it from conscientious motives under all circumstances, by so doing strengthen themselves for the future, and at the same time be practical evidences of a testimony that has need of many more supporters than it has. I especially desire that some of us who are young, who from necessity mingle much in the world, may be concerned to show that we are of the world, and may be willing to deny ourselves for the cause of Him who has loved us. The religion of Jesus is a practical religion, and we are told that he who was first in a little, was made ruler over more.

Noble Rescue of Five Boys from Danger.

The following record of true English bravery in an attempt to rescue some boys from imminent death is forwarded us by a correspondent who well knows the cave in which the boys were imprisoned, and the wall over which the men allowed themselves to be lowered for their rescue:—

Plymouth Hoe, on the 9th of last month, was the scene of a rescue no less romantic because real. Five boys were playing upon the beach in front of the Hoe, when, without thought of danger, they went into a cave that ran a good way back in the rocky cliff that fronts the sea. Still playing about within the cave, they, boy-like, thought of nothing else, and forgot the tide that quickly flowed with-out. Hastened by a gale, that tide came on with unusual rapidity, and before they were aware, the boys found themselves hemmed in completely by the surging waters. Then they saw their danger, and screamed loud and long, and fortunately their screams were heard by the crowd that chanced to be standing in the road above, watching efforts that were being made to save a steamer that seemed stranding. The position was plain to all; and minute by minute death was coming nearer to the boys. With each great wave the tide flowed in further and further, until the cave was nearly full. With each advancing flood the boys could only go back a step or two, until they felt themselves crouching against the hard wet rocks behind them, and they could go no further. Inside the cave the boys were literally face to face with death, and any escape seemed impossible. Above, the crowd, with eager voices and beating hearts, discussed what could be done. No boat would live a moment in the wild waters and the raging surf below, that was certain. What, then, could be done? Two sea-faring men volunteered to fight the good fight, and do the deed of daring that must be done, unless the boys were to perish in their living tomb, with a crowd of people just above them. A rope was tied round each man, and he was let down over the sheer face of the rocky cliff all in the rushing waves and seething spray, until he was just above the cave. When there, each brave fellow let himself be washed by the waters into the cave, until he seized a boy and brought him out alive. Then he was hauled up with his prize of rescue, and this was repeated until all the boys were saved.

It is impossible to paint the full danger run by these brave men. They risked being dashed to death against the sheer cliff as they were let down dangling upon their errand of mercy, and they risked being crushed against the cave as they went in upon the rushing water. No wonder that when the deed was done a ringing cheer went up from all the crowd. No wonder that the people pressed around these two sea-faring men to shake hands with those who had so nobly done their duty. No wonder that the crowd put their hands into their pockets, and gave the proceeds of the collection to these gallant fellows there and then. But the pleasure of having performed so truly noble a deed must be to those men a far higher reward than the money value of the present thus placed into their hands by the spontaneous gratitude of the spectators.

On Keeping Inward with the Lord.

The following, taken from the writings of that deeply experienced servant of the Lord who was the chief instrument in raising up the Society of Friends to be a people distinguished in their early days for their close inward walking, is applicable to those who now profess the same faith and who desire to walk by the same law of love and truth in their souls, as did those living sons of that day. I believe that many, like myself, have severe conflicts with the prince of the power of darkness, in endeavoring to resist the vain imaginations and evil thoughts by which he delights to captivate the mind, and imbue it with the leaven of his own nature; and yet are unable to overcome, until it pleases Him who has power to destroy the works of the devil to raise up his standard against him and cast him out. This He will and does do for those who truly seek his aid, and rely not upon themselves, or trust to their own power to resist or overcome any evil thing. For Christ Jesus is the Saviour of all who are saved; and if we ever come to know Him to be our Redeemer we must experience Him to redeem us from the power of sin in ourselves, that it shall not have dominion over us. Thus we come to know a death unto the old nature and lusts, and a new birth unto holiness, righteousness and life eternal.

When George Fox was in Derby prison, in 1650, because of his testimony for the Truth as it is in Jesus, he said: "It came upon me to write a paper and send it forth to be spread amongst Friends and other tender people, for the opening of their understanding in the way of truth, and directing them to the true teacher in themselves."

The following are extracts from this paper, which may be found on pages 86 and 87 of his journal:

"The Lord doth show unto man his thoughts, and discerneth all the secret workings in man. A man may be brought to see his evil thoughts, running mind, and vain imaginations, and strive to keep them down, and to keep his mind in; but cannot overcome them, nor keep his mind within to the Lord. In this state and condition submit to the Spirit of the Lord that shows them, and that will bring to wait upon the Lord; and He that hath discovered them will destroy them. Therefore stand in the faith of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the author of the true faith, and mind Him; for He will discover the root of lusts, evil thoughts, and vain imaginations, how they are begotten, conceived and bred; how they are brought forth, and how every evil member doth work. He will discover every principle from its own nature and root.

So mind the faith of Christ, and the anointing which is in you, to be taught by it, as He will discover all workings in you. As He teacheth you, so obey and forsake; else you will not grow in the faith, nor in the life of Christ, where the love of God is received. Love begetteth love, its own nature and image; and when mercy and truth meet, what joy there is. Mercy triumphs in judgment; and love and mercy bear the judgment of the world in patience.

The chaste virgins follow Christ the lamb, that takes away the sins of the world; but they that are of that spirit which is not chaste, will not follow Christ the Lamb in his steps, but are disobedient to Him in his commands.

Some men have the nature of swine wallowing in the mire. Some have the nature of dogs, to bite both the sheep and one another. Some have the nature of lions. Some the nature of wolves, to tear and devour the lambs and sheep of Christ. Some men have the nature of other beasts and creatures, minding nothing but earthly and visible things, and feeding without the fear of God. Some have the nature of tall sturdy oaks, to flourish and spread in wisdom and strength, who are strong in evil, which must perish and come to the fire. Thus evil is but one in all, but worketh many ways; and whatsoever a man or woman's nature is addicted to that is outward, the evil one will suit him, and please his nature and appetite, to keep his mind in his inventions, and in the creatures from the Creator. If the mind go forth from the Lord, it is hard to bring it in again; therefore take heed of the enemy, and keep in the faith of Christ.

To live and walk in the Spirit of God is joy, peace, and life; but the mind going forth into the creatures, or into any visible things from the Lord, this bringeth death. When the mind is got into the flesh, and into death, the accuser gets within, and the law of sin and death gets into the flesh. Then the life suffers under the law of sin and death, and then there is straitness and failings. For then the good is shut up, and the self-righteousness is set atop.

O, therefore, mind the pure Spirit of the everlasting God, which will teach you to use the creatures in their right places, and which judgeth the evil. To thee, O God, be all glory and honor, who art Lord of all visibles and invisibles! To thee be all praise, who bringest out of the deep to thyself! O powerful God, who art worthy of all glory! For the Lord who created all, and gives life and strength to all, is over all, and merciful to all. So thou, who hast made all, and art over all, to thee be all glory! In thee is my strength, refreshment and life, my joy and my gladness, my rejoicing and glorying for evermore."

There are many persons who would willingly be Christians, and eminent Christians too, if Christianity were limited to great occasions. But on smaller occasions, in the every-day occurrences and events of life, the religious principle is in a state of dormancy; giving no signs of effective vitality and movement. The life of such persons is not like that of the sun, equable, constant, diffusive, and beneficent, though attracting but little notice; but like the eruptive and glaring blaze of volcanoes, which comes forth at remote periods, in company with great thunders and shakings of the earth; and yet the heart of the people is not made glad by it. Such religion is vain; and its possessors know not what manner of spirit they are of.—T. C. Upham.

Lines written by Mary M. Miller, of Iowa, a few days before her death, to her sister—lat. mo. 27th, 1879.

I'm thinking, sister, of years long since gone,
When once we loved with childhood's blessed trust,
Whose gentle presence ever gladdened home,
Was, far from kindred hearts, laid in the dust.

Another loved one crosses memory's way,
Dear mother, with her never-tiring love,
Who passed from earth, up to the full-orbed day,
The long sweet rest of paradise above.

Oh, how the years since those sad days have sped,
And to our grief a chastened feeling given,
A sweet sad yearning o'er the precious dead,
A fearful joy that they now rest in Heaven.

Oh loved ones, in that glorious land of light,
Where none might injure, unholy e'er can stay;
Where the eternal morning knows no night,
And tears are wiped from every eye away!

There, through the gates of pearl, o'er golden street,
The white-robed throng of ransomed spirits tread,
Who by the blood of Christ, for Heaven made meet,
Are by the Lamb to living fountains led.

Oh sweeter grows the thought, dear precious ones,
As years roll on, of your eternal rest;
Life's battle fought, the glorious victory won,
Sarely the memory of the just is blest!

LIFE.

Selected.

When sanguine youth the path of life surveys,
It does not calculate on rainy days;
Some, as they enter on the unknown way,
Expect large troubles at a distant day;
The loss of wealth, or friends they fondly prize,
But reckon not on ills of smaller size,
Those nameless, trifling ills that intervene,
And people life, infesting every scene,
And there, with silent, unobtruded success,
Wear off the lesser edge of happiness;
Those teasing swarms that buzz about our joys,
More potent than the whirlwind that destroys;
Potent, with heavenly teaching, to attest
Life is a pilgrimage, and not a rest.

That lesson learned aright, is valued more
Than all his experience ever taught before;
For this his choicest secret, timely given,
Is wisdom, virtue, happiness, and heaven.
Long is religion viewed by many an eye,
As wanted more for safety by-and-by,
A thing for times of danger and distress,
Than useful for our present happiness;
But after fruitless, wearisome essays
To find repose and peace in other ways,
The sickened soul when Heaven imparts its grace,
Returns to seek its only resting-place;
And sweet experience proves, as years increase,
That wisdom's ways are pleasantness and peace.

HARVEST HYMN.

We thank thee, O Father, the Harvest again,
Has gladdened our fields in its radiant glow;
The voice of thanksgiving we raise to thy name,
From whom all our blessings and happiness flow.

Oh, teach us, great Master, to study aright,
The tares from the wheat, the chaff that arise;
May our hearts of Grace never meet with a blight,
But, tending to thee, may we grow to the skies.

The mustard seed's increase, oh give to each grant;
The showers of thy love to the husbandman grant;
When weary with labor, on thee may we rest;
Thou, his Father in blessing, his Saviour in want.

And when the great Harvest of all shall appear,
And the sick of Death shall remove from the sod;
We pray the Redeemer of men may be near,
To take the wheat home to thy garner, Oh God.

That we may be fitted, thy glory to share;
To "bloom in fresh fragrance, in realms of delight,"
Oh teach us to thank thee from our hearts every year,
Looking up to the Shepherd of Calvary's height!
That so, at thy harvest, unmildew'd by sin,
We all may be ripened for the gathering in.

Stepping in Father's Footsteps.—One bright winter's morning, after a snow-storm, a father took his father for a walk to attend to some far-off affairs requiring his attention. As he started his little boy of five summers also snatched his hat, and followed the father with modesty, and an assumed business like air. When they reached the door, the gentleman noticed that no track or pathway had been made in the snow, and he hesitated about letting his boy follow him. But the soft, fresh snow looked so tempting, so pearly white that he concluded to allow the child to walk after him. He took long and rapid strides through the untrodden snow, when, suddenly remembering his "little boy," he paused looked back for him, and exclaimed:

"Well, my son, don't you find it hard work to walk in this deep snow?"

"Oh! no," said the boy. "I'm coming for, father, I step in all your tracks."

True enough, the dear child was planting his tiny feet just where the parent's had trodden. The child's reply startled the father, as he reflected that thus would his child keep pace with him, and follow in his tracks through life. He was not a man of prayer, and no Christian; and well might he pause and tremble as he thought of his child, ever striving "to step in all of his tracks," onward, onward through life's mysterious mazes and mazes toward eternity! The little boy's remark brought that strong, stubborn-hearted man to think. Finally he repented, and sought and found peace. We believe he is now making such tracks through life that as so day that son may be proud to say: "Father, I step in all of your tracks."—British Woman.

The Clandestine Trade in Dynamite in Scotland.—Three years ago there existed a clandestine dynamite factory at Saizny, close the French frontier. The business was carried on in some large, old-fashioned, stone built farm buildings, and the dynamite smuggled into France. There being an excise duty in that country of 2*fr.* 50*cs.* per kilogramme on all the dynamite produced, trade, as long as it lasted, was an extremely profitable one, and as the people in the neighborhood were all allowed to participate in benefit derived from it, the secret was kept. Even the officers of the commune nothing. One day, however, a frightful explosion occurred; hardly one stone of farm building was left standing on another three men, one hundred cows, many stags and several horses were killed, and the proprietor of the establishment disappeared. This juncture the police requested the help of Colonel Pietet, who is both an engineer and an acknowledged authority on all matter relating to dynamite. He recommended a cautious approach of the scene of the accident, as it was by no means certain that the dynamite had exploded. Some of it may be buried beneath the debris. At his suggestion the Government undertook the work of searching the ruins, intrusting to him the dangerous duty of superintending. In five large cases of dynamite were found intact and carefully removed. Then arose question as to how they were to be disposed of, and on the advice of Colonel Pietet, they were carried into the open fields and buried, advantage being taken of the opportunity to try several interesting experiments.

stance, one case was surrounded by a huge pile, and, though it did not explode, was quite assumed. Among the absconding proprietor's papers was found a document from which appeared that some time previously he had had ten casks, each containing 1000 kilograms of dynamite, to the Geneva railway station as artificial manure. The risk of storing such an enormous quantity of so dangerous material in the midst of a large population is frightful, and Colonel Pietet went immediately to see whether it was still there. It had been sent to Morges, in Canton Vaud. Morges was at once apprised of the nature of the consignment. It had been forwarded to Pontarlier, after remaining six weeks in the station at Morges, and a telegram was sent to Pontarlier. Pontarlier replied that the casks had gone on to Verrières. Verrières forthwith communicated with the dynamite was then in the hands of the Custom-house officers, who even before the arrival of a despatch from Geneva had begun to suspect the presence of something other than artificial manure. It was, of course, immediately confiscated, and the circumstances being entirely unprecedented, instructions were given from headquarters. The Government experts descend from Paris to look into the matter and decide how the dynamite should be dealt with. Instead of adopting the course followed by Colonel Pietet and destroying it, they ordered it to be taken to Lormont, a small town in the Jure, and placed in the magazine there. A short time afterwards the fort of Lormont was blown into the air, and one of the 12 men who constituted its garrison has since been seen since.—Geneva Correspondence London Times.

Reflections on the 5th of 7th mo, 1850.

In little bosoms such achievements strike
A kindred spark, they burn to do the like.
The martial spirit of the nation is being light to the children; and thus the heaven unrighteousness, it may be, almost insensibly spreads.
Time, mind, and money, may be thoughtfully and foolishly, if not sinfully wasted in it from which no good results, but show-
"with what superior skill we can abuse the gifts of Providence and squander life."

Wine or Lemonade?—A young man called, with company with several others, upon a young man. Her father was also present, to assist in entertaining the callers. He did not see his daughter's scruples against the use of spirituous drinks, for he had wine to offer. The wine was poured out and would have been drunk, but the young woman asked: "Did you call upon me or upon papa?" "Galley, if nothing else, compelled them to war," "We called upon you." "Then you will please not drink wine; I have lemonade which I callers." The father urged the guests drunk, and they were undecided. The young woman added: "Remember if you call upon me then you drink lemonade; but upon papa, why in that case I have nothing to say." The wine glasses were set down, but their contents untasted. After leaving the house one of the party exclaimed, "That the most effectual temperance lecture I ever heard." Indeed, it was sown in ground. It took root, sprang up, and bore fruit. The young man from whom these words were obtained, broke off at once from the use of all strong drink, and holds in grateful remembrance the woman who graciously and still resolutely gave him to understand that her callers should not drink wine.

Lady Jane Grey's Last Hours.

She did not wish to die—at seventeen no one wants to die—but death, in her present adverse state, appeared as a benign angel, rather than a messenger of gloom and wrath.

Racked with anguish at the shameful apostasy of Northumberland to Romanism just before he was executed, she cried out in holy wrath, "Like as his life was wicked, so was his end. I pray God that neither I nor friend of mine die so." And kindling with renewed fervor she added, "Should I, who am so young and in my fewer teens, forsake my faith for love of life? Nay, God forbid; and much more he should not, whose fatal course, though he had lived for years, could not long have continued. But life is sweet. * * * God be merciful to me!"

On the fatal morning of February 9, 1553, dressed with extreme care in a black velvet gown, Lady Jane came forth from her prison, a prayer-book in her hand, a heavenly smile on her face, a tender light in her gray eyes. She walked modestly across the green, passed the files of soldiers, mounted the scaffold, and then, turning her beautiful face toward the spectators, calmly said:

"Good people, I am come hither to die. The act against the queen's highness was unlawful, but touching the procurement and desire thereof by me, or on my behalf, I will wash my hands guiltless thereof, and deliver to my God a soul as pure from such trespass as it is innocent from injustice; but only for that I consented to the thing I was enforced under constraint making of the law believe that which I never understood."

She paused as if to put away from her the world, then she added:

"I pray you all, good christian people, to bear me witness that I die a true christian woman, and that I look to be saved by no other means than the mercy of God, in the merits of the blood of his only Son, our Lord Jesus Christ. And now, good people, while I am alive, I pray you to assist me with your prayers."

Knitting down, she said to Feckenham, the only living whom Mary would allow to come near her:

"Shall I say this psalm?"

"The prelate faltered, "yes."

On which she repeated in a clear voice the noble psalm: "Have mercy upon me, O God, after thy great goodness; according to the multitude of thy mercies do away with mine offences."

When she had come to the last line, she rose on her feet, took off her gloves and kerchief, which she gave to her gentlewoman. The book of Psalms she gave to Thomas Brydges, the lieutenant's deputy, in which she had written these lines: "Call upon God to incline your heart to his laws, to quicken you in his way, and not to take the word of truth utterly out of your mouth."

Then she untied her gown, and took off her bridal gear; the headsmen offered to assist her, but she put his hands gently aside, and drew a white kerchief round her eyes. She whispered in his ear a few soft words of pity and pardon as the figure of the veiled executioner sank at her feet and begged for forgivness. In a distinct voice she said to the executioner, "Pray, dispatch me quickly." Being blinded and unable to see the block on which to lay her young head, she was seen to feel about for it with her hands, and was heard to say, confused, "O, what shall I do? Where is it?" The guard and Feckenham led her to the right place, and as she laid her noble head upon the fatal block, before the death-stroke could reach her, the sweet lips were heard to murmur, "Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit." With these divine words, the soul of Lady Jane Grey passed into its everlasting rest, and the fairest, wisest head in all the English realm fell from under the gleaming axe.—National Repository.

How to Understand the Scriptures.

Francis Howgill, in his tract entitled, "The invisible things of God brought to light," in reply to the query—whether reading the Scriptures and conforming to the practice of the saints in the use of ordinances will not make persons good Christians—thus unfolds the source of true knowledge of Divine things:

"While [spiritual] death hath dominion in man and over man, and the veil over the heart, man doth not understand the mystery of God's kingdom, neither understands the Scripture, which was spoken from the Spirit of Truth, or any thing of truth as it is in Christ; for none understand the things of God but by the Spirit of God; so that every man that comes to have a good understanding must come to know the pure Spirit of God in him to direct him, and inform him; which Spirit was the original of the Scripture; for the holy men of God spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost; and without the Holy Ghost in some measure be known, and that which is infallible, the sayings, the writings, the scriptures, cannot be understood; and because of the want of this, all the earth is run into heads and sects and opinions. * * *

"The Jews under the first covenant had the Scriptures, the good and wholesome words of God, and the prophets, and read the law and the prophets on the Sabbath days, and yet the veil was over their hearts, and though they did perform many things commanded, yet they being erred from the Spirit, did not understand of what the Scripture spoke, nor know Him nor his mind, to wit, Christ, of whom the Scriptures spoke, neither were they accepted of God, but reproved and rejected by Christ himself, who said, they erred, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God; doubtless they did know the words naturally and read them, but the Spirit's mind in so speaking they knew not."

In another tract, called "The works of darkness brought to light," he exposes the error of one who had said, the Scriptures are the means which God hath discovered for the obtaining of eternal life. In this, he says:—"If the Spirit of Truth, through which God and the deep things of God are discovered, if it please to manifest eternal life, or anything which pertains thereunto, through the words which have been spoken by itself, and now brings in those words again, and opens them in any believer's heart, and gives him to understand them and the things of God through any of the words of the Scripture, this is not excluded; but to limit life or the Spirit to this or that or the other thing, true believers dare not do. For God, who is eternal life, manifesteth his mind to the creature, how, when, where and by what He will. Who art thou that would'st limit Him? And thou that know'st Christ no other way than by the words without thee, know'st Him not at all, no more than the Pharisees who had the words, and yet were ignorant of the life."

The True Story of Skipper Ireson.

Though the poem has been published many years, and has appeared in every edition of J. G. Whittier's works since it was written, Skipper Ireson has never been vindicated, nor has a complete and truthful history of the affair ever been given to the public until recently. In his "History and Traditions of Marblehead" Samuel Roads, Jr., gives the following interesting version of the affair, which is acknowledged to be authentic:

On Sunday, the 30th of October, 1808, the schooner Betty, commanded by Skipper Benjamin Ireson, arrived from the Grand Banks. Shortly after their arrival the crew reported that at midnight on the previous Friday, when off Cape Cod Lighthouse, they passed the schooner Active, of Portland, which was in a sinking condition, and that the skipper had refused to render any assistance to the unfortunate men on board the wreck. The excitement and indignation of the people upon the reception of this news can be better imagined than described. The resentment of the people was still further provoked when, on the following day, the sloop Sealow arrived, having on board Captain Gibbons, the master of the ill-fated schooner. He corroborated the story told by the crew of the Betty.

This statement, by one who had so narrowly escaped a watery grave, made a deep impression upon the fishermen, and they determined to demonstrate their disapproval of Skipper Ireson's conduct by a signal act of vengeance. Accordingly, on a bright, moonlight night the unfortunate skipper was suddenly seized by several powerful men and securely bound. He was then placed in a dory, and, besmeared from head to feet with tar and feathers, was dragged through the town, escorted by a multitude of men and boys. When opposite the locality now known as Workhouse Rocks, the bottom of the dory came out, and the prisoner finished the remainder of his ride to Salem in a cart. The authorities of that city forbade the entrance of the strange procession, and the crowd returned to Marblehead. Throughout the entire proceeding Skipper Ireson maintained a dignified silence, and when, on arriving at his own home, he was released from custody, his only remark was: "I thank you for my ride, gentlemen, but you will live to regret it."

His words were prophetic. When too late to make reparation for the wrong they had committed, the impulsive fishermen realized that they had perpetrated an act of the greatest injustice upon an innocent man.

Skipper Ireson was not more to blame than his crew, and it is believed, not at all. When the wreck was spoken and the cry of distress was heard a terrific gale was blowing. There was a consultation on board the Betty as to the course to be pursued, and the crew decided not to endanger their own lives for the sake of saving others. Finding that they were resolute in their determination, Skipper Ireson prepared to lay by the wreck all night, or until the storm should abate, and then go to the rescue of the unfortunate men. To this they also demurred, and insisted upon proceeding upon their homeward voyage without delay. On their arrival in Marblehead, fearing the just indignation of the people, they laid the entire blame upon the Skipper. This version of the affair is generally accepted as true.

In the following letter to Samuel Roads, Whittier embraces the opportunity to make reparation for the injustice unwittingly committed in his ballad. It will be read with interest by all those who reverence and love the man for his faithful devotion at all times to the cause of the oppressed. In writing it he has demonstrated anew his devotion to truth, and has gracefully discharged one of the most delicate duties that can confront a literary man—the acknowledgment of a mistake:

"Oak Knoll, Danvers, Fifth mo. 18th, 1880.

"My Dear Friend: I heartily thank thee for a copy of thy History of Marblehead. I have read it with great interest, and think good use has been made of the abundant material.

"No town in Essex county has a record more honorable than Marblehead; no one has done more to develop the industrial interests of our New England seaboard, and certainly none have given such evidence of self-sacrificing patriotism. I am glad the story of it has been at last told and told so well.

"I have now no doubt that thy version of Skipper Ireson is a correct one. My verse was solely founded on a fragment of rhyme which I heard from one of my early schoolmates, a native of Marblehead. I supposed the story to which it referred dated back at least a century. I knew nothing of the particulars, and the narrative of the ballad was pure fancy. I am glad for the sake of truth and justice that the real facts are given in thy book. I certainly would not knowingly do injustice to any one, dead or living.

I am very truly thy friend,

JOHN G. WHITTIER."

Mercantile Honesty.—John Field, in an address before the Young Men's Christian Association on the subject of salesmen, said: "A gentleman engaged as a salesman in my house (not with us now, has not been for years) reported to me that he had succeeded in selling a very sharp merchant quite a large bill. I was a little surprised myself, for I knew him to be a very peculiar man. In looking into the matter, I found that all staple, well-known goods were sold absolutely below cost, and other goods of which the buyer was not a critical judge were charged above their market value. Calling the salesman into the office I said to him: "Mr. —, I have always looked upon you as an honest man until to-day." His face crimsoned, and he became very angry and said, "Sir, do you mean to say that I am a thief?" I replied, "You sold Mr. So and So." "Yes," said he. "In the first place, you sold some of our goods below cost; you cheated us. In the second place you sold him other goods above their market value; you cheated him; in other words in the day time you let him have his own way, but in the midnight hour in the darkness you had your way." "Mr. F.," said he, "I never saw it in this light before; you are quite right; I will never do so again," and he never did.—Late Paper.

Religious Items, &c.

Individual Influence.—Bishop Warren, in a appeal to the Methodists, speaks of the great proportion of uneducated persons in the South and of the effect produced in a community by personal efforts of refined and pious people. He says that in their efforts to convert the world, "We began with great ideas of the power of preaching, but we had to come to the application of the power of living epistle—the power of Christian lives revealed in the lowly work of the hospital, by the wayside in the hotel, and in the primary work teaching little children."

He proposes to send "a devout, godly man into each of at least one hundred of our individual churches in the South the coming winter."

A Geneva dispatch to the London Tin says, the Great Council of Geneva has adopted a law according to which, after a given time States and communes will grant no subsidies for religious purposes. This involves the disestablishment and disendowment of Protestant, as well as the Catholic church in this Canton.

The American Tract Society's report show that it received last year $382,283.15, an expended $378,882.59, leaving a balance $3,400.56. The list of publications has been increased by 292. Over 60,000,000 pages printed matter have been distributed free of charge. In the colportage work 222 m. have been employed, who made 173,321 family visits. They distributed 155,251 volumes and addressed 7,261 religious meetings in the year.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Prickly-pears.—The prickly-pear forms the chief fortification of the Malagasy towns and villages. A dense thicket of this surround every village and homestead in many parts of the country, and a more formidable obstacle to the attack of an enemy can hardly be imagined. The trees attain a considerable thickness, and every portion of them, trunk, leaves, flowers, and fruit, is fully armed with clusters of sharp needle-like thorns, between two and three inches long; these, if carelessly handled, inflict painful wounds which inflame and are often difficult to heal. To an almost naked and barefooted soldiery, and without artillery, it forms an impenetrable barrier which only rounds of chain and bar shot could clear out of the way. The prickly-pear also of some service for food, the pears bear a palatable fruit when carefully divested of their spiny covering. The larger thorns were formerly used as needles, and are still the ordinary pins of the Malagasy. There are no proper branches in the prickly-pear all the thick fleshy leaves grow from the edge of the others, and flowers and fruit also grow in the same position. They possess great vitality, so that a single leaf laid on the ground develops a number of tendrils roots, that grow out of the earth, and rapidly increases. Sibree's Madagascar.

The Poisoning of Wells.—It is probable that a large proportion of cases of disease in rural districts are the result of poison absorbed in the system either from the stomach or the lungs. The blood is manufactured in the digestive organs from the food, passes a great part through the liver, and is filtered through the lungs, in both of which it is full d purified, and in the latter it is brought directly into contact with the air which is inhaled by inspiration, and is subjected to a very deleterious matter which may be contained in it. As the food and drink are the materials of which the blood is formed, any healthful or poisonous influence at this source, of course, poisons the stream; and as the function of the lungs is to aerate and purify the blood, any thing wrong in the aerifying material interferes with this important process.

But we propose here only to call attention to what we believe to be the most prolific source of rural diseases, malarial, functional, or organic in their character. This is the cess-pool supply. A cess-pool eight feet deep receives the excreta of a family, the wash in a bath-room, water-closet, and sink included. Thirty or forty gallons a day, equal nearly 15,000 gallons, or 2,000 cubic feet of the most poisonous kind of filth, is poured into this pool only eight feet deep, of course, soak into the soil and saturate twenty feet only from this deadly sink the well, which is probably several feet deeper than the cess-pool. The drainage from a cess-pool will flow then in every direction in a circle of twenty feet radius only before it enters into the well. For each foot in depth in this area there are about 1,200 cubic feet, and in a year the 2,000 cubic feet of waste will completely fill this space of twenty feet around well to a depth of more than a foot and a half, and in two years to a depth of three and a half feet. But two things cannot occupy same space, and this filth will then be distributed over a much larger quantity of soil and in proportion to the ratio of solid soil to the small interstices or spaces among the soil, in the mass. Taking this ratio as ten to one, the 2,000 cubic feet of waste saturate 20,000 cubic feet of earth in one year. It is true that the soil near the cess-pool retain the largest portion of the solid matter, and the first water which reaches the well will be filtered to some extent. But it is only a question of time—the lapse of which will depend upon the nature of the subsoil—long or how short a time will elapse before the poison pours undiluted into the well, from it into the stomachs of the unfortunate and unsuspecting victims. If a bed of soil lies close to the bottom of the cess-pool, and the water required to reach the well will be probably months. If the soil is gravelly and the water sinks downward, there is the absolute certainty that a stream of water which flows to the well will be reached sooner or later. A similar frightful certainty, slowly but surely approaching in thousands of cases, attends in time to sap the life of unsuspecting people, who will by and by exhibit every symptom of insidious but fatal disorder. The face cheek, swollen glands, dry hot skin, indured digestion, bilious derangements, rashes, tremors, diarrhoea, dysentery, heaves eruptions, tumors, coated tongue, short breath, and all the varied symptoms by which blood poisoning first becomes apparent, the final deadly typhoid and malignant fevers are predicted, alarm the consciousness, and are the source of the very poison itself is only used to allay the fever and thirst occasioned by it.

It is not to be desired to be sensational or to make too much of this. The danger exists, and it is everywhere. The case before us, to which we call the closest attention, is by no means an unusual one. In fact, there are thousands that are greatly more dangerous than this, and every person who cares for his own health and that of the loved ones whom he shelters from harm with tenderest care, should see to it that this prevalent source of danger is eliminated from his household; and remember that decomposing organic matter is the most deadly of all poisons.—The Rural New Yorker.

Remember your latter end, and the day of account, and keep a bridle to your tongues; for he that knows not a bridle to his tongue, his religion is vain. And keep to the daily cross, which is the power of God to salvation. If you will be heirs of the kingdom of heaven, and of the crown immortal, you must take up the daily cross, for "No cross, no crown." The cross will keep your minds in subjection to the living God; and being in subjection, and standing in awe that you sin not, will keep you near to the Lord, in a living acquaintance with Him; then He will take delight to bless you more and more, and instruct you, and to counsel you in his way, which is pure and holy, and will not admit of any unholiness nor uncleanness.—Elizabeth Sturridge.

Live in love and prefer one another. Cursed be that in any, that would be grudging or jealous, without just grounds, of another's greatness. Delight to see each other prosper and grow in the truth, and do all you can to promote it.—J. Scott.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 17, 1880.

During the late London Yearly Meeting, a meeting was held to give Stanley Pumphrey an opportunity of describing his visit to America. In the report of this meeting, as published in The British Friend for the Sixth month, is the following paragraph.

"I have heard it stated that there is not much difference between the Wilbur and the Hicksite Friends. That statement is unjust. The Wilbur Friends accept as we do the doctrine of the deity of Christ, and would subscribe as heartily as ourselves to that noble declaration of faith drawn up by Wm. Penn and others in 1673, and which now stands, as I hope it ever will, in the discipline of the Society. They believe in the doctrine of redemption through Christ Jesus, and that the forgiveness of sins which we may experience in the mercy of God, is through Him and for his sake. But I fear there is justice in the remark made to me by a serious man of another denomination, that they mix up other things along with it, and assign too large a place to the works of man in the way of salvation. The idea that appears to be current among them, and which I think much of their preaching is likely to foster, appears to be that there must be a long time of preparation, a gradual working up to a higher tone of life, till after careful attention to religious duties and submission to a rigid discipline of cross-bearing and self-denial, we are at last brought into a position in which our Heavenly Father may be pleased to accept us and forgive us for the sake of his Son. 'I was waiting to make myself worthy,' said one of their members to me, 'and, oh, what a weary waiting time it was.' How thankful I was that the Lord had enabled me to proclaim in her hearing the Gospel of his free grace, the blessed tidings that for him who repents and turns to God, and believes on his Son, who died to save us, there is present reconciliation, and a free full pardon to which the Holy Spirit is ready to bear witness by filling us with peace. That this saving faith purifies the heart, and is evidenced by a life of righteousness is of course another aspect of the teaching that must be kept in view."

In the term Wilbur Friends, as here used, we suppose are included the Yearly Meetings of Philadelphia, and Ohio and those elsewhere who unite with them in maintaining our original principles and practices. While great respect is justly due to John Wilbur, as an honest Friend who endeavored to uphold the principles of our Society, yet he was only one of many such; and we do not see any propriety in using such an appellation to distinguish that portion of our religious Society, whose governing motive in their line of action has not been merely sympathy with any individual, but a concern to maintain unimpaired the doctrines and testimonies of the Gospel as held by Friends in the beginning.

While neither the case of the individual referred to in the above extract, nor the manner in which the views of Friends are there presented, is such that we can accept them as properly representing either the doctrines preached or the effects produced thereby among Friends generally in this section of the country; yet the paragraph involves to some extent, what we have often believed was the root or groundwork of the difference between primitive Quakerism and the modified form of it, which has spread in some quarters. The advocates of both believe in the divinity and offices of our Saviour; but Modern Quakerism teaches its followers, that they may secure the blessings that are designed to flow from the atoning sacrifice of our Redeemer by such belief in Christ as it is in the power of an intelligent man to exercise at his will; and that this is the only essential to salvation; and that he who is thus saved will be afterwards purified, and made to lead a life of righteousness. The Ancient Quakers taught, that no man is any further in a state of acceptance with God, than he is brought into a state of purity—as George Fox expresses it, "So far as a man is sanctified, so far as he is justified, and no farther"—that redemption from the power of sin is effected in man by the Spirit of Christ Himself, which visits all, enlightens all, and gives power to repent of and forsake sin, to all who yield their hearts to its influence; that such and such only will have their past sins blotted out, not through any merit of their own, but through the mercy of God in Christ Jesus our Lord, agreeably with the testimony of the apostle—"If we walk in the light, as [God] is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanseth us from all sin." Their faith in Christ had reference to both his outward offering and his inward work. It was not a belief or acceptance, such as the natural faculties of man could exercise at will; but was the result of the operation of the Divine Power—one of the fruits of the Spirit.

It almost inevitably followed from the doctrines held by Ancient Friends, and their true successors in modern times, that their preaching should largely turn the attention of their hearers to the internal work of the Spirit of Christ, as the only way to salvation; that they should press upon them the necessity of walking in the Light of Christ, and of depending on His Divine Guidance and help in every step towards Heaven. This preaching had no tendency to make any believe that they had passed from death unto life, whilst sin still retained its dominion over them; or to settle them down in a state of self-security, while still far short of that rest from their own works, of that surrender of their own will, which are necessary for the Christian to experience. It did not exhort them to believe that they were "saved," because they repeated a certain formula of words, or because of anything they had thought or willed. It left the question, whether they were saved or not, as one to be settled between each individual soul and its Creator, who knows how and when and in what degree to impart a sense of His loving-kindness and acceptance to His dedicated children. While these may often be bowed down with a humble sense of their own unworthiness, there are few indeed of them who would be so unwise as to expect "to make themselves worthy" of the Divine favor, well knowing that "all merit and all worthiness is in Christ alone."

In corroboration of our own views, we insert an extract from a letter recently received from one whose long experience of the goodness and mercies of the Lord give weight to his remarks. He says:

"In the whole of the paragraph on page 166 of The British Friend, first column, [the part above commented on], he seems to lose sight of that precious, passive, submissive state of mind so becoming to new-born babes in Christ, wherein our own wills and wisdom with the unassisted workings of the unrenewed heart are nailed to the cross. Instead of this [the implies that] we are, by a sort of imputative righteousness, or belief in the dear Redeemer's outward coming, so justified, that a 'present reconciliation, and a free and full pardon' is experienced first, and then the Holy Spirit bears witness of peace. Whereas the apostle says, 'No man can call Jesus Lord, but by the Holy Ghost.' Do not Friends believe we must be delivered from sin itself before we can be delivered from the wages of it? And is it not by walking in the Light of Christ manifested in the heart, that the blood is known to cleanse from all sin? Is it not the power of Christ revealed in the heart that saves through our obedience to it? Did not William Penn write that if we reject Him as our Sanctifier, none of us can truly know him to be our Sacrifice?"

In his remarks on Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, S. Pamphrey speaks of the testimony to plainness of attire maintained by Friends in this section of country, as an "exaggerated regard to a ritual of dress." To meet with such criticisms is one of the afflictions that consistent Friends must expect to bear in these times, when a self-confident spirit prevails in some, leading those under its influence to sit in judgment on persons of more spiritual experience than themselves, inducing them to set at naught the counsel and concern of religiously exercised Friends on their behalf, and causing them to assume an attitude of defiance towards those who may truly be regarded as fathers in the church. Yet it is a comfort to reflect that such criticisms apply with no greater force to consistent Friends of this day, than to their faithful predecessors in the truth.

We have been requested to call attention to the desire of the officers in charge of the School for Indian children under the care of the United States Government at Carlisle, Pa., "to bring some of these Indian pupils more directly in contact with the civilized home-life and language of the white race, than is possible while together in large numbers." It is proposed to place those who it is thought will prove satisfactory, during the two months' vacation, in the families of suitable persons who are willing to receive them. Their travelling expenses will be paid, but their services are expected to compensate for their board.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In reference to the recent firing into an American schooner off the Cuban coast, the State Department has been informed by the Spanish Government that it has no such vessel as the Nuncio, and the Spanish authorities are inclined to believe that the vessel was a pirate. Ample reparation is promised, however, should it turn out that the outrage was committed by Spanish officials.

Invasions of the Indian Territory by companies of emigrants from Illinois and Missouri, are reported from Kansas City. No official information of the invasion has yet reached the Interior Department.

An official statement compiled at the Post-office Department, shows that the losses of postage stamps, framed envelopes and postal cards, during the fiscal year just closed, foot up an aggregate of $3,932,519, being an increase of nearly three and a half million dollars over the preceding year. The greatest proportional increase was in the item of postal cards, the issues of which amounted to $2,753,470. The issues of postage stamps aggregated $2,114,128.

A fire in Tyrone, Pa., on the 8th inst., destroyed sixteen buildings—among them two banks and the post-office. The loss is estimated at $125,000 to $150,000.

A heavy rain storm at Des Moines, Iowa, on the 7th, is reported to have done great damage to property and to the growing crops. Several towns, and the outlying parts of New York on the 11th, several barns and other farm buildings were destroyed by lightning during the day.

A stage coach containing nine people, while descending Mt. Washington on the 11th inst., was upset when rounding a curve, throwing the occupants into the woods and on the rocks. One person was killed, and five others injured. The driver is said to have been drunk.

A number of French Jesuits have arrived in Quebec, and others are expected to seek an asylum in Canada.

In Chicago during the last week, the temperature for four consecutive days, ranged from 90 to 95 degrees in the shade. Six cases of sunstroke, two fatal, occurred. The valuation of New York city for the taxation purposes, for the year 1880, is $1,143,765,727.

The Adams Express Company has the daily use of 121,216 miles of railroad, for which the companies receive an annual compensation of $2,093,412. During the last year it carried for the Government $661,000,000, and for the general public the sum of $11,050,000,000.

The mortality in this city for the week ending on the 6th inst., was 367. Of this number 90 were adults and 298 children—191 being under one year of age. Fifty deaths occurred from consumption; 15 congestion of the brain; 5 diphtheria; 115 cholera infantum. The Health Officer's report, for 1879, states that the actual mortality for the year was 15,473; the number of births registered was 18,499; number of marriages 6,221. Ratio of deaths was 18.25 per 1000 persons.

Hotels.—United States States, 1881, 1041; registered 1021; common 1031; 4110 '85, 1084 Cotton.—There was no material change to notice price or demand. Sales of middlings are reported 12 a 12½ cts. per lb. for uplands and New Orleans.

Petroleum.—Standard white 10½ cts. per gallon export. Oil is firm and in fair demand at rather big rates. Sales of 3000 barrels, including Minnesota (tras), at $4.75 a $6.25; Pennsylvania family at $4.65 '55; western do. do. at $5.25 a $6, and patents at $6 a $7.75. Rye flour is steady. Sales at $4.25 per bushel. Grain.—Wheat is in good demand, but rather low. Sales of 5000 bushels of red wintered hard at $1.14 a $1.15, and damp do. do. at $1 a $1.05. It is steady at 85 cts. for Pennsylvania. Corn is as sales of 10,000 bushel, including rejected, at 45 a cts.; steamer at 47 a 48 cts.; mixed at 49 cts., and low at 51 a 52 cts. Oats are firmer. Sales of 7 bushels, including mixed at 67½ cts., and white at 44 cts. per bushel.

Hay and Straw Market.—For week ending 7th 10th, 1880.—Loads of Hay, 255; loads of straw, Average price during the week: Prime timothy, $1 to $1.50 per 100 pounds; mixed, $1.25 to $1.55 per 100 pounds.

Beef cattle were in fair demand, and prices were fraction higher; 2500 head arrived sold at the differ yards at from a 4½ cts. per lb. as to condition.

Sheep were rather higher: 7000 head sold at different yards at 2½ a 5 cts. per lb. as to condition. Hogs were unchanged: 5000 head sold at the fore yards at 6½ a 7 cts. per lb.

Cows were a dull: 170 head sold at $20 a $50 per head.

FOREIGN.—A dispatch to the News from Dublin says "The weather all over Ireland, up to the present, been most favorable. It is expected that the potato crop will be enormous. It promises to exceed anything in Ireland since the period anterior to the famine of 1847. Root and cereal crops are also luxuriant."

The Irish Compensation bill before the House, will with strong opposition; and the general impression that the bill will not become a law.

The Annest's bill, in a modified form, has passed both Houses of the Great Britain Parliament, and an order has been published granting full remission sentences to all individuals convicted of participation in the insurrection of 1870—1, and subsequent insurrectionary movements.

It is reported that the Government is disposed to suspend the execution of the anti-indent decrees against other religious orders until the legal tribunals have decided on the case of the Jesuits.

The Government at Constantinople is indisposed towards the recommendations of the late Conference. It is reported that the Turkish Minister of Foreign Affairs has offered to pay a money indemnity to the Negro, if the latter consents to relinquish all claim the territory in question.

England and France have advised Greece to stop calling out the reserves, until the collective notes have been received and repaid to by Turkey and Greece order to avoid offering the Porte any pretext for resistance.

A Russian caravan has been pillaged on the Chiu frontier and two merchants were killed. A party Russian explorers are prisoners in the hands of Chinese.

During last week, a timber raft with forty persons on board was dashed to pieces in the rapids of the river Dnieper, and all perished.

South America.—Arica has been captured by Chileans, which is looked upon as a fatal blow to hopes of Peru, and the President urges the continuation of the war, and is taking most energetic measures to prosecute it.

Seventy-one deaths occurred from yellow fever, eleven from small-pox, in Havana, during the week.

FRIENDS' ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE Near Frankford, (Twenty-third Ward), Philadelphia Physician and Superintendent.—JOHN C. HALL, D. Applications for the Admission of Patients may be made to the Superintendent, or to any of the Board Managers.

DIED, at his residence in this city, 2nd mo. 3d, JAMES H. CRESSON, aged 76 years, a member of Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for Western District.

For "The Friend,"

Samuel Smith's Testimony.

This valuable Friend was born in Bucks Co., Pa., in 1737, but lived during most of his life in the city of Philadelphia, whither he moved in 1763.

His friends say of him: "He was one of those who, early felt drawn to bear a testimony against the free use of ardent spirits, the sale of that article being connected with the business in which he was engaged, became burdensome; and dwelling near a preserving principle in his own mind, which redeems from a selfish spirit, and inspires not only with love to God, but love to his neighbor, he was strengthened to relinquish the prospect of present gain for the more enduring riches of a quiet and approving conscience."

As a minister of the Gospel he travelled in various parts of America, and twice paid religious visits to England. In his various journals on Truith's account, "he was careful to go so near his Guide as to be preserved from exceeding the limits of his concern, or continuing longer from home than the clear manifestations of duty required; being tenderly cautious that the ministry should in no respect be burdensome."

When near the end of life he drew up the following testimony:—

I think it right now in the 77th year of age, to subscribe my firm belief in that sacred truth, that God wills that all men should be saved with an everlasting salvation, through faith in Christ Jesus, and by obedience to the dictates of his pure Holy Spirit. As I can say was manifested and operative in my mind in very early life, leading to the love of God, doing good and shunning evil, as it was attended to and obeyed, it brought peace and happiness, which is Heaven. When disobeyed it brought reproof, correction and trouble, that which is directly opposite to happiness; and this I have found to be the case during the whole course of my life, thus the two seeds, or spirits, are striving in man for government, and to whichever most yields, the fruit is either peace and happiness or guilt and trouble; and I think I have had this further evidence of the benefit regarding this Divine monitor or principle within, that when I have attended to its secret intimations even in regard to temporal pursuits, I have never been suffered to go very deep into perplexing entanglements; thus safety and happiness will be the blessed effect both as it regards this life, and that no death, which is to come.

If I have been favored to pass through seventy years of life with less difficulty and embarrassment than many others, I attribute it to that degree of attention I have paid to this inward monitor, which I have most surely believed to be man's surest guide through the wilderness of this world. And the greatest perplexities I have ever been in, have been by neglecting or disregarding it. Thus I feel desirous that the minds of all men might be turned with due attention to this heavenly Guide, especially in early life. But if they will not regard it, neither would they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.

A disregard, in the first place, to that heavenly counsel of the blessed Master to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, with the promise that all things should be added, lays the foundation for multiplied difficulties, for when there is a beginning wrong, the path as it is pursued, may be expected to be srewed with perplexities.

Oh that mankind would also regard the prophet's advice, not to seek great things for ourselves, then a little with the divine blessing upon it, would teach contentment, and this would lead to happiness, and thus heaven would be begun here, a sure pledge if steadily pursued to obtain it hereafter.

Having looked over the foregoing now in the 78th year of my age, I can afresh subscribe to the truth of it, and have a comfortable hope, I trust, that I shall be favored to lay down my head in peace with the Supreme Judge and all men.

SAMUEL SMITH.

Philadelphia, 5th mo. 10th, 1814."

As the close drew near, he gave directions concerning his funeral, requesting that no public invitation should be given in any meeting, and that his connections at a distance should not be sent for; observing that he had long been grieved with the great parade of funerals, and with the entertainments of some in the country at the houses of the deceased, after the interment.

The evening before his death, he suffered much pain, and being asked whether he could say, "My heart is fixed," he replied: "I have not much else to say than that I feel as if all my nearest friends had forsaken me—that is, there is none of them can come where I now am—and all I can do is to desire patiently to endure my portion of suffering until it shall please the Master to release me. I have not ability now to look into my heart and my accounts there, but I feel a confidence that mercy and peace will attend me."

He died on the 1st of Ninth month, 1817, in the 81st year of his age.

A Ride on an Avalanche.

So great are the dangers and difficulties that beset the Alpine climbers that four guides accompanied a party of two who left Sion to ascend the Hant de Grey on Feb. 28th, 1824, with Benner, the trusted guide of Prof. Lyndall, perhaps the most prudent and skilled of Alpine guides, in charge. Starting at 3 A. M., from Ardon, by 7 A. M., the party reached a height of seven thousand feet, but such obstacles did the snow present that in the next three hours they gained only one thousand feet. The snow was dangerous, for at what step might they not start an avalanche! While crossing a couloir, two of the men sunk to the waist in the snow. Avoiding the soft places, Benner crossed above them, the snow holding him up; I, following, sank and had to cross through the furrows made by those who sank first.

Bénisson then advanced; he had made but a few steps when we heard a deep, rattling sound. The snow-field split in two about fourteen or fifteen feet above us. The cleft was at first quite narrow, not more than an inch broad. An awful silence ensued; it lasted but a few seconds, and then it was broken by Benner's voice, "Wir sind alle verloren," we are all lost. His words were slow and solemn, and those who knew him felt what they really meant when spoken by such a man as Benner. They were his last words. I drove my alpenstock into the snow and brought the weight of my body to bear on it; it went in to within three inches of the top. I then waited. It was an awful moment of suspense. I turned my head towards Benner to see whether he had done the same thing. To my astonishment, I saw him turn round, face the valley, and stretch out both arms. The ground on which we stood began to move slowly, and I felt the utter uselessness of my alpenstock. The speed of the avalanche increased rapidly, and before long I was covered up with snow and in utter darkness. I was suffocating, when with a jerk, I suddenly came to the surface again. The rope had caught most probably on a rock, and this was evidently the moment when it broke. I was on a wave of the avalanche, and saw it before me as I was carried down.

It was the most awful sight I ever witnessed. The head of the avalanche was already at the spot where we had made our last check. The head alone was preceded by a thick cloud of snow dust; the rest of the avalanche was clear. Around me I heard the horrid hissing of the snow, and far before me the thunder of the foremost part of the avalanche. To prevent myself sinking again, I made use of my arms much in the same way as when swimming in a standing position. At last I noticed that I was moving slower; then I saw the pieces of snow in front of me stop at some yard's distance; then the snow straight before me stopped, and I heard on a large scale the same creaking sound that is produced when a heavy cart passes over hard-frozen snow in winter. I felt that I also had stopped, and instantly threw up both arms to protect my head in case I should again be covered up. I had stopped, but the snow behind me was still in motion; its pressure on my body was so strong that I thought that I should be crushed to death. This tremendous pressure lasted but a short time, and ceased as suddenly as it had begun. I was then covered up by snow coming from behind me. My first impulse was to try and uncover my head, but this I could not do; the avalanche had frozen by pressure the moment it stopped, and I was frozen in. Whilst trying vainly to move my arms, I suddenly became aware that the hands as far as the wrist had the faculty of motion. The conclusion was easy, they must be above the snow. I set to work as well as I could; it was time, for I could not hold out much longer. At last I saw a faint glimmer of light.

The crust above my head was getting thinner, and it let a little air pass, but I could not reach it any more with my hands; the ice struck me I might pierce it with my breath. After several efforts I succeeded in doing so, and felt suddenly a rush of air toward my mouth; I saw the sky again through a little hole. A dead silence reigned around me; I was surprised to be still alive, and so persuaded at the first moment that none of my fellow-sufferers had survived, that I did not even think of shouting for them. I then made vain efforts to extricate my arms, but found it impossible; the most I could do was to join the ends of my fingers, but they could not reach the snow any longer. After a few minutes I heard a man shouting; what a relief it was to know that I was not frozen in and they could come to my assistance! Suddenly there was an exclamation of surprise. Rebot had seen my hands, he cleared my head in an instant. Soon the three guides who survived cut the snow with the axe down to my feet, and I was taken out. A fatal ride it was. Boissonnet, my companion, and Benner, the faithful guide, were dead—buried and suffocated in the snow. The bodies were recovered in three days afterwards.—Hours of Exercise Among the Alps.

Testimony of a Converted Skeptic.—Men who have strayed into skepticism are continually coming back to the Bible, and accepting it again as their teacher, their guide, and their comforter. I am myself an instance of this. Carried away, as by a tempest, from my early faith, I wandered for years in the dreary regions of doubt and unbelief. I looked for light and beheld darkness. I sought rest and found disquietude. And the farther I went the worse I fared, and the longer I remained in those dismal shades the more wretched I became. I found myself at length face to face with utter darkness and eternal death. God, in his mercy, rescued me from that awful state, and brought me back to Christ. And here I am, happy in the light of his truth and in the assurance of his love. I praise the Bible, and love Christ and Christianity more than ever, and I am more happy in the work of a minister than ever I was in my life. And my ability to maintain the claims of Christ and Christianity and the Bible to the love and reverence and gratitude of mankind is greater than ever. And my hatred and horror of infidelity are greater than ever. I know it to be the extreme of madness and misery—the utter degradation and ruin of man's soul.—Joseph Barker.

London Epistle, 1751.

Selected.

Dear! beloved young Friends!—In much affection and tenderness we exhort you, above all things, to give diligent heed and attention to the voice of the Spirit of Christ speaking in the secret of your own consciences, reproving for evil, and speaking peace when you do well. For this, as it is closely and reverently regarded, will not only season your minds with a holy fear and dread of offending the Great Majesty of heaven and the whole earth, and thereby be a means of preserving you from the vices and vanities, and allurements of the world; but will also influence you to seek after, and pray earnestly for, that wisdom which is from above. Happy are the youth who thus give up their names to serve the living God with full purpose of heart! How inexpressible are the blessings which those who are thus early devoted to serve the Lord, bring upon themselves! And how do they cause the hearts of their parents and friends to overflow with joy and thanksgiving to the Author of all our mercies; and the church of God to magnify his name, for the continuance of his goodness to his people, from one generation to another! Whilst the ungodly and disobedient, and such as, contrary to the tender entreaties and admonitions of their parents, the counsel of their friends, and the dictates of the Spirit of Truth in their own hearts, give up the reins to their unruly passions, and indulge themselves in rioting, wantonness, and excess, too often wound their parents with grief and affliction, become themselves a reproach to their Christian profession, and render their own lives short and miserable, attended with such reflections as these: "How have I hated instruction, and my heart despised reproof, and have not obeyed the voice of my teachers, nor inclined mine ear to them that instructed me!" Prov. v. 12, 13.

Oh! that all such may return unto the Lord, whilst the day of his gracious visitation is extended unto them, who delighteth not in the death of a sinner, but willetth the salvation of all.

Pride.

And now abideth pride, fashion, extravagance, these three; but the greatest of these is pride—simply because it is the root of the whole matter. Destroy the root, and the tree will die.

It is hardly worth while to waste ammunition in shooting at fashion and extravagance as long as the root is alive. Most persons say it does not matter how people dress, pride is in the heart. Very true, but straws show which way the wind blows. Plain exterior may cover up a proud heart; but depend upon it, a fashionable exterior seldom, if ever, covers up a plain heart. Some rules work two ways, but some will not. A lady once asked a minister whether a person might not be fond of dress and ornaments without being proud? He replied, "When you see the fox's tail peeping out of the hole you may be sure the fox is within." Jewelry, and costly and fashionable clothing, may all be innocent things in their places, but when hung upon a human form they give most conclusive evidence of a proud heart.

"But is it possible that a man can be found at this advanced age of refinement that dare to write or speak a word against pride and its consequences? The large majority of that class of men died and were handsomely buried some time ago. Now, the pulpits have nearly all shut down on that style of preaching. The fact is we have passed that age, and are living in better times. Our fathers and mothers were far behind the times. They were good enough in their way; but, dear me, they would not do now. They wore plain clothes, wore shipped in plain churches, and sung old fashioned hymns. They talked and acted like some old pilgrims that were looking for a better country; and when they left the world they stuck to it, to the very last, that they were going to a city where there is no night. It is my deliberate opinion that the vast majority of them went just where they said they were going.

But they are nearly all out of the way now and the people have a mind to try a different route. "We can be Christians now and do as we like. Yes indeed. We can have fine churches, cushioned seats, costly carpets, a fashionable preacher, and have all our fiddling and singing done to order. Why in some of our modern churches the majority of the choir are not even members of the church; and they do sing so sweetly; perfectly delightful. The music rolls over the heads of the congregation like the sound of many waters. Not a word can be heard; but the sound is glorious. Sometimes one sings all alone for a little while then two, and pretty soon the whole choir will chime in until the whole house is filled with most transporting sound. Now, if this is no singing with the spirit, and with the understanding also, then what is it? that's the question. I know it is a little risky to speak up against pride at this day, because the church is full of it. It is of no use to deny it. An hundred who occupy the pulpit, whose duty it is to point out these evils plainly, are like dumb dogs; they don't even bark at it. They just let it go; and go it does. And in proportion as pride gains in a church, spiritual power dies out. They will not, cannot, dwell together, for they are eternal opposites. It is a sin and a shame for men and women professing Christianity to spend money the way they do to gratify a proud heart. There are many evils in the land and in the church, but I doubt if any one evil is doing more harm than pride. It has stolen into the church by degrees, and now rules with a rod of iron. Churches that were once noted for plainness and whose law still stands against pride and fashion, are practically powerless on the subject.

The religion of Christ is pure, peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, and full of mercy. All Christians are baptized with one Spirit into one body. They mind not high things; but condescend to men of low estate. Their highest ambition is to honor God, with sin they have and are. They are not puffed up, not conformed to this world, but transformed by the renewing of their minds. There is such a thing in heaven or earth as a proud Christian; there never was, nor never can be. Pride is of the devil—it originated with him; and he is managing it most successfully in destroying souls. But who is to blame for this state of things in the church? First, and mostly the pulpit is to blame. Men who profess to be called of God to lead people to heaven ve ceased to rebuke this soul-destroying, even-provoking spirit. But why? First, a living, then for a popularity. Churches that were once powerful for good are now well-nigh lost in forms and fashions, may shut our eyes, and cry old fogey, all that, but the fact is before us—pride, ambition and extravagance are eating the very heart out of many of the heretofore best congregations in the land. The world is running away. The rich lead the way, because they are; while the poor strain every nerve to keep in sight.—Bishop J. Weaver.

Story of the Cataract.—Niagara Fall Dry for a Day.

The following letter has been published in the Chicago Tribune. To it are appended testimonials of several persons of respectable standing in the community, attesting the correctness of the statement as to the lossness of water in the Niagara River at the time mentioned.

Hamilton, Ontario, June 9.—In the month of March last I delivered in the City of Hamilton, Ontario, a lecture entitled "Upper Canada It Was Fifty Years Ago, and Ontario as It Now Is"; and, in the course of my lecture, I spoke of the great difficulty of constructing an International Bridge between Buffalo and Canada side opposite to that city, on account of the great current of water running times down the Niagara river, where the waters are driven by strong westerly winds upon Lake Erie, whereas the quantity of water running down the river is very much diminished when the winds drive up Lake Erie. I then remarked:

"This fact caused an event 32 years ago, of which probably very few of you have ever heard. I refer to the time when the Falls of Niagara were dry for a whole day. That day was the 31st of March, 1838. I did not witness it myself, but I was of it the next day by my late brother-in-law, Thomas C. Street, Esq., member of Parliament. Happening to go out to his office the next day, he told me that his miller had had a grist on the rapids above the Falls knocked at his bedroom door about 5 o'clock in the morning of that day, and told him to get up, as there was no water in the mill-race and no water in the great river outside of the race. He said that he was startled, the intelligence, and hurried out as soon as could dress himself, and then saw the river, at the edge of which he had been born 34 years before, dry. After a hurried breakfast and his youngest daughter, (then unmarried), went down about three-quarters of a mile to the precipice itself, over which there was so little water running, that, having provided himself with a strong pole, they started on the Table Rock and walked near the edge of the precipice, about one-third of the way toward Goat Island, on the American shore, and, having stuck this pole in a crevice of the rock, and Miss Street having tied her pocket handkerchief firmly on the top of the pole, they returned. He said that he then tied his view toward the river below the Falls, and saw the water so shallow that immense jagged rocks stood up in such a frightful manner that he shuddered when he thought of it, having frequently passed over them in his little Maid of the Mist (as I often had it). He then returned toward home, and came from the Canada shore some one-half mile above the Falls toward Goat Island. When he told me this he reproached himself very much for not having set out for me, about eight miles distant, but he said that, though he had several times intended doing so, he had each time concluded not to do it, lest, before we could reach the wonderful scene, the waters would have returned to their old courses. Of course everybody was speaking of the wonderful event when I was out there next day, and I have heard others who witnessed it speak of it since that time." So far can I testify to the evidence of the fact at the time of the occurrence.

T. C. Street's theory was this: That the winds had been blowing down Lake Erie, which is only about 30 feet deep, and rushing a great deal of water from it over the Falls, and suddenly changed and blew this little water (comparatively speaking) up to the western portion of the lake; and that, at this juncture, the ice on Lake Erie, which had been broken up by these high winds, got jammed in the river between Buffalo and the Canada side, and formed a dam which kept back the waters of Lake Erie a whole day."—T. B. Fuller.

In a meeting held at Carlow, Ireland, in the year 1762, Samuel Fothergill was largely engaged in testimony, "as wrote one then present, 'setting forth the doctrines of Christianity, and the foundation of it, at much length, for the information of those differing in name from us (for true religion is the same in all) saying, that as we were a people who almost everywhere had been spoken against, sometimes through ignorance, and sometimes, he was afraid, through malevolence, he was willing to inform them what principles we held, and what our belief was concerning the fundamentals of Christianity; and that it was not being men of literature, nor any natural or acquired ability as men and creatures, that could procure to us that substantial religion that could stand by us beyond the grave, by assisting us to renounce the devil and all his works, the pomps and vanities of this wicked world; but our humbly depending upon that sufficiency which is of God.' " He said he was sensible that many were prevented from coming to partake of the inestimable blessing of peace and serenity of soul, by that monster, shame, so that they cannot bear ridicule from their acquaintance, which must be their lot if they are bent to live a Christian life. But the cross being as foolishness, and a stone of stumbling, men remain in darkness and ignorance, and answer not the end of their creation, and are prevented from coming to the knowledge of Him who has called us to glory and to virtue.

This, he acknowledged, had been the case with himself in the early part of his life, when he lived in as loose and forgetful a manner as perhaps any present, though often convicted in the secret of his soul for his folly. But shame would not allow him to submit to be accounted a fool, for he had extended pretty far in notion and speculation, and endeavored to procure some knowledge in literature, but was made sensible it would avail nothing in that which pertains to life and godliness, through the knowledge of Him who has called us to glory and to virtue. And as destruction from God was a terror to him, because of his highness and majesty, he could not endure, he was enabled in measure to conquer this shame, and submit to that power that would cleanse his heart, for which unmerited favor, all within him worshipped and praised Him that lives for ever. And having happily experienced the advantage of joining with wisdom's call, he was earnest in inviting others to join with it. And if we come thus to obey the call of wisdom, we shall dwell in a quiet habitation, in a covert from the storm in times of trial, when afflictions roll upon us, for these we must expect on this side the grave."

How the Pyramids Were Built.

From the far distance you see the giant forms of the pyramids, as if they were regularly crystallized mountains, which the ever-creating nature has called forth from the rock, to lift themselves up towards the vault of Heaven. And yet, they are but tombs, built by the hands of men, which have been the admiration and astonishment alike of the ancient and modern world. Perfectly adjusted to the cardinal points of the horizon, they differ in breadth and height, as is shown by measurements of the three oldest, as follows: 1. The Pyramid of Khufu, height, 450.75 ft., breadth, 746 ft. 2. Pyramid of Khafra, height, 447.5 ft., breadth, 690.75 ft. 3. Pyramid of Menkara, height, 203 ft., breadth, 352.78 ft. The construction of these enormous masses had long been an insoluble mystery, but later generations have succeeded in solving the problem. According to their ancient usages and customs, the Egyptians, while they still sojourned in health and spirits, were ever mindful to turn their looks to the region where the departing Ra took leave of life, where the door of the grave opened, where the body, well concealed, at length found rest, to rise again to a new existence, after an appointed time of long, long years; while the soul, though bound to the body, was at liberty to leave the grave and return to it during the daytime, in any form it chose. In such a belief, it was the custom sometimes to dig the grave in the form of a deep shaft in the rock, and above this eternal dwelling to raise a superstructure of sacrificial chambers, sometimes only a hall, sometimes several apartments, and to adorn them richly with colored writings and painted sculptures, as was becoming to a house of pleasure and joy. The king began his work from his accession. As soon as he mounted the throne, the sovereign gave orders to a nobleman, the master of all the buildings of his land, to plan the work and cut the stone. The kernel of the future edifice was raised on the limestone soil of the desert, in the form of a small pyramid built in steps, of which the well constructed and finished interior formed the king's eternal dwelling, with his stone sarcophagus lying on the rocky floor. Let us suppose that this first building was finished while the Pharaoh still lived in the bright sunlight. A second covering was added, stone by stone, on the outside of the kernel; a third to this second, and to this even a fourth; and the mass of the giant building grew greater the longer the king enjoyed existence. And then, at last, when it became almost impossible to extend the area of the pyramid further, a casing of hard, smooth, polished like glass, and fitted accurately into the angles of the steps, covered the vast mass of the sepulchre, presenting a gigantic triangle on each of its four faces. More than a seventy such pyramids once rose on the margin of the desert, each telling of a king, of whom it was at once the tomb and monument. Had not the greater number of these sepulchres of the Pharaohs been destroyed almost to the foundation, and had the names of the builders of these which still stand been accurately preserved, it would have been easy for the enquirer to prove and make clear by calculation what was originally, and of necessity, the proportion between the masses of the pyramids and the years of the reigns of their respective builders—Brugsch's Egypt.

For "The Friend,"
A Settlement in the Truth.—Gospel Ministry.

When Job Scott was laboring in the service of the Gospel in the year 1789, in the lower part of Maryland, he came to a place called "The Cliffs," of which he says: "We had a glorious meeting at this place, at Friends' meeting-house, but mostly among such as were not Friends, many of them being called Methodists, a people that abound in this land; and some of their hearts have been touched with a live coal from the holy altar; but they seem very unsettled, many having hurried forward into much religious activity, being very noisy, talkative, and almost, if not quite, ranting. Yet I hope some of them will come to a settlement in the truth; but expect many will quite run out, and finally shake off their religious exercise; this being the natural consequence of making haste into religious performances without the pure leadings of truth therein. My heart and mouth were largely opened among them in this and divers other meetings; and this day, in a special manner, the streams of life flowed plentifully and sweetly, to my great satisfaction and comfort, and to the refreshment of many minds. Glory to God, who hath hitherto helped us! We can do nothing without his help, but can do all things required of us through his strengthening influence in and upon us."

A few days after this he attended a meeting at Stafford, in Virginia, of which he observes: "It was silent, except a few words at the close, which I felt easy to drop with my hat on, informing that the life was so low, and the springs so shut up, that I had not dared to attempt anything under pretence of preaching the gospel; but that I felt a particular freedom to mention something that had turned in my mind to those not of our Society. I told them, a minister of the gospel had nothing of his own to offer to the people; his whole dependence is on Christ; he must speak as the oracle of God, and only in the ability that God giveth; therefore is under an absolute necessity to keep silence, unless immediately abilitated and commissioned from God; that for their sakes, through the flowings of the love which I felt to them, I had rather desired as a creature, that the way might be opened for communication; but that I found a dow of love and good will was not a sufficient qualification to preach the gospel; mentioning that Saul's forcing himself and offering, through a fear that the people would be scattered abroad, displeased the Lord, and Samuel his prophet; that therefore I had not dared to attempt to preach the gospel among them, knowing who it was that said, such as kindle a fire and warm themselves by the sparks of their own kindling, shall lie down in sorrow. I further told them, that those who can appoint meetings when they please, and always preach in them, whether divinely influenced or not, whatever they may pretend, are not the ministers of Christ; they have something of their own, and are not wholly dependent on Him. Such preachers, however well they mean, and though even sometimes favored, for the people's sakes, yet if they go in that independent manner, almost universally run themselves into a flat, lifeless formality, and dry up what little spring of life they may once have felt."

THE WINDS.

We come! we come! and ye feel our might,
As we're bustling on in our boundless flight,
And over the mountains, and over the deep,
Our broad, invisible pinions sweep,
Like the spirit of Liberty, wild and free!
And ye look on our works, and own 'tis we;
Ye call us the Winds; but can ye tell
Whether we go, or where we dwell?

Ye mark, as we vary our forms of power,
And fell the forests, or fan the flower,
When the harebell morneth, and the rush is bent,
When the lark's chirping, and the cock is rent,
As we wail the bark o'er the slumbering wave,
Or hurry its crew to a watery grave,
And ye say it is we!—but can ye trace
The wandering winds to their secret place?

And, whether our breath be loud and high,
Or come in a soft and balmy sigh,
Our threatenings fill the soul with fear,
Or our gentle whisperings woo the ear
With music aerial, still 'tis we.
And ye list, and ye look; but what do you see?
Can ye lush one sound of our voice to peace,
Or waken one note when our numbers cease?

Our dwelling is in the Almighty's hand;
We come and we go as His command;
Though joy or sorrow may mark our track,
His will is our guide, and we look not back;
And if in our wealth ye would turn us away,
Or win us in gentle airs to play,
Then lift up your hearts to Him, who binds
Or frees, as He will, the obedient winds.

Hannah P. Gould.

What is Vulgar?

There are few attributes that are so often misapplied as that of vulgarity. Those who frequently employ the word, who freely apply it to other people, and live in dread lest it might be cast at themselves, generally mean nothing more disgraceful than poverty, ignorance, want of refinement, or bad taste. These things, or rather the name of them, they fear more than any actual wrong-doing, and upon those who exhibit them they visit the full weight of their contempt.

Now it is quite possible that all or any of these things may be associated with vulgarity, but they are not in themselves vulgar. There are thousands of persons, poor, unlearned, without grace, or polish, or elegance, to whom the word would be wholly inapplicable. On the other hand, there are thousands of the rich, and the educated, and the fashionable, who are essentially vulgar. The trait does not spring from outward circumstances; it is inherent, it belongs to the man or the woman, never to their surroundings. It may exist in low life or in high life, in the cottage or the court, in the factory or the university. Nothing that is unavoidable, nothing that is honest, straightforward and natural can be vulgar. Vulgarity implies some sort of pretension, affectation, or insincerity. It is exhibited equally in two ways—by looking up with envy and by looking down with scorn; by flattery and severity, or by avoidance and contempt. It resides in those who wish to pass off for something that they are not, in those who are jealous of the rich or the fashionable, and apotheir manners, their habits, their conversation; and it is equally present in those who scorn the poor, the uneducated or the humble, and count themselves superior on the mere ground of their outward advantages. Honest ignorance is not vulgar, but conceited ignorance, that affects a knowledge it does not possess, is, and so is the pedantry that holds itself aloof from and despises those who do not happen to have the same kind of knowledge as itself. Who has not seen the supercilious and compassionate smile of a conceited young man, who has picked up a little information on some special subject, and delight to air it before those who, though perhaps wiser and better educated than himself, chance to be unacquainted with the matter in hand. Neither poverty nor wealth have, in themselves, anything to do with vulgarity; but the poverty that has no self-respect, and the wealth that has respect for nothing but itself, are equally vulgar.

There is nothing which more pointedly exhibits this trait than the eager desire to be considered genteel, and the continual effort to appear so. At the bottom of this there is always an uneasy suspicion that the result is not there, and a fear of being found out, which leads to still more strenuous exertions to deceive. But, like all counterfeit, it has not a true ring. Real refinement, real power, real worth do not seek for a foil by uttering loud contempt of what is inferior, or by drawing away in disgust from every thing coarse and commonplace. They can afford to rest upon their own merits, without trying to publish them; they look with sympathy and charity upon the short-comings of others, and are far more anxious to lend helping or uplifting hand than to disclaim acquaintance that might be thought to compromise them. The would be genteel, on the other hand, care not whom they sacrifice to their low ambition. Whoever is not in the set to which they aspire falls under the ban of their contempt. Perhaps it is a young man, nobly working his own way through college course, denying himself every luxury, dressing unfashionably and studying faithfully. There will be some of his fellow-students utterly unable to appreciate his character, who will make him a mark for their silly shafts of ridicule. Or, the butterfly-façon will look down with contemptuous pity on the noble woman who is living too important and valuable a life to leave her citadel, or desire for the frivolous occupation which satisfies their shallow souls.

Such persons show no judgment of their own, or characters, actions, beliefs or manners; they accept without a qualm the dictates of popular opinion, or rather those of the narrow clique which they either belong to or aspire to join. They watch its pulses and distribute their frowns and smiles accordingly. Their thoughts must not stray from the beaten path, their imagination must not wander into forbidden ground, their feelings must be toned down to the level of conventional politeness. They are slave without knowing it, and they lay down a their tyrant's feet all their self-love, their candor, all their originality, all their individuality. Their life is one of sham, an sham is the essence of vulgarity. Let us not mistake. The poor, the uneducated, the awkward, the unfashionable, if they but keep their simplicity of heart and independence ( nd, can never be vulgar; but all preten- sion, duplicity, all affectation, all mean cringing one class and haughty superciliousness to another, all conceit, vanity and presumption, all noting of the voice of a set or clique, in a word, all that is opposed to sincerity, truth and straightforward honesty, is not only irreverent and culpable, but intrinsically and essentially vulgar.—Public Ledger.

For Tract-Writers and Readers.

There are thousands upon thousands in England and America who so read of, and live in Christ, as to become religious in a sense, but not truly godly; believes, but not acts.

Their religion is something they bring to; not that which springs from Him by Spirit dwelling in their hearts. Christ out of them, and for them, is so writ- and preached up to them, and believed in them, that Christ with them, and in them, not known.

A Christ that saves is everywhere spoken of the Christ that crucifies, nowhere. The Ser of the Scriptures is made everything; the Holy Spirit little or nothing. He is ad- duced in theory, but little or not at all known reality.

The religion of preachers and people is more fruit of the letter of Scripture enlighten- in some measure, the understanding, than the Spirit, the Blessed-Spirit, convincing of and giving a New Heart.

A faith of man which says, "If I believe I all be saved." is prevalent, almost universal, amongst professors; while the faith which is the operation of God, and a fruit of the rit, is rarely seen, and seldom felt.

The former, which fills the understanding and engages the heart with dogmas, opinions, strines, forms, and ceremonies, is every- ere to be met with; the latter, which unites the heart to God, makes one with Christ in rit, brings a love which is unutterable, a peace which passeth understanding, is rarely anywhere to be found.

This genuine Christianity faints and droops, its Infidelity sneers, and Popery revives. But who are principally accountable to the st blessed God for this state of things?

The answer is: Half-hearted, unfaithful, appointed, man-made ministers on the one d; religious scribes and tract-writers and tributors on the other.

The former, by so preaching and living as make people "godly" without the real sion of God, who is alone the salvation of s people. The latter, by so writing that th which is of man, is taken to be that hich is of God by the Spirit, leading men perceptibly into the possession of a Chris- tianity, springing chiefly from a cultivated lterstanding, in the place of a New divine art and right spirit, the gift of God, in, and Christ Jesus our Lord.

To that both ears to hear let him hear.

There is no hearing his gracious voice, by humbling ourselves under his mighty war; then doth He make known his will, and blessed are they that hear his word, and y it; that know his will and do it.—Eliza- beth Sturdee.

Education in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

The necessity of keeping the children of Friends separate from the influences of the public schools, is felt more strongly each succeeding year; and the concern has taken such practical shape that but very few now go to schools which are not taught by members. This separation has thrown the teachers of the Society outside the influences which are at work in raising the standard and improving the quality of the teaching in the public and normal schools. The isolated position of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting through all the life of the generation which is now coming into activity and influence, has kept it from joining actively in general movements inside the Society, looking towards the same end. So that, a community by ourselves, there is danger that we will not make that progress in educational reforms, which the world around us is making, and that Friends in this vicinity will lose the position they have held from the time of William Penn until recently, of leaders in all matters relating to education. Such a loss would seriously detract from the influence we have possessed in advancing the great in- rmal reforms we have at heart, and would indirectly be prejudicial to the best interests of the Society.

To hold our position in this respect, in- fluences should be set at work to increase the general interest in the subject, to arouse the activities and enthusiasm of the teachers, and to point the way to better results, and higher motives. Such influences might take any of the following forms:

1st. A general Educational Convention, held at a convenient place and time, for all teachers of Friends' schools, for committees of such schools, and for others interested in the subject, in our Yearly Meeting. In this convention the best methods of teaching, and kindred subjects, could be discussed, and the special needs of the schools of this Yearly Meeting might be found and in part supplied.

2nd. The publication of an educational periodical, especially adapted to our wants, which should be a channel of intercommuni- cation on this subject.

3rd. Some system like the societies for "Home Study," which should encourage the prosecution of systematic study by young people after leaving school. I. S.

Sold Himself.—A story is told of a farmer who sold a load of corn. When it was weighed he slyly stepped on the scales, and then drove off to unload. When the scales was weighed off he took good care not to be in it, and congratulated himself that he had cheated the buyer by his own weight. The grain-dealer called him in, and, after figuring up the load, paid him in full. As he batted up his coat to go out, the buyer kindly asked him to smoke with him, and then talked over the crops and the prices of hogs, and the likelihood of the Maple Valley railway building up that way, till the farmer fairly squirmed in his chair with uneasiness about his chores at home. At last he could stand it no longer and said he must go. The dealer quietly said that was not to be thought of; that he had bought the farmer at full weight and paid him his own price, and that he would insist on doing as he pleased with his own property. The raiser of corn saw that he had indeed sold himself, in one sense at least. He acknowledge-d and compromised the affair. Now when he markets grain he don't stand on the scales.

Opening of an Ancient Roman Tomb.

In a letter from a Roman correspondent, which appears in the last number of the London Athenaeum, a description is given of the discovery of an ancient family tomb at the Foot of Aurelian's Wall, and within the limits of the Farnesina Gardens, close by where had recently been unearthed a palace containing a fine set of ancient frescoes.

The tomb is eighteen feet square, and it is built with huge blocks of travertine outside, with brickwork inside, coated with stucco. The doors open on the side opposite the river—that is to say, on the side facing the Janiculum. It stood, probably, on the line of an ancient road, running along the right bank of the Tiber, which road was cut by Aurelian when he enclosed the fourteenth region within his walls. Three or four steps led to the door, above which was set the inscription, engraved on a block of marble five feet long by three wide. We learn from the inscription that the beautiful mausoleum was raised in memory, and as the resting-place, of C. Sulpicius Platorinus, a "decemvir stilitibus indidandis," and of his daughter, Sulpicia Platorina, the wife of Cornelius Priscus. The room inside has a mosaic pavement, and three niches for cinerary urns on each wall. The niches are separated one from the other by bald columns of masonry, coated with marble stucco, and supporting the cornice. The niches in the centre of each wall are semi-circular, those at the corners are square.

In every one of them we have found a cinerary urn, and these cinerary urns are the most exquisite, the most elaborate, the most perfect works of the kind I have ever seen. They are all set in white Carrara marble, and their alto relievos represents festoons of fruits and flowers alternating with bulls' heads. Lovely groups of birds fly around or eat the fruit. Some of the urns are round, some square, the motive of the decoration being the same for all of them. The cover of the round ones is in the shape of a thalos, the tiles being in the shape of acanthus leaves, with a bunch of flowers on the top resembling the handle.

The reliefs on the pediments represent panoplies of various kinds. The unsealing of the urns was indeed a moment of great excitement; it was performed in the presence of a large and distinguished assembly, including the leaders of the diplomatic body and of the Roman nobility. They were found half full of water (from the last floods of the Tiber), with a bed of ashes and bones at the bottom. The contents were upset on a piece of white cloth. The first heap showed nothing valuable; the second, a large gold ring without the stone, which was found, however, within the third cinerarium, a most extraordinary coincidence.

The stone, probably an onyx, has been very much injured by the same fire which calcined the bones; still one can make out that the engraving represented an lion in repose. Nothing was found in the fourth; the fifth furnished two beautiful gold rings, slightly injured by fire, with emeralds representing a mask and the hunting of a bear. The last urn, inscribed with the name of Minasia Polla, a girl of about sixteen (as shown by the size of the bones and teeth), contained a plain hair-pin of brass and nothing else.

Having gone through the performance we came back to the tomb, and directed our men to clear up the rubbish accumulated in the centre of the cellar. Wonder after wonder! First of all came to light, the full-size marble statue of Sulpicia Platorina, a beautiful young woman, with a light veil covering the head and enveloping the upper portion of the body. The noble carriage of the figure and the general arrangement of the drapery recall to the mind the Vatican Pudicitia, even in some small particulars, as, for instance, the hand appearing under the folds of the veil. The statue is in excellent preservation. Second to appear was the marble bust of Minasia Polla, one of the most refined and carefully executed portraits ever found in Rome. She was a beauty, and the artist was worthy of her charms. Not a particle of the marble is broken or lost.

At nightfall, when workmen and spectators were preparing to leave, another and more important statue was discovered, that of the Emperor Tiberius, with the sword in the right hand, and a short drapery descending from the shoulder across the body. The statue had been crushed and split by the falling of the vaulted ceiling, but nothing is missing to restore and complete the whole.

Summing up the results of this memorable and unique excavation, we have discovered beneath a mere handful of rubbish, two inscriptions and a portion of a third, six cineraria, the marketable value of which is stated by connoisseurs to be at least ten thousand francs apiece, three gold rings, one intaglio and two camei, a mosaic pavement, a bust, and two full sized statues. The excavation is not yet complete.

It is hard to imagine and difficult to explain how this rich tomb and its treasures have escaped destruction or any sort of damage, notwithstanding their being exposed to the view for many centuries in one of the most populous and most unscrupulous quarters of the town. It is difficult to explain why the tomb had been built so very near the Tiber, and almost to the level of its waters, which must have entered the room some ten or fifteen times a year. Perhaps, when Aurelian built his wall close to the north side of the mausoleum, and raised the level of the adjoining quarter, the mausoleum itself was buried, and its treasures left untouched.

What is Conversion?—Though hearing and reading are the usual means of convincing serious minds of the religious experiences of the faithful, such aids alone cannot turn the strong tide of our propensity to evil. That wonderful change doth not consist in a mere assent to truths proposed to the understanding, but in a conversion of the will by the operation of the Holy Spirit, which alternately enlightens the mind, and mortifies the will, till the point of entire passiveness is attained, when the balm of healing mercy is poured into the soul, and produces such a determined preference of good in the mind and affections, as fully sets us free from the dominion and torment of corrupt nature. During this strife of the two seeds of grace and evil in the soul, the disposition and conduct of the patients are wavering and inconstant, and to inexperienced and superficial observers, utterly incomprehensible. They are supposed by such, and sometimes, perhaps, by themselves, to be subjects of the heavenly kingdom; whereas they are yet only approaching it; and, not having entered its strait gate, are still too much strangers to its laws and ordinances, perfectly to keep them. In this preparatory state, we our taint by our frequent miscarriages the insufficiency of man to direct his own steps; and not being yet wholly weaned from human dependences, Divine wisdom sees meet to make use of instrumental helpers for our aid and encouragement, gradually lessening and removing these, as we are able to endure the deprivation, till, at length, all those props being struck away, we appear to ourselves as utterly destitute and forsaken. Thus what was said of typical Israel is spiritually experienced by the Christian traveller;—"He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; He led him about; He instructed him; He kept him as the apple of his eye;" and what followed is fulfilled, to his unspeakable and everlasting comfort:—"As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreading abroad her wings, taketh them, and beareth them upon her wings, so the Lord alone did lead him, and (now) there is no strange God (or inferior object of dependence) with him."—Episcopal Recorder.

From the "Herald of Truth."

The Love of Money.

One form in which this root of evil is sometimes manifested is this: We often see true Christian brethren and sisters striving hard to do their duty in all things, and yet they are poor in earthly goods, and would a-tall need the assistance of those who have been more fortunate; then we hear the more favored ones say, "If those poor persons had worked and saved as we have done, they might have plenty." We have often been pained to hear Christian professors make such expressions, when it appeared as though they were seeking an excuse to ease their consciences. Thus they de-pise the poor, and glory in the works of their own hands, and not in the gift of God, who has bestowed on every man and woman as He has seen fit. It matters not how small the talent which we have received from God, if we are faithful in improving it acceptably to Him we shall be rewarded. Let us not grieve or be discontented if we are not rich; but let us be comforted with the declaration of the Apostle James where he says, "God hath chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom." God has chosen them in the world, but such as are willing to come out from among the world, and receive his word, renounce self, and follow Jesus in humility. Jesus said, "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." He does not mean here those alone who are poor in earthly goods, but the poor in spirit; those who are contented and thank God for his protection and providence to whatever extent they have been prospered; theirs is the kingdom of heaven. If those who have been blessed with this world's goods are not vain and high minded, but condescend to men of low estate, and are willing to distribute to the necessities of the saints, and walk in spiritual humility, they have an equal interest in the above promise with those who are poor in this world's goods. "He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully. Every man according as he purporth in his heart, so let him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver." 1 Cor. ix. 6, 7. "For there be first a willing mind, it is accept according to that a man hath, and not according to that he hath not."

Dear brethren and sisters, let us thank God for all that He has done for us, and be contented with the way in which He has prospered us, and deal faithfully with the man of unrighteousness, ever trusting in Jesus who hath shed his precious blood to save t

"12th mo. 6th, 1853, I went to Westport to attend the meeting of the committee he there. In the meeting of the committee Fourth-day, after getting through with t business, Samuel Bettle, Sr., remarked that was something of importance which mon could not purchase. It was that Frien should be preserved under a right exere that the Institution may be conducted in su manner as to support the primitive doctri and testimonies of Friends, and educate t children in them. This was the original concern, and it had been blessed, and he believ as Friends kept to this ground a blessi would continue to rest upon the school. I spoke in a feeling manner, and being now his eightieth year, it seemed like a legacy t to the younger members who night surri him to bear in mind in the future managemnt of the seminary. It was responded and had a good effect upon the feelings many."

Fashion and Deformity.—Professor Flow delivered a very interesting lecture on t subject at the Royal Institution, having pass in review the various methods adopted by different nations and at different ages of forming or altering the natural shape of s portion of the body in obedience to t dates of fashion. The different practices shaving, cutting and dressing the hair a beard, and tattooing the skin were allude; but more attention was given to the disfigu ment of the nose, lips, and ears by cut holes and inserting various substances thro them, almost identical customs being describ among people living at most remote regio of the world. The fantastic methods of fill and chipping the front teeth into differ patterns practised by the Malays and so African negroes were then noticed. An account of the mode of altering the form of t head, which prevailed once extensively Europe, and was almost universally adopt in Peru and on the western coast of Nor America, was followed by a description of the effects produced upon the feet of civiliz races by the unnatural form of the boots co monly worn, the evils of pointed toes a high heels being exemplified by dia grams a specimens. The construction of the wai was next noticed, the figure of the Venus Milo, and one taken from the last Pa fashion book, being compared and contrasted. All these customs were shown to arise fr a similar propensity, which manifested its the human mind under all conditions of civilization, to tamper with a form which good use, as well as good taste, ought to teach is the most perfect that could be designed. The origin of these fashions is mostly lost in security, all attempts to solve them being more than guesses. Some of them I become associated with superstitious ob- vances, and some have been vaguely thought to be hygienic, most have some relations to conventional standards of personal appear- ance; but whatever their origin, the desire to conform to common usage and not to appear singular is the prevailing motive which leads their continuance. The vitiating of taste- duced by these conventional standards which shows itself in the Malay in the per- fect of black teeth to those of the pearly- iteness, in the Bongo negro and American- oodius in liking lips and ears which are- ously and to our eyes hideously en- duced by huge wooden plugs inserted through- in, in the Chinook Indian by contempt of- y head which is not flattened like a pane- or elongated like a sugar-loaf, is displayed- ur ourselves by the admiration of un- ially pointed toes and contracted waists.

Mennonite Discipline.—At a recent Con- ference of Mennonites, for the State of Ohio, the following points were considered and the con- clusions annexed were arrived at:—

Is it right for a brother to take part in or encourage any thing that is no benefit to him but an injury to another? Ans. No, not even if it is a benefit to him. "Let no man seek his own, but every one another's wealth." I Cor. x. 24.

Should not the inconsistency of ministers allowing their members to marry out of the church, without reproof, and yet refusing to marry them, be removed? Ans. It is re- moved; it is not allowed for members to marry out of the Church.

If a brother has a note which he cannot collect has he a right to sell it? Ans. He has not.

If a brother owe a brother, and he refuses to pay, he being more able to pay than the other is to lose, what should be done? Ans. He shall pay; if not, he cannot be a brother.

If a brother or sister joins a secret society, how long can they be members of the Church and also of the secret society? Ans. Till they are admonished and have a reasonable time to withdraw.

Can anything be done in the District Con- ference that the Church may become more uniform in dress? Ans. Yes.

We should not be conformed to the world in speech, conduct or apparel, but seek for uniformity in the Church.

No brother should serve as jurymen on a criminal case; it was deemed wrong to have lightning rods on buildings, or to have property insured. We should seek to be united in the bonds of love, and bear one another's burdens. The use of musical instruments was discouraged; we should, according to the ad- monitions of the apostle, "sing and make melody unto the Lord in our hearts." We should earnestly seek to win souls to Christ. How can we do this? First by leading a holy and pious life, and giving a good example, and secondly, by admonishing sinners and reminding them of their duty and the purpose for which they were created, namely: "to glorify God." Which however we cannot do by a profession only, but by serving and worshipping in spirit and in truth.

The Universalist Convention of Ohio held its annual meeting at Blanchester, beginning 6th mo. 3rd. From the report of the Secretary it appears that there are in the State ninety-six churches, with 5,004 members, on an average of about fifty five members to a church.

South African Diamonds.—The produce of the South African mines is enormous, and the quality of the stones, which is frequently marred by a somewhat tawny complexion, is reported to be improving. Vast profits have, of course, been realized. One gentleman's "claim" is said to have cleared in two years £45,000. The new Rush mine alone yielded £3,000 a day. In 1875, when the diggers had been at work only four years, gems to the value of £3,500,000 had been extracted from it. The packets of diamonds sent by post- bag from Kimberly to Cape Town in 1876 weighed 773 pounds, and were worth £1,114,590. Nor does there seem to be any present prospect of the supply coming to an end. On the contrary, there is every reason to believe that only a very small portion of the diaman- tiferous regions of South Africa has yet been explored.—Frazer's Magazine.

Watson Smith has found tannin to exist in the leaves of the eucalyptus tree in such quantities as to promise to make the product of commercial importance if the tree becomes widely cultivated. A decoction of the leaves has been drunk as tea. The wood of the blue and red gum varieties has such qualities as will make it very desirable in the arts.

Wet House Lots.—When you see a man digging a cellar in soil which you know is overlaid by hard pan which retains the soil moisture, and will entail consumption on children reared in its cold exhalations, go to him and implore him not to do it.—Dr. George Derby.

For securing checks from fraudulent altera- tion, The Papier Zeitung recommends that the paper of which the checks are to be made be colored in the vat with ultramarine green, and that the ink used for filling the amount, and signing the check, consist of a weak solu- tion of acid. This shows white on the ultra- marine ground, and cannot be discharged without the manipulations for that purpose leaving their trace. A bank in Lyons is said to have adopted this plan of check.—British and Colonial Stationer and Printer.

The favorite lithographer's paper seems to be that made by the Chinese. It takes pre- cedence over other imported paper of its class, and has grown to be quite an important item of our trade with China.

A new metallic compound, which is adapt- able to a great variety of uses, and is likely to prove a valuable substance, has lately been brought to notice. It is called Spence's metal, and is formed by combining a metallic sulphide—iron pyrites, for instance, or other similar compound—with melted sulphur. The combination forms a liquid, which, on cool- ing, becomes a solid homogeneous mass, re- quiring a temperature of only 320 deg. to melt it, and having the properties of expand- ing on cooling, of resisting atmospheric and climatic influences, acids, alkalis, and water, and of being susceptible of a high polish.

How Not to Take Cold.—In a lecture on "Colds and their Consequences," Dr Beverly Robinson gave the following sensible sugges- tions: "A person properly clothed may walk in a strong wind for a long time without taking cold, but if he sits in a room where there is a slight draught he may take a severe cold in a very few minutes. Therefore, don't sit in a room where there is a draught. Un- less you are affected by peculiar nervous con- ditions, you should take a cold sponge bath in the morning, and not wash yourself in warm water. Plunge baths in cold water are not recommended; neither is it necessary to apply the sponge bath all over the body. Occasional Turkish baths are good, but those who have not taken them should be advised by a physician before trying them. Warm mufflers worn about the neck do not protect one against taking cold, but do not protect the face. One extreme is liable to take cold as soon as he takes them off. They make the throat tender. Ladies ought to wear warmer flannel under-clothing than they now do. People often take cold from inhaling cold air through their mouth. Ladies dress them- selves up in heavy furs, go riding in their carriages, and when they get home wonder where they got that cold. It was by talking in the cold, open air, and thus exposing the mucous membranes of the throat. The best protection under the circumstances is to keep the mouth shut. Above all, be careful of your feet in cold, damp weather. Have thick soles on your shoes, and if caught out in a rain which lasts so long as to wet through your shoes despite the thick soles, put on dry stockings as soon as you get home. But in cold, wet, slushy weather, don't be caught out without overclothes. Rubbers are unhealthy, unless care is taken to remove them as soon as you get under shelter. They arrest all evaporation through the pores of the leather. Cork soles are a good invention. When you go into the house or your office, after being out in the cold, don't go at once and stick yourself by the register, but take off your coat, walk up and down the room a little, and get warm gradually."

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 24, 1880.

The Apostle Paul declared, that leaving the things which are behind and reaching forth to those which are before, he pressed toward the mark for the prize of a heavenly crown. He often exhorted those whom he addressed to the same earnest determination to secure that inestimable prize; telling them to take to themselves the whole armor of God, even those spiritual weapons which are mighty to the destruction of all that opposes the Truth. Many are the obstacles that obstruct the progress of the Zion bound traveller, and unless there is this determined purpose to press through all, to give up all, to make the salvation of our souls the great business of life, to do as our Saviour commanded, "Seek first the Kingdom of Heaven and the righteousness thereof;" there is little hope that we shall conquer the opposing forces of the world, the flesh and the devil, conspiring to stop our progress.

Bunyan, in his Pilgrim's Progress, represents Valiant-for-Truth as being met on his journey to the Celestial City by three armed men who tried to turn him back towards the City of Destruction. Nothing daunted, he stood his ground and boldly fought against all three. When one afterwards said to him, it was great odds, three against one—he replied, "This true; but little or more are nothing to him that has the truth on his side." "Though an host should encamp against me," said one, "my heart shall not fear; though war shall rise against me, in this will I be confident." He further said that he cried for succor to his King, "who," he added, "I knew could hear me, and afford invisible help, and that was enough for me."

The same lesson of the need of an earnest purpose is taught in another part of the same book, where the Interpreter showed Christian a beautiful palace which many persons desired to enter, but were afraid to encounter the armed men who stood about the door to prevent them from going in. At last a man of a very stout countenance put an helmet on his head, and drawing a sword rushed toward the door upon the armed men, who laid upon him with deadly force; but the man not at all discouraged, fell to cutting and hacking most fiercely; and after he had received and given many wounds to those that attempted to keep him out, he cut his way through them all, and pressed forward into the palace, where he was received with the message—

"Come in, come in,
Eternal glory thou shalt win."

The earnest, yet humble follower of Christ, has the never-fading source of strength which Valiant-for-Truth found effectual in his deadly combat. He can cry unto his King, who he knows can hear him and afford help. The Lord on high, who knows the secrets of every heart, is ever mindful of his people, and He will never desert those who are sincerely striving to walk in the footsteps of the flock of his companions. He is an ever-present Helper in the time of trouble. "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so is the Lord round about his people, from henceforth even forever."

May He stimulate us to greater earnestness and zeal in working out our salvation, in true dependence on his help; and fill us with more ardent concern for the spread of his kingdom among men, so that both by example and precept, we may hold forth the inviting language, "Come and let us go up to the house of the Lord, to the mountain of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The business failures in the United States for the first half of 1880, number 2497, with liabilities amounting to thirty-three millions of dollars. For the same period last year the liabilities were sixty-five millions; for the first six months in 1878, 130 millions. In the Dominion of Canada a similar decrease in the number of failures is reported. The total value of the wheat trade in this country now amounts to 3,000 per day. Of this number the large manufacturing of the United States produce 1500 a day, viz: The Waltham factory 750; the Elgin 500; Springfield, Ill. 80; Hampden Water Watch Company 30; Howard 20; Lancaster 50; Rochester 70, and others are produced by smaller establishments.

The statement of the Treasury Department shows the total amount of paper and fractional silver currency outstanding in the United States at the close of the fiscal year, 6th mo. 30th, to be $755,322,556. This is higher than at any time since 1879; and the highest total of any time reached was $983,318,685, in 1865. At the beginning of the rebellion the total was $207,102,477—all State bank circulation.

In the debt refunding operations there have thus far been refunded into 5's, 4's and 4's, $1,395,347,800 bearing a higher rate of interest than the 4's now due. The total annual interest charge for the debt. The total annual interest charge is now $79,633,981; at its highest point, 8th mo. 31st, 1865, the annual charge was $150,977,037. The debt which was $2,756,431,571, is now reduced to $1,919,329,747.

The Report of the Commissioner of Agriculture shows an advance of about 8 per cent. in the price of farming and timbered lands, taking the average for the whole country. The timbered lands show a tendency to appreciate in value more rapidly than the cleared lands.

Captain Payne and twenty-two men, trespassers in the Indian Territory, were sentenced by courts on the 14th inst., and turned over to Colonel Robinson.

It is estimated that the value of the products of the various manufacturing of Philadelphia, for the present year, will reach $600,000,000. Textile fabrics of various kinds will contribute more than one-sixth of the whole.

The exports from Philadelphia during last month were $5,031,591; one-half of which went to Great Britain, and one-tenth was carried in American vessels. The number of deaths in this city during the past week was 496. Of the whole number, 28 were under 15; 275 children; 174 being under one year of age. Some of the principal causes of death were consumption; 48; convulsions, 29; cholera infantum, 101; typhoid fever, 19; marasmus, 33; old age, 15; paralysis, 11.

In New York the death rate for the past six months was 25.26 per thousand.

FOREIGN.—On the 15th inst., a violent explosion occurred in the London and Southern Wales Colliery Co. Newport. It is supposed that 119 men were in at the time, and it is not expected that any can survive. It is believed that the explosion was caused by lightning striking the winding gear at the top of the shaft. Only 17 bodies have yet been recovered. The explosion involving loss of live stock, damage to various crops, and some loss of life.

The reports of famine fever in parts of Ireland said to be much exaggerated. Inquiries on the subject show it to be ordinary typhus, and the deaths are few. The return of imports and exports for the first six months of the year, show an increase over a year of 171,000,000 francs in the imports, and 58,000,000 francs in the exports. The Minister of Finance states that the Treasury will be able during the current year to redeem 167,000,000 francs worth of Treasuries.

The French have under consideration the building of a ship canal from Bordeaux to Narbonne. The cost of construction is estimated at 75,000,000 francs.

The Government sends instructions to its representatives abroad authorizing them to assist with funds any and every unannounced Communist residing able and unable, for want of money, to return to France. The Senate and Chamber of Deputies have been rogued.

Russia.—The Americans who went out to invest in the iron and coal projects in Southern Russia, in fact failed at St. Petersburg and were received with similar favor by the Czar.

The Russian General Kaufman has been ordered Eastern Siberia with 14,000 men, to clear the district infested by brigands and Chinese immigrants.

Turkey.—The Albanians have attacked the Montenegrin forces, and have attacked the Montenegrin garrisons at divers points, and fighting is reported. It is the Porte encourages the resistance of the Albanians. There seems but little prospect of a speedy settlement of the boundary question.

China.—The British and Pekin announce that Ching Ho's sentence has been remitted, and that the Government has abandoned the idea of going to war with Russia.

For "The Friend"

Thomas Wilson.

Thomas Story says in his journal, that when London in 1693, "I became nearly united the divine love and life of Truth, with my much esteemed friend, Thomas Wilson, who was to me the most able and powerful minister of the Word of life in the age." He soon attended in his company a meeting at Ford, "Where," T. Story says, "we had a noblest and most profitable meeting; for though many the Collegians were there, who used to be in an extraordinary manner, yet the inestimable power of the Word of life being over me at that time, they were quiet under the ministry thereof in the autoprivative ministry of Thomas Wilson; whose voice was as thunder from the clouds, with words penetrating as lightning." He adds, "Many of us were struck with amazement and surprise, and their eyes were filled with tears." "I would be easy to multiply the testimonies of those who knew him, to the worth and efficacy of this valuable minister of the gospel."

Many such are prefixed to the brief account of his life and travels, which he left behind him, and which was published in the year 1728. Some extracts from this it is hoped will prove interesting and instructive to the readers of "The Friend."

Thomas Wilson was born in Cumberland, England, and brought up in the profession of the Church of England. He says: "While as a youth, I had great hungerings and thirstings in my heart after righteousness, and the true knowledge of the living God, and his Son, Jesus Christ, in which time I went about great diligence to hear the priests; and yet more, did carefully mind what was spoken. And when I heard of a priest that was noted for a good man, and preached two sermons in one day, I went from our own parish, after the forenoon sermon, eight miles foot to hear an afternoon sermon. The more I sought to hear, my inward hunger and thirst more increased, so that I was sensible great poverty of spirit; and in the time of singing Psalms, a thoughtfulness came into my heart, that men should be made holy by the things they could rightly sing to the praise and glory of God. My mouth was stopped from speaking with them, through a godly sorrow that was in my heart, with secret cries and humble prayers to the living Lord God of heaven and earth, for the knowledge of the way of salvation; but being yet in the wilderness of men's doctrines, creeds, articles and outward forms, I could not find true peace in conscience, nor see any bright beams of salvation, in which state I travelled in great godly sorrow, having religious seekings in my heart, and being weary of the heavy load of sin, as also the doctrines and worship of men's making. My mind was much inclined to dispute about religion with all sorts of professors that I met with, yet still could not meet with or find inward peace of conscience; but many texts of Holy Scripture were opened to my understanding, so that I began to see, what was not of faith was sin, even in points of worship and pretended service to the great God, and Saviour Jesus Christ, to the scribes and Pharisees, formerly, 'Ye hypocrites, well did Esaias prophesy of you, saying, This people draweth length into me with their mouth, and honoreth me with their lips; but their heart is far from me. But in vain they do worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men.'

Thus being made sensible that too many of the doctrines of the church wherein I was created, were precepts of men's making, and that our blessed Lord and heavenly Saviour had said to the woman of Samaria, at Jacob's well, "The hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship Him: God is a spirit, and they that worship Him, must worship Him in spirit and in truth;" this worship, in the renewings of the Holy Ghost, and not in the oldness of the letter, I greatly longed to know, but could not find it, neither could any priest I conversed with, tell me how or where to find it. But after long travel of spirit and great concern of soul, the Lord was graciously pleased to make me sensible that what was to be known of God was manifest in man; about which time I went into an evening meeting of the people called Quakers, with strong desires in my mind to the Lord, that if it was the true way of salvation which the Quakers preached, I might have some inward feeling and testimony thereof, by the blessed word in my own heart. After sitting some time in silence, a Friend began to speak, directing and exhorting to an inward waiting upon the Lord in faith, to receive power from Him over every unclean thought, by which heavenly power they might glorify and praise the holy name of the Lord, through the ability of his own free gift.

This I understood to be his holy word of grace, which the true apostles of our dear Lord and blessed Saviour, Jesus Christ, preached, and turned the minds of people unto, and then I felt my soul much in love therewith; and smiting upon my breast, said in my heart, This is what I greatly wanted: that is, power against every vain thought and idle word, (being things that troubled me) the Lord's power arose in the meeting, and fell mightily upon me, to the breaking and tendering of my heart, and a glorious time it was, as the mighty day of the Lord; so that great fear and trembling and shaking seized me, inasmuch that the table whereon I leaned was shaken. Thus being sensible in some measure of the glorious name and power of the Lord Jesus, I was full of inward cries to this effect; O Lord! create in me a clean heart; for I saw the old one was not clean, and that I had been kissing the letter, but not the Son, as advised by the Holy Scriptures, which saith, 'Kiss the Son, lest he be angry;' &c.

Now was a time of the Lord's fierce anger because of sin. He showed me all things that ever I had done, and condemned the evil; so I was made willing to love and dwell under his righteous judgments, being truly convinced it was the way to come unto the mercy-seat. Then it was upon my mind, that I must cease from all the doctrines of men, will worship, hearing the priests, and repeating their sermons, which I had delighted in and was in the practice of as religious duties; it being made plain to me that I should turn from them, and mind the gift which was in me, and sit down among Friends in their silent meetings, to wait upon the Lord in retiredness of mind, for his heavenly teachings and holy leadings. In the performance of inward, divine and heavenly worship, the great power of God did wonderfully break in among us, and many young people were convinced of the inward work of God, and turned to the Lord with all their hearts. The meeting, in general, became very tender and heavenly minded, and Friends had great love one to another, the heart-melting power of the Lord being much felt and inwardly revealed, when no words were spoken by either man or woman. In this state we travelled in the silence of all flesh, in which times the Lord often renewed our strength in the inward man, so that we knew and experienced what the apostle exhorted the primitive Christians unto, even Christ to dwell in us by faith. The renewings of the Holy Ghost increased, and were shed on us abundantly in our meetings, whereby some were so filled, that they were concerned to declare and preach the things of the Kingdom of God, and what He had done for their souls. One of the first that came forth in prayer and supplication to the Lord, was William Greenup, and I was the next that came forth there in testimony, which was in very great fear and much trembling. The word of the Lord, in and through me, was as a devouring fire, burning against all sin and iniquity; and the Lord made us cry aloud to turn people from all vain worship, to the living God, that is a Holy Spirit; and the precious life of Jesus broke in wonderfully amongst us, so that we felt drawn to visit other meetings in the country, wherein the Lord's heavenly power was plentifully enjoyed amongst us, and several convinced of the Truth, who turned to the Lord with all their hearts, and joined with Friends; particularly in our own meeting, whereby it was enlarged. I was often very much affected in feeling the love and power of God break through the whole meeting, and many such heavenly meetings we had, and the word of the testimony in the Lord's ministers increased amongst us. I then found further drawings to other counties, and visited the meetings of Friends in Lancashire and Westmoreland.

In the year 1682, it was upon me from the Lord to visit Friends in some parts of Ireland. I took shipping at Workington, and landed at Dublin, where I was altogether a stranger; but after I had staid a meeting amongst Friends, they inquired which way I intended to go; I told them I had a desire to see some Friends who dwelt between the West and North. A Friend answered, he did not think there was such a place inhabited by Friends, or to that effect, but if I would see Friends, I must go North or South, which brought great trouble upon my mind, and I became very low in spirit, questioning in myself whether I was not mistaken in that which I thought was the Lord's powerful opening in my heart, showing me both the place and people, and wherein I thought I had the mind of Christ, in the holy vision of life. The cries of my heart were great unto the Lord in secret why I was mistaken; but after some time a living hope sprang in me that I was not mistaken, and that the Friends lay as I had seen.

A Friend, named Abraham Fuller, spoke kindly to me, and said he lived near the middle of Ireland, and if I would go with him, we might get a meeting amongst Friends at Edenderry, and I had much peace in going with him. We had a blessed meeting with Friends at Edenderry; and next day travelling towards Lehinche, where he dwelt, he asked me if I understood the compass, I told him no, and that I had not seen any compass in all my life, but that in the ship wherein I came to Dublin. He was then very cheerful, and lovingly said, he remembered that I had said in Dublin, I would go between the West and North, which now, said he, I see is true, for we go even as thou then said; at which I was truly thankful to the Lord, who never fails to be gracious, and his blessed word is infallible. For then I, like Samuel, knew it was the word of the Lord that called me into his work and service, and showed me these things before I went from home. We came cheerfully on our way until we got to Lehinche, and thence to the Moate, where we had a blessed heavenly meeting; so to Mountmelick, and had a meeting there, and thence to James Hutchinson's, and from thence to the Province Meeting at Castledermot.

This Province Meeting was large, and divers able Friends in the ministry were there; but I was very low in my mind, and did not go up into the gallery, but sat down a little within the door, and many people came in, so that the place about where I sat was much thronged, it being a time that the rabble sort of people were very rude. Several such were there that day, and I being under great exercise of spirit, the powerful word of the Lord filled my heart, so I stood up and preached the gospel in the demonstration of the Spirit and power that was upon me. The rude rabble were astonished and became very quiet, and the Lord's heavenly power did shine forth gloriously; under a weighty sense thereof the meeting held and concluded. This meeting brought me into acquaintance with Friends to whom I had before been a stranger, notwithstanding I understood afterwards they were afraid, when I stood up, that my appearance would have been hurtful, but it proved otherwise, to their great satisfaction."

The Opium Question.

The great national inquiry involved in the virtual forcing on the Chinese nation of opium, by Great Britain, induced Friends of London Yearly Meeting at its recent session to lay before the Government a protest on this subject. This was followed on the 4th of Sixth Month by a speech in Parliament by J. W. Pease, in which he called the attention of the House of Commons to the facts relating to the revenue derived from the cultivation and sale of opium and its introduction into China, and urged the Government to take steps for gradually withdrawing from the traffic. This speech led to a debate on the opium question—which is thus commented on in the National Baptist of this city.

"The history of the opium question is one of the most painful stories in the annals of Great Britain. In East India, the East India Company held the monopoly of opium; that is, all who raised it were obliged to sell to the company. When the company ceased to exist, and the control of India passed into the hands of the Government, in 1858, or thereabouts, we presume that this monopoly passed to the Government, and it is now held and used by them.

The Government having bought up the opium on its own terms, next sells it to the traders, who in their turn import it into China.

But about forty-five years ago, the Chinese Government was anxious to put a stop to the trade in opium: 'Whether,' says H. Martineau, 'the motives of the Government were philanthropic or politic, whether it mourned over the popular intemperance in opium smoking, or feared the effect of a constant and increasing drain of its silver currency, does not affect the question.' The Chinese Government, as it had a perfect right, forbade the trade in opium. Yet the drug continued to be brought in by smugglers in vast quantities. At last, the Government of China, after very long forbearance, seized the opium which had thus been smuggled contrary to law, and destroyed it.

Capt. Elliott, who was in command of the British naval forces, espoused the cause of the smugglers. The Chinese were attacked, and the Chinese war was begun, if that can be called a 'war' in which there was no resistance worthy of mention. The helpless Chinese could obtain peace only by paying $21,000,000 for the expenses of the war, and $6,000,000 for the smuggled opium which they had destroyed. Free access to opium was also henceforth allowed.

H. Martineau says: "Whichever way we look at this affair, there is no comfort—at least for those who cannot be comforted with dollars or pride in our warlike resources and experience. We are hated in China, not only as their conquerors, but for our forcing upon their society the contraband drug which they would have kept out of the reach of the intemperate of their people—by means which we may laugh at, but which they had a right to adopt. It is an humbling story; and the wonder to future generations will be, how we bear the shame of it so easily as we do."

The East Indian Government, which is the course the British Government, now derives annually a revenue of $35,000,000 from the opium raised in India, and forced upon the Chinese. Samuel Laing, Member of Parliament, formerly Finance Minister in India, in an article in The Nineteenth Century for January says: 'The question of opium is one of the main-stays of Indian finance.'

It is a matter of some gratification to observe that no one ventures to defend the morality of the basis on which the revenue is raised. The Times, not a paper endowed with an excess of scrupulousness, in allusion to the debate says:

"It is humiliating to be reminded that the Indian revenue "is becoming more and more dependent upon poisoning the Chinese." A sense of shame is stirred by the thought that "three in a generation have objectionable treaties been forced upon them at the point of the bayonet." The confessed stagnation of missionary efforts is obviously to be explained by the fact that the people judge British sincerity in inviting them to enter the Christian fold, by the persistency with which the British Empire deadens and paralyzes their energies. The defence of the particular mode in which the revenue is levied is an avowal of the evil consequences connected with its source. It is alleged as a cogent argument for preserving that specific excise arrangement that, were it changed, 'our dominions in India would be flooded with cheap opium, to the demoralization of our own subjects.' The plea against tempting the people of India to take the drug, comes still from a government which forces it down the throats of Chinamen.

The Nonconformist and Independent, in allusion to the debate says:

"Not a single speaker [with the exception of Prof. Fawcett] attempted to defend the opium trade as a satisfactory source of revenue, and even the Postmaster-General contented himself with the very doubtful analogy of our home taxes on the drink traffic. Gladstone, with that frank adherence to formal utterances in which he never fails, even when candidly explaining the necessity for acting in an opposite sense in office, acknowledged that he had once "denounced in the strongest terms the opium trade," and assured the House that he is still "the last man to deny that it is a difficult and most painful question." Even the Marquis of Hartington, though the studiously cold and prudent tone of his speech called forth a natural protest from Dr. Cameron and A. Sullivan, plainly acknowledged that if he had had to consider the morality of the question alone, he would have found the opium revenue indefensible. He was scarcely justified in taunting its opponents of the trade with their "character morality," for they are mainly to be found amongst classes of men who have usually not been slow to make any sacrifices required by their principles. However, the upshot of the argument, and those of his supporters, always excepting Fawcett, was that the opium traff-

th the policy toward China entailed by it, bad beyond all justification, except by the act of necessity. It produces about £7,000,000. India has not sixpence to spare; and a mode can be imagined of supplying the deficit of the opium revenue except impossible contributions from English taxation. That in effect the state of the case as put by the Ministry. And we have no hesitation in saying that it ought to cover with shame and humiliation every member of the imperial class which boasts of India as its proudest conquest.

Americans have no right to set themselves up as judges upon the sins of other nations; they have enough sins of our own to weep over. But we can and we ought to hope and pray that our brethren in blood and tongue of faith may be enabled to rise to the height of looking at this great moral question, and, as an act of obedience to God, and justice to man, put from them this great sin. We are confident that the generation of statesmen now at the head of affairs would not have forced this unjust constraint upon China, if they rightly continue the injustice? Gladstone, Bright, and Foster have been inconstant for fidelity to their convictions. It is moral power, the preference for the right over the expedient, in which has lain the mental greatness of Gladstone. He has an opportunity now to crown his great life with the greatest of all its victories. We trust that there will be given to him the courage, the faith, the wisdom needed for the exigency. We believe that there is always a way leading into the right, if we but are determined to find it. It is possible that the land now devoted to the raising of opium, might be set apart for the raising of food, and that a remedy might be found for the desolating famine that has ravaged East India, and made it a burden Great Britain.

We trust that the great Minister will go down to posterity as the man who summoned his countrymen to be just even at the risk of clinging to their own burdens; and that his name will be uttered with gratitude by the Christians of Bulgaria, by the Afghans, by the Chinese, by the Brahmin, by the tenants of England, by the cotters of Scotland, by the Irish peasants, by the oppressed of all nations and all lands."

The Lord doth show unto man his thoughts, I discovereth all the secret workings in a man. A man may be brought to see his evil thoughts, running mind, and vain imaginations, and may strive to keep them down, and keep his mind in; but he cannot overcome them, nor keep his mind within to the Lord. In this state and condition submit to the will of the Lord, which will discover them, I will bring to wait upon Him, and destroy them. Therefore stand in the faith of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is the author of the true faith, and mind Him; for He will discover the root of lusts, evil thoughts, and vain imaginations, and how they are begotten, conceived, and bred; then how they are brought forth, and how every evil member doth work. I will discover every principle from its own source and root.

To mind the faith of Christ, and the anointing which is in you, to be taught by it, which will discover all workings in you; and as He telleth you, so obey and forsake: else you will not grow up in the faith, nor in the life of Christ, where the love of God is received.—George Fox.

True Ministry and its Source.

In reply to some charges made against Friends by a minister of Durham, Francis Howgill says:—

"None knows the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son reveals Him; and that Gospel that we preach, we neither received it of man nor from man, but by immediate revelation; and unto this the Scriptures witness. I know prophets and ministers of Christ, which were shepherds and gatherers of Summer fruit, and husbandmen at the plow, and the same call as ever was. God is not bound up to your trade of divination and study; and by these which are base in your eyes shall you be confounded."

"As for learning, I own it in its place; but that it makes and breeds able ministers, I deny it and all those ministers; for many filthy frogs and unclean spirits have come out of the universities, that have spread over the nations as locusts without a king; and all their preaching and their sacraments are carnal, and all their ability that is got by their trading leads people to be sevenfold more the children of the devil; I speak what I was a witness of while I followed the chiefest of them."

In "The Fiery Darts of the Devil quenched," the same writer says:—All the holy men of God and Apostles were not ministers by the will of man, but contrary to the will of man; and all who are made ministers of man and by man, we deny; and the Scripture denies them; for what they preached they neither received it of man, nor from man, but by the revelation of Jesus Christ; and all who have and are made ministers by hearsay and what they have formed up in their imaginations from the Scripture, with their points and their doctrines which they raise up in their carnal minds, all such we declare against."

In a "Lamentation for the Scattered Tribes," Francis Howgill addressed a class of persons of whom he says:—"You have no gift, but [that] acquired by long raking in the letter, and the exercise of your carnal wit and knowledge in contention and strife. You have treasured up a great deal of stuff in the earthly memory, and this you call a gift of the Spirit; and such an one you make a pastor or an apostle of, and he begets into his image, but still in the curse, and makes proselytes in the same likeness, leads into sorts and opinions from the true gift of God; for who hath a gift, it exercises him first, and then he declares unto others of those things which the gift of God hath wrought in him; and he that knows the gift of God is led out of his own way, will and time, into his will from whence it comes; and here is the ministry Christ always blessed, not in their own wills, but in his will."

In his tract, "The Glory of the true Church discovered," he calls the attention of his readers to the fact those first selected by our Saviour to be ministers of the glad tidings of the gospel, were illiterate men, "and their ability stood in the Spirit, where the ability of all the ministers of Christ now standeth." "They desired not to be approved in that wisdom which man's wisdom teacheth, but in the wisdom which is from above."

If Heaven is lost, all is lost.

Signal Lights.

I once knew a sweet little girl called Mary. Her father was the captain of a big ship, and she sometimes went with him to sea; and it was on one of these trips that the following incident happened.

One day she sat on a coil of rope watching old Jim clean the signal lamps.

"What are you doing?" she asked.

"I am trimming the signal lamps, miss," said old Jim.

"What are they for?" asked Mary.

"To keep other ships from running into us, miss; if we do not hang out our lights, we might be wrecked."

Mary watched him for some time, and then she ran away and seemed to forget all about the signal lights; but she did not, as was afterwards shown.

The next day she came and watched old Jim trim the lamps, and after he had seated her on the coil of rope, he turned to do his work. Just then the wind carried away one of his cloths, and old Jim began to swear awfully.

Mary slipped from her place and ran into the cabin, but she soon came back and put a folded paper into his hand.

Old Jim opened it, and there, printed in large letters—for Mary was too young to write—were these words: "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain."

The old man looked into her face, and asked: "What is this, Miss Mary?"

"It is a signal light, please. I saw that a bad ship was running against you, because you did not have your signal lights hung out, so I thought you had forgotten it," said Mary.

Old Jim bowed his head and wept like a little child. At last he said: "You are right, missy, I had forgotten it. My mother taught me that very commandment when I was no bigger than you; and for the future I will hang out my signal lights, for I might be quite wrecked by that bad ship, as you call those ouths."

Old Jim has a large Bible now which Mary gave him, and on the cover he has printed, "Signal Lights for Souls bound to Heaven."

Superintendence of Providence.

One of the strong consolations which the true Christian enjoys, is derived from the belief that an all-wise and merciful Providence is continually watching over him, and directing the course of his temporal affairs in such a manner as shall make them all ultimately work together for his good. We are taught in the Holy Scriptures, that this special care is extended even to the minute affairs of good men—that the very hairs of their heads are all numbered—and that so universal and so particular is the superintendence of the great Creator, that not a sparrow falleth to the ground without his notice.

Intimately connected with this doctrine is that of the restraining influence of Divine Grace on the mind, secretly checking us when we are reaching forward to objects which are not proper for us to go into, or which if attained, would be prejudicial to our religious growth. The secret hand unseen by mortal eye, is often stretched forth to preserve us from dangers of which we are unconscious, and is no less kind and beneficent when it withholds us from engaging in schemes to which we look with the fondest anticipations of pleasure, than when it shields us from some impending storm of adversity and sorrow, which threatens to burst upon us. To bow in cheerful submission, when it arrests us in the prosecution of extensive and profitable business, and turns us away from the avenues to wealth which seem opening before us, requires the exercise of great self-denial, yet all those who yield in faith to its guidance, will find their truest interests as well as their substantial happiness greatly promoted.

HEAVENLY TREASURES.

We have treasures, heavenly treasures,
Not of earthly mould;
Purest joy unmix'd with sadness,
Glories yet untold;

Thoughts that know a higher centre
Than this changing sphere;
Thoughts that wake the sweetest music
To the spirit's ear;

Conscious presence of that Father,
Whose kind love has given
All we hold as best and dearest,
Loved of earth and heaven;

Light, to cheer the darkened vision;
Strength, the storm to brave;
Hope, to lure us to that haven;
Grace, to bless and save;

Faith, to point the way to glory,—
By the cross it leads;
Meek-eyed Mercy, softly weeping,
For the erring pleads;

Pardoning goodness most unbounded,
Comforter and guide,
Kind reprover of all evil;
Blessings multiplied;

Eye, that drops not in soft slumber;
Ear, that hears our cries;
Arm of strength, and Hand of wisdom
Every want supplies;

Love, a Saviour's benediction;
Free salvation near,
Sanctifying each affliction
We may have to bear.

These are treasures—Heavenly treasures,
Free from moth and rust,
These increase the gifts and talents
We hold but in trust.

God has every means afforded,
Sent His only Son,
To restore the wandering children,
Save the straggling one.

Not a heavenly treasure wanting
That He will not give;
Even died because He loved us,
Died that we might live.

We have other heavenly treasures,
Beautiful and bright,
Spirits of the true and faithful,
Passed to realms of light.

Watch they from the shining portals
O'er their loved ones yet?
Ah! the pure and white-robed angels
Never can forget.

Our's the grief—the heart's sad aching—
Years of untold pain;
Their's the joy—the soul's awaking,
Their's—eternal gain.

They are ours as dear as ever,
Only gone before,
Treasures that have power to guide us,
Where we part no more.

THE GATE.

Selected.

O strong-barred gate,
Open to me!
On the other side
Such joy I see!
None ever weary,
None are crossed;
Even the thought
Of pain is lost.

I prayed in vain
Before the gate;
I watched and wept
Early and late,
I watched and wept
From sun to sun;
At last I said:
"Thy will be done."

Said it in truth,
And turn'd away
To do God's will
From day to day;
"One farewell look,
My wish, to thee,"
Behold, the gate
Was open to me!

THE THRUSH'S NEST.

Selected.

BY JOHN CLARE.

Within a thick and spreading hawthorn bush
That overhung a mole-hill large and round,
I overheard, from morn to morn, a thrush
Sing hymns of rapture, while I drank the sound
With joy,—and oft, an untrusting guest,
I watched her secret toils from day to day;
How true she warped the moss to form her nest,
And model'd it within wood and clay.
And by-and-by, like heath bells gilt with dew,
There lay her shining eggs, as bright as flowers,
Ink-spotted over shells of green and blue;
And there I witnessed in the summer's hours
A brood of Nature's minstrels chirp and fly,
Glad as the sunshine and the laughing sky.

THE EVENING RAINBOW.

Selected.

Arch of promise, in the evening sky,
Thou shinest fair, with many a lovely ray,
Each in the other melting. Much mine eye
Delights to linger on thee: for the day,
Changeful, and many-weather'd, seemed to smile,
Flashing brief splendor through the clouds awhile,
Which deepened dark anon and fell in rain:
But pleasant it is now to pause and view
Thy various tints of frail and watery hue,
And think the storm shall not return again.
Such is the smile that piety bestows
On the good man's pale cheek, when he in peace
Departing gently from a world of woes,
Anticipates the world where sorrows cease.
—Sauthey.

We may be deeply afflicted in view of the desolations of Zion; but let us ever remember and rejoice, that the cause of truth and holiness is lodged safely in the hands of God. With him a thousand years are as one day; and in the darkest moments, when Satan seems to be let loose with ten-fold fury, let us thank God and take courage, because the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth.

It is one among the pious and valuable maxims, which are ascribed to Francis de Sales: "A judicious silence is always better than truth spoken without charity." The very undertaking to instruct or censure others, implies an assumption of intellectual or moral superiority. It cannot be expected, therefore, that the attempt will be well received, unless it is tempered with a heavenly spirit. "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."—T. C. Upham.

Ghost Stories.

Some young people are fond of ghost stories and sometimes are frightened as they hear them. A cold chill runs through their veins and perhaps they dream of them at night and wake up with a start, ready to fancy a sort of strange things. Well, I, too, like sometimes to hear or read a ghost story, but I always like to hear the explanation of it for I believe that in every case an explanation might be given, if it could only be found out. I have been induced to think of this especially lately by the following circumstances.

I have come, with my wife and young family, to reside in an old-fashioned house. It is situated in the country, and surrounded by fields, gardens, and trees.

One night, soon after we had got comfortably settled into it, I was awakened by mysterious creaking sound, as if some door in our room was being slowly opened; and yet it hardly seemed quite like the noise of one of the bedroom doors. My wife awoke at the same moment, and we both asked "What is it?" We searched for matches, but they were not in their accustomed place, and it was some time before they could be found; but then in a moment the mystery was explained. It was the cat, who had secreted herself in a wardrobe, and had pushed the doors open to let herself out! We soon turned her out of the room, and went to sleep again; but, as it seemed to us, almost immediately afterwards, we were awakened by another mysterious sound—a deliberate rapping sound, where downstairs—we could not tell exactly where—not like the rapping of a knocker on a door, but a hollow, muffled, curious kind of sound. It went on—rap, rap, rap. What could it be? We could not imagine. I got up, and looked about the house, and called the dog from the kitchen, but could see nothing. The sound ceased as I got up, and we were glad to find that it was not renewed, and soon we went to sleep again.

Next day we thought and spoke of the mysterious sound, but no explanation of it could be given, until, at night, just as I was looking round the house, and seeing that it was safely bolted and locked, I passed by the hat-stand in the hall, and suddenly remembered that some time ago, in our former house, our dog used to pull down the cloaks hanging upon the stand, in the middle of the night, to make himself an extra bed, and that in doing he had made a rapping sound which several times had awakened us, and was something like the sound which we had heard that night before; but then, he had been repeatedly punished for the trick, and had entirely given it up; was it possible that he had recommenced it in this our present house? I took hold of the hat stand and pulled it out and fro. Yes, with a hard pull it hit against the wall, and made a rapping sound. It was the dog then; but, to make assuredly sure, I placed a stick, well balanced upon the top of the stand, which would fall with a loud noise if the stand were shaken and then retired to rest. Sure enough, in the middle of the night, a loud noise resounded through the hall proclaimed the fact that the cunning animal had been at his old trick again, and it was he who was to blame for the mysterious ghost-like sounds.

"Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror of night." How sweet is this promise! This appears so different to us at night to what by day. Sounds which would be almost inaudible by day are distinctly heard at night, and things are mysterious and alarming at night which are not at all mysterious alarming by day. I have read of a young hero, who fought and risked his life at Waterloo, that he was not nearly so much alarmed by the sights and sounds of that tremendous battle as he was a few nights afterwards by strange noise in his bed-chamber, in an old encephal farm-house. Something came creeping along the room, and up to the side of his bed. His hair stood on end with fright, and he grasped his sword, and struck with it lightly right and left, but soon he was misled by hearing a poor pussy's "mew" was a kitten, who had found her way into a warrior's room, and had given him this terrible fright.

Yes, the strong sometimes become weak, and the courageous timid; but, if we fear, we have really no reason to fear anything else, for in darkness or in light, in danger or in safety, in life or death, He will be near to protect and preserve us.—Ep. words.

God's Own Medicine.

The restorative influence of even a few hours spent in the fresh air on lake or river bay or sea, is beyond all account. A lady highly standing, speaking at one of the lately meetings of the Assembly of the Philadelphia Charity Organization, said (in substance):

A few summers ago, I had a little child very ill. There seemed no hope of its recovery. My husband urged that we should take it out a day on the river. I objected to it, but insisted. When we started, I fully expected to bring back a dead baby. But he came to revive as soon as we were on the boat, and came home much improved. At night, when he was put in his crib, he fell to sleep in a natural and easy position, the first time in weeks. And from that kept on amending till he was quite well.

On a day on the river or on the bay is worth much to those who have a pleasant home, airy rooms and every comfort that wealth can supply, what must it be to the poor, and especially to children, in our crowded alleys, blind courts, walled in on every side, with only a low, narrow door for entrance, and with all manner of smells and nuisances? I have mentioned to us one case among the poor families that she visited, where there were five persons in a room, in which they lived and ate and slept and cooked. At night, they had all the doors and windows open; and a part of them had to keep awake their few little goods should be stolen.

Now the moral of it all is, if you are one of most stay-at-homes, go away now and then, and get a breath of air and a change of the shore, or on the bay for a day. And more, send your children. If the children are restless and irritable, and have lost their appetites, if the baby does not sleep, if the punting, and if their toil-worn mother does not rest with them by night or by day, then take a day on the water or at the beach, or among the hills. Let them put up their beds, and take an early start in the cool morning, and take one of the boats up or down the river, and be gone all day. They will come back sun-browned and tired; but they will sleep better, and they will show the good effect of the trip for days and weeks. It may cost you something; but not near so much as a doctor's bill, and not half so much as an undertaker's charges.

Have't you a dollar, or five of them, that you want to send to Eliza S. Turner, Chadd's Ford, Delaware Co., Penn., to use for the Children's Week? And if you are a farmer, or have a house in the country, can't you offer a home for a week or two, to one or two or three of the little pining children in the city, that need, not medicine, but air and light and green grass and the shade of trees and the breath of the pines and the kinships of nature?

How is it about your washerwoman, the colored widow with two children? Have they had any outing this summer? Can you not be their Providence, and look after them?

Remember that the death-roll in Philadelphia for the last week in June numbered 609, twice as many as the same week of last year. Of these, about half were children.—Selected.

The Cost of Repudiation.

Honesty the best Policy.

The Inquirer says; It seems that the crevasse in the Mississippi which is working such havoc among the plantations and farms of the bottom land, was a direct, though a delayed result of repudiation. The Sny levee, in which the break occurred, was built with the proceeds of certain bonds issued under color of an act passed by the Illinois Legislature in April, 1872. The legislation was loose and irregular in form, really affording, as it was found on trial, little or no security to the unfortunate people who subscribed for the bonds. The State was not made responsible; there was no mortgage that could be fore-closed with any effect, and there was no provision for enforcing the collection of taxes to pay interest or principal. The work was held to be a "public work" by the courts, and as such, should have been protected and maintained by the public, through the machinery of the State Government; but, unhappily there has always been a strong repudiating spirit shown in the river districts of Illinois respecting the obligations incurred on account of public improvements, the Democracy making repudiation of these obligations one of the permanent planks in local platforms. This spirit was strong enough to throw overboard the levee bondholders and their claims, and in July, 1875, the interest was defaulted. It has been established in court that this levee, forty miles long, was constructed in the most substantial manner; that "its capacity for resistance was last year tested by the greatest strain of high water;" that "it fulfills all the expectations of the land owners, to whom the enjoyment of its benefits seems now permanently secured;" also, that "their lands, previously submerged during a large part of every season, have been transformed into the best agricultural lands in the State;" and that "the public health in the surrounding country has been vastly benefitted and the increased value of these lands, resulting wholly from the construction of this admirable work, exceeds its total cost many times over."

But having fully realized these benefits, according to the use of the bondholders' money, the worthy citizens determined that their borrowing the money was unconstitutional. The act under which the levee was built was illegal; the bondholders had no right to lend money under such an act, and therefore they should not be paid either principal or interest—just to teach 'em better next time, perhaps.

The default occurred five years ago, and since then the matter has been drifting through the courts; the bondholders, according to present appearances, being fated to finally lose whatever money they put into the undertaking. In the meantime, the levee has been in charge of nobody in particular, and, after five years of neglect, has, naturally enough, fallen badly out of repair. One of the heaviest floods the upper Mississippi has ever known now pours upon its weakened banks, and a break follows as a matter of course. The whole country is flooded, crops destroyed, cattle drowned, buildings undermined and floated off, railroads washed out, bridges tumbled down, and an amount of damage done that cannot be estimated until the water subsides, but that may reach millions of dollars. When the worthy repudiators come to reckon up what their losses amount to, and what it will cost to rebuild the Sny levee, perhaps they will come to the conclusion that it would have been cheaper to pay the bondholder—as their claims matured. Not to say anything about honesty in the case, an unliking to cheat a creditor sometimes costs more than it comes to.

In the meeting for discipline of the general meeting [Abington Quarterly Meeting], I was enabled to invite the young men to be faithful to the manifestations of the Light of Christ, and they would feel themselves bound to maintain the doctrines and testimonies of the gospel held by Friends, wherever they went, both great and small. Hereby they would be prepared for service in the church, and be constrained in our meetings for discipline, to speak a word in the authority of Truth, at the Master's bidding, to the business before their meetings. They would feel it a religious duty to support the discipline, and to stand for the blessed cause, entrusted to our Society to uphold in the world.—Wm. Evans' Journal.

The licensed taverns of John Adams' day seem to have been very much like the licensed grog-shops of to-day. In his diary, describing them, he says: "If you sit the evening, you will find the house full of people, drinking drams, flip, toddy, carousing, swearing, but especially plotting with the landlord to get him at the next town meeting an election either for selectman or representative. Thus the multiplicity of these houses, by dividing the profits, renders the landlords careless of travellers, and allures the poor country people, who are tired of labor and hanker after company, to waste their time and money, and contract habits of intemperance and idleness.

The worst effect of all, and one which ought to make every man, who has the least sense of his privileges, tremble, is that these (henceless) houses are become in many places the nurseries of our legislators. An artful man, who has neither sense nor sentiment, may, by gaining a little sway among the rabble of the town, multiply taverns and dram-shops, and thereby secure the votes of the taverner, and retailer, and of all; and the multiplication of taverns will make many, who may be induced by flip and rum, to vote for any men whatever.—From the Diary of John Adams.

Triumphant Death-bed.—Joseph White, of Bucks county, Pennsylvania, a devoted and self-denying follower of the Lord Jesus Christ, who had labored faithfully in America and Europe in preaching the everlasting gospel of life and salvation, was enabled on his death-bed, in the renewed assurance of the blessed truths which he had declared unto others, to rejoice with great fervor of spirit, and to give thanks in the midst of the severest agonies of nature. On one occasion, after a time of silence, he broke forth in these expressions: "The door is open; I see an innumerable company of saints, and of angels, and of the spirits of just men, which I long to be embodied, to be with, but not my will, but thy will be done, O Lord! I cannot utter, nor my tongue express, what I feel of that light, life and love that attends me, which the world cannot give, neither can it take away from me. My sins are washed away by the blood of the Lamb that was slain from the foundation of the world; all rags and filthiness are taken away, and in room thereof, love and good for all mankind; O that we all may become more united in the church militant, and nearer the church triumphant. O that we all might meet such an end as I have in prospect, for it is all life, all love and all peace; the light that I see is more glorious than the sun in the firmament; come Lord Jesus Christ, come when thou please, thy servant is ready and willing; into thy hands I commit my spirit; not my will, but thy will be done, O Lord! Let this mortal body be committed to the dust; be with me, with all children and my grand-children; be with all men that love thee, that love thy appearance. O the pains that I feel, that attend this mortal body, they are more comely to me than jewels! I rejoice in my sighs and groans, for to me they are most melodious; I am about to enter that harmony with Moses and the Lamb, where they cry holy, holy, holy, holy! I cannot express the joy I feel. My heart (if it were possible) would break for joy. If any inquire after me, after my end, let them know all is well with me."

Bermuda.

Bermuda is entirely a coral island, that is to say, the complete mass of the island now above water, and that below sea level, as far at least as excavations which have been made have extended, has been brought together by the agency of lime-secreting animals and plants, aided by the wind and waves, and alterations in the height of the sea-bed. It is the most distant coral island from the equator, lying about 9° of latitude north of the Tropic of Cancer, in about the same latitude as Madeira, which island has, however, no coral reefs. It is distant from Cape Hatteras, the nearest point of the American coast, about 600 miles.

Bermuda consists of a series of islands, some very small indeed, others several miles in length, there being, it is said, an island for every day in the year. The islands are disposed in an irregular semicircle, and the larger ones of the chain are narrow and elongate in form. This semicircle, or rather semi-ellipse, is completed below water, or made into an entire atoll shape by a series of coral reefs, as may be seen by a glance at the chart. A few narrow and winding passages lead in through the reefs to the harbors of St. George's, Ireland Island, and Hamilton, the capital town. The highest point is only about 300 feet above the level of the sea.

The islands are almost entirely composed of blown calcareous sand, more or less consolidated into hard rock. In several places, and especially at Tuckerstown and Elbow Bay, there exist considerable tracts covered with modern sand dunes, some of which are encroaching inland upon cultivated ground, and have overwhelmed at Elbow Bay a cottage, the chimney of which only is now to be seen above the sand. The constant encroachment of the dunes is prevented by the growth upon them of several binding plants, amongst which a hard prickly grass (Cenchrus) with long, deeply penetrating root fibres, is the most efficient, assisted by the trailing Ipomoea pes-capræ. When these binding plants are artificially removed, the sand at once begins to shift, and the burying of the house and the present encroachment at Elbow Bay are said to have originated from the cutting through of some ancient sand-hills for military purposes.

The sand is entirely calcareous and dazzling white when seen in masses. When examined closely, in small quantities, it is seen to consist of various-sized particles of broken shells.

Thus, although the foundations of Bermuda and its natural breakwaters and protection without which it would not exist, are formed by corals, the part above water is mostly derived from another source, and even below the water the same is the case for some distance, for the same beds of sandstone were met with in an excavation carried to a depth of 50 feet.

The shells, more or less broken, are thrown upon the beach, and there pounded by the surf. As the tide recedes, the resulting calcareous sand is rapidly dried by the sun, and the finer particles are borne off inland by the wind, to be heaped up into the dome-shaped dunes. The rain, charged with carbonic acid, percolates through the dunes, and taking lime into solution, re-deposits it as a cement, binding the sand grains together.—Moseley's Naturalist on the "Challenger."

We are now in the beginning of a political campaign that will produce great excitement. All who read the political papers are in danger of being captured by it, and led to the extremes that irritate the feelings and cause them to say hard things against others, and often the church has lost some of its character, and brethren some of their influence, by taking too much part in politics. Let your religion rule; let it control you in all you say and do, that you may honor and work for God instead of a President. Then you will be better and feel better when the campaign is over.

Natural History, Science, &amp;c.

From The Paper World, a well-conducted journal published at Holyoke, Mass., we extract the following items:—

The Wonderful Adaptability of Paper.—The adaptability of paper to numerous important and widely-varied uses is wonderful. Whichever substance can be satisfactorily substituted for wood, iron, and such common materials, to the extent that paper can be made, it is impossible to find anything else which like paper, may be so differently and dextrously prepared, as regards flexibility, tenacity, strength, durability, imperviousness to fire and water, &c., that it can be made into pails, washbowls, dishes, brick, napkins, blankets, barrels, houses, stove-wearing-apparel, curtains, bonnets, newspaper and writing sheets, wrappers, carpets, covering for iron ships, flapper-pots, boxes, pavement slates, coverings for the leads of pen-jewelry, lanterns, car-wheels, dies for stamping, uppers of shoes, roofing, and many other things. It is this tendency on the part of paper to take the place of everything else, become a universal substitute, so to speak, which leads to the conclusion that the futurity has a grand development in store for it, so that in the years to come its manufacture will hold a magnificent position among great industrial interests of the world.

Japanese paper air-cushions are curious serviceable articles, and one of them will sustain without bursting, a man weighing a hundred and sixty pounds. The cushions are said, are waterproof and make good preservers. For pillows they are superior to rubber, because they will not stick together, and will emit no odor. When not in use they may be rolled in small packages.

The pachymeter, an instrument lately invented in Vienna, accurately determines the thickness of paper to the one-thousandth of an inch. Another Austrian invention is the dasyimeter, a small pendulum which indicates in pounds just the amount of force which is necessary to break a strip of paper etched between two points by means of a screw, until it can no longer bear the tension. A material called parchment slate, manufactured in Nuremberg, Germany, readily takes the mark of a lead pencil, and is being substituted for paper in note and account books, &c. It is much lighter than the mineral slate, and possesses the further advantage that it will not break—being tough and unyielding. Writing upon this substance, can be as easily erased and cleaned off as in a slate itself.

The company that has been experimenting Florida with palmetto for paper-making purposes, has met with such gratifying success that they will erect about twenty paper mills in various parts of the State where palmetto trees grow in abundance, and where transportation facilities are good. Some English paper manufacturers in Canada have been so influenced by the favorable reports concerning palmetto that they have sent an agent to Florida to ascertain what may be its intrinsic merits.

Paper blankets possess a great advantage over woolen and cotton bed-coverings for use in hospitals and in regions where yellow fever or other virulent epidemics may be raging. The only safe way to get rid of infected cotton or woolen bed-clothes, which cannot be destroyed, may be the means of spreading certain diseases to a terrible extent, is to burn them—neither an easy nor an agreeable thing to do. But, in the case of paper blankets, it is only necessary to dip them in a tank and expose them to the flow of a hydrant a few minutes, and the desired disinfection is effected.

Low animals play and enjoy themselves.—All birds chase each other about in play; perhaps the conduct of the crane and the plover is most extraordinary. The latter feeds on one leg, hops around in the most grotesque manner, and throws somersaults. The Americans call it the mad bird, on account of these singularities. Water birds, such as ducks and geese, dive after each other, and splash the surface of the water with outstretched necks and flapping wings, throwing abundant spray around. Deer often engage in sham fights, or trial of strength, by twisting their necks together and pushing for the mastery. Animals pretending violence in their play consist of exercising it; the dog takes the shortest precaution not to injure by his bite; the orang-outang, in wrestling with his rival, pretends to throw him, and makes a show of biting him. Some animals carry their play in the semblance of catching their prey. Young cats, for instance, leap every small and moving object, even to leaves stirred by the autumn wind. They then steal forward ready for the spring, the body quivering and the tail vibrating with emotion; they bound on the moving object and again spring forward to another. We saw young cougars and jaguars play with a round substance, like kittens. Birds of the magpie kind are the analogous of cats, full of mischief, play, and mimicry. There is a story of a tame magpie that was seen busily employed in a garden gathering pebbles, and with much solemnity and reverence, air burying them in a hole made to receive a post. After dropping each stone it cried "Cur ack!" triumphantly, and set off for another. On examining the spot, a poor toad was found in the hole, which the magpie was stoning for his amusement.—Passions of Animals.

May the life come so up to dominion over all, as that no obstruction may remain to a perfect coalition, and cementing, living fellowship and union among all the members of our Israel. There is no other rock or foundation on which this divine fellowship can be abidingly established, but the life, and where that is abode in, many little differences in sentiment and appearance are swallowed up of love.—J. Scott.

Consistency.—It often appears to me that we make our way better in the minds of the people, when we keep strictly to our religious profession, in all countries and among all sorts of persons.—Richard Jordan.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 31, 1880.

The paragraphs in the British Friend, commented on in our issue of 7th month 17th, relative to the doctrinal difference between Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting and those who criticise them, have arrested the attention of others, as well as of those connected with the care of our journal, and have led to the expression of views and feelings which seem to us of value and interest to those on whom rests a concern for the welfare of our religious Society. From a communication received from a valued correspondent we condense the following:

The doctrinal difference referred to is just the difference that has marked the changes in all the Yearly Meetings, and has worked the disunity in all the Yearly Meetings and led to the separations. Some may not have gone to the same extreme as others in that direction, but there is a common bond of sympathy among them all, and when occasion serves, they can all act together.

If missions are to be set up under our name, and men and women are taught (if not directly, by inference), that they can undertake the preaching of the gospel under the authority of a text or two of scripture, it is not to be wondered at that every true Friend should be alarmed. A trying part of it all, that it is attempted to pass these things off, as if they were really consistent with the testimony of the Society.

Running without being sent, and thus undertaking unauthorized religious labor, is liable to lead those who enter upon such a course into error. Those who are kept under the government of the Spirit of truth, and minister only of that which is divinely impressed on their understandings, will be preserved from the vagaries in doctrine evinced by some who depend on their own mental powers and their study of Scripture for the material of their communications. The things of God cannot be rightly known through the unaided faculties of the natural man, because, as the apostle says, "they are spiritually discerned." Therefore those are apt to go astray who do not humbly seek for a wisdom higher than their own, to unfold to them the mysteries of the kingdom of God. To the want of this humble seeking, much of the confusion and unsettlement to which our Society has been exposed at different periods, may safely be attributed. It is only as it holds to its holy Head, that the Church has true nourishment ministered unto it, and that it is knit together, increasing with the increase of God.

While some credit, as Friends, may be due to those who have refused to join with Helen Balkwill, William Wetherald and others in the taking of bread and wine, and going into the water, yet the constant holding up of views of religious belief inconsistent with the well-known doctrines of the Society of Friends, without going the length of embracing the so-called "Ordinances," is perhaps really more injurious.

The practice of waiting for a renewed qualification to engage in vocal religious exercise has nearly disappeared in some places under the influence of the "new views;" the indispensable duty of silent waiting upon God is lightly esteemed; and silence is deemed a loss of time. As a natural consequence, those who have assumed the function of ministers are rapidly approaching the position occupied by the teachers of other denominations. They have in some cases assumed a clerical garb. At funerals and marriages they appear as if they expected to officiate as a matter of course; and they are not backward to take the highest seats. There is just ground to fear that the members of our Society are being rapidly educated in these things: "The prophets prophesied falsely, the priests bear rule by their means, and the people love to have it so, and what will they do in the end thereof."

Thus while many have been turning their attention to Madagascar and to Syria, the hedges are broken down about our own vineyard, and our own Society in many places running to waste and becoming a by-word and a reproach.

Every intelligent Friend must be aware that such ministers as are now furnished with credentials to travel, both by London and other Yearly Meetings, could not have gone up and down in past years promulgating such views as they do, without exciting the concern of qualified elders. The care extended to Hannah Barnard, Elisha Bates, Isaac Crewdson and others is a proof of this. Alas, how different is it now! So that the whole head is sick, and the heart of the true burden-bearers is faint. The fact cannot be safely ignored, that many meetings have come so much under the influence of this degenerate Quakerism, that the credentials issued by them are not regarded with that respect they once carried with them, but are no doubt received rather as acts of courtesy to maintain an appearance of unity. One cannot but believe that there is either unsoundness in doctrine or a lamentable want of discrimination and good judgment in meetings which send forth ministers to travel through the land, who preach doctrines, and introduce practices inconsistent with our principles; and whose influence over the more unsettled portion of our members tends to lessen the respect they should feel for those who adhere to the old ways, and to undermine the authority in the Church which the Truth has given them.

Those who permit such ministers to go forth, probably have little idea of the suffering of spirit and anxious thoughtfulness they occasion to many of those who feel bound to watch over the flock in their respective neighborhoods, as those who must give account to the Chief Shepherd. Those faithful watchmen mourn over the unsettlement produced by such ministers as have been referred to; and hear of their coming with sorrow, and of their departure with a sense of relief.

The truly humble and appointed ministers, who are brought under concern for the promotion of the Lord's cause in the earth, may be discouraged when they view the activity of some in whose labors they cannot discern the Lord's hand; and may at times be ready to conclude that it is scarcely worth while to make an effort to fill up their own measure of service. We desire the faith of these in the Lord's power and watchful care over them may be strengthened; and that they may heed the injunction of our Saviour to one of his disciples formerly: "What is that to thee? Follow thou me." May they be so filled with innocent boldness and so kept under the influence of the Lord's Spirit, as to proclaim the Divine message clearly and fully, not giving place to a timid fear lest their hearers will not bear an open declaration of sound doctrines. Such timidity, where it prevails, paves the way for a gradually increasing blindness among the people.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 21st inst., twenty men employed in the shaft of the Hudson River Tunnel, Jersey City, were drowned by the irruption of water while engaged at work. This shaft had been sunk to a depth of about 65 feet, and was 35 feet in diameter. The tunnel with which it is to communicate is intended to be about one mile in length, under the North River, and its approaches are prospectors of a mile long on either side. The point at which the accident occurred is about 40 feet below the surface of the ground, and it is believed to have been caused by some negligence in the management of the airlocks by which the pressure of compressed air, necessary for the operations, was interrupted, and the resistance thus made to the weight of the superincumbent mass of earth and water was lessened. Eight of the workmen escaped.

The estate of Robert Morris, the financier of the U. S. Government during the revolutionary period, and who finally became insolvent, has just been settled in the Orphan's Court in this city, after the lapse of nearly 75 years. The proceeds, amounting to nearly $20,000, was awarded to relatives of the family of the deceased.

The steamer Dessouk, with the Egyptian obelisk on board, has arrived. Eight of the workmen escaped.

Census returns show the present population of Boston to be 263,565, an increase of 77,066 in ten years; of Washington city (including Georgetown and other suburbs) 169,456; of the State of Rhode Island 276,710, and of New Jersey 1,100,000.

The first State Convention of colored men ever held in Illinois, met in Chicago, on the 21st inst., and continued for two days.

A sharp shock of an earthquake was felt at Manchester and other towns in New Hampshire on the 20th inst.

New York harbor is said to abound with sharks, brought in by the swell and offal dumped in from the city.

The flow of gold to this country from Europe has again begun, one million dollars worth of bullion having recently been purchased in one day in London for shipment to the United States.

Statistics of the number of miles of railroad on this country show, that in 1833 there were 133 miles in operation, and that in 1879, 89,437 miles had been constructed, of which 84,232 were in use. In the five years between 1869 and 1873, 28,049 miles were built, or nearly one-third of the whole. The most marked feature in connection with the increase of earnings continues to be the reduction of freight charges which has been taking place on the principal railroads for several years, including the one just closed. The rate at which freight is now carried is lower than would have been regarded as possible a few years ago. There are 15,011 miles of railroad in Pennsylvania, upon which are 3864 engines, 1698 first class passenger cars, 520 second class passenger cars, 773 baggage, mail, and express cars, and 157,759 freight cars of all descriptions.

The circulation of paper currency, including greenback and national bank notes, is stated to amount to $634,000,000, and is greater than that of any other country, in proportion to population. Taking specie and paper combined, France stands first on the list having a circulation of $44.06 per capita. Next, Belgium, with $45.55, then the Netherlands, with $42.24. The total circulation of the United States is $22.59 per capita, and that of Great Britain $29.11. Italy, with a population of nearly 27,000,000, has a circulation of only $6.42 per head of the population, being smaller than any other European nation.

Markets. (Ex.—United States) 6's, 1881, 104; 5's, registered, do. 102½; cotton, 104½; 4½'s, 111½; 5's, 109½.

Cotton.—Sales are reported on a basis of 11½ cents per lb., for middling uplands, and 12 cts. for New Orleans and Texas.

Petroleum.—Standard white is quoted at 9½ cts. per gallon for export.

Floor.—Demand limited, but prices firm. Sales of Penna. extra family have been made at $5; Ohio, from $6.25 to $6.25. Minnesota patent at $7.12. Rye-flour at $4.25 to $4.57½. Bran sold at $16 to $16.50 per ton.

Grain.—Wheat is in fair demand, but prices are unsettled. Sales of red at $1.09 to $1.10. Rye, 70 cts. for Pennsylvania new. Corn, western and southern yellow sold at 61 cts. Oats, No. 1 white, 42 to 44 cts.; mixed, 35 to 36 cts.

Average price for week ending 24th inst., $1.35 to $1.45 for prime timothy hay, and mixed $1.20 to $1.30 per 100 lbs. Straw, $1 to $1.10.

Produce.—At Philadelphia, cattle were in good demand, and the arrivals were light. Extra, 5½ to 5½ cts.; good, 5½ to 5½ cts.; common, 4½ to 4½ cts.

Sheep.—Sales at 10 to 10½ cts., according to quality. Lambs ranged in price from 3½ to 7 cts. per lb.

Hogs. 6½ to 7½ cts. per lb.

Wool.—The number of buyers has increased, and there is a prospect of a more active market. Sales of Ohio x and xx and No. 1, 45 to 48 cts.; combed and delaine, 42 to 52½ cts.; scoured, 50 to 90 cts. Canada, combed, 42½ to 45 cts. Australay, combed, 50 cts.

FOREIGN.—Dispatches from Berlin state that the naval demonstration of the Powers in Turkish waters will be placed under a joint French and English command, and that it will be at first merely for purposes of observation.

A Council of Ministers of the Turkish Government has recently declined to accept the decision of the Berlin Conference, and proposed that it should reopen negotiations with Greece on a different basis. The Montenegro envoy has been directed to leave Constantinople in consequence of the Porte's falsely represented to the Powers that the Montenegrins were the aggressors in their recent fight with the Albanians. Dispatches from that city represent that extensive preparations are being made in view of a war with Russia.

The Porte, in its reply to the collective note of the European Powers, states that the decision of the recent Conference gives Greece more territory than was provided for in the Berlin Treaty, and the proposed cession includes positions which it is impossible for Turkey to surrender.

The Pesthub dispatches state that the statements in regard to failure of crops in Russia are greatly exaggerated. The report that the government will shortly prohibit the exportation of corn is semi-officially contradicted.

Owing to abundant harvests this year, the Sultan of Morocco has removed the prohibition against the exportation of maize, peas and beans; the prohibition, however, has been retained with respect to the potato, barley and flour, through fear of possible famine.

At the Manchester Assizes several officers and directors of the Northern Counties of England Insurance Company were found guilty of fraud and conspiracy in falsifying the company's accounts. The general manager was sentenced to eighteen months hard labor, the chairman of the board of directors to twelve months hard labor, and four others to six months imprisonment each.

Volcanic disturbances in the island of Luzon commenced on the 13th inst., and up to the 25th there had been repeated shocks of earthquake. The cathedrals and barracks at Manila have fallen; many lives have been lost. The inhabitants of Manila have fled to the fields. The earth has opened in several places, jets of boiling water and showers of ashes are ejected.

The National Board of Health has received from Havana, under date of the 17th inst., the following report: For the week ending the 10th inst. the total number of deaths from all causes was 250, of which 17 were from yellow fever. For the week ending the 17th inst. there were 74 deaths from yellow fever, and that date there were probably 200 cases of yellow fever in the city and suburbs.

A telegram to the Aborigines Protection Society London, dated Cape Town 21st inst., says: "Official intelligence from Basutoland announces that there a general refusal to disarm. The European women and children are being sent away. A general native rising is seriously apprehended."

Abdurrahman Khan was formally recognized as Emir of Afghanistan on the 21st inst. Many of the leaders of Yakoub Khan's party have joined him.

Lepel Griffin, the British Political Officer, in behalf of the Queen and the Viceroy of India, acknowledge Abdurrahman Khan as Ameer, and announced the early withdrawal of British troops which frontier fixed by the Treaty of Gandamak. The Secretary for India has stated in the House of Commons that no foreign interference will be allowed at Cabul, and that the Ameer has been told that if he conformed to the advice of Great Britain, it would assist him against undue oppression by any foreign power.

On the 19th inst. a treaty was concluded at Port Plata by Ministers Plenipotentiary of the Hayti and the Domingo governments. The principal feature of the treaty is the condition that the Haytien government to exile from Hayti every Dominican hostile to the present government of St. Domingo. This measure believed to have secured the peace of both countries. The Chinese authorities, desiring to protect native industry, have prohibited the importation of American kerosene oil.

After this meeting, I went into the county of Wexford and visited Friends, having several sad heavenly meetings with them in that county; they were a lowly plain people. Hence I came into the county of Wick, and some little time after, the motion of me for travelling ceased, and I durst not go further, but returned back into the county of Wexford, and wrought harvest-work in Lamb's-Town, where Robert Cuppage, a man in the ministry dwelt, who had a consent to visit Friends in Munster, and would take me with him for a companion. I told him, I durst not go, because the Lord had taken away the motion of life from me and I must wait upon the Lord, to know his blessed will and good time; so I staid.

A little time after, came James Dickinson, a young man from Cumberland, to visit me, with intention to go into Munster, then the Lord was pleased to open my eyes to go with him, and we being both very young, travelled together in true brotherly love, great humility, and godly fear; and the blessed heavenly power of the Lord did often enter our hearts in meetings, as also the hearts of many Friends, and we had a prosperous journey in the will of God: so I saw it good to wait the Lord's time in all things; having travelled through Leinster and Munster, James Dickinson went northward. I was afraid of running before my true love, because they who run and are not of God, can neither profit the people nor themselves, so I staid at work in the city of Wexford about sixteen weeks, and went thence to Dublin, and the Half Year's Meeting there, which was large and very good; shipping and landed at Liverpool with my former companion, James Dickinson; and when it was now a time of great persecution of Friends in England, it pleased the Lord to give us a peaceable and prosperous journey through the meetings of Friends all the way to Cumberland.

Where he saw that Thomas Wilson manifested, he set forth, to move in his religiousness only under the putting forth of the Lord, is shown also by the testimony to him at the Half Year's Meeting of Friends in the north by the Half Year's Meeting of Friends who say of him: "When he had drawn ings on his spirit to go forth in public service, he was careful in waiting to know the Lord's acceptable time, in which he freely gave up, preferring Truth's service before his own worldly concerns; and when he found his spirit clear of the service he was engaged in, he was careful to return with what expedition he could." In this he acted according to the advice of George Fox, who advises ministering Friends, when their services are completed, to return with speed to their habitations, that there be no slothfulness.

Is there not a danger in this day, that for want of care in this respect, some may linger longer than is best among their friends, finding it easier to depend on the hospitality of others, than to be diligent in laboring for their own support, and forgetful of the example of the great Apostle Paul who, when among the Thessalonians, wrought with labor and travail night and day, that he might not be chargeable to any of them.

Of this visit to Ireland, Thomas Wilson's companion, James Dickinson, says, "The power of the Lord was wonderfully with him, and made him as a cloud folded, full of rain, carried by the breath of the Almighty to water the ground. He had great service while I was with him, and several were convicted by him." After finishing his labors in that country, Thomas Wilson says:]

In a little time after, with my dear companion, James Dickinson, visited Friends in the two counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland. At Kendal, some persons came to break up our meeting, and began to pull out Friends; and in a very rude manner took out my companion. Then the word of the Lord came mightily upon me, and I was made bold to stand up and preach the everlasting gospel amongst them; the holy power of the Lord came mightily over the hearts of Friends, and even the opposers were made quiet a considerable time; but after I had stood about an hour, they came and pulled me to the door. I asked for my hat, and they said, Give him his hat, he does well to put it off when he preaches. And after they had asked me many questions, I asked one of them, whether he was a believer in Jesus Christ or not? He said, he was, and also in the apostles' doctrine. Then I told him, he never read that either Christ or his apostles did enter into any religious assemblies, and disturb them as he did us, except Paul before he knew the Lord Jesus, for which sin he afterward calls himself the chief of sinners; I bade him consider; and sat down in the meeting, all being very still, and in a little time James Dickinson kneeled down to prayer; the Lord's heavenly power came over all, and the meeting ended sweetly.

In the year 1684, I and my said companion travelled through Lancashire and Cheshire, into Wales, and had many blessed meetings, both in North and South Wales. In all which no informer disturbed any of our meetings, until we came to Redstone in Pembrokeshire, where a constable, with a wicked informer, and several other persons came; and as I preached the word of the Lord to the people, the informer laid rude hands on me and pulled me away. I spoke to him mildly, desiring him to let me speak a few words, and he did so. The constable and those with him, sat down and staid about an hour, in which time I preached the way of salvation to them all; after which, James Dickinson kneeled down to pray, and the informer came to pull him up from his knees, but could not, he being in fervent prayer to the Lord, so the meeting ended in a sweet feeling of the Lord's glorious presence: Thanksgiving be unto Him that lives for ever and ever.—Amen.

The informer came and laid his hands on me next, saying, "I must go with him." I asked, whither? He said, "Before a justice." I asked for his warrant. He answered, 'he was a commission officer, and that I had nothing to do to ask him for a warrant.' Friends told him, it was but a civil question, at which he was very angry, but no man laid hands on us to take us away, so we fell into some friendly discourse. I was very pleasant, and easy in spirit; and walking to and fro in discourse, one of the company said I smiled, which they admired at, we being likely to go to prison. I answered, 'That I came in the true love of the Lord Jesus Christ to visit them, and had nothing but love and good will to them all;' and turning to the informer, said to him, 'If thou was in a journey as we are, and any man should ask thee to go with him before a justice of the peace, without the king's justice's warrant, thou wouldst think it below thee as a man to go.' This being mildly spoken to him, he gave a sudden answer, saying, 'To be sure he would;' then said I, 'Consider our case;' whereupon perceiving he had over-shot himself, he rode away and left us.

We having appointed a meeting to be next day at Havertordwest, went thither that night, and next morning to the meeting; wherein, after a little time, the glorious power of the Lord did shine, and that text of Holy Scripture, viz: 'Then said these men, we shall not find any occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God.' After they had prevailed with King Darinus to sign a decree, whereby Daniel might be ensnared in performing his duty to his God, this righteous man declined not his duty, through fear of suffering, but was very bold, as well as innocent, as appears in the tenth verse of the same chapter, viz: 'Now, when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and his windows being open, in his chamber, toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees, three times a day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime.' This subject was preached to the people, as our case, men having nothing against us, but for worshipping the Lord God of Daniel in his Holy Spirit, according to the institution of our blessed Lord and Saviour, above sixteen hundred years ago; and that in this glorious gospel time, we are to be very diligent and faithful to the Lord, to keep up our religious meetings, even in stormy times of persecution, referring to Daniel, who was blessed of the Lord for his faithfulness; boldly declaring and affirming, that the Lord, whom we serve in the gospel of his Son, will reward all his faithful children and people, instancing many proofs out of the Holy Scriptures. The aforesaid informer, and several priests, whereof his brother was one, together with some of the town officers, being outside of the house, and hearing these gospel truths preached, were very sober, and staid a great while. Then some of them said, 'Let us pull them out of their meeting;' but others said, 'No, by no means;' for it is the Quakers' doctrine, it is good and sound, we never heard the like, let them alone; so went away, and our meeting ended in prayer and thanksgiving to the great Lord of heaven and earth, who is worthy for ever and ever.

This informer fined Friends very much, but the Lord, by one means or other, prevented their goods from being taken away; and lastly, by the death of King Charles the Second. After which no informer troubled us in any meeting where I came, though we had many meetings to visit, as in Glamorganshire, Herefordshire, Radnorshire, Montgomeryshire, Shropshire, and Flintshire; in all which meetings we had blessed sweet waterings and a confirming ministry, and Friends were glad in that the God of peace had rebuked the storm in those parts. My companion and I parted for the service sake; he went into Ireland, and I travelled northward, and had a pleasant journey through Cheshire, Lancashire, and Westmoreland.

Friends at Great Strickland not being suffered to meet in their usual meeting-place, met in the highway before the meeting-house door, and the officers came while I was preaching the word of the Lord, but were very sober, and did not break up our meeting. From thence I came home, where my mother and family, with friends and neighbors, were very glad to see me safely returned in that stormy time.

After some stay at my outward employ about home, I found drawings to visit Friends in Northumberland, Bishoprick, and Yorkshire; and had many blessed meetings mostly peaceable, though the storm of persecution was not yet fully ended. I went into Warwickshire, Oxfordshire and Oxfordcity, where I heard the scholars had been rude, and much abused Friends. I went into that city on a First-day morning, in great fear and humility, being a stranger to all Friends there, and sat down in a corner of the meeting-house. Friends sat by the sides of the house, and left the middle empty for the rabble; we having sat a little time, a Friend began to speak, and had spoken but a very few words before the scholars came in, in such abundance that I supposed they filled the middle part of the house. The Friend sat down as soon as they came in, and the meeting being in silence, they began to talk one to another, and spy out who would preach; and seeing me like a traveller, said, 'That one in the corner, looking rudely upon me, thus talking one to another for some time. The word of the Lord was strong in my heart to preach unto them; but I was first to say, 'Sit down, young men, we shall be glad of your company, so long as you are civil;' which done, they all sat down and began to listen earnestly what I would say. I preached the way to the kingdom of heaven to be in Jesus Christ, regeneration, and to be born again; and that blessed Jesus taught this doctrine to Nicodemus, 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.' And though he was a master or teacher in Israel, yet being carnally minded, he could not understand these things; neither can any carnal minded men now know the things of God, for no man knoweth the Father but the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him. So those who preach against revelation, they preach against the true knowledge of the living God, and life eternal; for our blessed Lord said, 'This is life eternal, that they might know Thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent.' And this was in aid by the Spirit and holy gift of his saving grace that brings salvation, and so went on preaching as it opened in me; the scholars went away quietly, and the meeting ended in prayer to Almighty God.

Penguins at Tristan Da Cunha.

As we approached the shore, I was astonished at seeing a shoal of what looked like extremely active very small porpoises or dolphins. I could not imagine what the things could be, unless they were indeed some most marvellously small Cetaceans; they showed black above and white beneath, and came along in a shoal of fifty or more, from seawards towards the shore at a rapid pace, by a series of successive leaps out of the water, and splashes into it again, describing short curves in the air, taking headers out of the water and headers into it again; splash, splash, went this marvellous shoal of animals, till they went splash through the surf on to the black stony beach, and there struggled and jumped up amongst the boulders and revealed themselves as wet and dripping penguins, for such they were.

Much as I had read about the habits of penguins, I never could have believed that the creatures I saw thus progressing through the water, were birds, unless I had seen them to my astonishment thus make out shore. I had subsequently much opportunity of watching their habits.

We landed on the beach; it was bounded along its whole stretch at this point by a dense growth of tussock. The tussock (Spartina arundinacea), is a stout coarse reed-like grass; it grows in large clumps, which have at their base large masses of hard woody matter, formed of the bases of old stems and roots.

In penguin rookeries, the grass covers wide tracts with a dense growth like that of a field of standing corn, but denser and higher, the grass reaching high over one's head.

Here there is a sort of mutual-benefit-alliance between the penguins and the tussock. The millions of penguins sheltering and nesting amongst the grass, saturate the soil on which it grows with the strongest manure, and the grass thus stimulated grows high and thick, and shelters the birds from wind and rain, and enemies, such as the predatory gulls.

On the beach were to be seen various groups of penguins, either coming from or going to the sea. There is only one species of penguin in the Tristan group; this is, Eudyptes saltator or the "well diving jumper." The birds stand about a foot and a half high; they are covered, as are all penguins, with a thick coating of close set feathers, like the grebe's feather that muffs are made of. They are slate grey on the back and head, snow white on the whole front, and from the sides of the head projects backwards on each side a tuft sulphur yellow plumes. The tufts lie close to the head when the bird is swimming or diving but they are erected when it is on shore, and seem then almost by their varied posture, to be used in the expression of emotions, such as inquisitiveness and anger.

The bill of the penguin is bright red, and very strong and sharp at the point, as our land-terrestrial before the day was over; the iris also red.

Most of the droves of penguins made their one landing place, where the beach surface was covered with a coating of dirt from the feet, forming a broad track, leading to a lane in the tall grass about a yard wide at the bottom, and quite bare, with a smoothly beaten black roadway; this was the entrance to the main street of this part of the "rookery," so these penguin establishments are called.

Other smaller roads led at intervals into the rookery to the nests near its border, but the main street was used by the majority of birds. The birds took little notice of us, allowing to stand close by, and even to form ourselves into a group for the photographer, in which they were included.

This kind of penguin is called by the whalers and sealers "rock-hopper," from its mode of progression. The birds hop from rock to rock with both feet placed together, scarcely ever missing their footing. When chased, they blunder and fall amongst the stones, struggling their best to make off.

With one of the Germans as guide, I entered the main street. As soon as one was in the grass being above one's head, one was, if in a maze, and could not see in the length where one was going to. Various late streets lead off on each side from the main road, and are often at their mouths as big as it, moreover, the road sometimes divides & little and joins again; hence it is the easiest thing in the world to lose one's way, and is quite certain to do so when inexperienced in penguin rookeries. The German, however, was our guide on our first visit, and accustoms to pass through the place constantly for two years, was perfectly well at home in the rookery and knew every street and turn.

It is impossible to conceive the discomfort of making one's way through a big rookery hap-hazard, or "across country," as one usually says.

In the path only a few droves of penguins on their way to and from the water, are encountered, these stamped out of y way into the side alleys. Now you are instant you leave the road, on the actual bright ground. The nests are placed so thick that you cannot help treading on eggs of young birds at almost every step.

A parent bird sits on each nest, with sharp beak erect and open ready to bite, ying savagely "caa, caa, urr, urr," its red gleaming and its plumes at half-cock, quivering with rage. No sooner are y legs within reach than they are furiously ten, often by two or three birds at once; is, if you have not got on strong leather g as on the first occasion of visiting a rookery you probably have not.

You make miserably slow progress, and at last resort to the expedient of stampeding as your breath will carry you. You put your head and make a rush through the as, treading on old and young hap-hazard, rushing on before they have time to bite. The air is close in the rookery, and the sun above, and out of breath, and running with perspiration, you come across a mass of rock from the cliff above, and sticking up in the rookery; this you hail as "a city of ice." You hammer off it hurriedly half a dozen penguins who are sunning themselves, and are on the look-out, and mounting the top take out your handkerchief to wipe away the perspiration and rest a while, and in what direction you have been going, far you have got, and in which direction you are to make the next plunge. Then when you are refreshed, you make another rush, and on.—Moseley's Naturalist on the "Chalper."

Weston Boarding School.

This interesting institution of learning was commenced and has now for more than three quarters of a century been conducted, it is believed, under a religious concern for the proper training of the youth of the Society of Friends. In order that it may continue to be for the future, what it has been in the past, it is important that those who are called to its management should endeavor to get into and well under the same religious concern that animated our forefathers in its establishment. Not among the least of the many pleasant associations that cluster around that quiet seat, is that among those now associated with others in its management, are several of our grand-children of those who co-operated with other worthies of their day in planning and erecting the buildings, systematizing and acting to order the government of the school, &c. That venerable seer and prophet, Thomas Scattergood, declared in his will, "This is a vineyard which the Lord will bless;" which prophecy so far, we may say, has a sense of reverent thankfulness, has a remarkably fulfilled.

are of the Church—hope of the Church—and long he cherished object of affection strong, his faithful members she, with garland care, watches of Westown where her jewels are; here first its outline on the vision rose, rom 'mid her worthies she has chosen those killed for the purpose, who with anxious eye mark all its movements—sage advice supply—live it their time—their love—their anxious care, he happily bear it to the throne in prayer.

Under some sense of the benefit that has accrued, and may still attend those educated under its sheltering roof, a strong desire has been felt that all our members, especially parents and guardians, may remember Westown, in looking out for a place of education for those under their care, and place them there in preference to putting them in situations of greater exposure and temptation, being that the opportunities for obtaining a rough education and discipline there, are very equal if not superior to other similar institutions, and that a blessing will rest on a course.

in walking through the grounds sometime ago, and reflecting upon the number of qualified Friends who have been engaged in conducting it, and who had been, we humbly trust, safely gathered to their everlasting rest, the desire arose, "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like unto his."

Among the worthies who were earliest associated in the management of the school, we find the names of George Churchman and Philip Price, the former appearing to have been appointed to serve on the Committee 10th mo. 31, 1794, and the latter in the year following. The only published account of Geo. Churchman that we are aware of, is on page 284 of Biographical Sketches, where he is referred to as an "experienced elder" who was concerned for the then young minister, Peter Yarnall.

Quoting again from the interesting little poem of our late dear friend Jos. Kite, he says:

"Next Price appeared the infant hand to rule,
Sustaining well the interests of the school,
Almost twelve years he watched young minds unfold,
And gather treasures better far than gold,—
Stores of instruction that will keep secure,
If rightly cherished, while those minds endure.
Much of his life for children's good he wrought,
Long their best interests claimed his anxious thought,
As death drew near, instruction still he gave;
Faith bore his head above the threatening wave;
There the Redeemer shed his calming power,
Silling the terrors of the parting hour."

The following letter exhibits the exercise and concern of Geo. Churchman for the true welfare of the infant institution. It is addressed to Philip Price, Jr., near Branlywine, and is dated from East Nottingham, 9th mo. 19th, 1799, at which period Richard Harts-horne was Superintendent. G. C. appears to have been a man of considerable education, the letter being carefully written, although in some simplicity of language, and penmanship quite legible. It is not known that it has before been published.

To the Committee and others (as may may open) at the Westown School:

Dear Friends:—I believe I may confess truly, my mind hath often been dipped into affectionate sympathy with those who have the superintendence and care of the children and other matters relative to the concern adopted by our Yearly Meeting for promoting a guarded education for youth, and who are thereby permitted to hold religious meetings with the children in the school-house at Westown. I have frequently felt fervent desires, that as Divine Providence hath apparently owned the concern in its beginning, his blessing may continue to attend the pious endeavors of Friends and those who now have the care thereof in its more advanced state. Perhaps I may without impropriety hint, that since my being at the place about two weeks ago, with some others of the committee, my sympathy hath been considerably increased, and a measure of brotherly care and concern felt that all interested in the business at that place and those who have to uphold a religious meeting there twice a week, may be favored and preserved in an attentive, humble state of mind, from day to day, as that nothing may be suffered to take root, or prevail, that may be any impediment, or means of obstruct-

Philip Price acted temporarily as Superintendent, after Richard Harts-horne left, until Joshua Sharpless was ready to take the charge, which he did 4th mo. 1st, 1800. P. Price came regularly as Superintendent 10th mo. 13th, 1818, left 5th mo. 3d, 1830, and was succeeded by Pennock Passmore, (father of the present Superintendent) 5th mo. 1st, 1830.

ing that union of spirit, and harmonizing of conduct and disposition, which is only proper to open the way for uniting in mental or vocal solemn supplication to the Almighty Father, for his blessing, not only in their awful sittings together for worship in his presence but at other times when engaged in their several and respective branches of care, whether for the instruction of the pupils, management of the necessary business in the house, upon the farm, or for preserving right order in every case that relates to the prosperity of this momentous concern.

From some degree of latter experience, and for encouragement to Friends at that pace, I believe I may be justified in mentioning it as my firm belief: that there is no disposition which brings the Christian mind (of male or female) into such a state of increasing acceptance with our most Merciful Father, and the God of our lives, as that of often submitting with deep abasement of soul, to enquire at his footstool concerning our own faults and failings, and concerning the progress we make in overcoming naturis, with all its defects and weakening propensities; or, in other language, to inquire whether the work of regeneration and sanctification is really going forward daily, or whether it is in any way impeded for want of our more fully embracing the humiliating doctrine of the cross of our dear Redeemer.

This deeply inquisitive disposition and exercise of mind fully given way to by both sexes, of each rank and degree, and especially by those of superior station, in every concern that relates to the advancement of the cause of truth and righteousness, when attended with a proper individual willingness of soul to submit to such fresh and repeated plungings or baptisms in spiritual Jordan, as are requisite for our thorough cleansing; I say, such an exercise (I do most fully believe), will effectually open the way for offering up available petitions to the Heavenly Father, whether in a united capacity when assembled before Him, or individually and more separately; that He may be pleased richly to dispense of his blessing in affording wisdom and understanding adequate to the proper and harmonious conducting each branch of that care, in which the real good and reputation of the whole is concerned.

Having latterly (as before hinted) perceived an increasing solicitude of mind that nothing may be permitted to happen among our valued Friends and fellow-members, who reside at Westown School or on the farm, obstructive to that pure order and necessary harmony which ought to be supported and prevail through each department for the children's right instruction, lively example and solid benefit; as an absent well-wisher, who may not have such frequent opportunity to be present at the place as those who dwell nearer, perhaps I may be permitted to hint further my sentiments relative to the present and future prosperity of a seminary which, if wisely conducted, seems to promise great utility to our religious Society, (if not to our country at large), viz: Seeing our nature as men and creatures is weak and frail; and if our frailties and propensities are given way to or not overcome through the assistance of Divine Grace, we are liable to deviate from the path of pure wisdom, and so to become bewildered or tainted with folly, which may lead towards discord and breach of harmony; therefore let all be diligent in maintaining the Christian watch and daily warfare; that each degree of disorder and confusion arising through the neglect of this important exercise may be shunned and honorably avoided. And if at any time through unwatchfulness little misses or causes of dissension should happen, or circumstances occur that may lead to a breach of harmony, O, let there be in meekness on all hands a speedy submission to the doctrine of the cross, whereby each species of a selfish disposition is brought under, through the operation of that Power, whereby the lively part, with its will, propensities and desires, are reduced and crucified.

Where this discipline is closely attended to, and more especially those of the upper rank are concerned to be instructive leaders and examples herein, in the meekness of Wisdom to those in lower stations, it surely tends to establish proper dignity and superiority on a sound and moral solid bottom than when rough temper and brittleness of disposition are manifested. And where those also in lower station, according to their several allotments, are rightly concerned to be improving daily in the same discipline, and properly exercised in meekness to show forth a conduct suitable to their place and degree, how beneficial will such a mutual submission to the refining work of self-mortification and reduction to lowliness of mind, prove towards the preservation and increase of harmony and good order! This truly Christian disposition becoming prevalent, we may profitably remember the instructive contents of certain weighty precepts recorded in Scripture, and be sensible of their propriety down to the present day, one of which recommends to us, "Not to mind high things but that we condescend to those of low degree." Another sentence advises us "to confess our faults one to another, and to pray for one another." In another place our Saviour points out that the way to true greatness is, "to become as a servant to all," &c.

And whenever or in whatever degree this essential Christian duty of bearing the cross to our natural dispositions, and in meekness duly bearing and forbearing one with another, is avoided or neglected, so far will weakness and causes of offence be manifest, and thereby disorder and confusion become introduced; which Christian prudence and the duties of our religion direct us diligently to check in their first budding, that thus they may be shunned and prevented. I seem free to make this further addition, for encouragement to friends of each class, who are, or may be engaged in necessary care in and about the Yearly Meeting school and the farm there, in the essential duty of daily endeavoring to ask wisdom for right government respecting each branch of duty according to the different stations, or for direction and assistance in managing matters in general, that when the minds of individuals become inwardly subjected in obedience to the doctrine of the cross, (as above hinted,) we may rely on the truth of the Apostle James' assertion, "If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God who giveth to all men liberally and unbridled not, and it shall be given him." James i. 5. I have not written these thoughts under an apprehension that I myself am perfect, yet I feel at seasons a fervent desire to be found pressing forward towards the mark of the prize of our high calling, and I hope my friends will feel that I do not write in a censorious or lordling disposition, but rather from a degree of lively hope and faith that the Divine blessing will be increased and even eminently vouchsafed to attend this noble Society concern, under which we are engaged and concerning which my mind, according to my measure, did feel much interested for many years preceding its adoption in the Yearly Meeting. My concern and sympathy have been increased at the present season from a renewed prospect of the benefit likely to arise, both to us, who are of the Committee, and the Superintendent, Tutors and Caretakers in every station, through the full predominance of a disposition of meekness, and being properly and mutually submissive to the Power that mortifies the creaturely will and deeds of the body; as hereby we shall become increasingly enabled to live in the life of Truth, and to ask wisdom in an acceptable and available manner to govern, assist and direct in all things, whereby the beloved youth who are and may be brought under the tuition and care of the institution, may be rightly instructed, exemplified, and led into the paths they ought to walk in, without being in anywise offended, through our little faults, or obstructed in a lively progression in true piety and virtue, or without suffering any hindrance therein through the prevalence of any wrong disposition, comparable to a "little folly," appearing in any of those entrusted with their tuition, or in the care and management of the institution. I am in the feeling of near sympathetic affection towards the Committee, Superintendent and wife, the Tutors, male and female,

Your loving friend and brother,

Geo. CHURCHMAN.

A Few Thoughts on the Fall of Man.

After Adam and Eve transgressed the command of God, they fell. Under the fall we are by nature prone to evil through their transgression. Now comes the question, When does a child become accountable for his actions or conduct; when does he receive that light that enlightens every one that comes into the world?

I believe we are born into the world with a seed of evil, by nature; but a child is not accountable till he arrives to the age to know evil from good, and transgresses the Divine laws; and that he is under sin as soon as he transgresses those laws, or disobeys them. Then the Lord visits us with his Spirit, showing us what is right and what is wrong. Some call it the light shining in darkness and we comprehend it not. If we will heed this light, it will lead us out of all evil, and then we will walk in the light and grow in grace day by day; then his Spirit will lead us and keep us. By our yielding our hearts or spirits unto Him, the great giver of all perfect gifts, He will lead us into the happy home where all of his children are ever at rest. This is done through repentance—"repent ye; the kingdom is at hand."

Here I think some of us miss our way. We are too curious in trying to pry into the hidden mysteries of God's will, and marking out our own way; and cry out, this is the way, walk ye in it! This is the way of self. My desire is that we, as a people, possessing as we do, may humble ourselves to the will of Christ; crying out, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? and wait the answer, then obey it. This will lead us out of all strife and contention and division. It will bind us into one brotherhood, in love one towards another, and shut out the old adversary that seeks to divide and scatter the flock of God's heritage. Let us make peace in the truth, and lay our foundation on the rock that cannot be moved.

JOHN MOON.

[In the above article it is stated, that a child comes under sin when it transgresses the Divine law; and it goes on to say, "Then the Lord visits us with his Spirit, showing us what is right and what is wrong." This might seem to imply that children are not visited by the Lord's Spirit until after they have done something that is wrong; and that the Light of Christ is first known as a reproof for evil. We scarcely suppose that the writer of the article intended to convey that meaning, as the general tenor of his article is in accordance with the doctrine of the Society of Friends, that the child is not guilty of sin till it violates the Divine law. The only way in which it can know this law is through the illumination of the Light of Christ showing what is wrong, and influencing the tender mind of the child to avoid it. If it disregards this warning, then the Light acts as a reproof for the evil.—Ed.]

Raising Cabbages.

Having been much interested in watching the operations of a farmer, who had devoted a portion of one of his fields to the raising of crop of cabbages, the observations made thereon and the reflections to which they gave rise have seemed to the writer to be instructive to his character, and have brought to mind some of the spiritual operations of the great good Husbandman.

After the field had been plowed and harrowed, a season of drought followed, which no planting could be done to advantage. Week after week passed, but until the winter rain descended, the farmer could do nothing with his ground. He was forced to wait with patience on Him "who gives us early and the latter rain." But when the ground had been watered from heaven, the following season of active labor and exertion. The young cabbages were to be procured from the persons who had raised them; the ridge of earth were to be thrown up by the plow, properly enriched, and the tender plants to be placed therein. Two elements were necessary to insure the successful growth of the crop—human labor and the blessing of heaven. Unless the rain had descended, which was altogether beyond his control, the farmer would have toiled in vain; but no amount of toil would have been fruitful of good results, if it necessary labor and skill in preparing the ground, and procuring and setting out the plants had not been exercised.

Is there not a similar process in our spiritual growth? Man, of himself is powerless work out his soul's salvation. He is entirely dependent on the mercy of his heavenly Father, who visits him with his grace, a good Spirit, and extends to him the call upon his heart and let the King of Glory come in. As Robert Barclay says: "Though there be a possibility of salvation to every man c ing the day of his visitation, yet cannot a man any time when he pleaseth, or hath some sense of his misery, stir up that Light and grace, so as to procure to himself tenderness of heart; but he must wait for it: which comes upon all at certain times and seasons, wherein it works powerfully upon the soul, slightly tenders it, and breaks it; at which time if man resists it not, but close with it, he comes to know salvation by it." Though it is heavenly rain, these times of refreshment which come from the presence of the Lord, are not in the control of man, yet there is a work for him to do also. He must open his heart to receive it, submit to its influence, walk in the path on which the light from heaven shines, do whatsoever it shows to be a duty, watch against evil, and as the apostle saith, work out his salvation with fear and trembling. If these visitations of Divine love do not thus improved, they will pass away, and the rain from the untilled earth, leaving hardened by that which was designed to be its fruitfulness.

After my friend had planted his field, the sun soon caused most of the plants to wither, that a person not familiar with farming operations would have feared that few of them would live. But the coolness and moisture of the nights were reviving to them, and a friendly shower which soon followed, ended the leaves to stiffen again, and settled the earth around the roots, so that it was soon found that the plants were established and thriving in their new home. The weeds were found to grow even more rapidly than the useful plants, and many days had not passed before the cabbages in some parts of the field were almost hidden by them. The wind and the hoe were set to work, and the cabbages were displaced or uprooted for the seed.

When the seed of the kingdom has been sown in the heart of man, and has taken root, and begun to grow, there is need of care and watchfulness lest it be choked and rendered unfruitful by the springing up of other weeds. We may have passed through trials and dispensations and visitations, which like the plow of the husbandman have upturned the soil of our hearts and left it as prepared and ready; yet the roots of spiritual weeds and seeds of evil may still be lurking there, ready to spring up and repossess the soil. There is need of constant vigilance and labor, and in the outward world and the spiritual. We must watch and pray that we enter not into temptation; we must bear the daily cross; we must labor in the Lord's vineyard. "Blessed be that servant, whom his Lord, when He cometh, shall find watching."

We may be deprived of outward consolation, and still have consolation of heart; but this is not all. We may be deprived, in the reign of God, and for wise purposes, of outward consolations also; and may be left for a season, in a state of mental barrenness and desolation; and yet faith, precious faith, distinguishing as this state of things may seem, shall still remain; and not fully merely, but with the strength and fulness of its exercise. We still our delightful privilege to say of ourselves, that he is our God, our Father, our Lord, and our portion. "Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord."

A fixed inflexible will is a great assistance in a holy life. Satan will suggest a thousand reasons why we should yield a little to the temptations by which we are surrounded; and let us ever stand fast in our purpose. A good degree of decision and tenacity of purpose is of great importance in the ordinary affairs of life. How much more so in the things of religion! He who is easily shaken will find the way of holiness difficult, perhaps impracticable. A double-minded man, he who has no fixedness of purpose, no energy of will, is "unstable in all his ways."—T. C. Upham.

THE INDIAN BOY.

[We have been requested to publish the following lines, written about the year 1812, by Samuel J. Smith of Burlington, N. J.]

From the blood-stained track of ruthless war,
An Indian boy had fled—his task begun;
Remote from his home, in the wild woods far,
A moss-bank pillowed his head.

His glossy hair was damp with dew,
His air was mild and meek—
And it seemed that a straggling tear or two
Had wandered down his cheek;

For he saw in his dream the bayonet's gleam,
He saw his kindred fall;
And he heard his mother's dying scream,
And the crackling flames take all.

In his feverish sleep he turned and rolled
"Mid the fern and the wild-flowers gay"
And his little hand fell on a rattlesnake's fold,
As coiled in the herbage it lay.

His head the stately reptile raised,
Unclenched his fiery eye;
On the sleeping boy for a moment gazed,
Then passed him harmless by.

'Twas well young savage, well for thee
It was only the serpent's lair,
Thy fate perchance would different be,
Had the white man slumbered there.

His short nap o'er, uprose the child,
His lonely way to tread;
Through the deepest gloom of the forest wild,
His pathless journey led.

Where high in air the cypress shakes
His mossy tresses wide;
O'er the beaver's stream, and the dark blue lakes,
Where the wild duck squadrons ride.

At the close of the day in a wildering glen,
A cave met his view;
And he crept well pleased in the sheltering den,
For chilly the night wind blew.

And soon his weary eyelids close,
Though something touched his ear,
'Twas only the famished she-wolf's nose,
As she smelt for her young ones near;

And forth he bled at the noon of night,
To seek her "customed prey"—
And the Indian boy, at the peep of light,
He too pursued his way.

'Twas well, young savage, well for thee,
It was only the wild beast's lair,
Thy fate perchance would different be,
Had the white man slumbered there.

But where, alas! poor wanderer, canst thou stray,
Where white intruders shall molest no more?
Like ocean's billows, their restless way
A whelming deluge spreads from shore to shore.

Their onward march, insatiate as the grave,
Still shall they hold; to provinces, province join;
Till bounded by the broad Pacific's wave,
Their giant empire seas alone confine.

And lo! their missions distant climes explore,
To spread the joyful gospel tidings far—
While warring in tenfold darkness, at their door,
The forest's children find no guiding star.

But oh! my country! though neglect alone
Were crime sufficient—deeper guilt is thine;
Thy sins of crimson, added to his own,
Have crushed the savage with a weight malign.

We seize the comforts bounteous Heaven has given,
With strange diseases vex him from his birth;
We sooth his sorrows with the hope of Heaven,
Yet drive him headlong from his home on earth.

As shrinks the stable from the rushing blaze;
Or feathered snow from summer's tepid air;
So at our withering touch his race decays,
By whiskey* poisoned, all that war may spare.

But can the Power, whose awful mandate rolled
This globe around, and gave all nations birth;
Can He the source of being, pleased behold
A people perish from the encumbered earth?

No—from their slumber let the good and wise
At length awaken, and their task begin;
Reform—enlighten—soften—christianize
The border savage—with the pater kin.

Then lead the wild man of the forest forth,
With kindness lure him; to his grief disclose
A new creation—make him feel the worth
Of all industry on a land bestows.

The page of knowledge to his view unroll,
The charms of virtue to his mind display;
And open wide on his benighted soul
The full effulgence of the Gospel Day.

EVENING.

Selected.

"Abide with us, for it is toward evening, and the day is far spent."—Luke

Sun of my soul! Thon Saviour dear,
It is not night if Thou be near;
Oh, may no earth-born cloud arise
To hide thee from thy servant's eyes.

When the soft dews of kindly sleep
My wearied eyelids gently steep,
Be my last thought, how sweet to rest
For ever on my Saviour's breast!

Abide with me when morn till eve,
For, without thee I cannot live;
Abide with me from night to night,
For without thee I dare not die.

Thou framer of the light and dark,
Steer through the tempest thine own bark;
Amid the howling wintry sea
We are in port if we have Thee.

If some poor wandering child of thine
Have spurned to lead the voice divine,
New, Lord, the gracious work begin;
Let him no more lie down in sin.

Watch by the sick; enrich the poor
With blessings from thy boundless store;
Be every mourner's sleep to-night
Like infants' slumbers, pure and light.
Come near and bless us when we wake,
Ere through the world our way we take,
Till in the ocean of thy love,
We lose ourselves in heaven above.

—Kelby.

Frozen Together.—During a season of great religious declension, an aged deacon was asked whether the church to which he belonged were united. "Ah, yes," replied the good man, with emotion; "for we are all frozen together."

One of the reasons for so much unanswered prayer, we believe, is that those offering it would shrink from the demand of God, which says, "Shall I answer in the way I think best."—Presbyterian.

* In reading an account of Indian life, by a woman who when a child was captured by Indians and lived among them all her life, I was struck by the statement that before the introduction of whiskey among them the death of a child was almost unknown, but after its introduction the children began to die the same as white people's children.

Allegheny Colored Schools.

We have received from S. M. Wickersham, of Pittsburg, Pa., a communication prepared by him for insertion in the papers of that city, explaining the action of the Board of Controllers of the Public Schools of Allegheny City, of which Board he is a member, in discontinuing a separate school for the colored children, which had been in existence for many years. This school was instituted under a State law of 1854, requiring the establishment of such separate schools. The communication states:—

"At the time of the passage of this act the Constitution of 1838 was in existence, under which the negro was debarred from all rights of citizenship; but the Legislature, seeing clearly the importance of educating all persons within the State, provided this method of so doing, and in deference to this law the Sherman avenue school was established and has since been kept up.

In 1866 the Constitution of the United States was amended, viz:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1.

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

On January 1st, 1874, the present constitution of Pennsylvania came into force, in which no exclusion on account of race and color exists, and in which appears:

ARTICLE X.

EDUCATION.

'Section 1. The General Assembly shall provide for the maintenance and support of a thorough and efficient system of public schools, wherein all the children of this Commonwealth, above the age of six years, may be educated, and shall appropriate at least one million dollars each year for that purpose.'

The decision of the State Superintendent of Instruction as to the qualifications for admission to the public schools, page 39—'School Laws and decisions of Pennsylvania'—is:

'§1. Residence in the district and fit age are the only requisites to entitle a person to admission to a common school in Pennsylvania.'

In the light of the above, it is apparent that now, no legal distinction of race or color remains, and that a separate school for colored children is a violation of both the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States, as well as of that of Pennsylvania, and the Board of Controllers of Allegheny recognizing their duty to abolish it, did so at their meeting of July 6th inst. S. M. W."

How many have been ruined by their reserves; giving up only in part; having only a half-way religion; striving to serve God and mammon, or something else beside God; living to themselves in gratifications, which, so far as indulged, never fail to keep the soul from dying into perfect life and liberty. Oh! the bondage. They bow down away; never rise superior to the power of the oppressor.

They see that rest or ease is seemingly good; so they bow down as between two burdens, and "become servants unto tribute." They have so much religion as makes wrong indulgences a burden to the tender-breathing life, yet so much reluctance to the entire death of the cross, as makes their religion a burden. So, between these two burdens, they are rather distressed tributaries than free subjects of either kingdom. My soul knows, and has deeply groaned under this cruel bondage; but, blessed be the Lord of liberty, He has so engaged my heart to follow Him, that it is, and has been for some considerable time, the fixed steady intention of my mind, through holy aid, to make war in righteousness, not in part only, but in true righteousness, with all evil of every kind. For I am, beyond doubt assured, that no other state will ever afford unshaken peace.

If all that profess to believe in perfection, did really believe in it, and steadily press after it, I believe God's kingdom would soon come on earth as in heaven, far more extensively than there is now any room to expect it soon to do. For, alas! where are they who even intend stealthily, and unceasingly, henceforward to deny themselves, take up their constant cross, and follow Christ fully, and wherever He leadeth. Few, I believe, with full purpose, even intend this; and without intending it, aye, and earnestly wrestling and laboring for it too, we shall never ascend to the top of the hill. We may have good desires at times; and now and then be alarmed, and resolve, and re-resolve; and yet make very little progress. And this, I fear, is too much the case with the great bulk of even our Society.

Our whole lives are short enough to finish the work our God has for us, even were we constantly engaged in the good fight against every evil motion. But until we engage in it without reserve, sin will have dominion over us; will reign; will more or less bring us into bondage. And while this is the case, we are in imminent danger, that we shall yet finally centre in the bondage of sin and corruption.—J. Scott.

A Scene at Glendalough.—Many years since S. C. Hall and wife visited Ireland, previous to writing their well-known work descriptive of its scenery and customs. On the occasion of their visit to Glendalough, the far-famed district of the Seven Churches, they observed a young lad seated on one of the tombstones, who, immediately on their approach, doffed his cap, and offered his services as guide over the district. A bargain was soon struck and the party drove off. The lad, full of the quaint old legends of the place, did his work well and to the entire satisfaction of his employers. Returning home after a day's thorough enjoyment, S. C. Hall took a flask from his pocket, and, after partaking of the contents, offered some to the lad. To his utter astonishment the offer was firmly but politely declined. An Irish boy who would not even taste whiskey was, indeed, a stranger sight than any he had seen during the day. He could not understand it. Resolved to test the lad's principles, he offered him a shilling, then half a crown, then five shillings, if he would drink the poisonous drug; but the lad was firm. Under the ragged jacket there throbbled a true heart. S. C. Hall determined, however, to conquer if possible, and finally offered him half a sovereign, a coin not often seen by lads of his class in these parts. I was a wicked act, and proved too much for the politeness even of an Irish boy. Drawing himself up in something well nigh akin to indignation, and pulling a Temperance medal from the folds of his ragged jacket, firmly told his tempter "that for all his money his honor might be worth he would not break his pledge." The history of the medal was soon told. It had belonged to the lad's father, who had spent the prime of his days in the service of the cruellest of task-masters—Drink. Until the advent of "Father Matthew's" happiness had been unknown in the home on the hill side. But with his advent, peace and joy prevailed. The medal was now round the lad's neck—a father's dying legacy to his son. Hence his noble and firm resolve. Nor was his heroism in vain. It was too much for S. C. Hall, who there and then screwed the top on the flask, and threw it into the lake by the side of which they stood. Since that day, and through the influence of that lad, he and his wife have been staunch teetotalers, aiding the movement by tongue and pen.

Religious Items, &amp;c.

Disestablishment.—The feeling among Non-conformists in favor of the separation of Church and State in England, is not one of hostility to the Episcopal Church itself. But they justly feel that it is a grievance to be taxed to support an Established Church with which they are not in sympathy, and from which they receive no benefit. In many places the clergy are paid by the State for taxes levied partly upon Dissenters, and paid large sums for trifling services. In one village of Scotland, for example, the clergyman receives £1,000 for attending to a parish of which he has but three members, or five comprising himself and his wife. A. Oliver, of Glasgow, states: "I am rated to help to pay the communion elements of my parish minister, but though I have been fifteen years in Glasgow I have never seen him—he does not look after his parishioners." Examples like these might be easily multiplied. No wonder that a Scotch minister indignantly exclaimed: "This is legalized robbery, and we shall not submit to it any more than we can help."

'Heretics' in Rome.—Roman Catholic papers of Rome express very hot indignation because a lot and building, once a convent of the barefooted Augustinians, but afterward, by order of Pope Pious IX., a barrack for soldiers, has been sold to some parties belonging to the Church of England for the erection of a place of worship. Cardinal Vicar Monaco La Valetta protests against the horrible outrage. "It is a contract which, while repugnant to the conscience of the Roman people, is stipulated in the name of the municipality of Rome. It is truly deplorable that the municipality, instead of endeavoring to obstruct the indefatigable efforts with which heresy tries to pervert this people, should facilitate its work opening for it another shelter in the midst of the city."

The Voce della Verità denounces as a grievous crime the permitting ministers of error to build churches in a country where the Catholic Apostolic Roman religion is the religion of the State.

It is well for American freedmen to recognize the spirit which rules at the fountain-head of the Papacy.

Papal Indulgences for sins and even crimes, still sold in the Philippines, by the Government, at its offices all over the country, at same counters with tobacco, brandy and very-tickets, and other articles of which Government retains the monopoly. The petual right to sell indulgences in Spain its colonies was granted to the Spanish by the Pope in 1750. In 1844-45 the Government received from this source of enue upwards of £58,000.

Natural History, Science, &c.

Tame Ostriches at Cape of Good Hope.—One hen ostrich was a pet about the house, used to do sad damage in the farm-yard, being the young goslings, swallowing them oysters. It was amusing to go into one the breeding paddocks; here a pair of criches were brooding on a nest of eggs, tiding, as usual, the labor between them. The cock was very savage and attacked all rders, so his master had a long pole with rk at the end of it, and when the ostrich at the party, he caught its neck in the k. The ostrich was excessively enraged, soon had to give in.

A kick from an ostrich is well known as y dangerous. The only thing to do when rked without means of defence, is said e to lie flat down and let the bird walk on till he is tired.—Moseley's Naturalist on "Challenger."

Manilla hemp is procured from a species banana, from the stems of which the fibres obtained by maceration.

Professor Schubeler, of Christiana, Norway, having been engaged for thirty years in studying the influences of climatic relations in rying, has made some interesting discoveries pecting the effects of the continuous sunh of the northern summer on the maturg of grains and fruits. Wheat brought from ssarabia and Ohio gradually acquired a her and darker color till it became like the tive Norwegian wheat. A similar improvat in color took place in field and garden ants. In no case did any plant which was apted to cultivation in the country at all e in color; on the other hand, many flowers nsplanted from Central Europe were larger d more intense in color. Even Scandinavian ants became brighter as they were taken in the southern part of the peninsula north. The flowers in color, the fruits gained in vor, and these aromatic & highly seasoned ants, which are esteemed in Europe on acant of the full development of their flavors such as the stronger kinds of celery, garlic, allots, and onions—became so strong under ighly northern culture, as to be unpleasant eat. The fruits at the same time lost in eetness, and golden drop plums and green es raised at Christiana and Drontheim, hile they were large, well-colored, and full vored, had a decided taste of unripe-ness. The conclusion drawn from these observa-ns, that light develops flavor, and heat eetness, is confirmed by the observations Dr. Edmund Goze on the fruits of Portugale. The strawberries of Coimbra are large and eet, but have no flavor, while the northern awberries are admired for their flavor, and a sweet Portuguese wine is inferior in aroma the northern wines. The continuous light ound to hasten rip ring, and more than mpenates for the retarding influences of the ver temperature. In this we have explained the facility with which varieties of cultivated plants adapt themselves to the shortness of the northern seasons.

Sea-Shore Sights.—Standing by the margin of the sea, we observe that the water breaks upon sand, gravel, mud, or strewn fragments of stone or shells, and that these materials pass down beneath it. If the shore is rocky, pools of salt water may be noticed, from which some idea may be formed of the nature of the bottom of at least the shallower parts of the sea. Each of these pools form, as it were, a miniature sea. Its sides are hung with tufts of delicate sea-weeds, and bright with clusters of sea anemones, while many a limpet and periwinkle stands fixed to the shore or creeps cautiously over its surface. The bottom of the water abounds in shady groves of seaweed, through which many tiny forms of marine creatures dart and crawl. As we look into one pool after another, we find them all to be more or less full of plant and animal life.

Turning from these shore pools to the edge of the sea itself when the tide is low, we mark that the ledges of rock support a thick growth of coarse, dark green, or brown tangles and sea-wrack, among which, if the water is still enough, tiny crabs, sea urchins, jelly-fish, and other bright-colored marine animals may be seen. If the water is examined from a boat, this forest-belt of large, dark sea weed is found not to extend to a greater depth than a few fathoms. Beyond it the bottom, whether rocky, sandy, or maddy, can be seen through the clear water, or may be examined by means of the dredge. Delicate scarlet sea-weeds, with corallines and deeper-water shells, inhabit these tracts. The sea-weed belt which fringes the land has an average breadth of about a mile. Beyond it, as we gradually get into deeper water, the common plants and animals of the shore are found one by one to disappear, and other kinds to take their place. The dredge may be dragged along some parts of the sea-floor and bring up only sand or mud, while at a short distance off it may come up full of many and varied forms of marine life, thus showing that there must be bare tracts of sand, mud, or stone on the sea-floor, and other patches where plants and animals are crowded together.—Harper's Magazine.

Punctuality.—A secretary of General Washington was once late in his attendance upon duty. When asked the cause, he excused himself by saying that his watch was out of order. "Then," replied the general, "you must get another watch, or I another secretary."

The tree will not only lie as it falls, but it will fall as it leans.—And the great question every one should bring home to himself is, "What is the inclination of my soul? Does it, with all its affections and powers lean toward God, or away from him?"

THE FRIEND.

EIGHTH MONTH 7, 1880.

We suppose all Christians believe that the primary ground or procuring cause of man's salvation is the goodness and mercy of our Heavenly Father, who so loved the world that He sent his only begotten Son into the world as a sacrifice for our sins, that whosoever believeth in Him might not perish, but might have everlasting life.

To the active mind meditating on these solemn subjects, many doubts, queries and suggestions are apt to occur—Why an all-wise, powerful and benevolent Deity should have permitted evil or suffering to appear in his creation? Why He should have ordained that the just should suffer for the unjust, and that our reconciliation to Him should be effected through the offering of his beloved Son, the Lord Jesus Christ? How it is possible to reconcile the Divinity of our Saviour and of the Holy Spirit with the Scripture declaration that there is but one God? Many such questions have presented to the busy mind of man, and they illustrate the truth of the Scripture assertion, that the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. "The natural man knoweth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." The grasp of our intellectual faculties is limited by Him who gave them, and it is only as we are divinely illumined by the Spirit of Christ, that we can see and understand spiritual truths. Hence our Society has always believed it safest to adhere very much to Scripture language when speaking of mysterious subjects, and not to venture on explanations or inferences which are the result of our own imaginations or reasonings.

We much desire that our members everywhere may stand on this safe ground, and not be drawn into speculations which may have a confusing and unsettling effect, especially in reference to the salvation of man. It is abundantly clear from the testimony of Scripture, that our blessed Saviour came into the world to save sinners, that He was wounded for our transgressions, that with his stripes we may be healed, that He offered up his outward life as a sacrifice for our sakes, that He bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we have redemption through his blood, even the forgiveness of sins, that "the remission of sins which any partake of is only in and by virtue of that most satisfactory sacrifice," for it is by the obedience of that One that the free gift is come upon all to justification.

It is equally clear that we cannot be saved without knowing the Spirit of the same Jesus Christ our Saviour, to rule in our hearts, there to lead, and to teach us; there to wash us from all defilement by his heart-changing operations. This Spirit of Christ is the free gift that is come unto all, purchased for us by his "obedience"—his sufferings and death. So that the true disciple of Christ may be said to be washed in his blood in a twofold sense—the expression having reference both to the outward offering which He made for the sins of mankind, and also to the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost which is shed on us abundantly through Him.

The Society of Friends has always fully recognized that the salvation of man depends both on the outward and the inward work of Christ—and has forborne to separate that which God has thus joined together.

We have been sometimes grieved to meet with the speculative disposition above referred to, directed to our Saviour Himself in his outward appearance; attempting to discriminate between flesh and spirit in a manner calculated to lessen that reverence which all should feel for Him who thought it not robbery to be equal with God. He who was from the beginning, by whom the worlds were made, took upon Him the form of a servant, even a body of flesh and blood such as we are clothed with. But the nature of that union of Divine and Human, we believe it is not for us to comprehend; neither do we believe it is prudent or safe to indulge in vain imaginations on such subjects.

It is often a source of encouragement and strength to observe the clearness of judgment and the attachment to our religious principles manifested by some who have been brought into our Society by conviction of the truth of its doctrines, and by being drawn to unite with those who are endeavoring to show to the world the blessed fruits they are calculated to promote.

One of these from a distant State, in writing to a Friend with whom he had met when on a visit in Pennsylvania, says: "Since mingling with Friends of your Yearly Meeting, I feel a strong attachment for your members. I do deeply deplore the condition of our Yearly Meeting. There have been so many departures, it seems to me, that there is but little left us but a name. Friends' general appearance is very unlike Friends; [from] their dress and address, and their manner of dealing, a stranger would not in many cases know who they were. I have not been a member of the Society very long, but if I am convinced of Friends' principles at all, and I trust I am, it is of the ancient form of Quakerism. I have no unity at all with this progressive spirit. I do desire that Philadelphia Friends may stand firm in the principle wherewith they have once been made free; for it does not look reasonable that the great Head of the Church will lead his people back into a place, whence He led them out with a high hand and an outstretched arm."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.
